THE Knowledge of the Hiſtory of any Country is of great Conſequence to its Inhabitants :——That of ENGLAND ſhould be the firſt Study of an Engliſhman. In arbitary States it may be of ſome Uſe to know the Proceedings of former ages ; but in a Land boaſting of its Freedom, they are peculiarly intereſting to every individual. The Author of this WORK, in exhibiting a faithful Picture of former Times, hopes, by alarming the Preſent, to preſerve the Liberties of the Future.

When we reflect on the noble Struggles made by our renowned Anceſtors in the Cauſe of Freedom, the holy Flame will be enkindled in our Breaſts, and we ſhall not tamely ſubmit to the Loſs of that Liberty which hath been purchaſed with the beſt Blood of the braveſt Men.

In the Courſe of this Volume the Writer hath taken peculiar Care to delineate with Fidelity every diſtinguiſhed Character ; and if the Colouring be ſometimes high, it is always juſt. Diſdaining to let the Royal Tyrant ſkulk behind the ſuppoſed Sanctity of his Character, he has dragged him forth to public View, and to public Contempt.——He has accompanied the Hero to the Field, and bound his Brow with Laurels :—— Nor has he forgot the modeſt merit of his fair Countrywomen ; but has given, in many Inſtances, a faithful Trait of the Female Virtues : always happy in an Opportunity of celebrating the Fortitude of the Man, and depicting the milder Graces of the Woman.

While Care hath been taken to brand the Vicious with the ſtrongeſt Mark of Infamy, the Writer hath not been leſs ſolicitous to reſcue modeſt Merit from the dreary Shade of undeſerved Obſcurity.

The gradual Advancement of RELIGIOUS KNOWLEDGE hath been recited with Fidelity ; the Extenſion of COMMERCE marked with Accuracy ; and the Progreſs of the FINE ARTS traced from their firſt faint Dawn, to their preſent Meridian Luſtre.

In a Word, whatever can tend to enlarge the Mind, improve the Underſtanding, and fan the ſacred Flame of FREEDOM, has been proſecuted with ſuch a Zeal, Integrity, and Fortitude, as he hopes will preclude the Neceſſity of beſpeaking the Favour of the Public.

BOOK I.

From the earlieſt Accounts of Time, to the final Departure of the Romans.

IT is generally difficult, often impoſſible, to diſcover the original inhabitants of any country. The events that happened during the infancy of nations are in time forgotten, or diſguiſed by fable and fiction: a thick cloud of ignorance and error broods over the tranſactions of early times. The firſt inhabitants of almoſt every kingdom were ſurrounded with difficulties, and expoſed to dangers; the whole country being little more than a continued foreſt, filled with beaſts of prey. Rude and ferocious in their manners, their chief employments were hunting and war. They were ſtrangers to learning, and wanted both leiſure and abilities to tranſmit their hiſtory to poſterity. It is therefore no wonder that the whole is little more than a ſeries of uncertain conjectures, mixed with a few facts, which glimmer thro' the veil of obſcurity; but afford too feeble a light to direct the hiſtorian in his reſearches.

Theſe remarks are unfortunately too applicable to the ancient monuments of the hiſtory of England. The origin of the firſt inhabitants cannot be traced with any degree of certainty: a vague and romantic tradition only remains to lead us through the intricate mazes of fabulous times. Some writers indeed have traced the origin of the Britons from Samothes, one of the ſons of Japhet; and others from Brutus, the grandſon of Æneas; but both theſe accounts are evidently fictitious, and have been long ſince exploded. The moſt probable opinion is, that this iſland was peopled at various periods, and from various parts of the continent; but it is impoſſible, at this diſtance of time, to determine the æra when the firſt ſettlement was made. The earlieſt expedition to this iſland founded on hiſtorical evidence, happened in the reign of Theutat, or Mercury, king of the Celtes, who, about 1860 years before the birth of Chriſt, ſent a colony into Britain, in order to increaſe the commerce of his ſubjects. Others followed their example, and ſpread themſelves into different parts of the iſland. Every family became a ſeparate ſociety; and thoſe who inhabited the inland parts, having no concern with the commerce carried on by their brethren, became in time a diſtinct people. They devoted themſelves entirely to a paſtoral life, and wandered from one part of the iſland to another in ſearch of paſture for their flocks and herds. They envied not the advantageous traffic of their brethren; they deſired not to ſhare in the buſy ſcenes of commerical employment. Strangers to the refinements of luxury, their wants were few, and eaſily ſatiſfied. Hunting and feeding their flocks formed at once their buſineſs and diverſions.

In their perſons they were tall, well proportioned and robuſt. Their hair, which was generally yellow, flowed looſely over their ſhoulders: they conſtantly ſhaved their faces, except their upper lip, where they ſuffered the hair to grow to an enormous length. They ſtained their bodies of a ſky-blue colour with the juice of woad, and wore no other covering than the ſkins of beaſts. Their ornaments conſiſted of coarſe paintings of flowers and animals on various parts of their bodies. Enured to all the inclemencies of the weather, to hardſhips and fatigue, and greatly addicted to hunting, they acquired a degree of fortitude and valour, which even their brethren on the continent, beheld with aſtoniſhment. Their agility was ſurpriſing, and the dangers they every day encountered among the rocks and precipices of their country rendered them almoſt ſtrangers to fear.

Honeſt, hoſpitable, and ſincere, they conſidered both the perſons and effects of ſtrangers inviolably ſacred; they thought it an indiſpenſible duty to afford them protection and defence againſt every inſult. Open and generous, they diſdained every ſpecies of deceit and artifice; manly and brave, they beheld effeminacy and indolence with deteſtation. Liberty was their darling object, and they made no ſcruple of ſacrificing their lives in its defence. They were ſo jealous of that noble acquiſition, that it was never entruſted in the hands of a ſingle perſon. Every tribe had indeed a chief, but his authority was at once both limited and precarious. His power was rather perſuaſive than coercive; he was reverenced as a father, rather than feared as a monarch. He had no guards, no priſons, no officers of juſtice; and one act of ill-judged violence was ſufficient to pull him from his throne. They were, however, very far from deſpiſing all kinds of authority, they were always attentive to the voice of wiſdom, which experience has conferred on the aged; and they willingly ſerved under the banners of a chief, in whoſe valour and military addreſs they had learned to repoſe their confidence. As a ſhade to all theſe virtues, they are charged with unbounded and even inceſtuous concubinage. But even this declined in proportion, as they became more civilized, and was ſoon after totally laid aſide.

Their habitations were mean huts, ſometimes formed of boughs of trees, reſembling arbours, and ſometimes of mud and clay, and generally covered with turf. Their towns were nothing more than a number of theſe huts, irregularly placed at ſmall diſtances from each other, and ſituated in the middle of a wood, all the avenues to which were blocked up with felled trees. They often changed the places of their abode according to the different ſeaſons of the year. In ſummer they generally inhabited the moſt fertile valleys, as affording the greateſt plenty of paſture and water for their cattle, and in the winter they removed to the hills, as being at once more dry and healthy.

While the Britons lived in this ſtate of natural tranquillity, the Belgæ finding themſelves greatly ſtreightened on the continent, ſent a colony into Britain. They were hoſpitably received by the inhabitants, and ſuffered to ſettle on the coaſt, where they applied themſelves to commerce and agriculture. Struck with the advantages reſulting from the latter, the natives applied themſelves to cultivate the ſoil. The increaſe was prodigious, and bread became the common food of the natives; the firſt refinement they received from their more opulent neighbours. The ſucceſs of theſe foreigners induced many of their countrymen to follow their example, till their number was ſo greatly increaſed, and their ſettlements extended over ſo large a part of the country, that the natives feared they ſhould ſoon want paſture for their flocks.

The tranquillity of the iſland was now deſtroyed; diſcord and faction ſucceeded to peace and unity. Divitiacus, king of the Sueſſones, took advantage of the civil commotions of the Britons, landed a conſiderable army on the coaſt, and being joined by great numbers of the Belgæ, inhabiting the maritime parts of the iſland, penetrated into the heart of the country, and reduced ſeveral of the inland provinces, which he garriſoned with Belgic troops. War and devaſtation now filled the iſland with blood and ſlaughter. The ſmaller tribes unable to defend themſelves againſt the inroads of the enemy, joined with others, and thus ſeventeen kingdoms, or principalities, were formed in the iſland; and each governed by an independent chief.

The names of the inhabitants of theſe principalities, and the counties they included, are exhibited in the following table.

Before the invaſion of Divitiacus, the Britons were totally ignorant of all military diſcipline; they hardly knew an inſtrument of war. Deſtitute of fortifications, they had no other retreat than their mountains, their defiles, their foreſts rendered more difficult by felled trees, and their bogs. Their only arms were ſharp-pointed ſticks, which they uſed as javelins, and long poles cleft at one of the extremities to receive a ſharp edged flint ſecured by a band of copper. A bell of the ſame metal was fixed at the other extremity, with the noiſe of which they endeavoured to terrify the enemy. But they learned from the Belgæ the uſe of the ſword, the dagger, and the target. They improved the war chariot, which they decorated very ſuperbly, and fixed ſharp iron inſtruments, reſembling ſcythes, to the axles. Their dexterity in managing theſe deſtructive chariots was amazing; they drove them with dreadful rapidity through the thickeſt ranks of the enemy's infantry, cutting down and trampling upon all that oppoſed their paſſage. They could ſtop them in an inſtant when in full ſpeed, and even on the declivity of a hill, leap from the chariot, run along the pole, and regain their ſeat, without checking the impetuoſity of the horſes. When they had penetrated into the center of the enemy, they leaped from their chariots, fought on foot till overcame with fatigue, and then vaulted into their ſeats. Endued with uncommon valour and perſeverance, and enured to hardſhips and fatigue, they charged the enemy with a fury ſcarce reſiſtable by troops not covered with armour. They advanced to the attack with every circumſtance that tended to inſpire the enemy with terror. They claſhed their arms in the moſt furious manner, raiſed a dreadful ſhout, while the hoarſe and jarring ſounds of uncouth inſtruments increaſed the confuſion of the wild uproar. The charge was dreadful: the tracks of their chariots were marked with blood and ſlaughter, and deſtruction hovered over the field of battle. But their being divided into ſeparate tribes, and governed by different chiefs, gave the enemy an advantage not eaſily retrieved. They were ſenſible of this, and endeavoured in ſome meaſure, to repair ſo pernicious a defect in the conſtitution of their country. When any eminent danger threatened their liberties, the ſtates were aſſembled, and a general was choſen, who commanded the whole army, and led the combined forces againſt the enemy. But though he had no equal in command, his power was not unlimited. He was ſubject to the orders of the aſſembly. The ſame authority that conferred, could deprive him of his command; and as ſoon as the danger was over he reſigned the enſigns of his power. A conſiderable interval of time, however, elapſed, before theſe precautions could be taken, during which the enemy was too often fluſhed with victory, and rendered more formidable by ſucceſs.

Though the inhabitants of the ſea-coaſts of Britain were addicted to traffic even from the time of Theutat, it is difficult, perhaps impoſſible, to enumerate all the commodities in which their commerce conſiſted. It is known that the Phœnicians, even before the ſiege of Troy, which happened 1190 years before Chriſt, carried on a conſiderable trade with the weſtern parts of the iſland for tin, which they ſold to other nations; giving the Britons pearls, ivory, ſilver and gold in exchange. The two former they manufactured, and in that ſtate ſold them to the merchants of Gaul. After the Belgæ had introduced agriculture, and extended the commerce of the iſland, the corn and wool of the Britons furniſhed valuable commodities, and were purchaſed with avidity by the traders on the continent. But the iſlanders were deſtitute of veſſels of burden: the art of ſhip-building was unknown to the Britons. They had only a few open boats, poorly conſtructed of wicker, and covered with pitched hides. In veſſels ſo ill adapted to out-live a ſtorm, very ſhort voyages only could be made; the tempeſtuous ſeas of Britain were not to be navigated in boats like theſe. The continent of Gaul was probably the fartheſt voyage they undertook, and this only in the ſummer months, and when the weather was calm and ſerene. Navigation, as well as ſhip-building, was introduced after the invaſion of the Romans.

But though the power of their chiefs was limited and precarious, that of their prieſts, whom they called Druids, was more abſolute and extenſive. Their influence in civil affairs was great, and in religious ceremonies abſolute and unlimited. They engroſſed all the learning of their country, and found their account in continuing the veil of ignorance over the eyes of a ſuperſtitious people. Skilled in every art that had a tendency to excite the admiration of an uninſtructed multitude, they were revered as ſomething more than mortal, and believed to be inſpired with the wiſdom of the deity. The education of youth was entruſted to their care, and without their approbation, no criminal could be executed. They were governed by a chief, called the arch-druid, whoſe power extended to the depoſition of kings. He was the ſupreme arbiter of all diſputes, and from his ſentence there was no appeal.

Every part of the druidical religion, was calculated to ſtrike the people with the terrors of ſuperſtition. Their altars were ſituated in the dark receſſes of ſome gloomy foreſt, and human victims were ſacrificed to their gods. Their ceremonies were always ſtriking; ſometimes dreadfully awful. The knowledge of the druids in aſtronomy was ſufficient for calculating eclipſes of the ſun, and they always took advantage of theſe phænomena. The people were ſummoned to the ſacred grove; the arch-druid preſided in perſon; and as ſoon as the eclipſe began, the victims were ſlain upon the altar. The horror of the ſlaughter was doubly augmented by the darkneſs, which the people conſidered as ſupernatural. Amidſt this ſcene of complicated diſtreſs, the arch-druid, agitated with enthuſiaſtic fury, and his hands reeking with human blood, addreſſed the gods; and continued his prayers till the darkneſs was over, when the wrath of heaven viſibly appearing to be appeaſed, he diſmiſſed the people with his bleſſing.

Perſuaded that the powers of nature were entruſted with their druids, and that their prayers were ſufficient to call down or avert the wrath of the gods; it is no wonder that an ignorant and ſuperſtitious people, almoſt adored them, and that their power was unlimited. But this power which they gained by art and deception, they uſed for the nobleſt purpoſes. They compoſed, by their mediation, the civil diſcords of their country. Their integrity was not be corrupted; their fortitude and perſeverance were uncommon. The great as well as poor trembled at their juſtice; for neither riches nor power were able to warp the equity of their deciſions. Their authority was ſufficient to ſoothe the rage of exaſperated armies, when on the very point of engaging. Fearleſs of the danger, and armed only by their ſacred character, they often ruſhed between the javelines of furious warriors, and calmed the raging ſtorm of contending paſſions into peace.

The oaks were ſacred among the druids; their conſecrated groves conſiſted entirely of thoſe trees; and their branches compoſed all the ornaments of their altars. The miſletoe of the oak was a peculiar object of veneration, being conſidered as the choiceſt gift of heaven. It was annually ſought for on the firſt day of the moon in the ſpring, with great caution and anxiety; and its diſcovery hailed by the acclamations of the multitude. The arch-druid, dreſſed in a long robe, aſcended the tree, and cropped the miſletoe with a golden pruning-knife. With this ſacred acquiſition in the ſkirts of his robe, he deſcended the tree, and offered a ſacrifice to the gods, to implore a bleſſing on their own gift.

It is not eaſy, at this diſtance of time, to diſcover the religious tenets of the Druids. All we know is that they believed in one ſupreme God, infinite, immortal and omnipotent; that all things derive their origin from heaven; that the ſoul is immortal, and that the righteous will be rewarded and the wicked puniſhed in a future life. Their idea of the deity was noble and ſublime. They believed his preſence filled the univerſe, his power ſupported the pillars of heaven, and his eye pervaded the inmoſt receſſes of the heart. “It was, ſays Tacitus, an opinion univerſally eſtabliſhed in all the countries where the religion of the Druids prevailed, that to ſuppoſe the preſence of the deity to be confined within any encloſed place, to repreſent him in an human form, or by any material image, was at once derogatory to his honour, and incompatible with his divine attributes.”

A. C. 55. Such were the ancient Britons, and ſuch the religious tenets they profeſſed, when Cæſar, after ſubduing the Gauls to the Roman yoke, meditated the conqueſt of their country. Animated with the deſire of extending the glory of his arms beyond the boundaries of the ocean, he determined to tranſport his victorious legions into this unknown country: the conqueror of Gaul muſt alſo triumph over the armies of the Britons. He pretended, indeed, that the Britons had aſſiſted the Gauls againſt the Romans; and that they had given refuge to the Belgæ, who had excited a revolt. This was conſidered as a ſufficient reaſon for hoſtilities, it having been long a maxim with the Romans to chaſtiſe all who had in any manner aſſiſted their enemies.

But whatever was the motive that excited Cæſar to engage in this expedition, it is certain that he took every precaution to inſure ſucceſs. He ſent Voluſenus in a ſingle ſhip to ſurvey the Britiſh coaſt, and obtain all the intelligence he could with ſafety. At the ſame time, he diſpached Comius, a Briton by birth, but a creature of his own, as ambaſſador to his countrymen, to perſuade them to form an alliance with the Romans, and put themſelves under the protection of the conqueror of Gaul. Both theſe atempts were rendered abortive. Voluſenus was not able to make any material diſcoveries, and Comius was loaded with chains, and treated as a traitor to his country.

No diſappointment was, however, ſufficient to check the ardour of Cæſar. He embarked two legions on board eighteen ſhips, ſailed from the coaſt of Gaul at midnight, and reached the Britiſh coaſt on the 26th of Auguſt, fifty-five years before the birth of Chriſt. Jealous of their liberties and religion, and acquainted with the deſign of the Roman general, the Britons had not been idle in making preparations for the defence of their country. Cæſar on his approaching the iſland perceived the ſhore lined with the natives to oppoſe his landing. His genius only was capable of ſurmounting the difficulties that now oppoſed his enterprize. Strangers to the manner of landing in the face of an enemy, deſtitute of boats, and incommoded by the ſurf of the ſea, the Roman ſoldiers ſhrunk from the danger; the conquerors of the world were for once intimidated. Cæſar perceived their confuſion, and exerted all his abilities to remove it; but ſtill the Romans refuſed to leap into the ſea amidſt a multitude of enemies who threatened their deſtruction. At length the ſtandard bearer of the tenth legion, with an intrepidity truly Roman, leaped overboard with the enſign in his hand, exhorting his brother ſoldiers to follow his example, as the only method to prevent their eagle from falling into the hands of the enemy. The ſenſe of honour now prevailed over the ſenſe of danger; and reproach effected what perſuaſion had attempted in vain. The whole legion followed their ſtandard-bearer, and the Roman army was ſoon engaged with the Britons. But here their boaſted diſcipline was of no advantage; the irregular manner of quitting their ſhips had thrown them into confuſion, and they were too vigorouſly aſſaulted by the Britons to form their ranks; the fortune of Cæſar was on the point of deſerting him. He ſaw the danger, and by a furious diſcharge from his engines broke the ranks of the enemy. The Romans took advantage of their diſorder and reached the ſhore. The fortune of the day was now entirely changed. The Romans recovered their ranks, attacked the Britons with their wonted intrepidity, and drove them from the field. The victory, however, was far from being complete; the Britons retreated to a neighbouring foreſt, and Cæſar thought it prudent not to perſue them. Convinced of the ſuperiority of the Romans, and dreading the effects of farther oppoſition to an enemy, now conſidered as invincible, the Britons releaſed Comius, and ſent him with their ambaſſadors to the Roman general, with offers of ſubmiſſion. A peace was concluded; they delivered ſome hoſtages, and promiſed to ſend others to the continent.

But the ſcene of war was hardly cloſed, before a violent ſtorm made dreadful havock in Cæſar's fleet. It happened in the middle of the night, ſo that the darkneſs augmented the horrors of the tempeſt. Some of the gallies were daſhed to pieces, and others that had been drawn up upon the ſhore, were filled with water. This dreadful misfortune ſpread ſuch univerſal terror and conſternation among the Roman ſoldiers, that they ſeemed not to be the ſame people. They had no materials for refitting their ſhips, and proviſions began to grow ſcarce in their camp. The heart of the intrepid Cæſar trembled for the conſequence.

The Britons perceived the diſtreſs of the enemy, and their innate love of liberty animated them to attempt the recovery of their independence. The warlike ſpirit of the generous iſlanders revived; their deteſtation of ſlavery rouzed them to action. Their ambaſſadors, after carefully viewing Cæſar's camp, ſecretly withdrew to their countrymen, that they might be more than ſpectators in the noble ſtruggle for freedom. They collected their ſcattered forces, and endeavoured to cut off all ſupplies of proviſions from the Roman camp.

Cæſar had foreſeen the conſequence, and took every precaution to render the attemps of the enemy abortive. He ordered all the harveſt of the neighbouring fields to be ſecured, and a magazine of corn to be collected within the fortifications of his camp. He refitted one of his gallies, and ſent her to the continent of Gaul for the neceſſary materials for refitting the reſt. In the mean time the fragments of the ſhips which the ſtorm had rendered irrepairable, were uſed with aſſiduity and ſucceſs. In ten days the remainder of his fleet was completely repaired. The Roman courage again revived, and the flame of conqueſt once more warmed the breaſts of theſe intrepid veterans. They had gathered in the greater part of the harveſt without diſturbance, and the paſſive behaviour of the Britons ſeemed to convince them, that their alarming apprehenſions had no other foundation than their own fears.

The moſt diſtant field of corn was ſtill untouched, and the ſeventh legion diſpatched to reap it. But they had hardly begun, when they found themſelves attacked by a numerous army of Britons, who had concealed themſelves for that purpoſe in a neighbouring wood. The Romans perceived their danger, and prepared for a retreat: but this was impoſſible. The Britons ſurrounded the field with their war-chariots, whoſe axles were armed with ſcythes, and attacked the Romans with a fury to which even theſe experienced ſoldiers, nurſed in the lap of ſlaughter, were wholly ſtrangers. Fortunately for them, and fortunately for their leader, the advanced guard of the camp perceived an unuſal cloud of duſt, and gueſſed the cauſe. Cæſar was alarmed, and flew at the head of the guard to the aſſiſtance of his diſtreſſed legion. His arrival prevented a general ſlaughter. Overpowered by numbers, and a retreat rendered impoſſible, a very ſhort interval of time muſt inevitably have determined the fate of this intrepid legion. The preſence of their general inſpired them with freſh courage: the attack of the Britons became more languid: they opened their ranks and retired to ſome diſtance, and Cæſar, after joining his legion, drew up his forces in order of battle; but the Britons not advancing to the charge, he retired unmoleſted to his camp. This is the only inſtance of that general's ever neglecting to pour his vengeance on the foe. Perhaps it is not too much to ſay, that Cæſar was, for the firſt time, obliged to leave the palm of victory in the hands of the enemy.

Convinced that the Romans, however powerful, were not invulnerable, and elated with their late ſucceſs, the Britons imprudently undertook what they were unable to perform. They ſent diſpatches into all parts of the iſland, inviting the chiefs of the petty ſtates to join them with all their forces, that they might aſſault the Roman camp, and pour deſtruction on the heads of the invaders of their county. A numerous army was ſoon collected, and the Roman intrenchments attacked with all the fury of an enraged multitude. Cæſar, with great tranquillity, beheld the irregular and unſucceſsful aſſault. He drew out his legions before the principal gate of his camp; and charged the undiſciplined Britons with ſo much impetuoſity, that they were unable to ſuſtain the ſhock. They fled in confuſion to their foreſts, and trembled leſt the Romans ſhould follow them to their retreat.

In this dreadful ſituation, the Britons once more ſued for peace; nor was their requeſt diſagreeable to Cæſar. Deſtitute of cavalry, he found it impoſſible to purſue his advantages by following the enemy into the inland parts of the iſland, the only method of ſecuring his conqueſt. The late battle was far from being deciſive; the Britons were defeated; but they had ſtill prodigious reſources, and their paſſion for liberty would not yet ſuffer them to ſubmit to the galling yoke of ſlavery. Proviſions began to grow ſcarce in his camp, the harveſt was over, and his army, though victorious, had ſuffered greatly, and were averſe to winter in an enemy's country, and in an iſland wholly unknown. Cæſar therefore readily admitted the ambaſſadors, and ſigned another treaty of peace with the Britons. Senſible of his own dangerous ſituation, and that the iſlanders would obſerve the peace no longer than they were in a condition to break it, he embarked his legions, ſailed on the twentieth of September, and, after a ſhort paſſage, landed ſafely on the contient of Gaul.

Whatever luſtre may adorn the victories of Cæſar; and whatever applauſe may be due to his capacity, his conduct, his intrepidity, yet ſurely his invaſion of Britain can be conſidered in no other light than that of the oppreſſive act of a lawleſs tyrant. Actuated ſolely by ambition, and deaf to the ſoft whiſpers of humanity, he trampled on the laws of nations, and deluged the fields of a country to which he had not even a pretended claim, with the blood of its innocent inhabitants. Virtue was ſacrificed to ambition, and juſtice hurled from her ſeat by the hand of oppreſſion. Let the bold invaders of the natural rights of mankind, view the baſe acts of tyranny with delight, and applaud the man that ſpurns at the laws of immutable juſtice; but let Britons, who pretend at leaſt to found their actions on the ſolid baſis of virtue and honour, withdraw the flimſey veil which vice has woven for deformity, and diſplay, in their genuine colours, the flagitious actions of every oppreſſor of the human ſpecies.

The Britons were no ſooner freed from the invaders of their country, than they determined not to obſerve the peace they had concluded from neceſſity. Cæſar alſo made preparations for invading the iſland in the ſpring with a more formidable force. Warlike preparations were made in the ports of Gaul with great vigour and diſpatch. Ships and military ſtores were collected in the harbours of Spain, and every precaution taken for riveting the chains of ſlavery on the arms of the Britons.

Alarmed at theſe preparations, and determined to exert their utmoſt force in the defence of their liberties, their country, and religion, the Britons entered into a general aſſociation, and elected a commander in chief over all their forces. Two generals, equal in abilities, and equal in valour, were candidates for this important poſt of dignity and honour. Caſſivellaunus chief of the Caſſii, or inhabitants of Hertfordſhire, and Imanuentius, general of the Trinobantes, or inhabitants of Middleſex, were the two perſons between whom the lot of pre-eminence was for ſome time ſuſpended. The conteſt was warm and ſpirited; the ſuffrages were divided till the death of Imanuentius, who loſt his life in the conflict, and put an end to the debate. Caſſivellaunus was proclaimed general of the Britiſh forces, and Mandubratius, the ſon of Imanuentius, to avoid the fate of his father, fled to Cæſar for protection.

The time of embarkation now advanced apace, and Cæſar ſaw his fleet increaſed with ſix hundred new tranſports and twenty-eight gallies, which, with the remains of his old ſquadron, he conſidered as abundantly ſufficient for his intended invaſion. This numerous fleet rendezvouſed in the port of Itium, now Calais, as neareſt to the Britiſh ſhore. Here he embarked his forces, which conſiſted of five legions of foot, and two thouſand horſe; and in the beginning of June, fifty-four years before the birth of Chriſt, left the port of Itium at ſun-ſet. The next morning they approached the Britiſh coaſt, and came to an anchor near Deal, the place where Cæſar made his former deſcent.

Diſconcerted at the appearance of ſo formidable a fleet, the Britons abandoned their firſt reſolution of defending the ſhore, ſo that Cæſar, to his great aſtoniſhment, landed his forces without oppoſition. A convenient ſpot of ground on Barham Downs was marked out for a camp, and Q. Atrius, at the head of a ſufficient detachment, was left to guard the ſpot, and fortify it with the utmoſt expedition, that in caſe of any misfortune, it might afford a ſecure retreat. This precaution being taken, Cæſar ſet out at midnight with the main body of his army, in ſearch of the Britons. After a march of twelve miles, he diſcovered the enemy poſted in a very advantageous ſituation, having the river Stour in their front, and a thick wood in their rear. Their war-chariots were drawn up in great order along the bank of the ſtream, the paſſage of which they determined to defend. The attack was begun by the Roman cavalry, who charged the Britons with ſuch impetuoſity, that they ſoon forced the paſſage, and the Britons retreated into the wood in their rear. All the avenues were fortified with ramparts compoſed of large trees laid acroſs one another to a conſiderable height. Nor were theſe the only defences of this intricate and gloomy retreat. In the center of the wood was a very ſtrong fortreſs, conſtructed during the civil wars, which ſome time before raged in this part of the country.

The difficulty of forcing a paſſage through thoſe rude, but ſtrong ramparts, was ſufficiently apparent. The Roman cavalry made ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, in which they were greatly haraſſed by the Britons, and were at laſt obliged to abandon the attempt to the infantry. The fortifications for ſome time baffled all their force; at laſt, the ſeventh legion was ſucceſsful, and the Britons were driven from their poſt with great ſlaughter.

Cæſar now determined to purſue the advantage he had gained over the enemy; but before he could carry his deſign into execution an expreſs arrived from Q. Atrius, informing him that a dreadful ſtorm, during the preceding night had deſtroyed the greater part of his fleet. The preſervation of his navy now engaged his whole attention, and obliterated the deſire of victory. Inſtead of following the enemy, Cæſar marched to the ſea-coaſt, where he was himſelf witneſs of the havock made by the tempeſt. Forty of his ſhips were entirely deſtroyed, and the reſt greatly damaged. He was now convinced that it was neceſſary to ſecure his navy from future misfortunes before he could with ſafety purſue the flying enemy. He ordered his veſſels to be drawn on ſhore above the reach of the waves, and ſurrounded by the fortifications of his camp. The ſoldiers applied themſelves with great alacrity to this aſtoniſhing undertaking; and having completed the deſign, Cæſar, after leaving a proper force for the defence of his marine camp marched again in purſuit of the enemy.

This misfortune, which had ſo greatly alarmed the Romans, revived the courage of the Britons, their numbers daily increaſed, and they again took poſſeſſion of the wood they had been forced to abandon. Experience had convinced Caſſivellaunus, that his forces were no match for the Romans in the open field; and he therefore took the wiſe precaution of avoiding a general engagement, and to content himſelf with haraſſing the enemy with flying parties, and cutting off their proviſions. Cæſar ſoon felt the effects of theſe prudent meaſures. His forces were continually attacked, with amazing impetuoſity, by ſmall parties who iſſued ſuddenly from their coverts, and as ſuddenly retreated. They were indeed generally repulſed, but not diſheartened; they returned to the charge with the ſame vigour, and with the ſame unſhaken firmneſs.

Cæſar was now ſufficiently alarmed. He ſaw the conſequence of being diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, and his troops perpetually haraſſed by flying parties of the enemy. He therefore determined to fortify his camp, and endeavour to bring the Britons to a general engagement. Caſſivellaunus, who watched every motion of the Roman general, thought it prudent to attack them before the ramparts were completed. Accordingly, while the Romans were buſily engaged in their works, he ruſhed upon them with the utmoſt fury; the advanced guard, unable to ſuſtain the ſhock, gave way, and a great ſlaughter enſued. Cæſar ſaw their diſtreſs, and ſent two cohorts to their aſſiſtance. But intimidated by the dreadful execution of the Britons, they halted inſtead of joining their companions. Caſſivellaunus perceived their conſternation, attacked them with his uſual force, and routed them with conſiderable loſs. Several Roman officers, particularly Quintus Laberius Durus, a tribune, were among the ſlain.

This ſucceſs proved fatal to the Britons. Jealous of the honour obtained by Caſſivellaunus, ſeveral of the petty princes left the camp; abandoning at once the cauſe of liberty and the intereſt of their country. The Romans, who expected a ſecond attack, were ſurpriſed when the morning diſcovered only a ſmall number of the enemy on the hills, at ſome diſtance from their camp, diſperſed in ſcattered parties, who ſeemed to decline an engagement. This change of conduct ſeemed myſterious to Cæſar, who detached three legions of foot, ſupported by all his horſe, on a foraging party, under the command of Tribonius. The deſertion of a very conſiderable part of his army had no other effect on Caſſivellaunus than that of rendering him more circumſpect in his conduct. He determined to haraſs the Roman detachment. Accordingly the horſe was attacked with ſuch fury, that they were obliged to fall back upon the foot. This ſmall advantage brought on a general engagement.

The Britons ruſhed from their retreat, and fell upon the invaders of their country with their uſual violence. But the compacted ranks of the Romans ſuſtained the ſhock, and totally defeated the Britiſh army.

This misfortune completed the deſertion which jealouſy had begun. The confederacy was now almoſt totally deſtroyed; and the Trinobantes, who had hitherto been kept within the bounds of their duty, by the power of Caſſivellaunus, abandoned the cauſe of their country, and put themſelves under the protection of Cæſar. Strengthened by this acquiſition, and freed from the danger of a general oppoſition, the Roman general turned his whole force againſt the unfortunate Caſſivellaunus, whoſe country was now devoted to deſtruction. The Briton perceived the gathering ſtorm, and took every poſſible precaution to break its force. He croſſed the Thames at the head of his diminiſhed army, and determined there to make a ſtand againſt the conqueror of the world. He fortified the oppoſite bank with palliſadoes and intrenchments; and, in the only place where the ſtream was fordable, he drove into the bed of the river a great number of ſtakes, which were ſharpened at the top and concealed under the ſurface of the water.

But theſe artful diſpoſitions were of little advantage to Caſſivellaunus. Cæſar was informed of the contrivance by deſerters, and took the neceſſary precautions for rendering the whole abortive. The Roman horſe firſt plunged into the ſtream, and were followed by the foot with the greateſt alacrity, though incumbered with their heavy armour, and the water up to their chins. Struck with aſtoniſhment at the ardor and intrepidity of the Romans, whom no obſtacle could ſtop, no difficulty intimidate, the Britons abandoned their intrenchments, and retreated to the woods, where alone they could hope for ſafety. Caſſivellaunus now perceived that all reſiſtance was in vain, and therefore determined to ſpare the lives of his followers, that when any favourable opportunity ſhould offer, he might be able to revenge the diſtreſſes of his country. He therefore diſmiſſed his forces, retaining only four thouſand chariots, in order to cut off the ſtraggling parties, and, if poſſible, prevent the Romans from obtaining proviſions ſufficient to ſupport their army. This conduct was more alarming to Cæſar than all the attacks of the Britons. He found that the prudence of Caſſivellaunus was equal to his valour. The cattle were, by his orders, driven from the fields, and the corn taken from the granaries; ſo that the Romans had no other ſubſiſtance than the ſcanty pillage of a few inconſiderable farms.

But theſe prudent meaſures were rendered abortive and the Romans enabled to purſue their march by the puſillanimous behaviour of the Ceni magni, or inhabitants of Surry, who perceiving that the Trinobantes were freed from the calamities of war, and lived in tranquillity under the protection of Cæſar, determined to follow their example. They ſent an embaſſy to the Roman general, with offers of ſubmiſſion. Their ambaſſadors met with a favourable reception. A peace was concluded, and the Ceni magni furniſhed the Roman army with proviſions. Cæſar now purſued his march to the capital of Caſſivellunus, marking his rout with blood and devaſtation. Every village was laid in aſhes, and the whole country rendered a ſmoking deſert.

The capital of the Britiſh general conſiſted only of a number of huts, ſituated in the center of a wood, the avenues to which were ſtrongly fortified with ditches, ramparts of earth, and felled trees. Theſe fortifications, though formed in the rudeſt manner, appeared formidable to the Romans. They had before experienced the difficulty of ſtorming ramparts defended by troops driven to deſpair. Cæſar ſaw the danger, and therefore ordered the fortifications to be attacked at two different places. The ſtratagem ſucceeded. Caſſivellaunus had no aſſiſtant capable of defending the rampart againſt the enemy. His preſence was neceſſary at both the avenues attempted, and wherever he commanded, the Romans were repulſed. But he could not divide his attention, and therefore thought it more prudent to retreat. The Romans now forced the rampart, and poſſeſſed themſelves of the deſerted capital. They found, however, great quantities of corn and cattle, Caſſivellaunus having made this place a general magazine of proviſions, and a retreat for his ſubjects with their flocks and herds.

Deſerted by his friends, and defeated by his enemies, his capital taken, and his territories laid waſte, Caſſivellaunus was ſupported only by his own greatneſs of ſoul. He ſtill retained the noble ſpirit of his anceſtors. He preferred liberty in diſtreſs to ſlavery in affluence; and though unable any longer to ſupport the cauſe of his country, he planned an expedition, which had it ſucceeded, would have overwhelmed the invaders with diſtreſs. Cæſar had left his navy within the intrenchments of his camp on the ſhore, and was now above eighty miles diſtant. The Kentiſh princes were ſtill firm in their alliance, and ready to act againſt the invaders of their country. Caſſivellaunus thought a favourable opportunity now offered for deſtroying the Roman fleet. He ſent expreſſes to the princes of Kent with orders to collect their forces privately, and attack the entrenchments of the enemy before they received any intimation of their deſign. His orders were ſtrictly obeyed; but unfortunately for the Britons, the ramparts of the Romans reſiſted all their efforts. They were repulſed, and the Romans, not content with defending their fortifications, ſallied out upon the aſſailants, put them to flight, and took their general priſoner.

Caſſivellaunus was now convinced that all oppoſition was in vain. He ſaw that his continuing any longer in arms contributed only to prolong the miſeries of his country; and was therefore deſirous of ſheathing the deſtructive ſword of war. He ſent an ambaſſador to Cæſar, who liſtened to his offers, and concluded a general peace with the Britons on the following conditions: that they ſhould ſubmit to the Roman ſtate, pay an annual tribute, and ſend a number of hoſtages to Rome, as a ſecurity for the performance of their engagements. It was alſo agreed, that Mandubratius ſhould continue unmoleſted in his dominions.

A general pacification having taken place, Cæſar returned to his naval camp, and prepared for his departure. His ſhips were launched and refitted with the greateſt expedition, and about the middle of September he ſailed for the coaſt of Gaul, which he reached after a ſafe and quick paſſage. On his return to Rome, he offered a croſlet of Britiſh pearls at the ſhrine of Venus Genetrix, from whom he was ſaid to be deſcended; and to fix a laſting remembrance of his expeditions into Britain, he employed his priſoners in adjuſting the tapeſtry ſcenes of the threatre, on which the victories he gained over the Britons were repreſented; while others of a more robuſt conſtitution, were employed in carrying the ſedans of the ſenators and principal nobility.

If we candidly examine the ſecond expedition of Cæſar, it will appear rather ſplendid than effectual. He penetrated indeed much farther into the iſland, and formed alliances with ſeveral of the petty princes; but he retained not a foot of ground, nor procured any ſolid advantage to his country. He did not think it prudent to winter in the iſland, nor even to leave part of his army in garriſon to keep the Britons in ſubjection. He retired rather as a defeated general, than a conqueror; and after laying part of the country waſte, and manuring the fields with the blood of their maſters, he left the Britons to repair the devaſtations, and cultivate with new ardor the lovely plant of liberty and independence. The treaty he concluded can be conſidered only a temporary ſubmiſſion, and of which he took no care to ſecure the continuance. All the honour therefore that juſtly belongs to that celebrated general, conſiſts in his having carried the Roman arms, beyond the boundaries of the ocean, and defeated the inhabitants of an iſland known to his countrymen only by the name.

The death of Cæſar lighted up the torch of civil diſcord in Rome, and the affairs of Britain were forgotten amidſt the diſtractions that filled the capital of the world. The Britons themſelves were either too ignorant or too careleſs to tranſmit to poſterity the tranſactions of their country. An interval of ſeveral years intervened without affording any remarkable events to fill ~~the page of hiſtory~~. All that can be collected is, that Caſſivelluanus ſeverely chaſtiſed the Trinobantes, for having joined the invaders of their country; and that at his death he left his crown to his nephew Tinuantius, who was ſucceeded by his ſon Cunoboline, a prince of great talents, improved by an excellent education at Rome.

Soon after Auguſtus was ſettled on the imperial throne, he undertook to compel the Britons to obſerve the treaty they had made with Julius Cæſar, and accordingly advanced into Gaul to carry his deſign into execution. A revolt in Panonia rendered his return neceſſary, and for ſome time ſuſpended his expedition. But as ſoon as the tranquillity of that province was reſtored, Auguſtus once more marched into Gaul, where he was met by an embaſſy from Britain, and a peace was immediately concluded. From this period the Britons maintained a friendly correſpondence with the Romans during the reign of Auguſtus, and that of his ſucceſſor Tiberius. They paid no other tribute than a ſmall duty on merchandize exported to Gaul, the only remaining mark of ſubjection; in all other reſpects they were a free and independent people. This intercourſe between the Britons and the continent ſoftened their ferocious manners; they grew inſenſibly enamoured of the Roman arts, and began to cultivate them with ſucceſs. Several of the Britiſh princes reſided at Rome, and others ſent their ſons thither for their education.

But though the Britons were not oppoſed by any foreign enemy, civil diſcord ~~frequently~~ raged among the petty chiefs of the iſland. Cunoboline, the moſt powerful prince in Britain, was properly the chief of the Caſſivellauni, but he had reduced the Trinobantes, the Dobuni, and ſeveral other provinces to ſubjection, ſo that he was now the moſt powerful prince in the iſland. He coined money to pay the duties impoſed by the Romans on Britiſh merchandize imported into Gaul.

During his reign, a detachment of Roman troops under the command of Germanicus, in their return from the victory they had gained over Armenius on the banks of the Weſer, were ſhip-wrecked on the coaſt of Britain. Theſe unfortunate veterans were received by the natives with the greateſt humanity, and afterwards conveyed ſafely to their country in ſhips provided by Cunoboline. That prince had hitherto enjoyed a continued ſeries of proſperity. Beloved by his ſubjects, and eſteemed by foreigners, he was conſidered as one of the moſt fortunate princes of his age: but a cloud of domeſtic diſtreſs obſcured the evening of his life. Adminius his eldeſt ſon, was of a cruel tyrannical temper. He trampled on the laws of juſtice, and endeavoured to raiſe an unnatural rebellion againſt his father. The people were diſtreſſed and laid their complaints at the foot of his throne. Perſuaſion and reproof were tried in vain, Adminius was not to be reformed. Parental fondneſs on the one hand, and a love of juſtice on the other, haraſſed the breaſt of Cunoboline: the latter prevailed, and Adminius was baniſhed. Exſperated at a ſentence which he conſidered as cruel, and determined to revenge the diſgrace, he repaired to Rome, and perſuaded Caligula, who then ſwayed the imperal ſcepter, to undertake the conqueſt of his country. He repreſented the Britons as a weak and divided people, averſe to union, and unable to defend their country againſt the attack of a feeble enemy; the very appearance of the Roman emperor would be ſufficient to reduce them to obedience.

A. D. 39. Pleaſed with the hopes of making ſo important a conqueſt without danger or fatigue, the weak, the proud, the puſillanimous Caligula, embraced the deſign of ſubduing Britain, a taſk which even the great and intrepid Cæſar had attempted in vain. He aſſembled an army of two hundred thouſand men, and advanced in perſon to the northern coaſt of Gaul, in order to invade the Britiſh iſland. Elated with the idea of reducing a people that had hitherto ſupported their independence againſt every attempt, he haſtened the embarkation of his troops, and ſeemed deſirous of treading in the ſteps of his great anceſtor. But before his ſhips were ready to ſail, advice arrived, that the Britons, informed of the intended invaſion, were drawn up in order of battle on the ſhore, and determined to ſpill the laſt drop of their blood in defence of their country. The emperor was intimidated; the very idea of danger was ſufficient to induce the daſtardly Caligula to diſembark his forces. But his vanity was equal to his cowardice: he was deſirous of receiving the honours of a triumph, without treading the thorny path of conqueſt; and of wearing the wreath of victory, without facing an enemy. He ventured out to ſea in his galley attended by his principal officers, and after ſurveying, at a great diſtance, the Britiſh coaſt, he returned with all the pomp and parade of a conqueror: ordered his ſoldiers to fill their helmets with ſhells, which he called the ſpoils of the ocean, and ſent them to Rome as the trophies of his victory. A triumph was decreed him by the venal ſenate, and Caligula entered Rome in all the parade of a victor over a people he dared not attack. And to perpetuate this ridiculous expedition, or rather to tranſmit his own folly to poſterity, he erected a watch-tower on the ſtrand, on the top of which a fire was kept burning, during the night, for the direction of mariners. The remains of this ſtructure may ſtill be ſeen at low water, on the ſands near Boulogne.

The long intercourſe the Britons had now carried on with the Romans, had greatly abated their averſion to that people. They cultivated their arts and imitated their manners. Theſe would indeed have proved happy acquiſitions, could they have been introduced without alloy: but unfortunately for our countrymen, they imported their luxuries with their arts. The hardy Britons ſunk into indolence and eaſe; their natural love of liberty and independence was ſoftened by effeminence, and that union which forms the only bound of ſecurity in times of diſtreſs, was diſſolved: the Britons had loſt their liberty before they were ſenſible of their danger.

While Caligula wore the imperial crown, no danger was to be feared, and this tended to increaſe the inattention of the Britons: they ſlept ſupinely on the couch of ſecurity. Claudius, who ſucceeded Caligula, was not leſs timid than his predeceſſor, but wholly governed by favourites. Theſe ſycophants, either deſirous of increaſing the reputation of their maſter, or of ſharing in the ſpoils of ſo important a conqueſt, perſuaded the emperor to undertake the reduction of Britain. The reſolution being taken, pretences ſoon offered for beginning hoſtilities. Beric, a Britiſh prince, who had been baniſhed from his country for endeavouring to excite a rebellion in favour of Adminius, repaired to Rome, and complained of having been unjuſtly condemned; offering at the ſame time, to aſſiſt Claudius in the reduction of the iſland. Before any anſwer could be given to Beric, an embaſſy arrived from Britain to demand the Britiſh fugitive. They were received with contempt, and given to underſtand, that if the long neglected payment of the tribute was ſtill delayed, it would be demanded at the head of a Roman army.

Confounded at ſo unexpected a reception, the ambaſſadors made no reply. They left Rome immediately, and repaired with the utmoſt expedition to their country. Cunoboline had ſome time before paid the debt of nature, and his two ſons Caractacus and Togodumnus, taken poſſeſſion of the government. Theſe princes highly reſented the ignominious treatment ment of their ambaſſadors, and rejected the demand with diſdain. They prohibited all future intercourſe with the Romans, and took every precaution in their power to defend the liberty and independence of their country. They raiſed a numerous army, and encamped near the ſea-coaſt, in order to prevent the landing of the enemy.

A. D. 43. Claudius, confident of ſucceſs, gave the command of his army in Gaul, to Aulius Plautius, a citizen of great reputation, and famous for his military capacity, with orders to tranſport a conſiderable army into Britain; enjoining him at the ſame time, not to finiſh the conqueſt himſelf; but ſend him timely information, that he might reap the fruits of victory in perſon. The emperor was deſirous of enjoying the honours of a triumph, without experiencing the fatigues of a campaign.

Plautius, in obedience to the imperial orders, led a large body of troops to the ſea ſhore, where a ſufficient number of ſhips were provided for tranſporting them into Britain. The embarkation was hardly begun, before a mutiny appeared among the ſoldiers. They declared they were ready to follow their general to any part of the continent, but would not paſs the boundaries of the ocean; they refuſed to plant the Roman eagles in what they called a new world. Aſtoniſhed at the behaviour of the legions, and perceiving that no arguments could prevail, Plautius ſuſpended the embarkation and diſpatched an expreſs to the emperor, who ſent Narciſſus, a perſon univerſally deſpiſed, and who had lately been freed from ſlavery by his maſter. He aſcended the roſtrum in order to harangue the troops: but his attempt was vain. Exaſperated at ſeeing the place, which had always been ſacred to intrepid generals, who had ſhared in common with the dangers and fatigues of war, prophaned by a ſlave, the ſoldiers ſet up an univerſal cry, in which the voice of Narciſſus was totally loſt; they would not ſuffer a perſon deſtitute of merit, and hardly free from the ſhackles of ſlavery, to interpoſe in the cauſe of a Roman army. The uproar increaſed; the banners of mutiny were diſplayed; and the imperial orders no longer regarded. Plautius perceived the gathering ſtorm, and trembled for the event. But generoſity prevailed, when power had exerted its force in vain. The ſoldiers revered the virtues of Plautius as much as they deſpiſed the effeminancy of the minion and returned to their duty. The troops were immediatly embarked, and, after a ſhort paſſage, landed in Kent without oppoſition.

The Britons had been informed of the mutiny in the Roman army; and concluded the danger was over. They thought it unneceſſary to guard the coaſt when no enemy was expected, and broke up their camp juſt before the Roman legions appeared. It was now too late to regain the advantage they had loſt; and inſtead of joining in a general body and attacking the enemy before they where ready to receive them, they retired into the inland part of the country, and divided their forces into ſmall parties. The two principal bodies were commanded by Togodumnus and Charactacus, both celebrated for their military abilities, their intrepidity, and their virtue. But jealouſies prevailed among the petty princes of Britain; they envied the talents they could not equal, and ſacrificed the liberties of their country to the ſpirit of malignity. After defeating ſeveral parties, Plautius marched into Oxfordſhire, where he attacked the army of Caractacus, and put them to flight. Inſtead of retreating before an enemy fluſhed with victory, Togodumnus, determined to give battle to the Roman forces. He ſuffered the paſſion of revenge to gain the aſcendency over his prudence. He attacked the enemy and was defeated. Theſe misfortunes, though they weakened the power, did not depreſs the ſpirit of the Britons. They repaired from all parts to the ſtandard of Caractacus, who, after joining his brother, encamped on the banks of the Thames in the country of the Regni. The Romans appeared on the oppoſite ſide of the river, but the ſtream was too deep and rapid to be forded, even by cavalry. This lulled the Britons into a fatal ſecurity. They ſaw the enemy; but made no preparations for defence. In the army of Plautius was a large party of German ſoldiers, who had long been accuſtomed to ſwim a croſs the moſt rapid rivers in their armour. Theſe plunged into the ſtream with ſo much intrepidity, that the aſtoniſhed Britons abandoned their camp, and retired in confuſion. A body of the Roman infantry, animated by the example of the Germans, followed them under the command of Flavius Veſpaſian, and his brother Sabinus. Having reached the oppoſite bank, and formed their ranks, they marched in ſearch of the enemy, who had retreated to the neighbouring woods. A ſlight ſkirmiſh enſued, in which the Britons were obliged to retreat; but as night was coming on, it was not thought prudent to purſue the advantage. The Britons were now rouſed to a ſenſe of their danger: they ſaw the gathering ſtorm that threatened to overwhelm their liberties, and determined, if poſſible, to prevent its effects. They attacked the enemy with an impetuoſity, that even the boaſted diſcipline of the Romans could not reſiſt. They broke through their ranks, and, with all the fury of men exaſperated to madneſs, thinned the ſquadrons of the enemy. A ſhort interval of time would have ſtripped the wreath of laurel from the Roman brow, had not C. Sidius Geta turned the ſcale of victory. That able officer, who was ſuppoſed to have been taken priſoner, found means to diſengage himſelf and his whole corps from the enemy; and wheeling about, fell upon the Britons in the rear. This aſſault was deciſive; they faced about to repel the attack, and by that means gave the main body of the Romans time to recover. The unfortunate Britons now found themſelves charged both in front and rear. They ſtood firm for ſome time; but the Roman diſcipline at laſt prevailed, and the Britons were put to flight. In the beginning of the action, Veſpaſian himſelf was ſurrounded, and muſt have loſt his life, had not his ſon bravely reſcued him at the hazard of his own. This victory fatal to the liberties of the Britons, was dearly purchaſed by the Romans; another battle, fought with equal obſtinacy, would have rendered the expedition abortive. The Roman ſenate themſelves were ſo ſenſible of the important ſervice of Geta, that they decreed him a triumph, though they hardly ever conferred that honour on an officer of his rank.

Deſpair now ſeized the ſpirits of the Britons. They retreated along the banks of the Thames, and being well acquainted with all the ſhallow places, croſſed the ſtream a little above Greenwich, the loweſt place where it was then fordable. The marſhes on the north ſide of the river offered a retreat which they thought ſecure, and there they encamped. Encumbered with their heavy armour, and haraſſed by fens and marſhes, which rendered the march both tedious and painful, the Romans followed the Britons, and the German infantry having diſcovered a ford, they paſſed the Thames, and ſurrounded the camp of the enemy. A battle enſued, when the Britons were again defeated, and Togodumnus, revered for his military talents, fell in the action.

This victory, though obtained with far more eaſe than the former, conſiderably increaſed the loſs of the Roman army, and the death of Togodumnus, raiſed ſuch a ſpirit of reſentment in the Britons, that Plautius thought it imprudent to face the gathering ſtorm. He had already experienced the fury of the enemy, and dreaded the conſequence that might reſult from the laſt efforts of a people driven to deſpair, and fired with a ſenſe of an irreparable injury. He therefore fortified his camp, and diſpatched letters to Rome, requeſting a reinforcement, and inviting the emperor to repair to Britain, in order to finiſh the conqueſt of the iſland in perſon. But Plautius was ſoon ſenſible that he could not continue long in his preſent ſituation. Proviſions began to grow ſcarce in his camp, and the flying parties of the Britons cut off moſt of his convoys. The treachery of the Dobuni now preſerved the army of Plautius. They had already permitted a Roman garriſon to be ſettled among them, and now afforded a ſecure retreat, and plenty of proviſions to the invaders of their country.

A. D. 44. Pleaſed with the hopes of triumphing over the Britons, and of finiſhing a conqueſt which even the great Cæſar himſelf had attempted in vain, Claudius embarked at Oſtium for Marſeilles, proceeded from thence by land to Boulogne, and croſſed over into Britain, where he arrived in the month of Auguſt. The junction of the emperor's forces with thoſe of Plautius, formed a more powerful army than had ever before appeared in the iſland. The Britons perceived the ſtrength of the enemy, and prudently avoided a general engagement. But the deſire of retaliating the injuries they had received from the enemies of their country, animated them to hover round the Roman camp, by which means they cut off many of their ſtraggling parties. Claudius, who had now taken upon himſelf the command of the Roman army, left his poſt, and marched in purſuit of the Britons. The cavalry effected what the infantry had attempted in vain; they cut off the retreat of the enemy, and forced them to a general engagement. The firſt charge was dreadful: the tracts of the Britiſh war-chariots were marked with the ſlain, and the ſtandard of deſtruction waved over the field of battle. But the Roman diſcipline prevailed: the deſultory attacks of the Britons were repelled, and their whole army put to flight. Claudius did not, however, purſue the enemy; he applied himſelf to make ſettlements in order to ſecure his conqueſts. He took the city of Camelodunum, now Maldon, in Eſſex; but uſed the inhabitants with great kindneſs. His generoſity completed what his victorious army had begun. Fearful of his power, and charmed with his moderation, great numbers of the Britons came to his camp with offers of ſubmiſſion. Whole provinces followed their example, and firmly eſtabliſhed the Roman power in Britain. The natives, though vanquiſhed, were left in the quiet poſſeſſion of their eſtates and effects; they exchanged their liberty for domeſtic peace. The clemency of the emperor was extolled to the ſkies, by a conquered but grateful people: they erected temples to his honour, and adored him as a deity.

Pleaſed with the ſucceſs of his expedition, in which he had not only defeated, but alſo gained the affections of the Britons, Claudius left Plautius to command the army, and returned to Rome, where he received the united acclamations of the people. The conqueſt of Britain was conſidered as the greateſt acquiſition: the Roman dominions were extended beyond the limits of the ocean. Intoxicated with glory, and laviſh of their honours, the ſenate beſtowed upon Claudius the ſurname of Britannicus, and decreed him a moſt magnificent triumph. Plautius ſoon after received an honourable recall to Rome, and was received with the greateſt marks of regard by the emperor.

A. D. 50. P. Oſtorius Scapula ſucceeded Plautius in the government of Britain; but as ſome interval of time elapſed between the departure of Plautius and the arrival of Scapula, the Britons had ſeized the opportunity to attempt the recovery of their liberty; and the new governor found the affairs of the iſland in great confuſion. Caractacus, inſpired with the noble ſpirit of his anceſtors, had collected a powerful army, and carried fire and ſword into the territories of the Romans. Oſtorius landed about the latter end of October, and though the ſeaſon was ſo far advanced, immediately led his forces againſt the Britons. This ſudden march was fatal to the deſigns of Caractacus. Perſuaded that the Roman general would not take the field till the winter was over, and determined to chaſtiſe the inhabitants who had ſubmitted to Claudius, his army was diſperſed into ſmall parties, and in that condition were eaſily defeated by the Romans. Peace being thus reſtored, Oſtorius, in order to render it laſting, determined to diſarm all the Britons that had formed an alliance with Rome. Provoked at an attempt to rivet the chains of ſlavery on a people who had hitherto remained faithful, the Iceni refuſed to deliver up their arms. They appointed a general rendezvous in Cambridgeſhire; and having marked out a camp in a very advantageous ſituation, they fortified it with a rampart of earth and felled trees, leaving only one avenue, which they paved with ſharp flints, in order to prevent the approach of the Roman cavalry. But nothing could abate the ardour of Oſtorius. He led on his infantry to the camp, and attacked it with the utmoſt vigour, and all the precaution of an experienced general. The Britons made a noble defence, and more than once repelled the aſſaults of the Romans. But their reſiſtance was in vain; their rude intrenchments were forced, and the Iceni fled to their woods for ſafety.

Oſtorius had hardly gained this important victory, before a new army appeared in another part of the iſland. Alarmed at the ſucceſs of the Roman governor, and determined to defend their liberty to the laſt extremity, the Cornavii flew to arms; Oſtorius marched againſt them at the head of his legions, and endeavoured to bring the Britons to a general engagement. But all his attempts proved abortive: the Cornavii had adopted the prudent meaſures of Caſſivellaunus. They concealed themſelves in woods and marſhes, and haraſſed the Romans in their march, cut off their ſtraggling parties, and intercepted their convoys. Oſtorius ſaw the danger to which his army was expoſed, and took every prudent precaution in his power to prevent the conſequences of this irregular war. But before he could reduce the Cornavii, a more formidable enemy engaged his attention. The Brigantes had collected a numerous army, and made a dreadful inroad into the Roman territories. Oſtorius returned with the utmoſt expedition to the aſſiſtance of his allies; but as he was marching by the ſide of Hatfield foreſt, his army was attacked with the utmoſt fury by the Britons, who had concealed themſelves in the wood. The ſucceſs which attended the firſt aſſault proved fatal to the Brigantes. They thought themſelves ſure of victory, and took no meaſures to ſecure their retreat. The Romans recovered their ranks, and the Brigantes were totally defeated.

A. D. 51. Convinced by experience that conqueſts, without ſecuring the advantages, are empty honours, Oſtorius erected a chain of forts along the banks of the Severn and Avon, in order to prevent any future inroads by the Britons. Having finiſhed theſe fortifications, he made Cogidunus, king of the Dobuni, a citizen of Rome, and confirmed him in the poſſeſſion of his territories. By this prudent meaſure he acquired a firm and powerful ally, who garriſoned the forts Oſtorius had erected, and put a final period to the inroads of the Silures.

But theſe precautions were not ſufficient to intimidate the Britons. Liberty was ſtill their darling object; they preferred death to the chains of ſlavery. The Brigantes, though defeated, were not diſcouraged. They joined the Silures, and under the command of Caractacus, determined to make a noble effort againſt the invaders of their country. Nurſed in the lap of adverſity, and a ſtranger to fear, Caractacus led his forces againſt the enemy. His military abilities were uncommon; his fortitude was invincible. His meaſures were prudent and vigorous; his reſources prodigious. The Romans at once revered and dreaded his talents. Headed by ſo able a general, the Britons prepared to encounter Oſtorious with uncommon ardour and intrepidity. Caractacus well knew that the Britons were no match for the Romans in the open field, and therefore endeavoured to ſupply that defect by prudent meaſures, and advantageous poſts. He transferred the ſeat of war into the country of the Ordovices, as being more inacceſſible to the Roman army. He formed his camp on the ſummit of a lofty mountain, very difficult of acceſs. The foot of the mountain was waſhed by a river, deep and rapid; and to increaſe the natural ſtrength of the poſt, Caractacus fortified the bank of the river with ramparts of ſtones faced with ſharp-edged flints. In this poſition he determined to wait the approach of the Romans.

Senſible of the danger of attacking forces fired with an enthuſiaſtic love of liberty, and led by a general, prudent, intrepid, and vigilant, Oſtorius led his legionary troops, compoſed of Roman veterans, againſt the Britons; and omitted no precaution to ſecure his army from the irregular attacks of the flying parties of the enemy.

As ſoon as the Roman army appeared, Caractacus drew up his forces, and conjured them to act like men on this important occaſion. He told them the hour was approaching that muſt reſtore them to freedom and independence, or reduce them to the moſt abject ſtate of ſlavery. He exhorted them to remember the glorious examples of their renowned anceſtors, who drove the ambitious Cæſar from Britain, and delivered their country from the oppreſſive violence of Rome. He invoked the ſhades of their great predeceſſors in this important day of trial, in this final ſtruggle for liberty and freedom. The Britons anſwered by a general ſhout of applauſe. They declared their reſolution of preſerving their liberties, or periſhing in the glorious attempt.

Oſtorius heard the acclamations of the Britons, and was alarmed for the event. He carefully ſurveyed the deep and rapid river, the rampart faced with flints, and defended by reſolute troops; the hanging crags, and the cloſe embattled ranks of the enemy. The proſpect was gloomy, the difficulties hardly ſurmountable, and the attempt almoſt deſperate. But the ardour of the Roman troops could not be repreſſed. Dangers tended only to awaken their courage, and augment their deſire of glory. The prize of victory was diſplayed, and every difficulty vaniſhed in the proſpect. Oſtorius perceived their eagerneſs, but would not ſuffer them to engage till he had diſcovered the ſhalloweſt part of the ſtream, where they might croſs the river with the leaſt obſtruction.

At laſt the ſignal for the attack was given, and the Romans croſſed the ſtream with great alacrity. A dreadful carnage enſued. The Britons defended their rampart with that unſhaken firmneſs which reſults from deſpair. The ground was ſtrewed with dead, and the groans of the wounded augmented the horror of the tumult. But the Roman diſcipline at laſt ſurmounted the difficulty; the rampart was thrown down, and both armies came to a cloſe engagement. The Britons ruſhed upon the Romans like men regardleſs of deſtruction. The balance of victory was for ſome time equally poiſed, and Fortune ſeemed undetermined where to beſtow the palm of conqueſt. At length the Roman veterans removed the dreadful uncertainty. Covered with armour, the ſwords of the Britons made little impreſſion, while death attended every blow ſtruck by a Roman arm. Caractacus perceived the conteſt was unequal, and retreated to his camp on the ſummit of the mountain. The aſcent was ſteep and tedious, but the ardour of the Romans was ſuperior to every difficulty. They gained the ſummit, and attacked the camp of Caractacus. The conteſt was dreadful; the Britons fought for liberty, the Romans for glory. Urged on by deſpair, the Britons aſſaulted the ranks of the enemy with a fury bordering on madneſs. But their efforts were in vain; they met death on every ſide, and the camp became a horrid ſcene of blood and devaſtation. The victory was complete, and the ſtandard of Britiſh liberty fell to the ground. The wife, daughter, and brothers of Caractacus, with many other perſons of birth and fortune, were taken priſoners.

Caractacus himſelf eſcaped, with a few friends, the dreadful deſtruction of his army. Diſtracted at the irreparable loſs he had ſuſtained, he flew to Cartiſmandua, queen of the Brigantes, for ſafety. A moment's reflection would have been ſufficient to have prevented this unguarded ſtep. He knew that Cartiſmandua had long been a friend to the Romans, though her huſband Venutius was one of the champions of liberty. Pleaſed with the opportunity of acquiring the favour of Oſtorius, ſhe baſely loaded Caractacus with chains, and in that ignominious manner delivered him into the hands of the Romans; an action that has branded her name with eternal infamy.

Rome had been long acquainted with the military reputation of this illuſtrious hero. He had ſeveral years ſupported the dying remains of that noble confederacy headed by Caſſivellaunus, for the defence of Britiſh liberty, and had given many ſignal proofs of his prudence and intrepidity. The news of his captivity was received with uncommon acclamations, and the Romans were deſirous of ſeeing a man whoſe power was ſufficient to check the flight of the imperial eagles. Caractacus and his whole family were accordingly ſent to Rome, in order to be expoſed as a public ſpectacle to the populace. The whole city attended; the prætorian guards were under arms, and the emperor was ſeated on a magnificent tribunal, adorned with the trophies of war. The ſervants of Caractacus walked firſt in the mortifying proceſſion, and were followed by the brothers, the wife and daughter of Caractacus, whoſe tears ſufficiently demonſtrated, that their ſpirits were equally depreſſed with their fortunes. Not ſo the brave Caractacus; he marched on with a ſteady countenance and noble deportment; his ſoul ſoared far above his preſent condition: he looked down with contempt on the malice of his enemies. He approached the imperial tribunal, and thus addreſſed himſelf to Claudius.

"Had my moderation been adequate to my birth and fortune, I had entered this capital not as a captive but a friend. Nor wouldſt even thou, O Cæſar! have diſdained to rank in the number of thy friends a prince deſcended from a long race of royal and illuſtrious anceſtors, and the commander of many nations. My preſent condition adds luſtre to your glory, though it reflects diſhonour upon me. I was once maſter of men and arms, of horſes and chariots of war, of riches and power. Can you wonder that I fought to preſerve them, and that I loſt them with regret? If the Romans are deſirous of univerſal empire, does it follow that all mankind ſhould ſubmit tamely to the yoke? Had the hand of perfidy ſooner betrayed me, I ſhould have been leſs diſtinguiſhed by misfortunes, and you by glory. Had I fallen in battle, both my name and fortune had been conſigned to oblivion. Puniſh me with death, and I ſhall ſoon be forgotten; ſuffer me to live, and the generous action will remain an eternal monument of your clemency."

Claudius, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by many acts of moderation, was deeply affected by the manly addreſs and majeſtic air of Caractacus. He ordered the Britiſh hero, and all his family, to be ſet at liberty, and loaded them with favours.

The ſenate was aſſembled, and the victory over Caractacus compared with the brighteſt periods of the Roman glory. They decreed to Oſtorius the honour of a triumph; but this was the period of his good fortune. Fired with reſentment at the ignominious treatment of their favourite leader, the Britons were rouſed to vengeance. They had acquired by fatal experience ſome knowledge of the Roman diſcipline, and carried on the war with more prudence and better ſucceſs than formerly; while the Romans, fluſhed with victory, grew indolent and careleſs. The legionary cohorts left to complete the chain of forts on the Severn, were attacked and defeated. A body of Roman foragers ſhared the ſame fate. Animated with theſe ſucceſſes, the Britons attacked the Roman army, maintained the battle till night put an end to the conteſt, and then retired with very little loſs. The Romans were no longer conſidered as invincible. The ſtandard of liberty was again diſplayed, played, and the Britons flattered themſelves with being able to retaliate the injuries they had received on the invaders of their country.

A. D. 59. Oſtorius, who now ſtooped under a weight of years and infirmities, exerted the laſt remains of life to finiſh a war ſo ſucceſsfully begun. But he was unequal to the taſk: he found it impoſſible to check the progreſs of the Britiſh arms, and ſunk into the grave with grief and dejection. Aulius Didius Gallus was ſent from Rome with the title of proprætor, to take the command of the Roman forces in Britain. But before he reached his government, Manlius Valens, a tribune, who headed the troops on the death of Oſtorius, had been defeated by the Silures, who now committed dreadful devaſtations in the Roman province. Aulius exerted all his abilities to recover the loſſes ſuſtained before his arrival, and, by his indefatigable application, put a ſtop to the victories of the Silures.

About this time Claudius paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded in the imperial throne by Nero, a prince who had no ambition for military honours. He devoted his time to purſuits of a very different kind, and would probably have declined all farther attempts againſt the Britons, could he have done it with ſafety to himſelf. But the people conſidered Britain as one of the faireſt jewels in the Roman diadem; and Nero thought it prudent to tread in the ſteps of Claudius, whoſe memory he highly reſpected.

During theſe tranſactions at Rome, a civil war of a very different kind broke out in Britain. Cartiſmandua, the infamous betrayer of Caractacus, to fill up the meaſure of her iniquity, had taken Volocatus, one of her menial ſervants, to her bed. Exaſperated at ſuch ſhocking injuries, her huſband Venutius repaired to the Silures, repreſented, in the moſt forcible manner, the deteſtable conduct of Cartiſmandua, and expatiated on the irreparable injury ſhe had done her countrymen, by baſely betraying their intrepid leader. He did not plead in vain. Rouſed by the ignominious treatment of their beloved general, they expreſſed their reſentment with a fury nearly allied to madneſs; and bound themſelves, by the moſt ſolemn acts of their religion, either to take ample vengeance on the infamous betrayer of their country, or periſh. The Brigantes readily joined the confederacy; and the deſerted Cartiſmandua, who had preferred the gratification of a lawleſs paſſion to conjugal virtue, and the friendſhip of the Romans to the liberty of her country, found herſelf abandoned by the greater part of her ſubjects, and expoſed to the vengeance of an enraged people. She flew immediately to the Romans for ſuccour, and was received with kindneſs and reſpect. Supported by forces that ſhe conſidered as invincible, ſhe ſet no bounds to her paſſion, and looked upon the threatened vengeance of the Britons with contempt.

But the Roman power was become fallacious. Diſcipline had given place to licentiouſneſs, and effeminacy had enervated the ſtrength of the conquerors of the world. The Britons advanced with confidence and intrepidity, and the Romans marched out to meet them. A dreadful battle enſued; the field was covered with ſlain; and it was with the greateſt difficulty the Romans prevented Cartiſmandua from falling into the hands of an enraged and injured people. All her dominions fell into the hands of the enemy. Didius, who was very old and infirm when he firſt came over into Britain, could not lead in perſon his army againſt the Britons: he entruſted the command to generals much inferior in merit, and the conſequences reflected a ſtain upon the honour of the Romans. Didius ſaw with grief this ſudden reverſe of fortune, and fell a victim to the complicated attacks of diſeaſe and vexation.

A. D. 61. As ſoon as the news of the death of Didius reached Rome, Paulinus Suetonius, one of the moſt celebrated generals of the age, was ſent to ſupply his place. A leader of abilities was never more wanting than at preſent. Elated by their ſucceſs, and exaſperated by the injuries they had received, the Britons threatened the Romans with deſtruction. Suetonius ſaw the danger, and took the moſt prudent methods to prevent it. The greater part of the Roman army was encamped in the country of the Ordovices, hear the ſtreight which ſeparates the iſland of Mona, now called Angleſea, from the coaſt of North Wales. Mona was principally inhabited by the Druids; it was their univerſity, the reſidence of their pontiff, a place more immediately conſecrated to their religious worſhip; and therefore eſteemed ſacred by all the Britons. It had alſo for ſome years been a common aſylum for the enemies of Rome, and was now very full of people. Convinced that the Britons could never be reduced to obedience while the Druids continued in their authority, Suetonius determined to deſtroy this ſeat of their ſuperſtition. He knew that enthuſiaſm ſupplied the Britons with a kind of frantic courage. Perſuaded that thoſe who fell in battle againſt the enemies of their religion, paſſed immediately into a ſtate of perfect happineſs, they did not conſider the loſs of life as an evil. They ruſhed undaunted into the thickeſt part of the battle, and ſmiled in the agonies of death. It was in vain to hope that force only could ever reduce to ſubjection a people inſpired with ſuch ſentiments. A mind filled with ſuperſtitious notions is deaf to the voice of caution. Mona muſt be laid waſte, the ſource of enthuſiaſm deſtroyed, and the Druids themſelves extirpated, before the Romans could triumph over the liberties of the Britons.

The arm of the ſea which divides Mona from the adjacent coaſt, could not be forded by the infantry; a ſufficient number of boats were therefore collected for tranſporting the legions, while the horſe croſſed the ſtreight. Suetonius perceived the inhabitants were drawn up at ſome diſtance from the water's edge, and therefore landed his troops with very little oppoſition. But the Britons ſoon advanced with the utmoſt fury upon the Romans, who were ſtruck with a ſuperſtitious terror at a ſcene which was now preſented to their view. Behind the Britiſh army were a multitude of women running about like furies with diſhevelled hair, and flaming torches in their hands. Amidſt theſe frantic women were the Druids pouring out the moſt dreadful imprecations, and, with their hands lift up to heaven, imploring the vengeance of their gods upon the enemies of their religion. The Romans ſtood for a time motionleſs; they ſeemed as it were transfixed with horror, and became an inactive mark to the miſſiles of the Britons. Suetonius ſaw their terror, and trembled for the event: he flew from rank to rank, and endeavoured, by threatenings and exhortations, to rouſe them into action. At laſt the love of glory prevailed over enthuſiaſtic horror. They attacked the enemy with their uſual intrepidity, and, after a ſhort reſiſtance, drove them into the woods, with a dreadful ſlaughter. Being thus maſter of the iſland, Suetonius applied himſelf to deſtroy every place dedicated to the ſuperſtitious worſhip of the Britons. He cut down their ſacred groves, and burnt the Druids on thoſe very altars that had been ſo often ſtained with human blood.

But while he was employed in demoliſhing the ſtructures and groves of the Druids, he was recalled by an event that threatened the total deſtruction of the Roman power in Britain. The vices of Nero were riſen to ſuch a ſhameful height, that a new ſpecies of taxation had for ſome time been introduced into all the provinces of the Roman empire, to ſupply his extravagance. The taxes levied on the Britons were grievouſly oppreſſive. They complained; but, inſtead of redreſs, they were treated with inſolence; their misfortunes were inſulted, and their miſeries made a ſubject of ridicule. Theſe acts of wanton tyranny raiſed a general ſpirit of reſentment, ment, and the whole nation was ripe for a revolt, when an incident happened which kindled into a flame the latent ſparks of vengeance.

Praſutagus, king of the Iceni, had long lived in friendſhip with the Romans; and having no ſon to inherit his dominions, bequeathed his immenſe treaſures to the emperor, and his two daughters, as joint-heirs; hoping by that means to procure a powerful protector for his children. But he was fatally deceived. Catus Decianus, the procurator, a monſter of vice, avarice and injuſtice, ſeized upon the whole, and the dominions of Praſutagus became a prey to the licentiouſneſs of the Roman centurions. Boadicea, the wife of Praſutagus, remonſtrated warmly againſt theſe iniquitous proceedings, and loudly exclaimed againſt the injuſtice of depriving her daughters of their inheritance; but inſtead of redreſs, ſhe was treated in a manner that reflects diſgrace npon humanity. Catus added inſolence to injuſtice: he ordered Boadicea to be publickly ſcourged, and ſuffered the ſoldiers to violate the chaſtity of her two daughters.

Theſe inhuman proceedings rouſed the Iceni to vengeance. They were joined by the Trinobantes, under the command of the intrepid Venutius; the band of union, which had been ſo long cancelled, was again revived; and the authors of theſe ſhocking acts of brutality devoted to deſtruction. Boadicea, who inherited all the ſpirit of her anceſtors, animated the Britons to vengeance by her irreſiſtible eloquence; while the druids, whoſe ſacred groves Suetonius was then deſtroying, inſpired them with a religious fury.

The firſt place which felt the vengeance of the Britons was Camelodunum, which was taken by ſtorm, and every torture that an exaſperated enemy could invent was practiſed on the unfortunate inhabitants. Boadicea ſeverely retaliated in kind on the Roman women the injuries offered to herſelf and her daughters. The garriſon retired to the temple of Claudius, imagining, perhaps, that the Britons would ſpare a ſtructure dedicated to religion. A moment's reflection would have been ſufficient to have convinced them how fatally they were miſtaken. The deſtruction of Mona had rouſed a ſpirit of religious fury which nothing could reſtrain. They forced the temple, put every Roman to the ſword, and laid the ſtructure in aſhes.

Elated with this ſucceſs, the Britons continued their ravages, ſpreading devaſtation over the whole country ſubject to the Romans. Petilius Cerealis, who commanded the ninth legion, marched to the aſſiſtance of his countrymen, and was met by the Britons. A dreadful conflict enſued, in which all the foot of the legion were cut to pieces, and Cerealis obliged to fly, with his horſe, to his fortified camp. But the infamous procurator eſcaped the vengeance his crimes ſo juſtly deſerved. Conſcious of having occaſioned this dreadful inſurrection, he fled to Gaul, and by that means eluded at once the fury of the enemy, and the rage of his Romans.

In the mean time Suetonius was marching with the utmoſt expedition to the relief of his friends, and reached London before that city had felt the vengeance of the Britons. But finding it impoſſible to defend the place with his ſmall army againſt the numerous forces of the enemy, he retired to a conſiderable diſtance, in order to take poſſeſſion of ſome advantageous poſt, and bring on a general engagement.

Informed that the Roman general had reached London, Boadicea led her army to that capital; but finding it abandoned by the enemy, ſhe put near ſeventy thouſand Romans to the ſword, and laid the city in aſhes. Theſe ſacrifices were, however, far from being ſufficient to appeaſe the fury of Boadicea; nothing leſs than the total extirpation of the Romans could ſatisfy her vengeance.

Aware of the enterprizing ſpirit of that heroine, and ſenſible that an inſatiable thirſt of revenge in the breaſt of an incenſed woman, at the head of a numerous army, would carry her beyond the bounds of prudence, and urge her to acts of imprudent impetuoſity; the Roman general poſted his forces, which now amounted to ten thouſand men, in ſuch a poſition as might beſt enable him to ſuſtain the fury of the firſt attack. Accordingly he made choice of a ſpot of ground acceſſible only by a narrow defile, having an open plain in his front, and a large wood in his rear. In this ſituation he prepared to withſtand the dreadful aſſault of the Britons. He placed his legionary troops in the center, the light-armed on each ſide, and his cavalry in the wings. In this order he waited the approach of the enemy.

Fluſhed with conqueſt, and elated with the hopes of exterminating at once the Roman power in Britain, Boadicea led her army into the plain in the front of the enemy. The number of the Britons was not leſs than two hundred and thirty thouſand men, eager for retaliating the injuries they had received on their tyrannical maſters. They did not entertain a doubt of obtaining the prize of victory, and accordingly brought their wives and children with them into the field, that they might be ſpectators of the vengeance they were going to pour on the heads of the enemy, and aſſiſt in plundering the invaders of their country. Theſe being placed in waggons poſted in the rear of the army, rendered a retreat extremely difficult.

At the head of the Britiſh army appeared Boadicea, drawn in a chariot, with her two daughters. She paſſed between the ranks of her army, and addreſſing herſelf to the heads of every tribe, repreſented, with the moſt powerful eloquence, and in the moſt pathetic manner, the inhuman inſults that had been offered to herſelf and her two daughters. "But, added ſhe, the deſire of revenging mine own injuries, however great, is the leaſt motive that induced me to attack the tyrants of the world. It is the univerſal ſlavery that is preparing, the chains that are forging for my brave and numerous people, that have rouſed me to vengeance. I have taken the field to defend the liberties of my country; but if there be any here who prefer the yoke of ſlavery to freedom; who can tamely behold their wives and daughters raviſhed, and ſtoop ſo low as to kiſs the feet of an inſolent maſter; they will do well to depart. For myſelf, I am abſolutely determined to conquer or periſh."

A general ſhout of applauſe reſounded in the Britiſh army, and Boadicea immediately led her forces againſt the Romans. The firſt aſſault was made by the Britons with the utmoſt fury. They valued not the ſwords of the enemy; they ſeemed rather to court than decline deſtruction. But the Roman ranks could not be broken; they ſtood firm amidſt a dreadful ſhower of javelins, darted with violence from the nervous arms of the enraged Britons. The legionary troops now ſallied out upon the enemy, and were followed by the auxiliaries. A horrid ſlaughter enſued. The victory was long doubtful, and the field of battle covered with the ſlain. But the heavy armed forces of the Romans at laſt bore down all oppoſition; and the retreat of the Britons being in a manner cut off by their own waggons, a dreadful carnage ſucceeded; near eighty thouſand of them periſhed. The unfortunate Boadicea perceived with diſtraction the defeat of her army, and diſdaining a ſubmiſſion, put a period to her life.

The Britons were now convinced that all oppoſition was in vain. They retired to their reſpective places of abode; but Suetonius, with a cruelty that has ſtained his character, purſued them with unremitting vengeance. The whole country became a ſcene of blood and ſlaughter; even the women and children were put to the ſword; the villages and towns reduced to aſhes, and large diſtricts totally laid waſte. A dreadful famine enſued, which depopulated thoſe parts of the iſland which the ſword of the Romans had ſpared.

Driven to deſpair by cruelty, and exaſperated to madneſs by the loſs of every thing they held dear, the Britons had once more recourſe to arms, and many of the Romans felt the weight of their reſentment. They never attempted to face the enemy in the open field, but hovered continually round their quarters, and put to the ſword every Roman that fell into their hands. Death, even in its moſt horrid ſhape, had loſt its terror: the Britons were rendered invincible by diſtreſs. Barbarity only increaſed the evil, and ſlaughter had no other tendency than that of depopulating the country. Julius Claſſicanus, who had ſucceeded Catus as procurator, beheld the perſeverance of the Britons with aſtoniſhment, and rightly imputed their obſtinate inflexibility to the haughty ſeverity of Suetonius. He was penetrated with compaſſion at the ſufferings of a brave and hardy people; and wrote to Rome, informing the emperor, that there would never be an end to the war, unleſs Suetonius was recalled. His letter had its proper weight with the emperor, and Suetonius received orders to repair to Rome.

A. D. 62. He was ſucceeded by Petronius Turpilianus, who, by the mildneſs of his adminiſtration, and his great affability, ſoon effected what the legions of Suetonius had attempted in vain. Inſtead of haraſſing the Britons by military executions, and keeping alive their reſentment by new injuries, he ſuffered them to enjoy unmoleſted repoſe. By this prudent conduct, their rage abated, their loſſes were forgotten, peace once more extended her olive branch over the deſolated country, and plentiful harveſts crowned the fields that the ſword of war had laid waſte.

A. D. 65. After three years reſidence in Britain, Turpilianus returned to Rome, where he was received with univerſal applauſe: triumphal honours were decreed him; and the Romans were convinced from experience, that moderation and lenity were more effectual in ſubduing the Britons, than perſecutions and tyranny. The ſame meaſures were purſued by ſeveral ſucceſſive governors; and the Britons, though many of them ſtill retained their love of liberty, did not look upon the Romans with the ſame malignity as before.

A. D. 78. But the glory of ſubduing the Britons was reſerved for Julius Agricola, whoſe virtues and talents have been rendered immortal by the pen of Tacitus. Agricola was no ſtranger to the Britons; he had ſerved under Suetonius with great reputation. Soon after his arrival, he received advice that the Ordovices had ſurpriſed and cut to pieces a body of Roman horſe ſtationed on their frontiers. This ſudden commencement of hoſtilities greatly alarmed the Romans; and Agricola, though the ſummer was far advanced, and the cohorts lay diſperſed in different parts of the country, wiſely reſolved to check the inſurrection in its birth. He accordingly aſſembled the legions and auxiliaries with the utmoſt expedition, and marched againſt the Ordovices. On his approach, they abandoned the plains, and retired to their ſtrong holds and fortreſſes in the mountains, places which had hitherto been conſidered as inacceſſible to an enemy. But Agricola was not to be deterred by dangers, nor ſtopped by difficulties: he aſcended the mountains at the head of his army, and drove the enemy from their retreats. Haraſſed in every part of the country, and deſtitute of any place of ſafety, the Ordovices ſubmitted to the Roman governor, and peace was once more reſtored in Britain.

A. D. 79. As ſoon as the winter was over, Agricola marched his army to the ſea-ſide, in order to reduce the iſland of Angleſey; an undertaking which Suetonius had left unfiniſhed. After carefully ſurveying the ſtreight which ſeparates the iſland from the coaſt of Wales, he diſcovered a ford, by which his forces paſſed into the iſland without oppoſition. Intimidated at the ſight of the Romans, the inhabitants flew into the woods for ſafety; but ſoon after ſued for peace, and gave him poſſeſſion of the iſland, which ſtill retains ſeveral monuments of his victory.

Agricola now applied himſelf to cultivate the arts of peace; and, in order to render his attempts ſucceſsful, he made himſelf well acquainted with the tempers and diſpoſitions of the people he was to govern. He began his civil adminiſtration by acts of juſtice and clemency. He was particularly careful to reform the diſcipline of his army, and to reſtrain the licentiouſneſs of his troops, that no freſh cauſe of diſpute might ariſe from their inſolence and oppreſſion. He was ſevere, but not cruel. He puniſhed crimes with rigour, but often pardoned faults. The common ſoldiers became modeſt and agreeable, the officers generous and humane. He was an inveterate enemy to every ſpecies of corruption. No rigour was practiſed in collecting the tribute; no iniquitous impoſitions were ſuffered. He coveted not reſpect when it owed its origin to fear; but cheriſhed obedience when it flowed from the heart. The Britons were happy under his government; they revered him as a parent, rather than feared him as a tyrant. They cheriſhed a real attachment for his perſon, and imitated his conduct.

A. D. 80. At the beginning of ſummer Agricola took the field, and penetrated into ſeveral provinces which had not hitherto been ſubdued; and by ſometimes haraſſing and alarming the inhabitants, and at others inviting them to ſubmiſſion by every poſſible allurement; he, by degrees, prevailed upon ſeveral capital cities to receive Roman garriſons. In this manner, partly by perſuaſion, and partly by his military abilities, he ſubdued the whole iſland, and returned to his head-quarters at the end of the campaign. He was joyfully received by the Britons, and he aſſiduouſly applied himſelf to finiſh the civil regulations he had ſo happily begun. He erected temples, courts of judicature, and other public ſtructures. He encouraged the building of private houſes, and inſpired a noble emulation among the Britons, by rewarding the active and diligent, and puniſhing the indolent and ſlothful. He eſtabliſhed ſchools and ſeminaries, where the Britiſh youth were inſtructed in the liberal arts: he extolled their genius, he applauded their aſſiduity. They were pleaſed with his encomiums, and ſoon became fond of the arts and manners of the Romans. Agricola conquered the Britons by kindneſs and perſuaſion: they cultivated the Roman language, and put on the Roman habit: they cheriſhed the Roman luxury; they viſited their baths and their banquets. At laſt they buried in the grave of voluptuouſneſs their natural ſimplicity and integrity, together with the very remembrance of their former independence.

A. D. 81. Having provided for the domeſtic tranquillity of Britain, Agricola led his army to the northern parts of the iſland, and penetrated as far as the frith of the river Tay in Scotland; the Caledonians, though a robuſt and intrepid people, retiring before his victorious legions. Here he erected a chain of forts to ſecure his conqueſts, and ſtop the ravages of the Caledonians. Theſe forts were conſtructed with ſo much art, and their ſituations ſo advantageouſly choſen, that it is ſaid not one of them was either forced, ſurrendered, or quitted as untenable, during his reſidence in Britain. Theſe forts were well ſupplied with proviſions, and garriſoned with brave and intrepid ſoldiers, who, by occaſional ſallies, kept the enemy in continual alarms.

A. D. 82. Early in the ſpring he led his army a conſiderable diſtance to the northward of the forts he had erected, and ſubdued ſeveral of the ſmaller tribes. He now erected a chain of forts acroſs the iſthmus between the Clyde and the Forth. During this expedition he ſaw the coaſt of Ireland, and meditated the conqueſt of that iſland; but this deſign was never executed.

A. D. 83. Deſirous of being acquainted with the coaſt of Scotland, Agricola ſent out a fleet to make diſcoveries of the creeks and friths in thoſe parts, while he himſelf marched forward at the head of his army. Alarmed at the appearance of this formidable ſquadron, the Caledonians attacked the forts of Agricola with great fury. Exaggerated accounts of the number of the enemy intimidated the Roman officers, who adviſed their general to retreat. But Agricola was not to be intimidated; he determined to continue in the enemy's country, but took every prudent precaution to preſerve his army. The Caledonians were headed by Galgacus, a prince admired for his military abilities: he had ſerved under the Romans, and was no ſtranger to their method of making war. Intrepid by nature, and nurſed in a camp, he was a ſtranger to fear, and knew too well the great advantage that always attends the aggreſſor in the field. He knew that forces fluſhed with conqueſt were almoſt invincible, and that diſtreſs had no tendency to render an army formidable. He therefore attacked the forts of Agricola with great fury, before the Roman general could carry fire and ſword into the heart of his country. The Caledonian army was greatly ſuperior in numbers to the Roman, but almoſt deſtitute of diſcipline. Agricola ſaw the danger of keeping his troops in one body, almoſt ſurrounded by a numerous and active enemy, who would not fail to cut off his proviſions. In order therefore to avoid the fate of periſhing by famine in an enemy's country, he divided his forces into three bodies. Fruſtrated in his deſign of ſurrounding the Roman army, Galgacus united his forces, and fell ſuddenly upon the weakeſt diviſion of the enemy. The advanced guard was cut to pieces, and the barbarians poured like a deluge into the Roman camp. Aſtoniſhed at this unexpected attack, which appeared more terrible from having been made in a dark and tempeſtuous night, the legionary ſoldiers were unable to exert their uſual intrepidity. Fortunately for them, Agricola was informed by his ſpies of the intention of Galgacus, and immediately diſpatched a reinforcement of light armed troops to their aſſiſtance. As ſoon as they reached the camp, they gave a general ſhout, which intimidated the enemy, and animated with freſh vigour the deſpairing legion, who were on the very point of being cut to pieces. The palm of victory was now wreſted from the Caledonians, who were obliged to retreat to the neighbouring woods for protection. But, though defeated, they were not diſperſed. The ſpirit of liberty was rouſed, and the whole country entered into a general aſſociation againſt the invaders of their country. An army far more numerous than the firſt was raiſed with the utmoſt expedition, and their wives and children ſent to places of ſafety. But, before they were ready to take the field, the ſeaſon was too far advanced to decide the dreadful conteſt.

A. D. 84. Early in the ſpring Agricola renewed his military operations, by ſending his fleet before him with orders to land occaſionally in different places, and ſpread the alarm along the coaſt of Scotland; while he himſelf marched to the Grampian hills, where the Caledonian army was aſſembled. It conſiſted of thirty thouſand men, headed by the intrepid Galgacus. As ſoon as he perceived the Roman army, he harangued his troops with all the eloquence of a conſummate general. He told them, in the moſt pathetic manner, that the iſſue of the enſuing battle would be the recovery of their freedom, or perpetual ſlavery; for their ſituation having rendered a retreat impracticable if vanquiſhed, they muſt either conquer, ſubmit to ſlavery, or periſh.

Galgacus drew up his army on the declivity of the mountain, by which means their whole number was expoſed to the view of the Romans, and exhibited a very formidable appearance. Agricola formed his army into two lines; the firſt conſiſted of eight thouſand auxiliary foot and three thouſand horſe forming the wings; the ſecond was wholly formed of Roman legions. As ſoon as the ſignal was given, both armies began the conteſt with amazing intrepidity. The battle was fierce and obſtinate, and, for ſome time, greatly in favour of Galgacus. Agricola perceived the danger, quitted his horſe, and, at the head of his legions, cloſed upon the enemy, and engaged them ſword in hand. This attack turned the ſcale of victory. The javelins of the Caledonians, on which they chiefly depended, and which they darted with the greateſt dexterity, were rendered uſeleſs, and their ſwords were too unweildy to be uſed with advantage. Unable therefore to ſtand the ſhock of the legionary forces, they gave way; and the Romans, after penetrating the firſt line, ſoon put the whole army into diſorder. The Caledonians now attempted to drive their war-chariots through the ranks of the enemy, but the unevenneſs of the ground prevented the deſign. Galgacus exerted his whole power to rally his forces, and lead them once more againſt the enemy, but found it impoſſible; and the night coming on apace, he retired, with the ſcattered remains of his army, into the inacceſſible parts of the mountains. Ten thouſand Caledonians fell in this fatal battle, while the loſs of the Romans did not exceed three hundred and fifty. The ſcene of deſolation which enſued is ſhocking to humanity. Driven to deſpair, and dreading captivity more than death, the Caledonians ſet fire to their huts, and maſſacred their wives and children, that they might not fall into the hands of the Romans. Such are the dreadful effects of unbounded ambition; the laws of immutable juſtice are ſacrificed to the deſire of conqueſt, and the ſoft whiſpers of humanity plead in vain!

This victory, ſo deſtructive to the Caledonians, was fatal alſo to Agricola. The infamous Domitian, who now filled the imperial throne, grew jealous of the reputation of his general. The conqueſts of Agricola were terrible to Domitian. He was recalled, under pretence of being promoted to the government of Syria, but in reality, that a final period might be put to his victories. He returned to Rome, where triumphal honours and a ſtatue crowned with laurel were decreed him by the ſenate. But he ſoon fell a victim to the ſuſpicious fears of the cowardly Domitian, who found means to take him off by poiſon. Thus fell the renowned and accompliſhed Julius Agricola, the celebrated governor of Britain. He introduced the Roman arts, the Roman language, and the Roman luxuries into this iſland; and ſpread deſolation and ſlaughter through an extenſive country, becauſe the inhabitants refuſed to part with their liberties, and tamely ſubmit to the Roman yoke of ſlavery. He waded through a ſea of blood to crop the laurels of victory, and fell a ſacrifice to that ambition which led him on to conqueſt. As a general, as a governor, as a civil magiſtrate, he deſerves the higheſt honours. His talents were great, his judgment was ſound, his memory was tenacious; he was fruitful in reſources, and intrepid in danger, a friend to merit, and an implacable enemy to extortion. But he ſtained his laurels with the blood of a people who never injured him, and againſt whom he had no other complaint than their being tenacious of their liberties, and true friends to their country.

A. D. 87. Lucullus ſucceeded Agricola in the government of Britain; but our accounts of his adminiſtration are very imperfect. The Caledonians, immediately after the departure of Julius Agricola, iſſued again from their mountains; and, by their example and conduct, animated the Britons to reſume the ſpirit of their anceſtors, and to join in the common cauſe of extirpating the Romans. But this was an undertaking that required years to bring to perfection. In the mean time Lucullus was put to death by Domitian, merely becauſe he had given his own name to a new kind of launce he had invented.

A. D. 111. No governor was ſent from Rome to ſucceed Lucullus till the attempts of the Caledotians rendered the preſence of an able general neceſſary. They broke through the chain of forts erected between the Forth and Clyde by Agricola, and laid great part of the country waſte. Alarmed at this irruption of the northern people, Julius Severus was diſpatched to drive the Caledonians back into their own country. He was a perſon of great military abilities; but, before he could lead his forces againſt the enemy, he was recalled; a rebellion having broke out in Syria, and Severus was the only general thought capable of reducing the inſurgents, and reſtoring peace to that fertile province. The Caledonians took advantage of the abſence of Severus, and continued their inroads with great ſucceſs. Lucius Antoninus, who commanded the Roman forces in Britain, advanced againſt the northern invaders. A battle enſued, in which the Romans were defeated, and Lucius himſelf dangerouſly wounded.

A. D. 120. There was now a neceſſity for ſending an able general to head the Roman army. The late defeat had rendered them timid and cautious, and the relaxation of diſcipline leſs able to contend with barbarians fluſhed with victory. The danger was preſſing; a little delay might have been fatal to the Romans. Priſcus Luſcinius was immediately diſpatched into Britain, and was ſoon after followed by the emperor Adrian in perſon. The Caledonians thought it imprudent to face the Roman army headed by the emperor, and retired to their faſtneſſes in the mountainous parts of their country. Adrian, however, proceeded as far as York, determined to chaſtiſe the enemy for their late inſults, and put the frontier into a better ſtate of defence. But ſome old officers who had ſerved under Agricola, gave him ſo dreadful an account of Scotland, and painted the difficulties that attended the march of an army through bogs and foreſts, and over the moſt frightful precipices, in ſuch ſtriking colours, that the emperor thought proper to lay aſide his intended expedition. He was, however, determined to provide for the future ſecurity of the Roman provinces. Accordingly he continued his march to the forts erected by Agricola; but thinking they were ſituate at too great a diſtance from the main body of the Roman forces, he relinquiſhed theſe fortifications, and erected a wall, or rather rampart of earth, above eighty miles in length, extending acroſs the iſland, from the mouth of the Tyne to Solway Frith. Garriſons were placed, at proper diſtances, along the whole line; and every neceſſary precaution taken to prevent the future inroads of the enemy. Having provided for the ſafety of his people, Adrian applied himſelf to correct the abuſes that had crept into the government. This taſk required the authority of the emperor, and he accordingly ſucceeded; after which he returned to Rome, and was honoured with the title of "The Reſtorer of Britain."

A. D. 138. On the death of Adrian, Antoninus Pius aſcended the imperial throne, and, like his predeceſſor, was more ſollicitous to preſerve than to enlarge his dominions; but hearing that the northern invaders had ruined ſeveral parts of Adrian's wall, and renewed their incurſions into the Roman territories; he ſent Lollius Urbicus to chaſtiſe the Caledonians, and put a ſtop to their depredations. Urbicus ſoon drove them back into their own country; and, to prevent their incurſions for the future, he erected a wall of ſtone covered with turf, extending from the Frith of Furth to the Frith of Clyde. From this period to the death of Marcus Aurelius, Britain enjoyed the bleſſings of peace. The invaſions of the Caledonians were not renewed; poſſibly the wall of Antoninus was too ſtrong a barrier for them to force, while the garriſons were well ſupplied with proviſions, and the ſoldiers regularly relieved.

A. D. 180. But, on the death of Aurelius, the face of affairs was altered. Commodus, who aſſumed the purple on the death of his father, was famous only for his vices. His indolence and timidity rendered him contemptible; his criminal exceſſes, an object of deteſtation. The Caledonians thought this a proper opportunity for attacking once more the territories of the enemy. Accordingly they made a breach in the wall of Antoninus, near one of the principal forts, cut the Roman garriſon to pieces, and poured like a torrent into the adjacent country. The contiguous ſtations were abandoned by the Romans, and the invaders ſuffered to purſue their inroads without reſiſtance. Rouſed from the ſlumber of indolence by the danger that threatened Britain, Commodus ſent Ulpius Marcellus, a general of great reputation, to chaſtiſe the inſolence of the northern invaders. On his arrival, he found the Roman diſcipline ſunk into a ſtate of ſloth and licentiouſneſs. The hardy veterans were become effeminate, and much fonder of the couch of indolence, than the honours which reſult from a vigorous campaign. Ulpius ſaw the neceſſity of reſtoring the ancient diſcipline before he led his forces againſt the enemy. He applied himſelf to the taſk with great aſſiduity, and his endeavours were ſoon crowned with ſucceſs. This difficulty being removed, Ulpius led his forces againſt the Caledonians, and drove them back into their own country with great ſlaughter. But merit is never rewarded by the ungenerous and the cruel. The ſucceſs of Ulpius excited the jealouſy of Commodus: he was recalled; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty he eſcaped with his life.

The Roman empire was now diſtracted with internal convulſions. On the death of Commodus, different pretenders to the imperial purple ſtarted up, and every part of the empire became the dreadful ſcenes of blood and ſlaughter. Violence and oppreſſion uſurped the ſeat of juſtice, and anarchy erected her throne in the capital of the world. The affairs of Britain were diſregarded in this general confuſion; and the Roman forces in the iſland became debilitated by luxury. The hardy veterans ſlumbered on the couch of indolence, and the deſire of acquiring glory loſt its force.

A. D. 207. At laſt Severus having defeated all his competitors for the imperial purple, determined to paſs over into Britain, in order to chaſtiſe the inſolence of the Scots and Picts, who, during the diſtreſſes of the Roman empire, had made inroads into Britain, and laid a conſiderable part of the country waſte. The very name of Severus, though now old and infirm, appeared terrible to the northern invaders. As a general, he had no equal; as a friend to juſtice, he puniſhed delinquents with rigour. The Caledonians feared his reſentment, and determined, if poſſible, to divert the ſtorm which was gathering round them. On his arrival, they ſent ambaſſadors to ſue for peace. But Severus was not to be diverted from his purpoſe; he diſmiſſed the ambaſſadors with an equivocal anſwer; and having made the neceſſary preparations, marched into the enemy's country.

A. D. 208. His army was too powerful for him to fear any oppoſition from the Caledonian forces; but he met with difficulties of a different kind. The country was covered with woods, and interſected with bogs and marſhes. Sometimes a frightful precipice oppoſed his march, and ſometimes a broad and rapid river. His forces were deſtroyed without fighting, and intimidated without facing the enemy. The Caledonians perceived the diſtreſs of the Roman army, and renewed their requeſts for a peace. Severus, who had now loſt above fifteen thouſand men, in this dreadful march through the territories of the enemy, liſtened to their propoſals, and a peace was accordingly concluded. But knowing that the Caledonians would obſerve the conditions of the treaty no longer than they were compelled by force, he applied himſelf to form a ſtronger barrier. Accordingly he faced Adrian's wall with ſtone, erected forts at proper diſtances, and finiſhed the whole in ſo firm and ſubſtantial a manner, that it reflected an honour on his reign. Having finiſhed his expedition, he returned to York, and took the title of Britannicus Maximus.

A. D. 209. The two ſons of Severus, Caracalla and Geta, inherited not the virtues of their father. Both were cruel, and both enervated with vice. Caracalla was left to guard the pretenture, but his imprudent conduct ſoon exaſperated the ferocious Scots to break the peace they had ſo lately concluded. He ſuffered his ſoldiers to make incurſions beyond the wall, and to treat the inhabitants with inſolence and cruelty. Exaſperated at theſe repeated acts of flagitious tyranny, and deſirous of recovering their former independence, the Scots and Picts had again recourſe to arms, and ſeverely retaliated on every Roman ſoldier, who ventured beyond the wall, the miſeries they had ſuffered from Caracalla.

A. D. 218. Severus, ignorant of the behaviour of his ſon, was ſo highly provoked at this breach of faith, that he determined to take a ſevere revenge. The orders he iſſued for chaſtiſing the Caledonians were couched in the moſt rigorous expreſſions; nothing leſs than the total extirpation of that people could ſatisfy the wrath of Severus. But he lived not to ſee his threatenings executed: his diſtempers continually increaſed; and, before the neceſſary preparations for the march of the army were completed, he died at York in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age; and his obſequies were performed with a ſplendor ſuitable to a Roman emperor.

The virtues of Severus, however great, were not without alloy. As a private man, he was covetous; as a commander, he was too ſuſceptible of revenge. Where-ever he conquered, he ruined; the ſword of deſtruction followed the wreath of victory. His ſpirit was dauntleſs, and ſuperior both to danger and fatigue. He was a ſtranger to laſſitude, and never wearied by the moſt minute enquiry into every article of his government. To his perſonal friends he was extremely grateful; to his perſonal enemies contemptuouſly diſdainful. As an emperor, he was moderate in his expences: in public buildings of every kind, magnificent, if not profuſe. He heard cauſes with the utmoſt exactneſs and patience: he entered the courts of juſtice at break of day, and ſtayed there till noon. His abilities were excellent, and improved by learning. He had more than the fondneſs of a father; he forgave Caracalla's frequent attacks upon his life. He was careful of the education of his ſons; and, at his death, jointly bequeathed to them his empire. The ſoldiers who loved Severus paid an entire ſubmiſſion to his will; they readily took the oath of fidelity to both the brothers. But the manners of the Britons were not ſufficiently poliſhed to render their country a pleaſing retreat to perſons long acquainted with the luxuries of Rome. They made a peace with the Scots and Picts; and taking with them their father's aſhes, they both repaired to the capital of the empire, and depoſited the remains of Severus in the tomb of Adrian. But Caracalla, whoſe ſoul was deeply tinctured with ambition and cruelty, could not bear to ſee a partner in the throne: he conſidered Geta as an enemy rather than a brother, and baſely cauſed him to be aſſaſſinated.

A. D. 286. From the departure of theſe princes, till the reign of Diocleſian, who aſſociated Maximian with him in the throne, nothing remarkable occurs in the hiſtory of Britain. Anarchy and confuſion prevailed throughout the world. The continent was filled with rebels, and the ſea covered with pirates. The coaſts of Britain and Gaul were infeſted with the fleets of the Franks and Saxons. Theſe diſorders called for an immediate remedy; and one Carauſius, a perſon of mean extraction, but famous for his courage and experience at ſea, was commiſſioned to put a ſtop to the ravages of the pirates. He was very ſucceſsful in his firſt attempts, and the barbarians were obliged to deſiſt from their depredations. His ſtation was near Boulogne, a port well ſituated for making him acquainted with the coaſts, the harbours, and the inhabitants of Britain. Carauſius ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful fleet, and was wiſe enough to know the weight, power, and dignity of his poſt. He ſaw himſelf the indiſputable ſovereign of the ſea, and determined, if poſſible, to wreſt the imperial ſcepter from the hands of the emperors. He redoubled his attention to increaſe his navy; he became rich by the ſpoils of the pirates; he formed a ſtrict alliance with the Britons. Had Carauſius been a land officer, all his ſchemes muſt have proved abortive; but from thoſe few particulars of his life which have reached our times, he appears to have been as ſucceſsful as he was ambitious, as bold as he was powerful, and as fit to command as he was ready to execute. To him we owe the firſt dawnings of our naval power; from his conduct we are appriſed of our natural ſtrength as an iſland, and from his example we have learned to ſet all the power of the continent at defiance.

Alarmed at the power, and exaſperated at the conduct of Carauſius, a perſon was diſpatched from Rome by the emperors, with a commiſſion to aſſaſſinate him. The attempt miſcarried, the aſſaſſin was diſcovered, and Carauſius determined to publiſh his claim to the imperial ſceptre. The officers of his fleet applauded his reſolution, and unanimouſly declared they would ſupport him to the laſt extremity. His firſt attempt was upon Boulogne, which he took by aſſault, and fortified the place as an occaſional retreat.

But his chief confidence was placed on Britain. The ſituation as an iſland rendered it impregnable to all but a maritime force, and his navy was ſuperior to any fleet the Romans could bring againſt him. Accordingly he had no ſooner finiſhed the fortifications of Boulogne, than he ſailed to Britain, where he was received with the greateſt acclamations of joy by the inhabitants. The Roman army proclaimed him emperor, and inveſted him with the purple robe.

A. D. 287. A triumvirate of emperors was an unuſual phænomenon: but the Roman power was ſo very tottering and precarious, that neither Diocleſian nor Maximian were in any degree ſtrong enough to deſtroy the acquiſitions of Carauſius. Some faint preparations of reſiſtance were made by Maximian, and Carauſius was proclaimed a pirate and a traitor to his country; but neceſſity ſoon after compelled the Romans to lay aſide their hoſtile intentions, and to ſign a treaty of peace; by which inglorious compact, this proclaimed pirate was declared Pius; this maritime robber was acknowledged Felix; and this avowed uſurper was ſurnamed Auguſtus.

Carauſius who was nothing more than a nominal emperor in Rome, was a real monarch in Britain; and he held the reins of government worthily. The Britons were no longer ſubject to the Roman power; they paid obedience only to their own ſovereign, and the laws of their country. Juſtice and equity were diſpenſed with an even hand; the commerce of the kingdom was encouraged; and the Britiſh ſeas were cleared of pirates.

The Scots and Picts, perſuaded that the Britons unaſſiſted by the Roman power, were unable to defend their country, renewed their ravages, and broke through the walls of partition. Carauſius immediately marched againſt the invaders, defeated them in ſeveral engagements, and drove them back into their country with conſiderable loſs. But having ſignalized his courage, and convinced the Caledonians that he was at once a powerful and vigilant enemy, he offered them peace on very advantageous terms, hoping by that means to unite the whole power of the iſland, and render abortive any attempt that might be made by the imperial armies of Rome.

A. D. 289. The power of Carauſius, and the alliances he had formed with other maritime powers, alarmed the Romans. The imperial throne was now filled by Maximian Galerus, and Conſtantius Chlorus. Forces were raiſed with the utmoſt expedition; and every precaution taken to prevent the allies from joining the fleet of the Britiſh monarch. Carauſius ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and took the moſt prudent meaſures to break its force. He collected his fleet, and ſtationed troops in every part of the iſland where the Romans could hope to land their forces. Small veſſels were kept continually cruiſing on the coaſts of Gaul, in order to give him the moſt early intelligence of the appearance of the enemy.

A. D. 293. But while he was thus preparing for the ſafety of his kingdom, he was baſely aſſaſſinated by the treacherous Alectus, one of his officers, and his boſom friend. That perfidious wretch did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of his villany. He ſeized indeed the reins of government, but loſt the affections of his people. At once ambitious and cruel, he was deteſted by the Britons; they paid him only the obedience of fear; and were ready to join the Romans on their firſt appearance.

Alectus ſaw his danger, but wanted capacity to avoid it. He increaſed his navy indeed, but not for the defence of his country. He employed his maritime forces rather as a pirate than a prince: inſtead of encouraging the trade of his ſubjects, he deſtroyed it. The intercourſe between Britain and Gaul was cut off; and the commerce of the Roman provinces interrupted. The loſſes and diſtreſſes of his people greatly affected Conſtantius. He redoubled his efforts to collect a fleet ſufficiently powerful to engage the navy of Alectus; and was at laſt ſucceſsful.

No time was loſt in unneceſſary preparation. The forces were immediately embarked, and Conſtantius ſailed for the coaſt of Britain. Alectus, informed that the imperial navy had left the harbours of Gaul, ſtood off to ſea to meet them; but a thick fog concealed both fleets from the ſight of each other; and the Romans landed without oppoſition on the coaſt of Suſſex.

Conſtantius knew that it would be impoſſible to defend his fleet from the attacks of the enemy, after his forces were landed, and therefore prudently ſet his ſhips on fire. The Britons were pleaſed with this magnanimous action. They ſaw that Conſtantius was determined to conquer or periſh, and therefore flocked from all quarters to his ſtandard, imploring his protection againſt the treacherous tyrant of their country.

The genius of Alectus was not fertile in reſources. He was ſuperior at ſea, but wanted prudence to make uſe of that advantage. He abandoned the only acquiſition that rendered him formidable to Conſtantius, and madly determined to meet the Roman army on the land. He ſhould have reflected that a number of raw forces, ſtrangers to military diſcipline, without armour, and without affection for their leader, were no match for the Roman veterans. Alectus was convinced of this when it was too late; the greateſt part of his ſoldiers went over to the enemy, and the reſt were ſoon put to flight. Deſpair now ſeized the heart of Alectus; he threw away his purple robe, ruſhed into the thickeſt part of the Roman army, and was cut to pieces.

A party of the Franks, who had eſcaped the general ſlaughter, marched directly to London, plundered the city, and fell down the river in veſſels loaded with the ſpoils they had taken; but were met in their paſſage by a diviſion of the Roman fleet, which had been ſeparated from the reſt by the late fog. A battle enſued; the Franks were totally defeated, and the Romans recovered all the booty taken by the enemy.

The Britons, now delivered from the tyranny of Alectus, once more applied themſelves to cultivate the arts of peace. Conſtantius laboured inceſſantly to render them a happy people. He publiſhed a general pardon to all that had been concerned in the late revolt; he reſtored to the proprietors all that had been taken from them, even by his own ſoldiers. He diſpenſed juſtice with impartiality; he permitted the free exerciſe of the Chriſtian religion, which had for ſome time before been planted in the iſland. He cleared the ſea of pirates, reſtored the Britiſh commerce, and chaſtiſed the northern people, who, during the late troubles, had renewed their ravages. So many good qualities rendered him dear to the Britons; they conſidered him as their deliverer, and forgot that they were again ſubjected to the Roman power.

The arts which had been introduced by Agricola had arrived to ſome perfection during the reign of Carauſius. The city of London was decorated with elegant ſtructures; it was become conſiderable for its extent, its beauty, and its riches: it was the center of commerce, and the reſidence of many wealthy merchants. Conſtantius was pleaſed with theſe improvements, and encouraged them by his munificence. He viewed with delight the dawnings of ſcience, the firſt eſſays of genius in a ferocious people. He thought the iſland worthy of his reſidence, and applied himſelf to cultivate the riſing merit of a people who conſidered him as their father. Perhaps his paſſion for the celebrated Helena, who, according to our beſt hiſtorians, was a native of Colcheſter, contributed to increaſe his affection for the Britons. She was a woman of extraordinary accompliſhments: the many noble works ſhe carried on at her own expence ſufficiently diſplay her public ſpirit; and her liberality, which attracted the love and veneration of the Britons, was unbounded.

A. D. 306. The Britons were happy under the adminiſtration of Conſtantius, but it was of no long continuance. He died at York in the twelfth year of his reign, and left the Britons to lament his loſs. His ſon Conſtantine, ſurnamed the Great, arrived ſoon enough to pay the laſt duties to his father, who named him for his ſucceſſor. His choice was univerſally approved of; and, on the deceaſe of Conſtantius, he was declared emperor by the army.

Conſtantine was formed for empire: his genius was piercing; his memory tenacious; his learning uncommon; his liberality unbounded. Affable, polite, equitable and humane, he won the hearts of all his ſubjects: they revered him as a father; they loved him as a friend. No perſon ever retired diſſatisfied from his preſence; no perſon ever implored his aſſiſtance in vain. Inflexibly impartial in the adminiſtration of juſtice, and deeply affected with every ſpecies of diſtreſs in others, he often repaid from his own coffers the loſs which the needy had juſtly ſuſtained by his ſentence. His ſoul was a ſtranger to cruelty. His laurels of conqueſt were never ſtained with the blood of the vanquiſhed. The ſword of rapacity never followed his victories; the forfeited eſtates of his moſt inveterate enemies were reſtored. To be unfortunate was a ſufficient recommendation to his protection, and the ſufferer was always ſure of finding relief. He openly declared himſelf a Chriſtian, and by that means gave a fatal blow to Pagan ſuperſtition. His life was the beſt comment on the tenets he profeſſed; the refined morality of the goſpel directed all his actions.

Under the government of ſuch a prince the Britons could not fail of being happy. No diſturbance, no inſurrection happened during his whole reign, though extended to an uncommon length. Poſſibly his political regulations had ſome tendency to promote this ſeries of tranquillity. He divided the iſland into four governments, viz. Britannia Prima, comprehending the country between the Thames and the Engliſh channel: Britannia Secunda, including that part of the iſland that lies between the Severn and the Iriſh ſea: Flavia Cæſarienſis, containing Cornwall, Somerſetſhire, and part of the counties of Wilts and Glouceſter: and Maxima Ceſarienſis, including the northern counties, together with Nottinghamſhire, Derbyſhire, Staffordſhire, and Lincolnſhire.

A. D. 337. Conſtantine the Great paid the debt of nature on the twenty-ſecond of May, after a proſperous reign of thirty-one years, and divided his empire between his three ſons. To the eldeſt, who was of the ſame name with his father, he bequeathed Britain, France, Spain, and part of Germany. But he did not long enjoy the crown, being killed in the battle of Aquileia, three years after his acceſſion, in attempting to make himſelf maſter of the dominions of Conſtans his brother.

A. D. 343. Conſtans having acquired the inheritance of his brother Conſtantine, paſſed over into Britain, in order to repel the incurſions of the Picts and Scots, who, on the death of Conſtantine the Great, renewed their ravages on the northern frontiers. This prince poſſeſſed not the virtues of his father; he was a ſtranger to the noble qualities that rendered Conſtantine amiable. He was not anxious to promote the happineſs of his people; he liſtened not to their complaints. Immerſed in luxury, and delighting only in the diverſions of the field, he left the cares of government to others who abuſed his confidence. His ſubjects were oppreſſed, and his revenues waſted by perſons of deteſtable characters. Exaſperated by cruelty ſupported by power, an inſurrection enſued. Magnentius, a Gaul of Britiſh extraction, headed the tumult, and Conſtans was ſoon after put to the ſword.

A. D. 350. The family of the great Conſtantine was, by this cataſtrophe, reduced to the youngeſt ſon, named Conſtantius; but the vices of his brother had alienated the affections of the Britons, who now declared for Magnentius; and had that uſurper been contented with the ſceptre of the iſland, he might, in all probability, have ſupported his power againſt all the attempts of his enemies; but he graſped at empire. He was ambitious of wearing the purple robe, and raſhly paſſed over to the continent at the head of an army. He fought two battles with Conſtantius, and was unfortunate in both. Driven to deſpair, and having only the wretched alternative of falling into the hands of the conqueror, or periſhing by his own hand, he choſe the latter; and falling on his ſword, put an end to his life.

A. D. 354. The ſufferings of the Britons began with the death of Magnentius. The emperor was implacable. They readily ſubmitted to his authority; but their defection in favour of Magnentius was not to be forgiven. He ſent over a covetous and unfeeling wretch, called Paulinus, a notary by profeſſion, to diſcover the adherents of Magnentius, and, on conviction, to confiſcate their eſtates. Nurſed in the lap of extortion, and proof againſt the moſt complicated diſtreſs, he executed his commiſſion with outrage and cruelty. Martin, the deputy of the province, ſaw his proceedings with grief; the ſufferings of an injured people excited his compaſſion. He warmly expoſtulated with Paulinus, and even threatened to leave the iſland, in order to lay his conduct before the emperor. Exaſperated at the threats of Martin, and terrified at the conſequences of having his conduct publickly examined, he ſuborned witneſſes to accuſe Martin of crimes againſt the ſtate. The deputy ſaw his danger, and determined not to ſuffer the intended diſgrace. When called before the court, he looked ſternly at Paulinus, drew his ſword, and made a thruſt at the tyrant's heart; but miſſing his blow, he turned the weapon againſt himſelf, and plunged it in his own boſom. Paulinus did not long, however, enjoy the fruits of his perfidy; he was, a few years after, burnt alive, by the command of Julian the apoſtate.

A. D. 363. From the death of Martin till the reign of Valentinian, nothing remarkable happened in Britain. The northern nations indeed continued their deſultory war, but were always repelled before they made any conſiderable progreſs; their attempts were not ſufficient to diſturb the general tranquillity of the province. But a ſcene now opened, which more than repaid the inactivity of many years. The fleets of the Franks and Saxons committed the moſt dreadful ravages along the coaſts; while the Scots and Picts, having broke through the walls of partition, laid the inland parts of the country waſte. The Roman general advanced againſt the invaders, at the head of his forces; but fell into an ambuſcade, and was ſlain. The condition of the Britons was now truly deplorable, and ſome forces were ſent to their relief; but they were unable to ſtem the torrent, and the barbarians continued their ravages with greater cruelty than before.

A. D. 364. Convinced that nothing but a powerful reinforcement, headed by a general of abilities and experience, could ſave the province from deſtruction; Valentinian diſpatched Theodoſius, reckoned the beſt ſoldier of his time, at the head of a choice body of troops, to chaſtiſe the ferocious barbarians, and reſtore tranquillity in the iſland. The arrival of Theodoſius entirely changed the face of affairs: he defeated the invaders in different parts of the country, recovered the ſpoils they had taken, and returned them to the original owners. Theſe acts of juſtice ſoon endeared him to the Britons; they followed his ſtandards with alacrity, and nobly aſſiſted in repelling the barbarians. He purſued his advantages, and, by degrees, drove the Caledonians into their own country. But Theodoſius well knew that he had yet effected only a temporary relief; the barbarians were repelled, but not rendered incapable of making another attempt. He therefore formed the country, between the walls of Adrian and Antoninus, into a ſeparate province, which he called Valentia, in honour of the emperor. He repaired both the walls, added new works, and placed ſtrong garriſons at proper diſtances, that a ſufficient force might always be ready to render abortive any attempt of the Caledonians. The ravages of the Franks and Saxons now called for his attention; a ſtrong fleet was fitted out, and the pirates totally defeated.

A. D. 370. Having thus reſtored tranquillity in the iſland, Theodoſius applied himſelf to regulate the internal police of the ſtate, in order to render it laſting: he corrected many abuſes, and committed the department of the adminiſtration of juſtice to a civilian equally famous for his parts and integrity. He leſſened the taxes, demoliſhed ſuch impoſts as were burdenſome to trade, and encouraged the commerce of the Britons by every method in his power. By theſe acts of prudence and clemency, he became the idol of the people; they conſidered him not only as their deliverer, but their common father. And, when he left the iſland, he was attended to the ſhip by multitudes of people, teſtifying, in the warmeſt expreſſions, their regret and ſorrow for his departure. The emperor received him with the moſt public demonſtrations of friendſhip and affection; and the ſenate decreed him a ſtatue, ordering it to be placed among their moſt celebrated anceſtors.

Among the officers that ſerved under Theodoſius in Britain, was Maximus, a ſoldier of great merit and experience, and deſcended from a noble family in Spain. Soon after the departure of Theodoſius, Maximus was advanced to the chief command in Britain; and, by forming his conduct after the model of his illuſtrious predeceſſor, acquired the love and eſteem both of the army and inhabitants. A profound peace reigned in the iſland; for the barbarians, intimidated by the valour and alacrity of Maximus, had laid aſide their incurſions, and continued quiet in their own country.

A. D. 375. During this period of repoſe and tranquillity, Valentinian paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded in the weſtern empire by his ſon Gratian, a youth in every reſpect incapable of ſupporting the weight of the imperial diadem. He was wholly addicted to pleaſures, and governed by favourites choſen from the loweſt claſs of the people. His talents were mean, his learning ſuperficial, his knowledge confined: his abilities were thoſe of a huntſman, rather than a monarch. He was much better qualified to preſide at the feaſts of debauchery, than to ſway the ſceptre of Rome. Gratian ſoon perceived his own inability to hold the reins of government, and choſe Flavius Magnus Theodoſius, ſon of the great general of that name, to be his aſſociate in the empire.

A. D. 385. Maximus could not behold the ſudden riſe of young Theodoſius with temper. They had both ſerved under the celebrated conqueror of the Caledonians; but Maximus being the older officer, was ſuperior in command. His ambition would not ſuffer him to ſerve under a perſon he had been uſed to command. He complained loudly of the injuſtice which had been done him; and found means to prevail upon the ſoldiers to join in his reſentment. The Britons, who were greatly prejudiced in his favour, followed the example of the Roman forces, and declared themſelves his friends. Elated with this dawning of ſucceſs, he collected all his forces, conſiſting of Romans and the flower of the Britiſh youth, and paſſed over into Gaul, where the legions quartered in that country and the neighbouring parts of Germany joined his ſtandard. He fixed his reſidence at Tiers, and was acknowledged emperor by moſt of the provinces on this ſide the Alps.

But while Maximus was enjoying the pleaſures of royalty, the Britons were reduced to a ſtate truly deplorable. Deprived of the aſſiſtance of the Roman veterans, whoſe very name was terrible, and drained of their native forces; the Britons were in no condition to repel the attacks of the ferocious Caledonians. They broke through the pretentures, and laid the country waſte with fire and ſword. Maximus rejected their repeated ſollicitations for ſuccour: the calls of ambition rendered him deaf to the ſoft whiſpers of of humanity.

A. D. 387. But it was now neceſſary for him to exert his whole ſtrength: Gratian advanced againſt him at the head of a powerful army. Maximus drew up his forces; but juſt before the ſignal for engaging was given, the greater part of Gratian's legions went over to the enemy. Deſerted by his troops, and in no condition of collecting a ſecond army, he fled to Lyons, and there periſhed by the hand of Andragathius.

Intoxicated with ſucceſs, and ambitious of poſſeſſing the whole Roman empire, he purſued his conqueſt with unremitting vigour, and graſped in idea the whole dominions of Conſtantine the great. Theodoſius was not intimidated by his rival's ſucceſs: he advanced againſt him at the head of an army of veterans, uſed to conqueſt under his ſtandard. The battle was fierce and bloody; but the fortune of Theodoſius at laſt prevailed, and the troops of Maximus were obliged to ſeek their ſafety in flight. He himſelf fled to Aquileia, where he was taken priſoner and put to death.

A. D. 388. Theodoſius, though ſurrounded by enemies, liſtened to the ſollicitations of the Britons. Their condition, indeed, merited pity. Without troops to repel the attacks of the ferocious Caledonians; without a fleet to guard their coaſts; and without generals to lead them againſt the invaders, they became an eaſy prey to the enemy, and ſeemed to have loſt the power of reſiſtance. But on the arrival of Chryſanthus, ſent into Britain at the head of an army by Theodoſius, the face of affairs was totally changed. The Caledonians were driven back to their country, the fleets of pirates, which had for ſome time infeſted the coaſt, were defeated, and the haraſſed Britons once more enjoyed the bleſſings of peace.

A. D. 395. While Theodoſius filled the imperial throne, the Britons were happy; their commerce flouriſhed, and the barbarians were confined to their own mountains. But the death of that great prince, put a period to their tranquillity. The Roman empire was indeed grown feeble under the weight of conqueſt. A deluge of barbarians pouring in from the north, attacked a power which oppreſſed the world. An inundation of warlike nations overflowed the plains of France and Italy. It became neceſſary for Rome to exert her utmoſt ſtrength to repel the attacks of the ferocious inhabitants of the north. The legions were recalled from Britain, and the inhabitants who had exchanged their freedom for ſlavery, left to defend themſelves.

Theſe fierce tribes of barbarians, who came to take vengeance on the empire, either inhabited the various provinces of Germany, which had never been ſubdued by the Romans, or were ſcattered over the northern parts of Europe and Aſia, now inhabited by the Danes, Swedes, Ruſſians, Tartars and Poles. They were driven from their native country by that reſtleſs diſpoſition which actuates the minds of barbarians, and induces them to roam from their native ſeats in queſt of plunder or new ſettlements. The firſt invaders met with a powerful reſiſtance from the ſuperior diſcipline of the Roman legions; but this, inſtead of daunting men of ſtrong and impetuous tempers only rouſed them to vengeance. They returned to their companions, acquainted them with the unknown conveniences and luxuries that abounded in countries better cultivated, or bleſſed with a milder climate than their own; they informed them of the battles they had fought, of the friends they had loſt, and watched them with reſentment againſt their oppoſers. Exaſperated at the misfortunes of their countrymen, and animated with a deſire of poſſeſſing kingdoms ſo far preferable to their own, multitudes of armed men, with their wives, children, ſlaves, and flocks, iſſued forth like regular colonies, in queſt of freſh ſettlements. New adventurers followed them. The lands which they deſerted, were occupied by more remote tribes of barbarians. Theſe, in their turn, puſhed forward into more fertile countries, and, like a current continually increaſing, rolled on, and ſwept every thing before them. Blood and ſlaughter marked the route of the barbarians. They ravaged or deſtroyed the countries round them. They reſpected neither age, nor ſex, nor rank; all fell in one promiſcuous carnage. Perhaps there is not a period in the hiſtory of the world more pregnant with calamities and diſtreſs, than that which commenced at the death of Theodoſius, and terminated with the ſettlement of the Lombards in Italy. The cotemporary writers who beheld that dreadful ſcene of deſolation, are at a loſs for expreſſions to deſcribe its horrors. "The ſcourge of God, the "deſtroyer of nations", are the dreadful epithets by which they diſtinguiſh the moſt noted leaders of the barbarians.

The Britons had their ſhare of theſe dreadful calamities. Deprived of the Roman legions, ſtrangers to military diſcipline, and immerſed in luxury, they were unable to defend their country againſt the ferocious inhabitants of Caledonia; who broke through the pretentures, and laid the country waſte with fire and ſword. In vain the Britons oppoſed their incurſions; they had ſlumbered too long on the bed of effeminacy, to be a match for the hardy inhabitants of the north; who ravaged the fields of their debilitated neighbours, and threatened them with the loſs of thoſe advantages, for which they had bartered their freedom.

A. D. 408. Driven to deſpair by their formidable enemy, they implored, in the moſt pathetic terms, the protection of the emperor. But their requeſt could not be granted. Alaric the Goth preſſed the Romans on every ſide, and threatened the deſtruction of their powerful empire. Honorius, who then filled the throne of the Cæſars, informed them, that no forces could be ſpared for their relief; and therefore adviſed them to arm in their own defence, and chaſtiſe with their own forces, the lawleſs invaders of their country. Tumult and confuſion, inſtead of unanimity, now filled the councils of the Britons. They ſeveral times elected a king, and as often hurled him from the throne. Like the idols of ſome ſavage nations, they were ſet up, worſhipped, and trampled to pieces. The names of theſe monarchs of a day are inſignificant, their actions as ſovereigns immaterial and uncertain: they were elected, adored, and deſtroyed. Affairs were now become deſperate; and the Romans who reſided in Britain, perſuaded that all reſiſtance was in vain, buried their treaſures, and fled to the continent for ſafety.

A. D. 423. Valentinian III. who ſucceeded Honorius in the imperial throne, could not view the diſtreſſed ſtate of the Britons without commiſerating their misfortunes. A ſingle legion was ſent to their relief; and even this ſmall force was ſufficient to drive back the ferocious Caledonians to their country. The pretentures were now repaired, and the northern frontiers put once more into a poſture of defence. Tranquillity was reſtored, and the Britons began to cultivate the arts of peace. While the Romans continued in the iſland, the Picts and Scots remained quiet in their own country; but the legion was no ſooner withdrawn, than the northern barbarians renewed their ravages: the frontier provinces were again filled with blood and ſlaughter. The fields were laid waſte, and every ſpecies of cruelty, that a ſavage enemy could invent, was practiſed on the wretched inhabitants.

A. D. 446. The Britons, unable to repel the attacks of their neighbours, applied again to the emperor for protection; and another legion, under the command of Gallio, an experienced general, was ſent to their relief. Succeſs again attended the Roman ſtandards; the barbarians were driven back to their mountains, and peace extended her olive wand over the iſland.

A. D. 447. But Gallio plainly told the Britons that this was the laſt aſſiſtance they muſt ever expect from Rome. He therefore aſſiſted them in repairing or rather rebuilding the wall of Severus: exhorted them to practice the military diſcipline of the Romans, and to unite themſelves firmly in one body for their defence. He gave them every neceſſary inſtruction, taught them the method of making the inſtruments of war, and pointed out the natural advantages they poſſeſſed from their ſituation. Having performed theſe good offices, he embarked with his legion, and took a final leave of the Britons.

No farther aſſiſtance indeed could be expected: the Roman empire itſelf ſoon became a prey to barbarous nations. Its ancient glory, vainly deemed immortal, was effaced, and Adoaces, a barbarian leader, ſat down on the throne of the Cæſars. The irruptions of theſe ferocious people were, indeed, gradual and ſucceſſive. The amazing fabric of the Roman empire was the work of ages; and it required the labour of ſeveral centuries to demoliſh it. The military diſcipline of the ancient Romans was ſo efficacious, that the remains of it deſcended to their ſucceſſors, and muſt have rendered them ſuperior to all their enemies, had it not been for the vices of their emperors, and the univerſal corruption of manners that prevailed among the people. Satiated with the luxuries of the known world, the emperors were at a loſs for new provocatives. The moſt diſtant regions were explored, the ingenuity of mankind was exerted, and the revenues of provinces expended on a favourite diſh. The tyranny and wickedneſs that prevailed under the Cæſars, could only be equalled by the barbarity of thoſe nations who demoliſhed the empire of the Romans.

It is well known that the chriſtian religion was introduced into Britain during the government of the Romans; but the exact time is uncertain. Some have indeed maintained that St. Paul preached the goſpel in Britain; but there is no other foundation for this opinion than a paſſage in Clemens Romanus, not rightly underſtood; and with regard to the fable of Joſeph of Aramathea, it has long been acknowledged to have owed its riſe to the dreams of ſome ſuperſtitious enthuſiaſtic. All we know is, that our anceſtors received the glad tidings of the goſpel in very early times, when they groaned under the yoke of foreign tyranny; and that this event happened before the concluſion of the ſecond century; becauſe in the general perſecution under Diocleſian and Maximinus about the year 303, the chriſtians in Britain were very numerous, St. Alban, and ſeveral others, ſuffered martyrdom for their faith during that perſecution.

What progreſs the Britons made in literature during this period, is uncertain. They were, doubtleſs, acquainted with the Roman arts; but whether any of them excelled, is unknown. No traces of their learning have been handed down to us: not a ſingle book written by the Britons has reached our time. Architecture and ſculpture flouriſhed during the reign of Carauſius; and further improvements were made in theſe and other polite arts, during the peaceable reign of Conſtantine the great; but the names of the artiſts are forgotten; they are periſhed with their works, and ſunk together in the gulph of oblivion.

BOOK II.

From the final departure of the Romans till the eſtabliſhment of the Saxon Heptarchy.

A. D. 448. THE Britons were now no longer the ferocious iſlanders who oppoſed the arms of the mighty Cæſar: they loſt their courage with their liberty, were become a puſillanimous people, and an eaſy prey to the Scots and Picts. They applied, in the moſt abject manner, to Ætius, whoſe valour at that time protracted the fall of the empire. The letter they addreſſed to that general, diſplays at once the miſeries of their country, and their own cowardice. “The barbarians (ſaid they) drive us towards the ſea; the ſea throws us back upon the barbarians; and we have only the wretched alternative left us, of periſhing by the ſword, or by the waves.” But their requeſt was in vain: Ætius himſelf was ſo cloſely preſſed by the Goths and Vandals, that no forces could be ſpared to aſſiſt the diſtreſſed iſlanders: the ravages on the continent were at leaſt equal to thoſe committed in Britain.

Denied aſſiſtance by the Romans, and incapable of forming any generous effort, the Britons abandoned themſelves to deſpair; they flew for ſhelter to their foreſts, and neglected the cultivation of their lands. A dreadful famine ſucceeded, during which multitudes of them periſhed for want of food. The ferocious Caledonians themſelves ſeverely felt the conſequences of their inhuman ravages. They found it impoſſible to ſubſiſt in a country they themſelves had laid waſte, and retired to their mountains with the ſpoils they had taken from their effeminate neighbours.

The retreat of the enemy revived the ſpirits of the Britons. They returned to their former habitations, applied themſelves to agriculture, and ſoon reſtored plenty to their country. But they enjoyed this interval of tranquillity without taking any care to render it permanent; they made no preparations for their future ſecurity. They were divided into parties, by the hereſy which their countryman Pelagius had lately introduced among them; and even the dread of the ravages of a ferocious enemy was not ſufficient to procure unanimity in their councils. Their northern neighbours, whoſe trade was rapine, ſoon threatened them with a new invaſion. Alarmed at the horrors they had ſo lately experienced, and trembling at the thoughts of depending on their own power, a reſolution was taken to procure the aſſiſtance of foreigners. Vortigern, who had made his way to the throne by the murder of his predeceſſor, propoſed that a number of Saxons might be invited into the iſland. The motion was approved, and ambaſſadors were immediately ſent to the continent to enter into a treaty with that people.

At that time the Saxons inhabited the ſea-coaſt from the mouth of the Rhine to Jutland. Valour and the love of liberty formed the diſtinguiſhing characteriſtics of that people. Their chiefs, who led them to battle, and preſided in their councils, were far from enjoying a deſpotic power; they were ſubject to the regulations of the ſtate, and to the voice of the people, who always came armed to the council, in order to declare their ſentiments. The attachment of the Saxons to their leaders was remarkable. When any of them fell in battle, they thought themſelves obliged to revenge their death, and never to ſurvive a defeat. They were almoſt ſtrangers to agriculture; they had no lands they could properly call their own, a new diviſion being made every year, leſt the love of property ſhould leſſen their military ardour, which they conſidered as the true ſupport of their ſtate. They generally carried their wives and children with them into the field, that the preſence of theſe objects of their affection might augment their intrepidity in the day of battle, and prevent their turning their backs upon the enemy.

Such were the Saxons, whom the Britons invited into their country, in order to defend them againſt the ravages of the Scots and Picts. But ſurely there wanted no great degree of foreſight to perceive the danger that threatened them from ſo powerful an ally. It was nothing leſs than exchanging a partial for a perpetual tyranny. For a moment's reflection is ſufficient to convince any thinking man, that a nation of ſo warlike and ferocious a diſpoſition as the Saxons, would not omit to ſubdue a people who were ſunk into the abyſs of effeminacy, and accuſtomed to the yoke of ſlavery.

The offers of the Britons could not fail of being agreeable to a people nurſed in a camp, who lived by rapine, and whoſe country was overſtocked with inhabitants. Hengiſt and Horſa, two of the moſt famous leaders of the Saxons, entered into a treaty with the deputies of Vortigern. They were brothers, and no ſtrangers to Britain, having often viſited the coaſts of that iſland in their piratical cruiſes. Nor did theſe ferocious generals find any difficulty in perſuading a ſufficient number of their countrymen to follow their ſtandards. The northern parts of Europe were full of barbarian tribes, who were continually ſending out multitudes of people in ſearch of new ſettlements; ſo that it was in vain for them to hope they ſhould be able to extend the limits of their country on the continent. Britain was fertile; the inhabitants opulent, and the climate inviting; charms more than ſufficient to attract the wiſhes of a rude and indigent people, and render them deſirous of exchanging their dreary and ſterile ſoil for the beautiful plains of a country ſmiling in all the charms of nature, improved by the unwearied hand of aſſiduous cultivation.

A. D. 450. Hengiſt and Horſa having increaſed their army to ſixteen hundred men, embarked their forces in three ſhips, and landed in the iſle of Thanet, where they were met by Vortigern and his court. Hengiſt and Horſa approached the Britiſh monarch in the attitude of ferocious warriors, having in their hands their ſhort broad ſwords, which they uſed with ſo much dexterity and effect. Their troops followed them in the ſame poſture, in order to convince the Britons, that they had not applied to a nation incapable of protecting them againſt the northern invaders of their country. Before the Saxons reached the Britiſh coaſt, the Scots and Picts had renewed their ravages, and penetrated as far as Lincolnſhire, committing the moſt dreadful outrages in their march. The Saxons joined the Britons, and ſoon convinced theſe northern invaders, that victory was not confined to the Roman ſtandards. They were unable to withſtand the valour of the Saxons; they fled in confuſion towards the frontiers of their country, abandoning all the ſpoil they had taken, which fell into the hands of the conquerors. This eaſy victory gave the Saxons a very mean opinion of the power of the Britons, who were unable to repel the deſultory attacks of ſo undiſciplined a foe: they perceived their own ſuperiority, and determined to improve it to their own advantage. Little ſincerity is to be expected from barbarians; their great virtue is to conquer for their own emolument. Ambitious of being maſters of a country they were called to defend, and deſirous of procuring a deſireable ſettlement for their Saxon friends, they informed them of the great fertility of the iſland, and the effeminate manners of the inhabitants; at the ſame time inviting them to attempt a conqueſt of the utmoſt importance, and attended with very little difficulty.

Their invitations were not made in vain. Deſirous of ſharing in the good fortune of their countrymen, and ſettling in a country ſo much ſuperior to their own, a very conſiderable number of the Saxons paſſed over into Britain, and joined the army of Hengiſt and Horſa. The Britons beheld this increaſe of the Saxon forces with anxiety. The auxiliaries, in whom they had placed their confidence, were become their terror. They had been witneſſes of their valour againſt their northern enemies, and dreaded the conſequences that would inevitably enſue, ſhould they turn their ſwords againſt their employers. They perceived the folly of the ſtep they had taken, and were deſirous of retrieving it.

A. D. 451. But it was now too late; the Saxons were landed, and their forces daily augmenting. Reaſons are ſeldom wanting when a barbarous army are determined to attack the poſſeſſions of a rich and indolent people. Hengiſt and Horſa, under pretence that the Britons had refuſed the ſubſiſtence they had promiſed, ravaged the adjacent country, formed an alliance with the Scots and Picts, and laid waſte, with fire and ſword, the territories of a people who had called them to their defence.

Exaſperated at the perfidy of the Saxons, and ſcandalized at the vices of Vortigern, the Britons flew to arms, hurled the guilty potentate from his throne, and placed the ſceptre in the hands of Vortimer his ſon. Under the banners of that active prince, the ancient valour of the Britons began to revive: they fought ſeveral battles with the Saxons; and, though generally defeated, convinced their perfidious auxiliaries, that the intrepidity of their anceſtors ſtill ſubſiſted among the Britons. In a battle fought near Ailsford, the Britons were victorious; and Horſa, one of the Saxon generals, fell in the conflict.

A. D. 457. The Saxons were alarmed at this change of fortune, and ſaw the neceſſity of repairing their loſs. But their numbers were too much reduced for them to venture a ſecond engagement with a people fluſhed with conqueſt; and therefore retreated to their camp, in order to wait the arrival of freſh ſuccours. The interval was of no long continuance; a large body of Saxons landed in Britain, and marched immediately to the camp of Hengiſt. Vortimer perceived the cloud of deſtruction gathering round him, and laboured aſſiduouſly to break its force; but the army of the enemy was too numerous to be oppoſed with ſucceſs by the undiſciplined Britons. Hengiſt now took the title of King of Kent; and the Saxons ſallied from their camp, marking their route with blood and devaſtation. Neither age nor ſex were ſpared; the prieſts were burnt upon their altars, and the prince and the peaſant ſhared the ſame fate. The ſtructures dedicated to religion were levelled in the duſt; and the whole country through which they paſſed exhibited the moſt dreadful ſpectacle of horror and deſolation.

A. D. 465. Vortimer ſaw with grief the ruin of his country, and exerted his whole power to ſtop the barbarous ravages of the Saxons; but before he could accompliſh this deſireable end, death put a final period to his labours, and the Britons were left without a leader. The fate of their country was too critical to admit of delay; ſo that the deſtructive parties that uſually prevailed at the election of a prince were now forgotten; and Ambroſius, a Briton of Roman deſcent, was, by the unanimous voice of the council, placed in the ſeat of power. A more proper perſon could not have been choſen to hold the reins of government at this dangerous criſis; he was humane, prudent, and intrepid: his conduct and valour were equally eminent; he was not to be intimidated by the power of the enemy, nor provoked to raſh meaſures by their cruelty.

Hengiſt perceived the alteration in the conduct of the Britons, and was alarmed for the conſequences. Inſtead of extending his ravages, he found it difficult to keep poſſeſſion of his kingdom of Kent. Aſſiſted by the famous Arthur, whoſe exploits have given riſe to ſo many fables, Ambroſius defeated ſeveral detachments of the Saxons, and filled with alarms the camp of the enemy. Hengiſt, to avoid the deſtruction of his army, ſent for another tribe of his countrymen, under the command of his brother Octa; but, inſtead of joining the Saxons in Kent, he ordered him to land in Northumberland, in order to divide the attention of Ambroſius. But ſtill the Saxons were in no condition to undertake any thing of conſequence againſt the Britons; ſeveral years elapſed before they were able to make ſettlements in any other part of the kingdom.

While the Saxons lay inactive, new tribes of adventurers were daily arriving from Germany. Among theſe the Angles made a conſpicuous figure, both with regard to number and military abilities. They were of a different nation from the Saxons; but being of the ſame religion, ſpeaking the ſame language, and coming upon the ſame errand, they joined the forces of Hengiſt, and acted with them in concert againſt the forces of Ambroſius.

A. D. 477. The affairs of the Britons now wore a lowring aſpect. The former ravages were renewed, and the ſtandard of deſolation again erected in their devoted country. In the midſt of theſe confuſions, Ella, a Saxon chief, landed, at the head of his forces, on the coaſt of Suſſex. He was bravely oppoſed by the Britons, and obliged to wait for freſh ſuccours before he could make any ſettlement in the country. This oppoſition raiſed the fury of Ella; he thought it an unpardonable offence in the inhabitants to defend their property, and therefore ſpared neither age or ſex; every perſon that fell into his hands he put to the ſword, without diſtinction. The wretched inhabitants that eſcaped the fury of their invader, took refuge in the foreſts, and left their poſſeſſions a prey to the conqueror, who took the title of King of the South-Saxons.

A. D. 495. About eighteen years after Ella had founded the kingdom of Suſſex, Cerdic, and his ſon Kenrick, landed in the weſtern parts of England, at the head of a powerful army of Saxons. But though his forces were much ſuperior to thoſe of Ella, he met with more difficulties in making a ſettlement. He was oppoſed by the celebrated Arthur, whoſe valour was now the principal ſupport of his country. He attacked the Saxon chief with all the vigour of an ancient Briton, and defeated him in ſeveral battles. But freſh reinforcements continually arriving, Cerdic conquered all oppoſition, and laid the foundation of the kingdom of Weſſex.

A. D. 527. The attention of the Britons was now called to another part of the country. No leſs than three armies landed about the ſame time on the eaſtern coaſt of the iſland. The firſt of theſe conſiſted chiefly of Angles, headed by Uffa, a celebrated leader of that nation. Little oppoſition was now made by the Britons; multitudes of them were deſtroyed, and others had taken ſhelter in the mountainous parts of the iſland. Uffa therefore eaſily defeated the few forces that oppoſed him, and founded the kingdom of Eaſt Anglia. Crida laid the foundations of the kingdom of Mercia; and Erkenwin eſtabliſhed that of Eſſex, or the Eaſt Saxons.

A. D. 547. Though the Saxons had been, for many years, ſettled in ſome parts of Northumberland, land, they were not able to ſubdue the inhabitants, till they were joined by Ida, a celebrated leader, at the head of a numerous detachment. The arrival of this chief raiſed the drooping courage of his countrymen. He attacked the Britons, drove them, with great ſlaughter, from their poſſeſſions, and aſſumed the title of King of Bernicia, including the counties of Northumberland and Durham. While Ida was employed in conquering the northern parts of the kingdom, Ella, another Saxon prince, ſubdued Lancaſhire, and the greater part of Yorkſhire, which he formed into a kingdom, under the title of Deïri. Theſe counties were afterwards united by a marriage between the grandſon of Ida, and the daughter of Ella, under the title of the kingdom of Northumberland.

Such was the eſtabliſhment of the Heptarch, or ſeven Saxon kingdoms in Britain. Hiſtory furniſhes few examples of revolutions that have been more general, or more complete: for if we except Cornwall and Wales, the whole ſouthern part of the iſland had changed its inhabitants, its manners, its language, and its government. Exaſperated by a long ſeries of oppoſition, the ferocious Saxons depopulated the country. They were not ſatisfied with the poſſeſſions of the unfortunate Britons; their lives were alſo neceſſary to ſatiate their inhuman cruelty. They ſtained their laurels with the blood of the innocent, and founded their power on the maſſacre of the inhabitants.

The hiſtory of literature, during this period, is confined to a very narrow compaſs. The Saxons were ignorant of letters; and, among the Britons, very few were capable of recording the tranſactions of their country. The long and dreadful wars which waſted their country, had almoſt obliterated the arts they had learned from the Romans. A few particulars indeed may be gleaned from ſome ancient writers, but moſt of them are founded on doubtful authority, and their number is too ſmall to form a connected hiſtory. The names of Merlin, a reputed prince and prophet; Pendragon, the celebrated Arthur, Thalieſſin, whoſe writings are ſaid to be ſtill extant, and a few others of leſs note, compoſe the whole catalogue of the learned in this dark period of hiſtorical narration. Literature, ſcience, taſte, were words ſcarce heard of in this ferocious and barbarous age. The human mind, neglected, uncultivated, and depreſſed, ſunk into the abyſs of ignorance. The taper of learning was extinguiſhed, and a cloud of more than Egyptian darkneſs hovered over Europe.

Previous to the hiſtory of the Saxon Heptarchy, it will be neceſſary to point out the counties which formed theſe reſpective kingdoms; and theſe will appear in the following table.

BOOK III.

From the eſtabliſhment of the Saxon Heptarchy, to its final diſſolution by Egbert.

THE hiſtory of the Saxon heptarchy is involved in obſcurity. The events which happened during this period are blended together, and form rather a chaos of perplexity, than a regular ſeries of facts proper to fill the page of hiſtory. Several writers have, indeed, laboured, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to unravel this intricate web of political confuſion, woven by the hands of ignorance and neglect; but their efforts have proved abortive, and the ſame doubts, the ſame uncertainties ſtill continue. Hiſtorical monuments are wanting, and it is impoſſible to ſupply the defect. The hiſtorians of thoſe times were ignorant, bigotted monks; they wanted penetration to perceive what was really neceſſary to be known; and learning, to convey to poſterity thoſe facts which they thought of ſufficient importance. Guided entirely by the ſpirit of enthuſiaſtic credulity, and wanting either abilities or honeſty to detect the frauds and examine the narratives of artful men, they have adopted the moſt abſurd fictions, and given, as hiſtorical facts, relations that ſhock the ear of reaſon. At the ſame time, they have often either omitted, or blended with improbable, and ſometimes contradictory circumſtances, ſuch civil tranſactions as are neceſſary for continuing the thread of hiſtorical narration. All, therefore, that can be attempted with ſucceſs, in this dark period, is to collect the few ſcattered particulars which form the outlines of the Saxon heptarchy, without pretending to finiſh the picture.

But it will be neceſſary, previouſly, to remark, That the Anglo-Saxon kings, during the heptarchy, uſually choſe one who was placed at the head of their political confederacy, for regulating their concerns; but without any juriſdiction in the dominions of others. He was general in chief, and led the combined forces of the heptarchy againſt the common enemy in times of war, and preſided in the general council of the confederacy in times of peace. This council was never aſſembled but when ſome imminent danger threatened the exiſtence of the whole heptarchy, and then only the whole was ſubject to its deciſions.

THE KINGDOM OF KENT.

HENGIST, the great leader of the Saxons, and founder of the kingdom of Kent, had, by his valour and conduct, rendered it the moſt formidable of all the Saxon heptarchy; but his two immediate predeceſſors may be ſaid to have inherited his conqueſts, rather than imitated his example. They ſat down ſupinely on the throne of their great anceſtor, without taking any care to render the ambitious deſigns of the neighbouring potentates abortive. While the original inhabitants of the iſland were able to make head againſt the invaders of their country, the Saxons were cloſely united, and formed one ſtrong compacted body: but the Britons were no ſooner rendered incapable of diſturbing the peace of the heptarchy, than the Saxons turned their arms againſt one another. Ambitious of power, and envious of the proſperity of their neighbours, they could not behold the proſperity of another without repining; and made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the laws of equity and conſcience to the thirſt of empire.

The firſt who diſturbed the peace of the heptarchy was Ceaulin, king of Weſſex. He unjuſtly ſeized the ſceptre of Suſſex on the death of Ciſſa; and not content with this acquiſition, he formed a ſcheme for becoming maſter of the whole heptarchy. He had for ſome time obſerved the indolence of the Kentiſh princes, and thought this a proper time for carrying his plan into execution.

Ethelbert, the great grandſon of Hengiſt, now filled the Kentiſh throne. He ſaw with grief the declining ſtate of his kingdom, and determined to reſtore it to its original luſtre. Poſſeſſed of all the intrepidity of Hengiſt, and ſuperior to him in mental acquiſitions, he was beloved and feared by the other Saxon princes. The ambitious deſigns of Ceaulin were ſufficiently evident, and required the abilities of Ethelbert to render them abortive. He ſummoned the other princes of the heptarchy to a general council, and convinced them of the neceſſity of arming in their own defence. Ceaulin ſaw the ſtorm that was gathering round him, and exerted his whole force to defend himſelf againſt its fury. He marched againſt Ethelbert, who led the combined forces, and gave him battle. The conflict was dreadful, but the fortune of Ethelbert prevailed: Ceaulin was totally defeated, and died ſoon after. Deprived of their leader, and the greater part of their army, the Mercians were in no condition of oppoſing the combined army of the heptarchy; they ſubmitted to Ethelbert, who reſtored the kingdom to the lawful heir, though under ſuch conditions and limitations as greatly augmented his own power.

But the moſt remarkable event in the reign of Ethelbert, was the introduction of the Chriſtian religion. The Britons had, for ſeveral centuries, enjoyed the light of the goſpel; but the Saxons were ſtill involved in the thickeſt night of ignorance and error. They worſhipped a plurality of gods, and had blended with their own the groſſeſt ſuperſtitions of other nations. Their principal deity was Woden, the god of war, from whom they pretended their anceſtors were deſcended, and to whoſe aſſiſtance they were indebted for all their victories. But, as their religion had no political inſtitutions to ſupport it, and many of their brethren on the continent had exchanged its abſurdities for the precepts of the goſpel, they were induced to entertain no very favourable opinion of the religion of their anceſtors, and prepared to liſten to the arguments brought in ſupport of another.

Ethelbert had, for ſome time, been married to Bertha, the daughter of Caribert, king of Paris; and it was ſtipulated by the marriage articles, that ſhe ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of her own religion. Adorned with all the charms peculiar to her ſex, and with the unaffected piety which adds a luſtre to greatneſs, ſhe was at once beloved and adored by the king and his whole court. She was attended by Luidhard, a prelate venerable at once for his learning and a life of exemplary goodneſs. The church of St. Martin, built in the time of the Romans, was allotted to Bertha for the exerciſe of her religion; and there the pious Luidhard preached the doctrines of the goſpel to very crouded audiences. The Saxon nobility liſtened with pleaſure to his eloquent and pathetic diſcourſes, and ſeveral of them became converts to chriſtianity. Theſe favourable circumſtances induced pope Gregory the great to entertain the pleaſing hopes of being able to deſtroy the ſuperſtitious worſhip of the Saxons and eſtabliſh on its ruins the tenets of the goſpel. To execute this noble deſign, he ſent Auguſtin or Auſtin, with four other monks, on a miſſion to the court of Ethelbert. But the monks, on their arrival in France, were ſo intimidated by the accounts they received of the ferocious manners of the Saxons, their conſummate ignorance, and their ſuperſtitious attachment to the religion of their anceſtors, that Auſtin thought proper to ſuſpend the expedition, till he received orders from his holineſs. Gregory ſaw the dangers which threatened the miſſionaries, and wrote a letter to queen Brunehaut, who, though ſtained with the moſt enormous vices, was capable of promoting the intereſt of the church, requeſting, in the moſt preſſing manner, her aſſiſtance in this pious undertaking. He ſollicited not in vain. Brunehaut exerted all her power to render the attempt ſucceſsful; and furniſhed the miſſionaries with interpreters from among the Franks, who ſtill ſpoke the language of the Saxons.

A. D. 597. Furniſhed with interpreters, and letters to queen Bertha, recommending the monks to her protection, Auſtin and his followers embarked on their miſſion, and, after a ſhort paſſage, landed in the iſle of Thanet. He immediately diſpatched a meſſenger to court, informing the king of the intention of his coming, and requeſting his permiſſion to preach the doctrine of the goſpel publickly. Ethelbert, without either granting or denying his petition, ordered him to continue in the iſle of Thanet, and ſoon after came thither in perſon, with his queen, attended by his whole court. The ſtupidity of this prince, though the moſt learned and polite of all the Saxon potentates, was ſo great, that he received the miſſionaries in the open air, in order to break the force of their enchantments, ſhould they employ magic and ſorcery againſt him. The monks advanced to audience with a ſlow and ſolemn pace, chanting their litanies with all the marks of unaffected devotion. Auſtin explained the doctrines of the goſpel, with which Ethelbert ſeemed deeply affected, but without declaring himſelf convinced of the great truths delivered by the miſſionary. He, however, granted him permiſſion to preach them openly to his people. Auſtin acquitted himſelf nobly; and added ſtrength to his doctrines, by the auſterities of his life. The Saxons were perſuaded that the followers of a religion which mortified every paſſion, muſt act from conviction; and that the tenets they profeſſed muſt be founded on a baſis more than human. Ethelbert was convinced of the truth of the goſpel, and ſuffered himſelf to be baptized. The example of kings is always powerful. The nobles and people flocked to Auſtin, and the chriſtian religion triumphed over the idolatry of the Saxons. Auſtin was conſecrated archbiſhop of Canterbury; the churches that had fallen to decay were repaired; the heathen temples were conſecrated to the worſhip of the true God, and a ſeminary of learning was opened in the capital of Kent.

A ſimilarity of ſentiments in religion is generally productive of civil connections. This obſervation was now ſufficiently verified. The Anglo-Saxons opened an intercourſe with the nations on the continent, and from them conceived an idea of more cultivated manners. They ſaw the many advantages that reſulted from a polite and generous behaviour; from connections founded on virtue; from reciprocal acts of kindneſs and benevolence; and wiſhed to imitate the practice. Ethelbert, deſirous of promoting the happineſs of his people, enacted a body of laws, and cauſed them to be written and publiſhed, that none might plead ignorance of the contents. The remaining part of the reign of Ethelbert, is marked with no tranſaction of importance, except the death of the virtuous Bertha: no diſturbance happened; his people were happy, and Ethelbert, after a proſperous reign of fifty-two years, paid the debt of nature in the boſom of peace and tranquillity.

A. D. 616. Eadbald aſcended the throne on the death of his father. But blinded with an inceſtuous paſſion for his mother-in-law, he abandoned his religion, that he might indulge his criminal exceſſes without reſtraint. Many of the nobility followed his example, and the tenets of the goſpel were in danger of falling a ſacrifice to heathen ſuperſtition. Laurentius, the ſucceſſor of Auſtin, found means to prevent ſo dreadful a misfortune. Fearleſs of danger when religion demanded his aſſiſtance, he laboured with the utmoſt aſſiduity to make Eadbald ſenſible of the enormity of his vices; and at laſt ſucceeded. Convinced by the arguments of Laurentius, he renounced the pagan religion, divorced his inceſtuous conſort, and became a remarkable penitent for his crimes. He demoliſhed the idolatrous temples, broke the ſtatues of the gods in pieces, and firmly eſtabliſhed the chriſtian religion in his kingdom. He extended his care for the intereſt of the goſpel beyond the limits of his territories; he greatly contributed by the force of his arguments, and more by his exemplary piety, to the converſion of Edwin, king of Mercia. He died after a reign of twenty-four years, with the character of an excellent and pious prince; beloved by his ſubjects, and revered for his virtues, even by the pagan monarchs of the heptarchy.

This kingdom continued in the royal line of the founder till the year 794; but no event that deſerves the notice of hiſtorians happened after the death of Eadbald. On the extinction of the Hengiſt family, the kingdom was rent with factions, and the crown became the ſport of fortune. The towns were laid in aſhes, and the fields manured with the blood of their owners. Nor were theſe troubles terminated, till Egbert united in his perſon the ſeven crowns of the Saxon heptarchy; after Kent had continued a diſtinct and ſeparate kingdom during an interval of 372 years.

The Kingdom of SUSSEX, or the SOUTH SAXONS.

THIS ſmall kingdom, which contained only the county of Suſſex and part of Surry, makes the leaſt figure of any in the Saxon heptarchy. Its whole extent was inconſiderable; and a very large part of this little territory was covered with woods and foreſts. At the ſame time it was but thinly inhabited, and therefore incapable of making any effectual reſiſtance againſt the attempts of an enterpriſing enemy.

It has been already obſerved, that this kingdom was founded by Ella, who landed at the head of a conſiderable reinforcement, to ſtrengthen the intereſt of Hengiſt. He died after a reign of twenty-three years. Ella was poſſeſſed of great military talents, and, on the death of Hengiſt, placed at the head of the Saxon heptarchy.

A. D. 514. Ciſſa, the only ſon of Ella, ſucceeded him in the throne; but did not poſſeſs the abilities of his father. He built the city of Chicheſter, and laboured inceſſantly to promote the happineſs and tranquillity of his ſubjects. He engaged not in the quarrels of the heptarchy, nor endeavoured to conquer any of the territories of his neighbours. This placable diſpoſition prevented his kingdom from becoming a ſcene of war and deſolation. His age, and the length of his reign were both uncommon; they were both extended beyond the common limits of mankind. He paid the debt of nature after a peaceful reign of ſeventy-ſix years, and in the one hundred and ſeventeenth year of his age.

A. D. 590. On the death of Ciſſa, who left no iſſue, the crown was ſeized by Ceaulin, king of the Weſt-Saxons, which occaſioned a confederacy to be formed againſt him, as has been already mentioned in the hiſtory of Kent. After this event the kingdom of Suſſex was ſubject to ſeveral revolutions; and, at length, totally ſubdued and united to that of the Weſt-Saxons in the year 754.

The Kingdom of WESSEX, or the WEST SAXONS.

NONE of the Saxon kingdoms met with greater oppoſition in their infancy than that of Weſſex. Cerdic, one of the greateſt generals among the Saxons, found two powerful enemies in Ambroſius and Arthur; nor was he able to eſtabliſh his kingdom till after the death of theſe two great leaders, who for ſeveral years ſupported the falling liberties of their country. With them the powerful reſiſtance terminated, and Cerdic ſat down in peace on the throne he had founded in the blood of an innocent people. He paid the debt of nature about ſixty-one years after his arrival in England, and left the Saxons in poſſeſſion of the eſtates they had wreſted from the inhabitants.

A. D. 540. Kenrick, the ſon of Cerdic, aſcended the throne on the death of his father. He came with him from Germany, and was very inſtrumental in defeating the Britons, and ſettling the kingdom. His reign, after the death of his father, was an interval of peace; no enemy made any attack upon his territories, no reſtleſs ſubjects diſturbed his tranquillity: he died in peace, after holding the ſceptre of Weſſex four years.

A. D. 544. He was ſucceeded by his eldeſt ſon Ceaulin, who inherited the military abilities and ferocious paſſions of his grandfather, but without his milder virtues. His ſole delight was war: he had no regard to the juſtice of his cauſe; the cries of a people, who never injured him, were fruitleſs and vain. He firſt turned his arms againſt the Britons who inhabited the counties of Devon and Cornwall; and laid great part of their country waſte. But the territories of the ancient inhabitants was a field too ſmall to circumſcribe the ambition of Ceaulin. He formed a deſign of making himſelf maſter of the whole heptarchy: he could not bear the thoughts of an equal; he graſped at the ſceptre of a kingdom, whoſe bounds were thoſe of the whole iſland. Warmed with the dreams of general monarchy in Britain, and fearleſs of the danger that muſt oppoſe his progreſs, he marched his victorious army into Suſſex, and ſoon became maſter of that little kingdom. But conqueſt now forſook the ſtandard of Ceaulin. Alarmed at his progreſs, and exaſperated at his conduct, the Saxon ſtates entered into a confederacy to blaſt his laurels. Ethelbert, king of Kent, led the combined army againſt the invader, and totally defeated him. The cruelty of his diſpoſition had alienated from him the affections of his ſubjects; they obeyed him only from fear. This defeat, therefore, could not be retrieved. He was driven from his kingdom, and died in miſery.

A. D. 568. The victorious Ethelbert placed Ceolric, the nephew of Ceaulin on the throne of Weſſex. He was entirely devoted to his benefactor, and had even joined the confederacy againſt his uncle: but nothing further is recorded of his reign, except that his kingdom enjoyed an uninterrupted peace while he filled the throne of Cerdic.

A. D. 597. Ceolwulph, the nephew of Ceolric, was placed in the ſeat of power, on the death of his uncle. The military abilities of this prince were great, and his talents for government equally conſpicuous. His whole reign was one continued interval of war. He courted peace indeed, but ſhe fled from him. Ever active and vigilant, he ſupported the dignity of his kingdom, and even enlarged the boundaries, though ſurrounded by powerful enemies. His moſt formidable oppoſer was Redwald, king of Eaſt-Anglia, then at the head of the Saxon confederacy. The conteſt between them was violent and bloody; but Ceolwulph at laſt prevailed, though he did not long enjoy the honours he had acquired. He died before he could reduce the South Saxons to obedience.

A. D. 611. Ceolwulph dying without iſſue, Kinegils, or Cinegils, his nephew, obtained the throne of Cerdic; and, in the firſt year of his reign, aſſociated his brother Quinchelm with him in the government; and they reigned together in the greateſt harmony. During two years the kingdom enjoyed a profound tranquillity; but at the end of that interval, the Britons began to make inroads into the territories of the Saxons. Rouſed by the injuries received from the enemy, Kinegil and Quinchelm advanced at the head of their forces, and met the invaders near Bindon in Dorſetſhire. A dreadful battle enſued, in which the Britons were totally defeated, and above two thouſand of them killed upon the ſpot.

BERINUS Converting the SAXONS to Christianity.

A. D. 634. Though the Chriſtian religion had, for ſome years, been planted in the kingdom of Kent, yet the Weſt Saxons were ſtill immerſed in all the errors of Pagan ſuperſtition. The torch of truth had not yet been lighted up in this part of the iſland, to diſpel the darkneſs of bigotry and error. But the period was now arrived when the abſurd worſhip of the Saxons ſhould be aboliſhed, and the true religion eſtabliſhed in its ſtead. Berenius, an Italian eccleſiaſtic, after being conſecrated by the pope, was ſent into Britain, to aſſiſt in converting the Saxons to chriſtianity. Kinegils liſtened to the preaching of Berenius, declared himſelf convinced of the truth of the goſpel, and was immediately baptized. His example was followed by numbers of his ſubjects; churches were erected for the worſhip of the true God; the heathen temples were, in many places, demoliſhed; and Berenius was inveſted with an epiſcopal character as biſhop of York. Quinchelm did not, however, follow the example of Kinegils immediately; but being ſeized with a violent fever, embraced the faith, and died immediately after his baptiſm. Kinegils ſurvived his brother about eight years, and laboured inceſſantly to promote the happineſs of his people.

A. D. 643. Kenovaloch, or Kenwal, ſucceeded his father Kinegils in the throne, but was a ſtranger to his virtues. Headſtrong, cruel, and voluptuous, he at once oppreſſed and impoveriſhed his people. He embraced chriſtianity with his father, but was not guided by its precepts. Soon after his acceſſion to the throne, he married one of the ſiſters of Penda, king of Mercia; but, not long after, he repudiated his wife, without aſſigning the leaſt reaſon for his conduct, and renounced his religion. Exaſperated at the affront offered to his ſiſter, Penda, without giving him time to prepare for a defence, entered his dominions at the head of a powerful army, laid great part of his kingdom waſte, and obliged Kenwal himſelf to fly to Annas, king of Eaſt-Anglia, for protection. Penda took poſſeſſion of the kingdom of Weſſex, and kept it three years. During that interval, Annas laboured inceſſantly to render Kenwal aſhamed of his vices: he happily ſucceeded; Kenwal again profeſſed himſelf a chriſtian, and was, by the aſſiſtance of Annas, replaced on the throne of his anceſtors.

A. D. 652. He was hardly fixed in the ſeat of power, before a rebellion broke out in his kingdom, and once more threatened him with exile. But the inſurgents were too haſty in their meaſures: they engaged the royal army near Bradford, in Wiltſhire, before they were joined by their friends in different parts of the kingdom, and were totally defeated.

A. D. 658. But though the rebellion was thus happily extinguiſhed, peace was not yet reſtored to this diſtracted kingdom. The Britons had long waited for an opportunity of retaliating on the Saxons the many injuries they had received, and thought this a fortunate moment for ſtriking the blow. Accordingly they invaded the kingdom of Weſſex, committing the moſt dreadful outrages in their route. Kenwal collected all his forces, and took the field at the head of a powerful army; determined, if poſſible, to bring the enemy to a general engagement. He marched, with the greateſt expedition, towards the place where the Britons had committed the greateſt diſorders; but, as he was paſſing along the declivity of a hill called Pine, in Shropſhire, the Britons fell with ſo much fury upon his army, that the Saxons were obliged to give way, and victory ſeemed ready to deſert the ſtandards of Kenwal. But the Saxons recovering from their ſurprize, cloſed their ranks, and attacked the Britons with ſo much intrepidity, that they were obliged to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

A. D. 661. Tranquillity was not, however, yet the lot of Kenwal. He was hardly returned from chaſtiſing the Britons, before his dominions were invaded by Wulphur, king of Mercia. The two armies met at Ponteſbury, in Shropſhire, and a furious engagement enſued. But the event of the battle is uncertain: ſome hiſtorians poſitively ſay, that Kenwal was defeated; while others aſſert, that he gained the victory. But however that be, this battle was productive of a peace, which ſoon after took place between the two kingdoms.

Kenwal now enjoyed ſome reſpite from the fatigues of war. Misfortunes and adverſity had convinced him of his errors. He applied himſelf, in the evening of age, to make ſome amends to his ſubjects for the cruelties he had committed in the morning of youth. He built the cathedral church of St. Peter at Wincheſter, which ſoon after became the ſee of a biſhop. But he did not long enjoy this interval of tranquillity. He was deſirous of conciliating the affections of his people: but, before he could entirely effect it, death put a period at once to his labours and his life. He died without iſſue, and left his kingdom to his wife Saxeburga.

A. D. 672. Few women were better qualified to hold the reins of government than that princeſs. Intrepid by nature; of a piercing genius, improved by an excellent education, ſhe held the ſceptre with honour to herſelf, and advantage to her country. The good of her people was her principal care. Vigilant and careful to provide for the ſafety of her dominions, ſhe gave her enemies no advantage, nor did ſhe attempt to invade the territories of others. But her ſubjects did not long enjoy the happineſs of her protection; ſhe paid the debt of nature after a ſhort reign of twelve months.

A. D. 674. On the death of Saxeburga, Eſcwin, deſcended from one of the collateral branches of the Cerdic family, aſcended the throne of Weſſex: but the fury of parties was now arrived to ſuch a pitch, that he was obliged to ſhare his power with Kentwin, brother to the late Kenwal. For ſome time they enjoyed the crown in peace; but the reſtleſs ambition of the Saxon princes would not ſuffer any potentate to enjoy a long ſeries of tranquillity. Wulphur, king of Mercia, once more invaded the kingdom of the Weſt Saxons. Eſcwin, who commanded the army, marched at the head of his forces, and met the Mercian troops at Bedwin, in Wiltſhire. The conteſt was long doubtful; at laſt victory declared for the Mercians; but the advantage had been ſo dearly purchaſed, that Wulphur was in no condition to continue in the territories of the enemy. Eſcwin ſurvived this battle only two years, when he paid the debt of nature, and left the throne to Kentwin.

A. D. 676. Hiſtorians have been ſilent with regard to the Mercian war. Probably a peace was concluded ſoon after the defeat of Eſcwin; becauſe we find Kentwin, ſoon after the death of his partner in the throne, was at leiſure to lead his army againſt the Britons, whom he defeated, and obliged their king, Cadwallader, to paſs over into Bretagne to procure aſſiſtance. While Kentwin was employed in his wars with the Britons, his nephew, Ceadwalla, formed a ſcheme for ſeizing the crown; but before his plot was ripe for execution, Kentwin returned to his capital, and obliged Ceadwalla to fly for ſafety to the foreſt of Anderſwald, in Suſſex. Here he was joined by great numbers from Kentwin's army, and committed the moſt inhuman barbarities on the inhabitants of that ſmall kingdom.

A. D. 686. On the death of Kentwin, Ceadwalla was placed on the throne of Cerdic. This acquiſition of power enabled him to proſecute his brutal ravages with more ſucceſs. He invaded the Iſle of Wight, and committed ſuch cruelties as are ſhocking to human nature. He had not indeed yet embraced the doctrines of Chriſtianity, though he had been very liberal to the church; a ſpecies of devotion, which, in that ignorant age, was thought a ſufficient atonement for the greateſt crimes. Soon after his converſion, he repaired to Rome, where he was publickly baptized by Sergius II. who then filled the papal chair; but ſurvived the ceremony only a few days. He was buried in St. Peter's church, where his tomb may ſtill be ſeen; and, from a pompous inſcription engraven on it, we learn, that he was only in his thirtieth year when he died.

A. D. 689. When Ceadwalla departed from England, he reſigned his crown to Ina, his nephew, though he had two ſons, then in their infancy. Ina was one of thoſe princes who deſerves to be mentioned with honour amidſt a multitude of barbarous wretches, many of whom were a ſcandal to humanity. He had united in his perſon the civil and the military virtues. He was formed to ſhine either in the council or the field; to lead his people to conqueſt, or teach them to cultivate the arts of peace. His abilities were ſo conſpicuous, that he had not ſat a year upon the throne before he was elected chief of the Saxon confederacy. He compoſed a body of laws, which, in the next century, formed the baſis of thoſe enacted by Alfred the Great. After conquering the Britons in Somerſetſhire, he did not follow the inhuman cuſtom of his predeceſſors, of exterminating the people; he treated them with kindneſs, permitted them to retain their poſſeſſions, and incorporated them with his ſubjects by intermarriages, and the allurement of equal laws.

After a glorious reign of thirty-ſeven years, he made a pilgrimage to Rome; and, during his reſidence in that city, he erected the Engliſh college; and, for the ſupport of that ſeminary, impoſed a tax upon his ſubjects, afterwards called Peter's-pence. This was the laſt act of his reign. He reſigned his ſceptre, took the habit of a monk, and died in obſcurity. His wife followed his example; ſhe took the veil, and ſpent the evening of her life in a monaſtery.

A. D. 727. Ethelhard, to whom Ina had reſigned his crown, found a powerful competitor in Oſwald, a branch of the royal family. He was ſupported by many of the nobility, and appeared at the head of a powerful army. Ethelhard, who was a ſtranger to fear, led thoſe troops, who had learned to conquer under the ſtandards of Ina, againſt the uſurper. A furious battle enſued, in which the forces of Oſwald were totally defeated. Peace was immediately reſtored; and Ethelhard enjoyed an uninterrupted ſeries of tranquillity, till death put an end to his life in the ſeventeenth year of his reign.

A. D. 733. On the death of Ethelhard, Cutherd, his relation, was placed on the throne of Cerdic. Peace ſeemed now to have taken her flight from the territories of the Weſt Saxons; tumult and diſorder marked the whole reign of Cutherd. The ferocious nobility conſpired againſt him, and his ſon fell a victim to their envy. The ſtandard of rebellion was now diſplayed, and the army of the inſurgents was headed by Edelhun, the moſt able general of his time. The royal army was far ſuperior in numbers to that of the rebels; but, animated by the example, and conducted by the prudence of Edelhun, they attacked the forces of Cutherd with ſuch fury, that victory was on the point of declaring in their favour, when unfortunately their intrepid leader was dangerouſly wounded. Confuſion, inſtead of order, was now conſpicuous in the army of the rebels. Cutherd improved the diſorder, and drove them from the field with great ſlaughter. Edelhun was taken priſoner; but his abilities recommended him ſo ſtrongly to Cutherd, that he not only granted him his pardon, but made him general of his own forces. Headed by Edelhun, the Weſt Saxons were invincible; wherever they turned their arms, they conquered. The flames of rebellion were ſuppreſſed; and the nobles, intimidated by the power of the army, buried their animoſities in the grave of circumſpection. But it was in vain to expect tranquillity while the iſland was divided into ſo many petty kingdoms, without any barrier to prevent the incurſions of the borderers. Ethelbald, king of Mercia, one of thoſe reſtleſs ſpirits who are never contented with their fortune, entered the territories of Cutherd, and committed all the exceſſes that might be expected from ſo ferocious a leader, who had already ravaged the kingdoms of Kent, Eſſex, and Eaſt-Anglia. But his victorious forces could not intimidate the ſpirit of Edelhun; he led the army of Cutherd againſt the enemy, and, after an obſtinate engagement, obtained the victory. Ethelbald fled with precipitation to his kingdom; and Edelhun turned his arms againſt the Britons, and united part of Cornwall to the dominions of Weſſex. In the midſt of theſe ſucceſſes, Cutherd paid the debt of nature, and left his crown to Sigebert, his nephew.

A. D. 755. Sigebert was but a youth when he mounted the throne; and might have reigned in peace, would he have liſtened to the voice of reaſon. But he ſcorned to be directed by thoſe whom age and experience had taught wiſdom. Headſtrong, violent, and proud, he treated his nobles with inſolence, and his people with inhumanity. He trampled upon the laws, and made his own will the rule of his government. Deſtitute of merit himſelf, he became the profeſſed enemy of all who, for their ſuperior abilities, were regarded with honour by the people. Sigebert was often warned of the conſequences that muſt ſoon attend his conduct; but he was deaf to advice, and laughed at the cautious counſel of his friends. Exaſperated by continual acts of tyranny, the people flew to arms, and were joined by the nobles. Sigebert ſaw the gathering ſtorm, but wanted power to break its force. His friends had deſerted him, and he could place no confidence in his troops. He ſaw Kinewulf, a prince of the ſame family, advancing againſt him at the head of the people, and immediately abandoned a throne he wanted courage to defend. He fled to duke Cumbran, at that time governor of a large diſtrict of Hampſhire; and with him he might have ended his days in peace, had his reverſe of fortune taught him to govern his headſtrong paſſions; but this was a virtue to which Sigebert was a ſtranger. Cumbrian ſtill continued his inſeparable friend, and endeavoured to reclaim him from thoſe vices which had deprived him of his crown. Exaſperated at what he conſidered as a flagrant act of diſreſpect, Sigebert put his benefactor to death. This inhuman action rendered Sigebert deteſted by thoſe who had hitherto followed his fortunes; they abandoned him to his fate. He ſaw his danger, and fled to the foreſt of Anderſwald, and there fell by the ignoble hand of a ſwine-herd.

Kinewulf, who now filled the throne, had a genius naturally turned to war, and defeated the Britons in ſeveral engagements; but was routed by Offa, king of Mercia, and loſt all his tenetaries on the north ſide of the Thames. This reverſe of fortune encouraged Kynchard, the brother of Sigebert, to attempt the recovery of the crown, which had been uſurped by Kinewulf; but not having force ſufficient to attack him in the open field, he hovered on the borders of the kingdom, in order to embrace the firſt favourable opportunity for carrying his deſign into execution, and revenging on Kinewulf the death of his brother. Several months paſſed without the leaſt proſpect of ſucceſs. At laſt he was informed that Kinewulf often paid ſecret viſits to a lady at Merton in Surry; and Kynchard determined to ſurpriſe him during one of thoſe interviews. Accordingly he ſurrounded the houſe, and found means to penetrate to the door of the apartment where the king was, before his attendants were alarmed. Kinewulf was the firſt who perceived the danger; he ran haſtily to his arms, and defended the door with the greateſt bravery; but perceiving Kynchard among the aſſaſſins, he loſt his uſual preſence of mind, and ruſhed upon the aſſaſſin; but before he could diſpatch him, he fell, covered with wounds. Alarmed with the noiſe, the king's attendants ran to the aſſiſtance of their maſter, and were all of them put to death. Kynchard himſelf had been ſo deſperately wounded by Kinewulf, that he was in no condition to make his eſcape. The news of this cruel aſſaſſination reached Kingſton early the next morning, when the principal inhabitants, headed by Oſeric, flew to Merton, where they found the conſpirators had barricaded the houſe, in order to defend themſelves to the laſt extremity. Kynchard endeavoured to divert the ſtorm which was ready to burſt upon him, by large offers, but all his promiſes were in vain; Oſeric, at the head of his company, demoliſhed the barricadoes, and cut every one of the regicides to pieces.

A. D. 784. Brithwick, a deſcendant from the great Cerdic, was placed in the ſeat of power on the death of Kinewulf. He was a lover of the arts of peace, and cultivated them with ſucceſs. He conſidered war as one of the greateſt ſcourges of heaven, and did every thing in the world to divert it from his people. But all his virtues were tinctured with jealouſy. The order of ſucceſſion to the throne, was not at that time nicely regarded; and Brithwick was advanced to the ſeat of power, though his title was inferior in point of blood to that of Egbert, a prince equally diſtinguiſhed by his merits and his birth. Brithwick knew this, and could not behold the great talents of Egbert without envy. His increaſing popularity heightened the diſguſt, and Egbert ſoon perceived that he could not long continue in the court of Brithwick with ſafety. He knew it would be madneſs to contend ſingly with power; and wicked to involve his country in the miſeries of a civil war. He therefore privately withdrew to the court of Charlemagne, then the moſt poliſhed and polite in Europe. Under that hero he learned the art of war, his ferocious manners were ſoftened, and his talents unfolded. The misfortunes of his youth were of the utmoſt advantage to himſelf and his country.

While Egbert was thus acquiring wiſdom and experience under a foreign prince, Brithwick was employed in rendering his people happy. He married Eadburga, daughter to Offa, king of Mercia. She was inſidious, incontinent, inſolent and cruel. She ſcrupled not to ſacrifice every thing to the gratification of her paſſions. A young nobleman having incurred her diſpleaſure, ſhe determined to avenge the affront. Nothing leſs than the life of the offender could ſatisfy her vengeance. She kept the ſecret concealed in her own breaſt, till an opportunity offered for executing her infernal deſign. She did not wait long; the nobleman was Brithwick's particular favourite, and frequently with him. One evening as they were drinking together, the treacherous Eadburga mixed poiſon in a cup of wine and gave it to the victim of her revenge. Unfortunately for Brithwick, he drank ſome of the wine, and they both expired together. Conſcious that her crime muſt render her obnoxious to the people, ſhe fled to the continent, and, after a ſeries of misfortunes, died in miſery.

Upon the death of Brithwick, it was determined to recall Egbert from the court of Charlemagne, in order to take poſſeſſion of the throne of his anceſtors. He immediately complied with their requeſt, and, on his arrival, received the crown of Cerdic from a people that loved and honoured his virtues. This great prince, ſoon after his acceſſion to the throne, put a final period to the Saxon heptarchy, and became the firſt king of England; but the manner in which he acquired the ſceptre of England muſt be deferred to the ſucceeding book, where we ſhall reſume the hiſtory of this celebrated prince.

THE KINGDOM OF NORTHUMBERLAND.

IT has been already obſerved, that a body of Saxons ſettled in this country, while Hengiſt was cloſely preſſed by the Britons; but that Ida was the firſt who aſſumed the title of king, after he had founded the kingdom of Bernicia, which was not till near one hundred years after the firſt ſettlement of the Saxons. Ida was a brave and generous prince; equally great in council and the field. As a general he was intrepid and prudent: as a governor, equitable and humane. He fought many battles with the Britons, and was at laſt ſlain by Owen, prince of the Cumbrians. But ſome years before this misfortune, another party of Saxons landed in the north, and ſubdued the ſouthern parts of Yorkſhire and Lancaſhire. Theſe formed themſelves into a province called Deïra, of which Ella, one of the Saxon leaders, aſſumed the title of king.

The Saxons were long oppoſed by the famous Arthur, who has been unfortunate enough to be celebrated by ſo many fabulous writers, that his true hiſtory can hardly be known. He was born about the year 496, and nearly related to Ambroſius Aurelianus. In the year 516, he was appointed to command an army, raiſed to put a ſtop to the ravages of the Saxons; and in order to procure him more reſpect from the ſoldiers, he was crowned king of Gwent, a name then given to the country lying between the Wye and the Severn. His generoſity, perſonal bravery, and aſſiduous care to promote the happineſs of his ſoldiers, ſoon procured him large reinforcements; and his ſucceſs againſt the invaders of his country was ſo remarkable, that the moſt ſanguine expectations of his ſubjects were fully anſwered. But though he was often victorious, he was not always ſo; nor was it in the power of any hero, however great, to drive the Saxons out of Britain. He ſtopped their progreſs, and often defeated their armies, though commanded by the moſt able generals.

During one of his expeditions againſt the Saxons of Northumberland, Madred, his nephew, whom he left guardian of his patrimonial dominions, uſurped the throne. Arthur returned, engaged him in ſeveral battles, and, at laſt, in a deciſive one fought near Camlen, ſlew him with his own hand; but he himſelf received a mortal wound, of which he died, after a reign of twenty-ſix years, and was univerſally lamented by his ſubjects.

The hiſtories of theſe times are ſilent with regard to the firſt five deſcendants of Ida, their names are indeed mentioned, but without any account of their virtues, their vices, their governments or their wars.

A. D. 586. Ethelfrid, one of the deſcendants of Ida, was a brave and active prince, but haughty and cruel; he married Acca, the only daughter of Ella, and on the death of that prince, ſeized on the kingdom of Deïra, which he united to his own dominions, forming by that means the kingdom of Northumberland. Ella left an infant ſon, called Edwin; but Ethelfrid paid no regard to equity: young Edwin himſelf would have fallen a victim to his ambiton, had not his guardians conveyed him to the court of Cadwan, king of North Wales, where he receivd an excellent education.

This acquiſition rendered Ethelfrid one of the moſt powerful monarchs in the Saxon heptarchy. His reſtleſs temper would not permit him to ſit down contented with this large addition to his kingdom. The love of conqueſt induced him to invade the territories of his neighbours. The Britons firſt felt the power of his arms. He laid great part of their country waſte, and penetrated at the head of his victorious army to the gates of Cheſter. Alarmed at the progreſs of the army, and exaſperated at the cruelties exerciſed on their countrymen, the Britons took the field, and advanced to meet the ferocious invader. A body of twelve hundred and fifty monks from the monaſtery of Bangor accompanied the army to animate the ſoldiers by their prayers and exhortations. Ethelfrid was ſurprized to ſee ſo large a body of men without arms, and aſked the reaſon for ſo unuſual an appearance. He was anſwered, that they were prieſts who were come out to pray for the deſtruction of his army. "Then", ſaid he, "they are as "much our enemies as thoſe that employ their "ſwords for our deſtruction"; and immediately detached a party, who cut their monkiſh battalion to pieces. Aſtoniſhed at this unexpected fate of their prieſts, the Romans made a precipitate flight: Cheſter was taken, and the famous monaſtery of Bangor levelled to its foundations. This religious ſtructure, according to Bede, contained two thouſand one hundred monks, who, according to the reſpectable cuſtom of religious orders in thoſe early times, maintained themſelves by their own labour, and thence a benefit, inſtead of a burden, to their country.

A.D. 616. The great abilities of young Edwin now became conſpicuous; he was admired and beloved. Theſe qualities awoke the jealouſy of Ethelfrid; he ſaw the dawning virtues of Edwin, and dreaded the conſequence of their meridian luſtre. The young prince perceived his danger, and repaired for ſafety to different princes of the Saxon heptarchy. At laſt he found an aſylum in the court of Redwald, king of the Eaſt-Angles. The great power of that prince increaſed the fears of Ethelfrid. The uſurper, conſcious of his own flagitious conduct, was alarmed when innocence had found a protector. He had recourſe to promiſes and threats, in order to induce Redwald to abandon Edwin. The Eaſt-Anglian prince, for ſome time, reſolutely rejected all his meſſages; but at laſt ſeemed diſpoſed to ſacrifice at the ſhrine of intereſt, the rights of hoſpitality. Edwin perceived his heſitation, but took no precautions for his ſafety; perſuaded that it was better to periſh at the court of Eaſt-Anglia, than become a wretched exile, without friends and without ſupport. The queen of Eaſt-Anglia was ſtruck with his generous confidence: ſhe pleaded ſtrongly in behalf of innocence in diſtreſs; and revived in the heart of her huſband the ſentiments of friendſhip and of honour. At the ſame time, Redwald well knew the implacable and cruel diſpoſition of Ethelfrid, and wiſely determined to prevent its effects. He collected a powerful army, and marched directly into the territories of Northumberland. His army was divided into three bodies, the firſt was led by his ſon Reyner, the ſecond he headed in perſon, and the third was commanded by Edwin. Reyner received orders to advance in order to ſecure a paſs; but the impetuoſity of his courage carried him too far for him to be properly ſupported in caſe of an attack. Ethelfrid, on the firſt information that Redwald had entered his kingdom, marched with the utmoſt expedition to meet him, and falling upon the advanced guard commanded by Reyner, routed them, and ſlew the prince with his own hand. Redwald, irritated almoſt to madneſs at the loſs of his ſon, attacked the Northumberland army with ſo much fury, that they were unable to ſuſtain the ſhock; they gave way and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Ethelfrid exerted all his power to rally his broken forces, and lead them once more againſt the enemy; but perceiving all his efforts were in vain, he ruſhed furiouſly into the midſt of Redwald's forces, and was ſlain. His body was found in the midſt of a heap of enemies killed by his own hand. He ſtill breathed, and his features ſtill maintained that fierceneſs of ſoul, which they had expreſſed during the vigour of his life.

A. D. 618. Edwin was now placed upon the throne of Northumberland, and ſoon became diſtinguiſhed for his impartial adminiſtration of juſtice. He reclaimed his ſubjects from a licentious life of rapine and diſorder, to which they had been long habited. The troops of robbers that infeſted the roads of Northumberland were diſperſed, ſo that even a woman might travel from one extremity of the kingdom to the other, without any danger of being inſulted. His people were happy; they loved him as a father, and were ready to ſacrifice their lives in his ſervice. A remarkable inſtance of this fidelity is recorded by hiſtorians. Quinchelm, prince of the Weſt-Saxons, having been defeated by Edwin, determined to deſtroy by treachery a monarch he found himſelf incapable of defeating in the open field. One Eumer, a wretch who entertained no idea of virtue, undertook to aſſaſſinate Edwin. He found means to obtain admiſſion to his preſence, and drawing a dagger to execute the deteſtable crime, Lilla, one of Edwin's miniſters, interpoſed with his body between them, received the blow, and died with the glory of having ſaved the life of his illuſtrious prince.

Soon after Edwin aſcended the throne of Northumberland, he married Ethelburga daughter to Ethelbert king of Kent. But the princeſs being a chriſtian and Edwin a pagan, it was ſtipulated in the marriage articles, that ſhe ſhould enjoy the free exerciſe of her own religion, and be permitted to retain in her ſervice Paulinus, a chriſtian biſhop, and ſuch other attendants as ſhould be thought neceſſary for performing the offices of chriſtianity with decency. Paulinus was a perſon of great learning and parts, and well qualified for enforcing the doctrines of the goſpel with reaſon and argument. Ethelburga, whoſe life was an exemplary pattern of virtue and conjugal affection, and who poſſeſſed all the zeal and piety of her mother Bertha, exerted herſelf ſucceſsfully in eſtabliſhing chriſtianity in the kingdom of Northumberland. Struck with the amiable virtues of Ethelburga, and charmed with her humane and tender diſpoſition, Edwin liſtened, with great attention, to her exhortations; but, like a wiſe prince, he carefully examined the foundations of the chriſtian doctrine. Paulinus ſatisfied all his ſcruples: and Edwin, after mature conſideration, declared himſelf a convert. Choiſi, the pagan high-prieſt, followed his example, and was the firſt to demoliſh the idols he had ſo long worſhipped. Edwin was baptized at York, with many of his nobles, by Paulinus, in a church built on this occaſion, and dedicated to St. Peter. Among barbarians the example of the prince is always followed by the people. The Northumbrians flocked in ſuch multitudes to be baptized by Paulinus, that the church was too ſmall for the purpoſe; the prelate was obliged to perform the ceremony in the rivers Gleni and Swale.

A. D. 633. The religion of Edwin being founded on conviction, he exerted all his power to eſtabliſh it in every part of his kingdom. This greatly promoted the popularity of Edwin; he was beloved and adored by his ſubjects, they conſidered him both as their temporal and ſpiritual father. His power increaſed, which the neighbouring princes could not behold without envy. Penda, king of Mercia, a prince of a ſavage, bold, reſtleſs and enterpriſing ſpirit, who made no ſcruple of trampling on the laws of virtue, equity and honour, in order to augment his power, or gratify his brutal vengeance, joined his forces with thoſe of Cadwallon, king of the Britons, and invaded Northumberland. They had advanced as far as Hatfield foreſt in Yorkſhire, and committed the moſt dreadful outrages, before Edwin was informed of their having entered his kingdom. Penetrated with the diſtreſs of his people and enraged at the perfidy of the enemy, he marched at the head of an inferior number of troops to give them battle, in order to terminate, as ſoon as poſſible, the miſeries of his ſubjects. The conteſt was dreadful; and for ſome time fortune ſeemed inclinable to beſtow on Edwin the palm of victory. At laſt an event determined the fate of the day. Offrid, the eldeſt ſon of Edwin, was pierced with an arrow, and fell dead at the feet of his father. Edwin, who till now led his forces with coolneſs and caution, was exaſperated to madneſs by this fatal accident. He loſt that ſteadineſs and preſence of mind which had rendered his forces invincible, ruſhed into the thickeſt part of the enemy, and was cut to pieces. Deprived of their leader, the Northumbrians fell into confuſion, and were ſoon put to flight.

Penda had now an opportunity of ſatiating his brutal paſſion. The ſword of deſtruction was drawn, and the fields deluged with the blood of their owners. Neither the tears of age, the deprecations of youth, nor the plaintive ſupplications of the ſofter ſex, had any power to move the pity of Penda. Cadwallon, king of the Britons, catched the infection, and rivalled, if he did not excel, even Penda in acts of brutality. The barbarities of the Chriſtian were equal to the cruelties of the Pagan. Paulinus and Ethelburga fled into Kent, and the prelate was placed in the ſee of Rocheſter.

A. D. 635. This dreadful ſcene of horror and devaſtation continued till Oſwald, the ſecond ſon of Ethelfrid, born to be the deliverer of his country, put a ſtop to the effuſion of human blood. When his father loſt his life and crown by the invaſion of Redwald, he fled to Scotland, where he ſtudied the art of war with ſucceſs, and alſo embraced the chriſtian religion. The calamities of his country called him from his retreat. At the head of a handful of men, he entered Northumberland, and took poſſeſſion of a very advantageous poſt a little to the north of the wall of Severus. Here he waited the approach of Cadwallon, who deſpiſing the little army of Oſwald, marched with all the ſecurity of a general retiring to his quarters. He viewed the intrenchments of the enemy, and immediately ordered a general aſſault. The attack was furious, but not ſucceſsful; and Cadwallon, leading his forces to make a ſecond aſſault, was pierced through the heart with an arrow, and fell dead on the ground. Confuſion, inſtead of order, now reigned among the Britons. Oſwald perceived the diſorder; and iſſuing from his intrenchments at the head of his forces, put the enemy to flight, and drove them out of the kingdom with great ſlaughter.

Having thus retaliated on the inhuman tyrant Cadwallon the miſeries he had inflicted on an innocent people, he aſcended the throne of his anceſtors, and applied himſelf to cultivate the arts of peace. His religion and virtue were equally conſpicuous; and his mind was adorned with every acquiſition neceſſary for augmenting the luſtre of a throne. He obſerved with regret the languid ſtate into which religion was fallen ſince the death of Edwin, and the flight of Paulinus; and determined, if poſſible, to revive the dying flame. In order to this, he invited Aidan, a perſon at once reſpectable for his learning, and venerable for his virtues, from Scotland, to aſſiſt him in this generous undertaking. Aidan immediately obeyed the ſummons of Oſwald, and was received with all the reſpect due to his great merit: but as Aidan was not ſufficiently acquainted with the Saxon language to undertake the taſk without aſſiſtance, the king himſelf became the interpreter of his diſcourſes to the people. The ſucceſs was equal to their moſt ſanguine expectations. Aidan founded a biſhop's ſee at Landisfarne; and ſeveral Scottiſh monks coming to his aſſiſtance, the number of their converts amazingly increaſed. Churches were built in moſt parts of Northumberland; monaſteries were founded, and ſchools erected for the inſtruction of youth.

The great merit of Oſwald ſoon rendered him conſpicuous among the princes of the heptarchy; and he was choſen chief of their political confederacy. Penda, who ſtill ſwayed the ſceptre of Mercia, could not hear the praiſes that were laviſhed on Oſwald without envy. A rival in power was not to be ſuffered by a tyrant actuated only by the principles of ambition. A ſtranger at once to the laws of juſtice and the principles of humanity, Penda determined to carry fire and ſword among a people who had not injured him, and into the territories of a prince whoſe merits eclipſed his own.

A. D. 642. The deſigns of the malicious are dark and concealed. Penda, without the leaſt complaint of injuries received, entered the territories of Northumberland, and ruined the country through which he paſſed. Oſwald, who felt the diſtreſſes of his people, collected all the troops in his neighbourhood, and advanced to meet the inhuman tyrant, who ſo often trampled on the laws of nations. The two armies met at Maſerfelt, where a furious battle enſued. But the troops of Oſwald were too few to contend in the open field with the Mercian forces, long uſed to conqueſt: they were totally routed, and Oſwald himſelf was found among the ſlain. The whole kingdom was now expoſed to the dreadful ravages of Penda, and the diſtreſs of the inhabitants is better imagined than deſcribed. The progreſs of the tyrant was at laſt ſtopped at Bambury-caſtle, which bid defiance to his power; and Penda directed his march towards the kingdom of Eaſt-Anglia.

From the death of Oſwald, the kingdom was agitated with diſſentions, under weak princes, whoſe actions are of very little importance to the reader: murders and aſſaſſinations compoſe the principal part of their hiſtory. Egfrid, indeed, who aſcended the throne of Bernicia in 670, deſerves to be remembered for the noble oppoſition he made to the papal authority. The popes had long been looked upon as ſacred and infallible; but Egfrid paid no regard to their aſſumed infallibility. He deprived Wilfrid, biſhop of York, of his biſhoprick, and ſeized all his poſſeſſions, which were very great, and prodigiouſly opulent. Wilfrid appealed to the pope: the ſynod of Rome ordered that Wilfrid ſhould be reſtored. He returned to England, and produced an authentic copy of the ſentence. Egfrid, in a full council of the nobility and clergy, treated the papal ordinances and juriſdictions, not with contempt only, but alſo with reſentment. Wilfrid, inſtead of being reſtored, or receiving any compenſation, was taken into cuſtody, and ſentenced to a cloſe impriſonment. So ſpirited an oppoſition to the ſee of Rome, in times ſo ſlaviſhly ſuperſtitious, ought to be remembered with honour. Agatho then filled the papal chair.

Few remarkable tranſactions happened in Northumberland after the death of Egfrid, except the depoſition and murder of its princes. The people were treated with cruelty, and ſuperſtitious bigotry uſurped the place of genuine religion. At laſt an univerſal anarchy prevailed; and Egbert, as I ſhall hereafter relate, ſeized the opportunity of reducing the kingdom to his authority.

THE KINGDOM OF EAST-ANGLIA.

THIS kingdom owes its name to the Angles, a people from Jutland, by whom it was founded. They were headed by ſeveral chiefs, all independent of one another; but none of their names have been preſerved by hiſtorians. Uffa was the firſt who aſſumed the title of king, and this was not done till after he had been above forty years in Britain. But, from the time of his aſcending the throne, till he paid the debt of nature, hiſtory is ſilent with regard to his exploits. His ſon Titel, to whom he left his ſceptre, reigned in the ſame obſcurity, though he filled the throne twenty-one years. The actions of both are ſunk in oblivion.

A. D. 599. Redwald, on the death of Titel his father, aſcended the throne. The actions of this prince eclipſed not only all thoſe of his predeceſſors, but alſo moſt of the Saxon chiefs. He was placed at the head of the heptarchy, and filled the poſt with great honour and applauſe. He embraced chriſtianity, but afterwards renounced it, at the inſtigation of his wife, who was an idolater. So many examples of temporary converſions, are a proof that chriſtians, ill-inſtructed, are only chriſtians in name; and that the labours of the ignorant miſſionaries of thoſe times, if they produced their effects without difficulty, were attended with no permanent advantages. After a glorious reign of twenty years, he paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by his ſon.

A. D. 624. Eorpwald, who was a weak and puſillanimous prince, appeared under great diſadvantages after his illuſtrious father. Perhaps it would have been impoſſible for him to have kept the ſeat of royalty, had he not been ſupported by Edwin, king of Northumberland, in gratitude for the protection he had himſelf received from Redwald. Eorpwald embraced the Chriſtian religion at the inſtances of Edwin; but this change of religion increaſed his inactivity: he was much better qualified for governing a convent than a kingdom. Richbert, one of his generals, who ſtill continued a Pagan, was ſo exaſperated at the converſion and puſillanimity of Eorpwald, that he aſſaſſinated him with his own hand.

After the death of Eorpwald, a long ſucceſſion of obſcure and inactive princes, who were either expelled, murdered, or retired into a convent, filled the throne of Eaſt-Anglia. It will be needleſs to mention the names of barbarians, whoſe actions are unworthy of being recorded in hiſtory. Sigebert alone deſerves to be excepted. He eſtabliſhed the firſt literary ~~ceremony~~ seminary, and furniſhed it with able maſters for teaching the ſciences. His talents and learning would have adorned the throne, had he not been ſeized with the religious enthuſiaſm of the times, and preferred the habit of a monk to the robes of royalty.

A. D. 749. The laſt of the Eaſt-Anglian princes was Ethelbert, whoſe mind was adorned with the moſt amiable virtues. His ſubjects promiſed themſelves a long ſeries of happineſs under the government of ſo generous and benevolent a maſter; at the ſame time they wiſhed to render the ſceptre permanent in his family. Ethelbert, who made the happineſs of his people his principal care, made no oppoſition to their requeſt; and a treaty of marriage was concluded between him and Althrida, daughter to Offa king of Mercia, a princeſs equally remarkable for her piety and accompliſhments. The generous ſoul of Ethelbert was above ſuſpecting others of treachery: he repaired to the court of Mercia to conſummate his nuptials. But Offa had other views. Ambition had more charms than virtue. He was determined to annex the Eaſt-Anglian kingdom to his own, though at the price of every thing held dear by mankind. He violated the ſacred rights of hoſpitality and honour; he cauſed the innocent, the unſuſpecting Ethelbert, to be aſſaſſinated, and ſeized upon his kingdom; which, after this period, was united with that of Mercia.

THE KINGDOM OF MERCIA.

MERCIA was, by far, the largeſt and moſt opulent kingdom of the Saxon heptarchy. It was founded by Crida, a deſcendant from Withelga, the ſecond ſon of Woden. He held the ſceptre only two years; and, on his death, Ethelbert, king of Kent, ſeized upon the Mercian territories, as the deſcendant of Hengiſt, the firſt Saxon king. Three years after, however, he reſigned the crown to Webba, one of the ſons of Crida. He was a very indolent prince; and though he held the ſceptre nineteen years, he performed nothing worthy of being recorded in hiſtory. At his death, he left his kingdom to Penda, his ſon. But Ethelbert, who ſtill filled the Kentiſh throne, fearing the reſtleſs ambition and turbulent temper of Penda would involve the whole heptarchy in confuſion and diſtreſs, ſeized the crown a ſecond time, and conferred it on Ceorl, a nephew of the late king. Ceorl reigned eight years, but left no traces of his government: his actions, whatever they were, like thoſe of his predeceſſor, are conſigned to oblivion.

A. D. 624. Penda ſeized the ſceptre of Mercia on the death of Ceorl. He was fifty years of age when he aſcended the throne, but glowed with all the fire of youth. A long ſeries of experience had not abated his ambition; the love of conqueſt was ſtill the ruling paſſion of his ſoul. His character has been already fully diſplayed in the hiſtories of thoſe kingdoms with which he was at war. He well deſerved the appellation of a ſanguinary tyrant. All the neighbouring ſtates ſufficiently experienced his injuſtice and his violence; no leſs than five Chriſtian princes fell in battle by his ſword. His whole reign was a ſcene of blood; the ſword of deſtruction always marked the route of his enemies. It reflects an honour to chriſtianity, that he always refuſed to embrace its tenets. If his portrait will admit of any ſoftening, it is his never moleſting any who became converts to the faith, provided they lived up to their profeſſion: he was an implacable enemy to all whoſe actions were a contradiction to their principles.

Time ſeemed to have no power over Penda. The flame of ambition, which generally grows languid with age, glowed with full vigour in his breaſt. He planned conqueſts when others are tottering on the brink of the grave: and, in the eightieth year of his age, marched, at the head of his army, into Northumberland, fully determined to depopulate the country, render the whole kingdom a ſmoaking deſert. But victory now forſook his ſtandards: he attacked the Northumbrian army and was ſlain.

A. D. 655. Peada ſucceeded his father in part of his dominions, and exerted himſelf nobly in propagating chriſtianity in Mercia. His labours were crowned with ſucceſs; the tender branch he planted during the reign of his father, now ſpread itſelf over the whole kingdom. But he did not long enjoy the crown; he fell a ſacrifice to malevolence, perhaps to ambition. Some writers ſay, he was poiſoned by his mother. At his death, Oſwy, king of Northumberland, ſeized upon the whole Mercian territories, which he held, till Wulpher, the ſecond ſon of Penda, wreſted them out of his hand.

A. D. 660. Wulpher, who ſeems to have inherited the reſtleſs ambition of his father, was continually engaged in war, which was his darling paſſion. Far from being contented with his own territories, though much larger than thoſe of any other prince of the heptarchy, he turned his arms againſt his neighbours. The firſt monarch that felt the power of his arms was Kenwalch, king of the Weſt Saxons, whom he defeated, and over-run great part of his territories. He next attacked the Britons, and drove them from their poſſeſſions between the Severn and the Wye. He reduced the kingdoms of the Eaſt Saxons and Eaſt-Angles, to a ſtate of vaſſallage, from which they never entirely recovered. But victory forſook him in the cloſe of his reign: he was defeated by Egfrid, and he paid the debt of nature after a reign of fifteen years, leaving his crown to Kenred his ſon.

A. D. 675. Kenred, who was an infant at the death of his father, wanted power to hold the ſceptre; his uncle Ethelred, celebrated for his military talents, wreſted it from his hand. He invaded the kingdom of Kent, and laid great part of it waſte. He defeated the king of Northumberland, and made himſelf maſter of Lindſey. Here he put a period to his conqueſts; determining to ſpend the remainder of his days in peace and tranquillity. Reflection now painted the former ſcenes of his life in different colours from what they had appeared at the head of his army. His mind was deeply affected with the gloomy ſuperſtitions of the times. He reſtored the crown to Kenred his nephew, from whom he had unjuſtly taken it, retired into the monaſtery of Bardney, which he himſelf had founded, and died in obſcurity.

A. D. 705. Kenred did not long fill the throne of his anceſtors. He had no talents for war; he was fonder of the indolence of private life, than the active ſcenes of royalty. After a reign of four years he reſigned his ſceptre to his uncle Ceolrid, and accompanied with his aunt Kiniſwintha, and Offa, king of Eſſex, repaired to Rome, where they all ended their days in a cloiſter.

A. D. 709. Ceolrid poſſeſſed very different ſentiments from his predeceſſor. He ſaw with concern the aſcendancy of the monks over the mind, when tinctured with the gloomy ſuperſtition of the age, and determined, if poſſible, to leſſen their power. Accordingly, he deprived them of ſeveral of their privileges. This was abundantly ſufficient to arm the whole fraternity againſt him. The prince, not ſuſpecting his danger, admitted them as uſual to his preſence. Their vengeance was not long delayed; they poiſoned his wine, and he died in the greateſt torments. Nor was his death ſufficient to ſatisfy their malice; they imputed the delirium occaſioned by the ſtrength of the poiſon, to his converſing with the devil, and charitably devoted his ſoul to eternal perdition. So dangerous was it in thoſe times of ignorant bigotry to moleſt a fraternity of men, who, by living on the labour of others, became a real burden to their country.

A. D. 716. This unfortunate monarch was ſucceeded by Ethelbald, the grandſon of Eoppa, brother to Penda. He poſſeſſed that reſtleſs ambition, which formed a part of the Saxon character. He invaded the territories of his neighbours, and filled the whole heptarchy with alarms. His abilities were great, and had they been confined to proper objects, his reign would have been glorious to himſelf and his people: but he deviated from the paths of honour. His manners were depraved, and a deluge of vice overſpread his kingdom. This procured him a ſevere reproof from the pope; and to avert the threatened vengeance of heaven, he had recourſe to the religious practices of the times, he founded the famous monaſtery of Croyland, which in magnificence far exceeded any then in Britain. He exempted the clergy from all taxes and ſecular ſervices, except ſuch as were neceſſary for building bridges, or repairing fortreſſes.

By theſe acts of benevolence to the church he was ſuppoſed by the clergy of that ignorant age, to have made a ſufficient atonement for the inundation of immorality which had covered the kingdom. But he did not end his days in peace. A rebellion broke out among his ſubjects, and Ethelbald fell in a battle with the inſurgents. Beornred, who headed the rebels, took poſſeſſion of the throne; but the nobles, incenſed at the inſolence of the rabble, flew to arms, ſoon hurled the uſurper from the ſeat of power, and placed Offa, the ſon of Eawa, brother of Penda, on the Mercian throne.

A. D. 758. Offa was one of the moſt diſtinguiſhed of all the Mercian princes. Fortune perpetually followed his ſtandards. He reduced the kingdom of Kent, after killing the prince with his own hand. He invaded Northumberland, and annexed the county of Nottingham to his own dominions. He conquered all the dominions of Weſſex to the northward of the Thames, and made them a part of his own territories.

The Britons had, for ſome time, made incurſions into the frontier provinces of Mercia, and committed the moſt dreadful diſorders. Offa marched againſt them, drove them back into their country with great ſlaughter, and to prevent their incurſions for the future, threw up a ſtrong intrenchment, which began near the mouth of the river Dee in Flintſhire, and running along the mountains terminated at the influx of the Wye into the Severn near Briſtol. This was the moſt ſtupendous work executed during the heptarchy; part of it ſtill remains, and is known by the name of Offa's dyke.

The character of Offa was now raiſed to the greateſt height. The luſtre of his victories, added to the merit of ſome good qualities, made the world willing, for ſome time, to overlook his vices. He perceived the advantages of commerce, and gave every encouragement in his power to the merchants of his country. Charlemagne thought him worthy of his friendſhip, ſent him ſeveral preſents, and remitted his ſubjects ſome duties which had before been uſually paid. But he ſtained his laurels by baſely aſſaſſinating Ethelbert, king of Eaſt-Anglia. That young prince, allured by the invitations of the perfidious Offa, came to the Mercian court to eſpouſe his daughter. He was received with every appearance of friendſhip and eſteem, but amidſt the joy of what he fancied was his nuptial entertainment, the cruel Offa cauſed him to be put to death, and immediately made himſelf maſter of his dominions.

A. D. 792. Awakened by the ſtings of conſcience, and deſirous of re-eſtabliſhing his character among his people, he had recourſe to the ſuperſtitious cuſtoms of that age to expiate his crime. He enriched the cathedral of Hereford; he gave the tenth of all his goods to the church; and undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, where he received abſolution from the pope. In return for this favour, he eſtabliſhed in his dominions an annual tax called Peter'ſpence, becauſe it amounted to a penny each family. This tax, after the union of the ſeven kingdoms, was levied all over England, and exacted as a tribute by the Roman pontiffs, till the reign of Henry VIII. who demoliſhed at once that tribute, and the pope's authority.

On his return to England, he erected the magnificent monaſtery of St. Albans, where he reſided ſome years in the quality of a ſteward, and died in obſcurity. Theſe, and other acts of piety, completely expiated all his crimes in the opinion of his ſubjects. Moral excellence or perfection was leſs regarded, in thoſe times of ignorant bigotry, than the founding of religious houſes, and the exterior practices of devotion.

A. D. 794. Egfrid, his ſon, aſcended the Mercian throne on the death of his father; and, from ſome of the firſt acts of his reign, the people promiſed to themſelves a long ſeries of happineſs: but their hopes were ſoon rendered abortive: Egfrid held the ſceptre only five months, when he paid the debt of nature, amidſt the tears and lamentations of his ſubjects.

Kenulf, deſcended from a collateral branch of the Penda family, received the ſceptre on the death of Egfrid. He was equally brave and ſuperſtitious. The kingdom enjoyed a profound peace during his whole reign; and his great beneficence to the church acquired him the character of a wiſe, courageous, active and equitable prince; though, perhaps, it would be difficult to find a ſingle inſtance in his whole reign that deſerved theſe epithets, except his munificence to the clergy. He filled the throne of Mercia twenty-four years.

A. D. 818. Kenelm was but an infant when his father Kenulf paid the debt of nature; and Quendrida, his ſiſter, was entruſted with the care of his education: but, inſtead of performing the duty ſhe owed to her father, ſhe baſely cauſed her brother to be murdered, and uſurped the throne. She did not, however, long enjoy the fruits of her perfidy; ſhe was driven from the ſeat of power by another uſurper, who was, ſoon after, expelled by a third.

It will be needleſs to purſue the hiſtory of this kingdom any farther. A ſucceſſion of perfidious actions can give very little entertainment to a humane and candid reader. The ſeries of uſurpers continued till Egbert ſubdued the kingdom, and put a period to the Saxon heptarchy.

THE KINGDOM OF ESSEX, OR, THE EAST-SAXONS.

ERKENWIN was the firſt of the Saxon chiefs who aſſumed the title of King of Eſſex; and even that prince held his kingdom as a fief of Kent. Nor has any of the ancient hiſtorians informed us at what period it became an independent monarchy. If either Erkenwin, or his two immediate ſucceſſors, performed any actions worthy to be tranſmitted to poſterity, they are buried in oblivion. Their names, and the length of time they filled the throne, are the only circumſtances they have recorded.

A. D. 596. Sebert, Sibert, or Sigebert, was a Pagan when he aſcended the throne of Eſſex. The darkneſs of heathen ſuperſtition had not then been diſpelled by the light of the goſpel. Ethelbert, king of Kent, deſirous of rendering others partakers of the ſame happineſs he himſelf had received from the preaching of Auſtin, diſpatched Melitus into Eſſex, in order to plant Chriſtianity in that kingdom, and convert his nephew, Sibert, from the errors of idolatry. Melitus ſucceeded, and Sibert readily joined Ethelbert in erecting the cathedral church of St. Paul. It was built upon the foundations of a heathen temple dedicated to Diana by the Romans, when they were maſters of Britain. Melitus was the firſt biſhop, and exerted his great abilities nobly in the cauſe of true religion. The great increaſe of proſelytes to Chriſtianity, that followed on the opening of the cathedral, encouraged the two princes to rebuild the church of St. Peter at Weſtminſter, which had been demoliſhed by the Saxons. That ſtructure was erected in the time of Conſtantine the Great, on the foundations of a temple built by the Romans, and dedicated to Apollo. The founding of theſe two churches gave a fatal blow to the idolatry of the Saxons; the temples were, in many parts of the kingdom, deſtroyed, and the images broken in pieces. But Sibert died too ſoon; he paid the debt of nature, after holding the ſceptre of Eſſex almoſt ſeventeen years.

A. D. 613. Sibert was ſucceeded by his three ſons, Saxred, Seward, and Sigebert, who formed a triumvirate, and reigned together. The piety of their father had produced very little effect on the minds of theſe three princes; they were ſtill idolaters, and endeavoured to reſtore the heathen ſuperſtition. Melitus laboured inceſſantly for their converſion: but his attempts were vain; they ridiculed the ſacred myſteries of chriſtianity, and at laſt baniſhed Melitus from the kingdom. Not long after, they led their army againſt the Kentiſh forces, and were all ſlain in the action. They reigned ſeven years. Sigebert the Little, ſon to Seward, aſcended the throne: but his actions, whatever they were, are conſigned to oblivion; even the time of his death is uncertain.

He was ſucceeded by Sigebert the Good, who again reſtored the Chriſtian religion, after it had been almoſt extinguiſhed by the triumvirate of idolaters. But we have no farther account of the actions of this pious prince, except that his people enjoyed an uninterrupted ſeries of peace during his whole reign. He was aſſaſſinated by two of his generals, in revenge for his having ſhewn a partiality to the biſhop, who had paſſed an eccleſiaſtical cenſure on one of them for his vices. This event happened in the year 622.

The reigns of the other kings of Eſſex are not worth a place in hiſtory. They performed no actions that deſerve to be recorded. Their reigns, like the lives of peaſants in a ſequeſtered valley, are barren of incidents; they are equally obſcure; and it were to be wiſhed they were equally innocent. After an interval of about 190 years, the kingdom of Eſſex was reduced by Egbert, who, ſoon after, put an end to the ſeven kingdoms of the Saxons.

Such is the hiſtory of the Heptarchy, a ſtructure founded on rapine and perfidy, and demoliſhed by ambition. Chriſtianity has, doubtleſs, a powerful influence in diſpoſing the mind to acts of kindneſs, benevolence, and humanity; in poliſhing the manners, and introducing a gentle and polite behaviour; but it loſt its force among the Anglo-Saxons; they were too ignorant and too ſuperſtitious to receive the benefits that reſult from its precepts. Inſtead of that ſimplicity of worſhip enjoined in the goſpel, they ſubſtituted an unbounded reverence for ſaints and relics; the practices of an abſurd devotion ſupplied the place of the evangelical virtues. Nurſed in ſuperſtition, and ſtrangers to a juſt and rational method of reaſoning, every operation of nature was conſidered as a miracle; the common accidents of life were believed to be the effects of the interpoſition of providence, and every misfortune the ſcourge of heaven. Hence they were prepared to receive, without examination, every fable, however abſurd; and every opinion, however extravagant. Religion, inſtead of enlightening their minds, involved them in the thickeſt night of ſuperſtitious bigotry. Ambitious of acquiring the praiſe of ſanctity, and deſirous of expiating crimes without ſuffering the pains of repentance, they buried themſelves in the gloomy receſſes of a cloiſter, and gave munificent donations to churches and the clergy. No leſs than ten of their kings, and eleven of their queens, retired from the world, and were loſt to ſociety. They graſped the ſhadow inſtead of the ſubſtance; and ſubſtituted the lifeleſs and gloomy devotions of a cell to the practice of juſtice, benevolence, charity, and the other virtues ſo ſtrongly recommended in the goſpel.

No diſcoveries in the arts mark this period of hiſtory: literature was little cultivated; the monks were the only people that had any tincture of letters, and their ſtudies confined almoſt entirely to theology. It is, indeed, in vain to expect the ſciences ſhould reſide in a country where the torch of civil diſcord is lighted by the hand of rapine, and diſperſes its malignant beams from one extremity to the other. Bede, indeed, was a perſon of great learning, conſidering the times in which he lived. His eccleſiaſtical hiſtory has reached our times, and diſplays a genius and aſſiduity, which, in more enlightened ages, might have conducted to the moſt important diſcoveries.

BOOK IV.

From the deſtruction of the Saxon Heptarchy, to the Norman conqueſt.

EGBERT.

IT has been already obſerved, at the concluſion of the hiſtory of Weſſex, that the meſſengers diſpatched to Egbert, when Brithwic fell a victim to the paſſion of his wife, found him in the ſervice of Charlemagne. In that polite and martial court Egbert had poliſhed his manners, and learned to conquer. On his aſcending the throne of his anceſtors, a very extenſive proſpect opened to his view. The royal families, in all the kingdoms of the heptarchy, except his own, were extinguiſhed; anarchy and diſorder had rendered all of them weak, and ſome of them almoſt defenceleſs. Egbert was the only deſcendant of thoſe chiefs who had conquered Britain, and boaſted their deſcent from Woden. The ſuperior qualities of his mind gave him as much advantage as his birth; ſo that he had the faireſt proſpect of extending his dominions, and of rendering himſelf the ſole monarch of the whole heptarchy.

He began with introducing among his troops the diſcipline he had learned in the armies of Charlemagne, and then turned his arms againſt the Britons. His ſucceſs over that brave and hardy people eſtabliſhed his character as a general, and he was choſen chief of the Saxon confederacy. The Mercians were the only people capable of defending themſelves againſt the power of Egbert: the kingdoms of Kent, Eſſex, and Eaſt-Anglia, were become tributary to that people. Bernulf, who then filled the Mercian throne, was alarmed at the ſucceſs of Egbert: he ſaw, that unleſs ſomething happened to blaſt his laurels, he muſt ſoon be maſter of the whole heptarchy. He therefore increaſed his army, and took the opportunity of Egbert's abſence to attack the provinces of Weſſex that bordered upon Mercia. Egbert was in Cornwall when he received the news of the Mercian invaſion; and marched, with the greateſt expedition, to put a ſtop to the ravages of the enemy. The two armies met at Ellandune, now Wilton, in Wiltſhire; a furious battle enſued, in which the forces of Bernulf were totally defeated, and the greater part of them who eſcaped the carnage of the engagement were cut off in their retreat. Another deciſive battle, fought ſoon after, finiſhed the conteſt, and made Egbert maſter of Mercia. He purſued his ſucceſs, marched towards Northumberland, and was met by the principal inhabitants, who came to do him homage. Egbert was content with reducing the ſeveral kingdoms of the heptarchy; he ſuffered them to enjoy their former laws and cuſtoms; and to elect their own kings, who governed their reſpective provinces, but paid an annual tribute to Egbert.

A. D. 829. Thus the heptarchy was conſolidated into one kingdom, and called England, from the name of one of the Saxon tribes, who, about four hundred years before, had eſtabliſhed themſelves in this country. Egbert was ſolemnly crowned at Wincheſter, and immediately iſſued an edict for aboliſhing all diſtinctions among the Saxon kingdoms.

But, though Egbert had reſtored peace throughout his dominions, and gained the affection of all his ſubjects by his humane government; yet this tranquillity was of no long duration. The northern parts of Europe were ſo overſtocked with people, that multitudes of armed barbarians were continually iſſuing from their native ſoil, in ſearch of plunder, or countries more fruitful than their own. A party of theſe wandering ravagers landed on the coaſt of England, where they were known by the appellation of Danes.

They were compoſed of different nations, many of whom being driven from the country by Charlemagne, ſettled in Jutland, before inhabited by the Angles and Saxons. By the addition of theſe refugees, the country ſoon became too populous, and they were obliged to ſeek new ſettlements in a diſtant kingdom. Great part of their country was covered with woods, which furniſhed them with timber ſufficient for building ſhips, and theſe they managed with great dexterity. But, inſtead of applying themſelves to commerce, they became pirates, and frequently landed on the coaſts of different kingdoms; and, after plundering the adjacent country, returned home with their booty. Piracy ſoon became the ſupport of their ſtate; and, inſtead of being conſidered as infamous, was looked upon as an honourable profeſſion. Their kings engaged in theſe piratical cruiſes, and became the leaders of a band of lawleſs plunderers. They made ſeveral deſcents on the Britiſh coaſt during the heptarchy, but were always repulſed with loſs.

A. D. 833. Perſuaded that their miſcarriages were owing to the ſmallneſs of their parties; and deſirous of plundering a country at once rich and fertile, they joined their fleets, and landed a body of fifteen thouſand men at Charmouth, in Dorſetſhire. So formidable a number of barbarians ſtruck the inhabitants with terror; they found themſelves unable to reſiſt their ferocious invaders, and fled for ſafety to the woods and marſhes. Egbert, on the firſt news of their landing, flew to the defence of his people: but his army was too weak to chaſtiſe the barbarians; they gained a complete victory; and Egbert himſelf was indebted to the darkneſs of the night for his ſafety. But though the Danes had been victorious, they ſuffered ſo greatly in the engagement, that they did not think proper to continue their ravages; they retreated to their ſhips, and diſappeared.

A. D. 836. The Corniſh Britons, deſirous of freeing themſelves from the Saxon yoke, invited the Danes to join them againſt the enemy. A numerous body of theſe pirates accordingly landed in Cornwall, and were joined by the Britons. This combined army immediately took the field, in hopes of ſurpriſing the Engliſh forces. But Egbert had learned wiſdom from experience; his laſt defeat had rendered him cautious: he expected the Danes would return, and kept his troops ready to receive them. He marched immediately againſt the enemy, and met them at Hengdown-hill, in Cornwall. Surpriſed to ſee the Engliſh army ſo near them, the Danes and Britons would have willingly retreated, but it was too late. Egbert attacked them with the utmoſt fury, and put them to flight. The Britons took ſhelter in their mountains, and the Danes retired to their ſhips.

A. D. 837. Egbert ſaw the neceſſity of a fleet to check the progreſs of thoſe rapacious invaders; and had even fitted out a few ſhips for that purpoſe: but he died too ſoon for his people, leaving the crown to his ſon, who was ill qualified to ſuſtain its weight. Egbert was formed both for conqueſt and government: he was intrepid, wiſe, and humane. He acquired a kingdom by his valour; and he rendered his people happy by his prudence, beneficence, and impartial diſpenſation of juſtice.

ETHELWOLF.

A. D. 838. ETHELWOLF aſcended the throne on the death of his father, but inherited few of his qualities. His virtues were thoſe of a monk, rather than a king. He received his education in the monaſtery of Wincheſter, where he contracted the indolence and inactivity ſo general in a cloiſter. The Danes did not fail to take advantage of his weakneſs; they landed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, plundered the adjacent country, and retired with their booty, leaving behind them ſuch dreadful marks of their brutality as are ſhocking to humanity. Their ſmall veſſels ran eaſily up the creeks and rivers; where, after drawing them aſhore, they ſurrounded them with entrenchments; and ſpreading themſelves in every part of the adjacent country, they carried off whatever they thought valuable, retreated to their ſhips, and diſappeared. Driven from one place, they appeared in another. The alarm was ſpread through the whole kingdom; terror became general; every ſeaſon of the year was dangerous.

A. D. 840. But hitherto they had attempted no ſettlement; the intention of their deſcents reached no farther than plunder. They landed in ſmall parties, and were oppoſed by the militia of the county. The reſiſtance they met with had no effect to diſcourage their incurſions; their inſatiable thirſt of booty ſupported them under every misfortune; defeats, as well as victories, incited them to greater enterprizes. They had now diſcovered the fertility of the country, and were determined, if poſſible, to fix themſelves in the iſland. They landed a numerous body of forces at Charmouth, where Egbert had, ſome years before, been defeated. The danger that now threatened his country, rouſed Ethelwolf from his lethargy. He marched at the head of his army, gave battle to the Danes, and was defeated. But the barbarians were convinced, from the oppoſition they had met with, that a ſettlement could not then be attempted with any hopes of ſucceſs. They abandoned the deſign; and, after ravaging the country, retired to their ſhips.

The fatigues of military duty were not at all agreeable to Ethelwolf. He ſaw that a continued courſe of activity was neceſſary to fruſtrate the attempts of theſe reſtleſs invaders, and determined to diveſt himſelf of part of his dominions, in order to procure that indolent tranquillity which he valued much more than power. He reſigned to Athelſtan, his eldeſt ſon, the counties of Eſſex, Kent, and Suſſex. This prudent expedient contributed greatly to the ſecurity of the ſouthern coaſt; but the other parts of the kingdom were ſtill expoſed to the dreadful ravages of thoſe barbarous invaders. A large detachment landed near the mouth of the river Parret, in Somerſetſhire; but they did not long continue their ravages; they were attacked by the militia of thoſe parts, and defeated, with ſuch terrible ſlaughter, that the kingdom was, for ſome years, free from their attacks.

A. D. 851. But this interval of tranquillity proved nothing more than a prelude to more general attempts. The Danes landed in ſeveral parts of the kingdom, but were every where defeated, though not till after they had committed the moſt dreadful ravages. A fleet of three hundred and fifty ſail landed their forces in the iſle of Thanet, great part of which they laid waſte, burnt the cities of London and Canterbury, and penetrated into Surry. Ethelwolf was now once more rouſed from his lethargy: he led his army againſt the invaders, and obtained a complete victory. But, notwithſtanding their loſs was prodigious, they took up their winter quarters in the iſle of Thanet.

A. D. 853. Alarmed at the barbarians making a ſettlement in the iſland, the militia of Kent and Surry attacked their camp with great intrepidity; but were repulſed with loſs, and obliged to abandon the deſign. The Danes being thus left at liberty, added new fortifications to their ſettlements, and determined to wait for freſh reinforcements.

But even theſe alarming circumſtances could not divert Ethelwolf from the reſolution he had taken, of making a pilgrimage to Rome. Such power have the deluſions of ſuperſtitious bigotry over the human mind, when unaſſiſted by the force of reaſon. He immediately diſpatched his youngeſt ſon, Alfred, to inform the pope of his pious intentions, who received confirmation from the hands of the holy father. Alfred was received with the greateſt marks of eſteem by Leo the fourth, and obtained every thing he requeſted.

A. D. 854. But this mark of his eſteem for the Roman pontiff was not ſufficient to ſatisfy a perſon of Ethelwolf's bigotry; he perſiſted in his former reſolution, and ſet out for Rome. He continued a year in that city, where he ſpent his time in exerciſes much better adapted to edify the inhabitants of that metropolis, than comfort his own oppreſſed ſubjects. He rebuilt the Engliſh college, which had been burnt down: he promiſed to extend the tribute of Peter's pence over the whole kingdom; and to pay his holineſs three hundred mancuſes (about thirty-eight pounds ſterling) two-thirds of which were to ſupport the lamps in the churches of St. Peter and St. Paul, and the other third was a preſent to the pope himſelf. Nor were his religious exerciſes leſs remarkable. He viſited every ſhrine, paid his devotions to every relic, and viewed every place that had been rendered remarkable by ſome event in the firſt ages of chriſtianity.

A. D. 855. After taking leave of his holineſs, Ethelwolf ſet out for his own dominions; but ſtopping at the court of France, he fell in love with Judith, daughter of Charles the bald. She was a widow, though very young, and adorned with all the charms of the ſofter ſex. Ethelwolf, notwithſtanding the great diſparity of their years, married that princeſs, and indulged himſelf for ſome time in the pleaſures of the French court, without paying the leaſt regard to the diſtreſſes of his country.

But theſe imprudent actions of Ethelwolf occaſioned diſturbances in his kingdom. Athelſtan had paid the debt of nature before his father left the kingdom, and Ethelbald, his ſecond ſon, now determined to ſeize a ſceptre which the weakneſs of Ethelwolf ſeemed to offer to his ambition. Many of the nobles joined him; and the torch of civil diſcord was on the point of being lighted when Ethelwolf returned to his dominions.

Ethelbald was not intimidated by the arrival of his father; he proſecuted his deſign with the ſame vigour as before. And Ethelwolf made preparation for reducing him to reaſon. The nobles perceived the dangers that threatened their country; and interpoſed their good offices to bring about a reconciliation. Ethelwolf conſented to cede the ancient kingdom of Weſſex to his ſon, reſerving the other parts of the iſland to himſelf. By this ſacrifice the internal peace of England was reſtored, and Ethelwolf ſpent the remainder of his days in tranquillity.

His paſſion for augmenting the power of the church, however, did not forſake him. He beſtowed on the clergy a donation, for which they had contended during ſeveral centuries. They maintained that the Moſaic law, which gave to the Levites the tenth part of all the produce of the land, was obligatory upon chriſtians; and notwithſtanding the obvious abſurdity of this application of the Jewiſh law, they were deſirous of extending it to the tenth of all induſtry, merchandize, wages of labourers, and pay of ſoldiers. This doctrine they had preached up with the utmoſt aſſiduity, but hitherto the intereſt of the laity had been too ſtrong for their arguments. The power of Ethelwolf effected what all their eloquence had attempted in vain; and the ſtates of the kingdom at his requeſt, conſented to the eſtabliſhment of tithes throughout all the kingdom. Perhaps the Engliſh were perſuaded that this remarkable benevolence to the church, would procure them the aſſiſtance of heaven againſt the Danes. It is natural for people in diſtreſs to be willing to pay liberally for deliverance.

A. D. 857. Ethelwolf now found his end approaching, and was deſirous of preventing any domeſtic diſputes between his own children, from diſturbing the tranquillity of his ſubjects. In order to this, he bequeathed all the territories he governed himſelf to his ſon Ethelbert, but in caſe of his death they were to deſcend to Ethelred, and for want of male iſſue, entailed upon Alfred. He gave his perſonel eſtate to charitable uſes, and ordered that all his ſucceſſors ſhould maintain one perſon out of every tenth family. Having thus ſettled his temporal concerns, Ethelwolf gave himſelf up entirely to the exerciſes of religion, and died in peace, after ſwaying the Engliſh ſceptre nineteen years.

ETHELBALD AND ETHELRED.

A. D. 857. NO oppoſition was made to the will of Ethelwolf. Ethelbald had for ſome time been ſeated upon the throne of Weſſex, and Ethelred took poſſeſſion of the dominions of his father. The king of Weſſex followed not the ſteps of Ethelwolf; he was not fearful of breaking the laws of his maker: almoſt the firſt action of his reign, was the inceſtuous marriage with Judith, his father's widow. His government was arbitrary and cruel; he was at once both indolent and perfidious, and practiſed every vice that ſollicited his depraved appetite. Swithin, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſaw with grief the enormous actions of his maſter, and exerted all his power to make him ſenſible of his crimes. He at laſt ſucceeded: Judith was divorced, and a change of government immediately followed.

A. D. 860. But Ethelbald did not long enjoy the crown of Weſſex. His people were hardly ſenſible of the happy alteration in their condition, before the king paid the debt of nature, and left the crown to Ethelbert his brother. The diſpoſitions of theſe two princes were directly oppoſite; Ethelbert was as remarkable for his virtues, as Ethelbald had been for his vices. Humanity and moderation formed the principal characteriſtics of his reign. No civil commotion diſturbed the tranquillity of the ſtate; no complaints of injuſtice were heard from the people. Happineſs ſeemed to have taken up her abode in the kingdom, while the olive wand of peace was extended over the whole iſland.

But this interval of undiſturbed enjoyment, lulled the people into a fatal ſecurity. They had, for ſome time, been free from the barbarous ravages of the Danes, and made no preparations to prevent their being again afflicted with the like misfortunes. A naval force, the only bulwark that could defend them from the inroad of a piratical enemy, was neglected; the coaſts were unguarded, and the whole kingdom expoſed to the invaſion of every embarkation of marine freebooters. The natural conſequences of this indolent ſecurity were felt too ſoon. The Danes landed at Southampton, and meeting with no oppoſition, they extended their ravages to Wincheſter, plundered the city, and reduced it to aſhes. Their route was marked with deſolation and ruin. Their armies were preceded with terror. No reſiſtance was made to their progreſs; the inhabitants thought of nothing but flight to ſave themſelves from their ſhocking brutalities. But the ſpirit of their Saxon anceſtors was not yet wholly loſt. Ofric and Ethelwolf, the two generals of the Engliſh forces, marched with the utmoſt expedition againſt the lawleſs invaders of their country. The flight of the inhabitants had filled the Danes with an inſolent confidence. They feared no oppoſition; and ſpread themſelves in a very diſorderly manner over the country for the ſake of plunder. In this fatal ſecurity they were overtaken by the Engliſh generals, and eaſily defeated. A dreadful ſlaughter enſued, and the few barbarians that eſcaped the ſword, were glad to eſcape to their ſhips without their booty.

A. D. 865. This defeat did not, however, deter their countrymen from their piratical cruiſes. A conſiderable number of them landed in the iſle of Thanet, and filled the adjacent country with terror. Their horrid maſſacres, which ſhock humanity, intimidated the people from making any reſiſtance. Recourſe was therefore had to negotiation; and the inhabitants agreed to pay them a conſiderable ſum of money, in order to ſave their eſtates from inevitable ruin. But little confidence can be placed in the promiſes of thoſe who live by rapine, and daily trample upon the laws of juſtice and humanity. Perſuaded that they could gain more by pillage than the ſum ſtipulated in the treaty, they perfidiouſly took the advantage of the truce to carry deſtruction among an unſuſpecting people. They commenced their ſhocking ravages in the night, and laid waſte the whole eaſtern part of the county.

A. D. 866. Theſe dreadful diſorders greatly affected the mind of Ethelbert. He ſaw with grief the miſeries of his country which he could not prevent. The barbarians ſpared neither age nor ſex; a total deſtruction marked the paths of the invaders. The churches were deſtroyed, the monaſteries reduced to aſhes, and the religious treated with the moſt inhuman brutality. In the midſt of theſe diſtreſſes Ethelbert died, and was univerſally lamented by his ſubjects, who loved his perſon and revered his virtues. He was ſucceeded in the throne by Ethelred his younger brother, purſuant to his father's will, though he left behind him two ſons, Adelheim and Ethelwould.

ETHELRED I.

A. D. 866. THE reign of Ethelred is marked with victories and misfortunes. Fluſhed with conqueſt, and grown inſolent by ſucceſs, the Danes extended their ravages, and threatened the deſtruction of the whole country. The continual deſcents of theſe invaders had greatly weakened the authority of the kings of Weſſex over the provinces of Mercia, Eaſt-Anglia, and Northumberland. Their tributary kings had almoſt thrown off their allegiance, and were on the point of aſſuming the ſame authority they poſſeſſed during the heptarchy.

Soon after the acceſſion of Ethelred, a difference happened between him and his brother Alfred, on account of ſome territories which had been given them. Ethelred violated the contract, and Alfred appealed to the nobles who had been witneſſes to the deed. The diſpute became violent, but was at laſt amicably determined; and the two princes agreed to act in concert againſt the invaders of their country. Perhaps there never was a time when unanimity was more neceſſary: the ſtrongeſt union only could repel the attempts of the enemy.

Bruern Brocard, a nobleman of Northumberland, in order to revenge an affront he had received, in the perſon of his wife, from Oſbert, who then filled the throne, invited the Danes into that kingdom. He ſacrificed to a perſonal injury the lives of thouſands, and involved his country in miſery and diſtreſs. Under the conduct of Ivar and Hubba, two bold and warlike princes, the Danes landed in Eaſt-Anglia, and took up their quarters in that country till the ſpring.

A. D. 867. Oſbert kept his court at York when the Danes entered Northumberland; and, had he ſatisfied himſelf with defending that city, the Danes would, in all probability, have been defeated. But the impetuoſity of his courage gained the aſcendant over his prudence. He ſallied out to meet the enemy, and was ſlain in the action. The whole army was defeated; and the inhabitants, to prevent the dreadful ravages of theſe lawleſs invaders, entered into a treaty with Ivar, by which he was left in quiet poſſeſſion of that kingdom.

A. D. 878. But the kingdom of Northumberland was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the avarice of the Danes. They marched through Lincolnſhire, where, among other inhuman acts of cruelty, they levelled to the ground the monaſtery of Bardney, and put all the monks to death. The monaſteries of Peterborough, Ely, and others that lay near their route, ſhared the ſame fate. The cataſtrophe of the nuns of Coldingham abbey was very deplorable; the abbeſs, to prevent their charms from exciting the luſt of theſe lawleſs ſons of rapine, propoſed, that they ſhould disfigure their faces, by cutting off their noſes and upper lips. The propoſal was embraced; and the abbeſs, in order to inſpire her nuns with courage, began with herſelf. This expedient ſaved their virtue. The Danes, diſguſted at their appearance, and incenſed at their diſappointment, ſet fire to the monaſtery, and the whole ſiſterhood periſhed in the flames.

After committing theſe inhuman outrages, the Danes divided themſelves into two bodies. Ivar led his forces into Eaſt-Anglia, and Hubba continued his march towards the territories of Weſſex. The Eaſt-Anglians met the forces of Ivar at Thetford, but were totally defeated. Edmund, the tributary king, was taken priſoner; and, after having ſuſtained a thouſand indignities, was transfixed with arrows, and afterwards beheaded.

A. D. 871. Ivar purſued his conqueſts with great rapidity, but found it neceſſary to re-join Hubba's forces, in order to attack the kingdom of Weſſex, the only country that ſeemed able to put a ſtop to their victories. The two princes marched in conjunction, to Reading, in Berkſhire; a town, from its ſituation on the confluence of the Kennet and Thames, very capable of being defended with a ſmall force. Here the Danes fixed their head quarters; and, to render the poſt more difficult of acceſs, they connected the two rivers by a deep trench, which they fortified with ramparts.

A few days after their taking poſſeſſion of Reading, one of their foraging parties was cut off by Ethelwolf, earl of that county, and their leader ſlain. This gleam of ſucceſs encouraged Ethelred and Alfred, who had joined their forces, to advance near the enemy. Nor did they continue idle in their camp; they cut off all the advanced parties of the Danes, and made preparations for attacking the fortreſs itſelf. The Danes perceived their danger, and, collecting all their force, ſallied out upon the Britiſh forces, and, after an obſtinate engagement, obtained the victory. The intrepid Ethelwolf fell in the conteſt.

Exaſperated at the loſs of ſo able a leader, and deſirous of retrieving the honour they had loſt by their late defeat, the Engliſh once more advanced againſt the barbarians, who determined to meet them in the open field. Accordingly they marched to a plain near Aſhdown, where they waited the approach of the Britiſh forces. The troops of the invaders were divided into two bodies; one of them headed by their princes, and the other by their nobles. This diſpoſition rendered it neceſſary for the Engliſh to divide their army. Ethelred placed himſelf at the head of one diviſion, and Alfred at that of the other. The attack was begun by Alfred with incredible fury, and he nobly ſuſtained the ſhock of the whole Daniſh army. His brother being engaged in hearing maſs when Alfred charged the Danes, refuſed to ſupport him till the ſervice was over. As ſoon as Ethelred advanced, the Danes, who had ſtood firm againſt the charge of Alfred, gave way; a dreadful carnage enſued, and the enemy were obliged to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight. One of their princes, and a vaſt number of their nobles, were found among the ſlain. Soon after this victory, the two brothers engaged another party of the Danes, and were defeated. Ethelred was mortally wounded, and died ſoon after, leaving his crown to his brother Alfred, who was born to ſupport the tottering throne, and eſtabliſh the happineſs of his people.

A L F R E D, ſurnamed THE GREAT.

A. D. 871. THOUGH Ethelred left ſeveral children, yet Alfred was placed on the throne of his anceſtors. The voice of the people, the diſtreſſed ſituation of the kingdom, and the teſtament of Ethelwolf, all conſpired in calling this prince to the exerciſe of royalty. He was only twenty-two years of age when his brother Ethelred paid the debt of nature; but had given ſo many convincing proofs of his valour, and the genuine goodneſs of his heart, that, perhaps, no prince ever aſcended the throne with more happy preſages of being the darling of his people; but he was ſurrounded with difficulties, and expoſed, on every ſide, to the moſt imminent dangers. Nothing leſs than a genius and abilities equal to his own could have been ſufficient to have reſtored ſtability to the throne, and happineſs to his ſubjects. Which ever way he turned, the proſpect was diſmal; a few gleams of hope only cheered the dreary gloom. The cities and religious ſtructures were levelled in the duſt; the farms were deſtroyed; agriculture was neglected; and the dejected peaſant pined for want of bread, in the midſt of fields that lately waved with all the beauties of a golden harveſt. He wanted ſubjects to recruit his armies; many of them had periſhed by the ſword and famine: ſome, diſpirited by the toils of war, had ſubmitted to the yoke of ſlavery; and others had fled to the mountains and foreſts for protection againſt a rude and barbarous enemy.

Alfred alone viewed this ſcene of complicated diſtreſs with unſhaken firmneſs; his ſoul ſeemed ſuperior to misfortunes. His penetrating genius pointed out reſources, which ſupported him in this alarming criſis. He did not deſpair of ſurmounting every difficulty, and of changing this ſcene of melancholy dejection into happineſs and joy. The firmneſs of the monarch revived the drooping ſpirits of the ſubject. The ſoldiers caught the noble infection; they promiſed themſelves, that under ſo able and intrepid a leader, they ſhould attack the brutal enemy with ſucceſs; that victory would follow the ſtandards of Alfred.

Secure of the affections of his people, and the unſhaken confidence of the army, Alfred applied himſelf, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to correct every abuſe which had crept into the civil adminiſtration; and revive among his troops that diſcipline which always leads to conqueſt, and without which the moſt numerous armies would attempt it in vain. He knew that great difficulties could only be ſurmounted by great efforts; and that the utmoſt activity is neceſſary to prevent the moſt alarming miſfortunes. He purſued theſe maxims, and ſucceeded; and left an example to poſterity, that if the natural ſtrength of the iſland be properly exerted, Britain has nothing to fear from the attempts of a foreign enemy.

The ravages committed by the Danes called his attention from the affairs of government to the field. It is a misfortune to ſociety, and to mankind, that it is the indiſpenſible duty of great and enlightened princes to engage in war. Awakened by the cruelties of the barbarians, Alfred took the field at the head of a ſmall body of forces, and engaged the Daniſh army at Wilton. The action was ſevere, and the enemy were obliged to retreat; but gaining an eminence near the field of battle, and perceiving that Alfred's army was far inferior to their own in numbers, they returned to the charge, and Alfred was obliged, in his turn, to retreat. The Engliſh, however, were far from being intimidated: they were perſuaded, that, under the banners of Alfred, they ſhould at laſt conquer; they ſaw the power of the enemy was much ſuperior to their own, and imputed the advantage they at firſt gained, and even their being able to face ſo numerous an army, entirely to the good conduct and intrepidity of their beloved monarch.

Alfred ſoon perceived, that it would be impoſſible to conquer an enemy whoſe armies were continually reinforced with freſh troops; and therefore wiſely applied himſelf to prevent, if poſſible, this perpetual inundation of barbarians. He fitted out a fleet of ſhips, in order to guard the coaſt. The advantages reſulting from this prudent meaſure were ſoon apparent: Alfred's ſquadron defeated a Daniſh fleet, took one of their ſhips, and obliged the reſt to retire.

A. D. 876. Halfden, one of the Daniſh kings, ſurpriſed Wareham-caſtle, the ſtrongeſt fortreſs in Weſſex. Alfred immediately marched againſt them; and Halfden, not thinking it prudent to engage the Engliſh, ſued for peace, and offered to give hoſtages for the faithful obſervance of the treaty. Alfred liſtened to his propoſals; a treaty was concluded, by which the Danes engaged to quit the kingdom. Alfred, that he might engage them not to break their oaths, leſt heaven ſhould puniſh their impiety, made them ſwear to obſerve the treaty on the holy relicks, and alſo on a bracelet, which they conſidered as ſacred. But it was in vain to expect, that men who had never ſubmitted to laws, ſhould pay any regard to an oath: the precaution of Alfred had no effect on the barbarians: they ſwore to obſerve the treaty, and broke it immediately. They continued quiet, indeed, for two or three months, and ſeemed to make preparations for their departure; but waited only for an opportunity of attacking his army to advantage. It was not long before the fortunate moment arrived. The Britiſh cavalry, confiding in the faith of the barbarians, diſperſed themſelves into ſmall parties, in order to procure forage with more facility. The Danes perceived it; and iſſuing from their camp in the night, attacked the parties of cavalry, ſeized their horſes, and mounting their own men, fled to Exeter. The ſudden and unexpected appearance of the enemy ſtruck the inhabitants with deſpair: they flew to arms, but it was too late; the Danes entered the city without oppoſition, increaſed the fortifications, and there took up their winter quarters.

A. D. 877. Convinced that no treaty made with an enemy, who trampled upon all the laws of juſtice, could be binding, and that force only could bring them to reaſon; Alfred applied himſelf to put his navy on a more reſpectable footing, in order, if poſſible, to deſtroy their naval force. A formidable fleet was ſoon fitted out, and ſailed immediately to block up Exeter by ſea, while Alfred attacked the city by land. In their paſſage to Exeter, the Engliſh ſquadron fell in with the grand fleet of the Danes, conſiſting of one hundred and twenty ſail, and having on board a ſtrong reinforcement for Halfden's army. A furious fight enſued, in which the Daniſh fleet was totally deſtroyed.

Terrified at the loſs of their ſquadron, the Danes had again recourſe to negotiation: they renewed their oaths; they gave freſh hoſtages; and engaged to quit the iſland immediately. Alfred had now learned caution from experience: he concluded a treaty with them, but would not ſuffer them to remove from Exeter, till they embarked for their own country.

Soon after their departure, the fleet of the famous Rollo appeared on the Engliſh coaſts. He expected no oppoſition, and was aſtoniſhed when the fleet of Alfred approached. The engagement which enſued convinced him that the attempt would be attended with danger, and thought it not prudent to make the experiment: he ſtood over to the French ſhore, and made himſelf maſter of Normandy.

Another army of the Danes had, ſome time, before, made themſelves maſters of Mercia, and driven Burhead from his throne, who fled to Rome, and took ſhelter in a cloyſter. That prince was the laſt that bore the title of king of Mercia. Alfred gave him no diſturbance; he obſerved religiouſly the terms of his treaties. The barbarians, however, were not charmed with this rigorous obſervance of public faith; the laws of virtue were unknown to the Danes. The country they had conquered was very fruitful, and, by a little aſſiſtance from agriculture, would have ſupplied them with every thing neceſſary to render life agreeable; but they had been ſo long uſed to rapine, that they deſpiſed every other employment: they had been nurſed in the lap of violence, and early initiated into the practice of brutal cruelty. From ſuch an enemy nothing but perfidy could be expected. While Alfred's fleet guarded the coaſt, they remained quiet; but, on the landing of a new reinforcement, they joined their countrymen, and immediately renewed their dreadful ravages. Oppoſition was now in vain; their numbers were ſo greatly increaſed, that it would have been temerity to have met them in the open field. Aſtoniſhed and intimidated at this inundation of barbarians, the Engliſh abandoned their habitations, and ſought their ſafety in a ſpeedy flight. Some paſſed over to the continent, and others took up their reſidence in mountains and foreſts. Alfred alone continued ſuperior to misfortunes: he laid aſide the enſigns of royalty, but he was ſtill the father of his people. He diſmiſſed his attendants; and, in the diſguiſe of a peaſant, concealed himſelf in the cottage of a cow-herd, whoſe wife put his patience to the ſevereſt trial, by requiring his aſſiſtance in her domeſtic affairs. He had not continued long in this humiliating retreat, before he found an opportunity of collecting a number of his friends; and with theſe he retired to an inacceſſible moraſs in Somerſetſhire, formed by the waters of the Parret and Thone. In the center of this moraſs he built a fortreſs, and often ſallied out upon the barbarians, who felt the vigour of his arm, but knew not from what quarter they received the blow. They never ſuſpected that Alfred was ſo near their camp; they were perſuaded he had fallen among the ſlain.

A fortunate event drew Alfred from his retreat. Hubba, a Daniſh prince, having landed at the mouth of the Taw, in Devonſhire, laid ſiege to the fortreſs of Kenwith. Odun, earl of Devonſhire, at the head of twelve hundred men, advanced towards the barbarians. A battle enſued, when Hubba was totally defeated, and Odun took the famous magical ſtandard of the Danes. This ſtandard was called Reafan, from its having the figure of a raven embroidered upon it, by the three ſiſters of Hubba. Magical incantations had alſo been uſed to render it proſperous; and the Danes, fully perſuaded, that the army, where it was diſplayed, would be invincible, aſcribed to it a miraculous virtue. Alfred now perceived a gleam of hope, and determined to take the advantage that offered. The camp of the enemy was at no great diſtance, and Alfred was deſirous of diſcovering what diſcipline they obſerved in this period of ſecurity. He took the diſguiſe of a harper; and penetrating into their camp, entertained them ſo highly with his muſic and facetious humour, that he was introduced into their general's tent, where he continued ſeveral days, and even gained the favour of that ferocious leader. Alfred, though his time ſeemed to be wholly devoted to mirth, did not forget the intention of his viſit: he obſerved their ſupine negligence and ſecurity; riot had uſurped the place of order, and diſcipline was loſt in intemperance.

Animated by theſe diſcoveries, he returned to his friends, and raiſed their drooping ſpirits with the hopes of an eaſy and certain victory. Diſpatches were immediately ſent to the moſt conſiderable of his ſubjects with this favourable intelligence, ordering them to aſſemble all their forces, and rendezvous at Brixton, in the foreſt of Sherwood. He was readily obeyed; the hopes of meeting their king, whom they had long regarded as dead, revived their hopes; the dangers of war now appeared far leſs terrible than the dominion of the Danes. The ravages of the barbarians had rouſed them to vengeance; they were deſirous of retaliating the cruelties they had ſuffered on the brutal invaders of their country. Alfred drew a favourable preſage from the alacrity of his ſubjects, who flocked to the ſtandard of a king they adored, and led them immediately againſt the enemy.

The Danes had advanced to Yatenden, on the borders of Hampſhire, in a confuſed, irregular manner: they dreaded no oppoſition; they imagined they had no enemy to fear. Aſtoniſhed and confounded when attacked by the Engliſh, their oppoſition was feeble; they were terrified at the name of Alfred, and ſought their ſafety in flight. A fortreſs was near, and thither they fled for ſhelter. Alfred ſurrounded their retreat, and famine ſoon forced them to ſurrender. Lenity ſtill glowed in the breaſt of Alfred; he could not be cruel, even to an enemy that had ruined his country. Perſuaded that the practice of agriculture would ſoon give them a diſtaſte to pillage and rapine, eſpecially if they became converts to the doctrines of the goſpel, he offered to eſtabliſh them in Eaſt-Anglia and Northumberland, which they had depopulated, provided they would undertake to defend thoſe countries againſt any future enterprizes of their countrymen, and alſo embrace the tenets of chriſtianity. The conditions were joyfully accepted: they had little religion of their own; and, when their intereſt pleaded, they had no objection to be Chriſtians. The event juſtified the policy of Alfred. Guthrun, the Daniſh chief, with thirty of his principal officers, were immediately baptized: Alfred was ſponſor, and gave Guthrun the name of Athelſtan.

This change of religion had the expected effect on the conduct of the Dane; he contracted a much greater regard for the ſacred nature of an oath: he poliſhed the ferocious manners of his countrymen. They had now a more tender regard for the lives of their hoſtages. They admired the abilities and virtues of Alfred, and ſeemed to have abandoned their former brutality with their former religion. Houſes were erected in the country aſſigned them; the lands were cultivated; virtue and induſtry were encouraged; and Alfred preſented the Daniſh chief with a ſhort code of laws for the government of his ſubjects.

A. D. 880. Ever attentive to the happineſs of his ſubjects, Alfred employed this interval of tranquillity in reſtoring order in the ſtate, and in eſtabliſhing meaſures which tended to prevent a return of ſimilar calamities. He had ſeen the effect produced by his navy, and applied himſelf to augment its force. At the ſame time, he took every precaution to prevent any miſunderſtanding between his Engliſh and Daniſh ſubjects. He governed them by equal laws; he made no difference between them in the adminiſtration of civil or criminal juſtice: an injury committed on a Dane was puniſhed with the ſame ſeverity as if the ſufferer had been an Engliſhman; the ſatisfaction, the fine was the ſame. The country again wore the aſpect of plenty; the fields again waved with golden harveſts: the cities were rebuilt; and London once more became rich and opulent; commerce again took ſanctuary within her walls.

Alfred had experienced the difficulties that attended the raiſing of an army on any ſudden emergency: to this principally he attributed all the miſeries ſuffered by his people. He therefore formed a regular and formidable militia for the defence of the nation. Every perſon in the kingdom, capable of bearing arms, was obliged to do military duty in his turn: ſtrong bodies of forces were thus always in readineſs to act againſt the common enemy. Part of theſe were ſtationed in garriſons; others were encamped in different parts of the kingdom; and others employed in cultivating the land, till an appearance of an enemy called them to arms. The kingdom was by theſe wiſe regulations always capable of oppoſing any invaſion; the fields were properly tilled; no individual had a right to complain that his burden was heavier than that of his neighbour. Content appeared in every countenance: the late interval of ſorrow was changed into an interval of joy.

But among all the eſtabliſhments of Alfred, thoſe relating to his navy were the moſt uſeful and advantageous. The very ſituation of the country, its being an iſland, pointed out a maritime force; though it had hitherto been unaccountably neglected. Alfred ſaw its neceſſity; he was convinced that while the Engliſh are maſters of the ſea, they have nothing to fear from the attempts of a foreign enemy. He ſtationed one hundred and thirty veſſels of war at proper diſtances along the coaſt. He inſtructed his ſubjects in the art of navigation; and invited the moſt expert ſeamen from different nations to ſerve in his marine. The cruiſes of the pirates, ſo injurious to trade, now received a ſevere check; they hardly dared to venture out of their harbours.

Nor did he neglect to put the ſea coaſt into a proper ſtate of defence. He built caſtles and fortreſſes in places moſt expoſed to the attempts of an enemy. They were well garriſoned, and furniſhed with every requiſite for making a noble defence. Beacons were erected on the ſummits of the moſt conſpicuous hills, and in the moſt proper places for ſpreading an alarm. Wherever any enemy appeared, the beacons were lighted, and a proper number of diſciplined forces, under the lieuteuant of the county, were ready for immediate action.

A. D. 892. By theſe wiſe meaſures and precautions, Alfred had, in appearance, ſecured the tranquillity of his kingdom, when Haſtings, a celebrated Daniſh pirate, after ravaging great part of France, made preparations for invading England. He was no ſtranger to the great abilities of Alfred; and well knew that the wiſeſt precautions had been taken to render any attempt of that kind abortive. But he perſevered in his deſign; not to make ſettlements, but to enrich himſelf with the ſpoils of a trading people. He fitted out three hundred ſail of ſhips, and embarking all his forces, ſtood over to the Engliſh coaſt. This powerful fleet was divided into two ſquadrons, one of which, conſiſting of two hundred and twenty ſail, entered the harbour of Rye in Suſſex, where they landed their forces, and ſeized the caſtle of Appledore. The other, commanded by Haſtings himſelf, entered the mouth of the Thames, and landed at Milton, where the Danes threw up an intrenchment. They afterwards erected a caſtle at Middleton, and another at Beamfleet. The dreadful ravages which had ceaſed for ſeveral years, were now again commenced; and an emulation ſeemed to exiſt between the two chiefs, who ſhould excel in acts of outrage and cruelty: the country was again filled with blood and ſlaughter.

A. D. 893. Theſe acts of barbarity augmented the glory of Alfred. That prince was in Eaſt-Anglia, employed in ſettling the affairs of that province, Guthrun having lately paid the debt of nature, when Haſtings landed his forces. On the firſt information of this deſcent, Alfred flew to the defence of his people, and marched immediately to attack the armies of the enemy. The advance of Alfred was terrible to the Danes. The party from Appledore, had carried deſtruction through the counties of Suſſex and Surry, and were now returning to their fleet loaded with plunder. Alfred met this powerful band of lawleſs pillagers at Farnham, where he attacked them with the utmoſt fury, obtained a complete victory, and took all their baggage. The few that eſcaped the ſlaughter fled to their ſhips, ſailed up the Colne, and fortified themſelves at Brickelſey in Eſſex.

A. D. 894. This victory would have put an end to the ravages of the Danes, had not their perfidious countrymen, who had received ſo many marks of kindneſs from Alfred, taken up arms in favour of the invaders. Regardleſs of oaths, and ſtrangers to gratitude, the Danes of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia renounced their allegiance, fitted out a numerous fleet, and landing in Devonſhire, beſieged the city of Exeter. Alfred marched with the utmoſt expedition to the relief of the inhabitants, and arrived in the neighbourhood, when the inſurgents imagined he was employed in the eaſtern parts of the kingdom. The approach of Alfred ſtruck them with terror; they immediately embarked, and joined Haſtings at Beamfleet. Encouraged by this powerful reinforcement, the pirate extended his ravages into Mercia, waſting the country through which he paſſed. Alfred had left a ſtrong body of troops in London, for the ſecurity of that city: theſe were not idle. They took advantage of the abſence of Haſtings, attacked his fort at Beamfleet, and carried it by ſtorm. The plunder of many ſucceſsful cruiſes, during a courſe of ſeveral years, were depoſited in this fortreſs. The conquerors returned loaded with riches, and among the priſoners were the wife and two ſons of Haſtings. Theſe were ſent to Alfred, who generouſly returned them to the pirate, with this remarkable meſſage, “That he did not make war upon women and chriſtians.” Struck with the noble generoſity of Alfred, and terrified by the power of his arms, Haſtings ſued for peace; which was granted him, on condition of his immediately departing the kingdom. Haſtings accepted the ſtipulation; but obſerved it no longer than ſuited his own intereſt: he embarked his forces, and joined his countrymen on the other ſide of the Thames. But the vigour and alacrity of Alfred, rendered all their attempts abortive; they were driven from one end of the kingdom to the other; and expoſed to the miſeries of famine. At laſt, in deſpair, they forced a paſſage to their ſhips, and abandoned the iſland, without being able to carry with them any part of the plunder they had wreſted from the inhabitants.

A. D. 896. Alfred found no difficulty in reducing the Danes of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia to their duty, after the departure of the pirates. But he was deſirous of eſtabliſhing a laſting tranquillity in his country. He had long perceived that peace was incompatible in a kingdom divided into petty ſtates, and governed by feudatory princes. He wiſely aboliſhed that form of government, and took the people under his immediate authority and adminiſtration. The Welſh, who had hitherto preſerved their independence, acknowledged the authority of Alfred. Peace was again eſtabliſhed in the iſland, and the great genius of Alfred was once more at liberty to purſue the wiſeſt meaſures for promoting the happineſs of his people.

Nothing leſs than the prodigious talents of Alfred were equal to the amazing taſk of reſtoring government and order in a kingdom reduced to the moſt dreadful ſtate of anarchy and confuſion. The laſt ravages of the Danes had obliterated all order and ſubordination. The people were reduced to ſuch a ſtate of miſery and want, that they were obliged to procure a wretched ſubſiſtence by committing the greateſt crimes. The whole country was infeſted with bands of robbers, whoſe dreadful incurſions rendered all property precarious; nor were the lives of the inhabitants ſafe from their rapacious attempts. The execution of a very ſevere juſtice only could put an end to thoſe alarming enormities, and eſtabliſh order in the ſtate. Alfred ſaw all the difficulties, but was not intimidated: he applied himſelf to regulate theſe crying abuſes, and he could not confer a greater favour on his people. He began with dividing the kingdom into counties; theſe he ſubdivided into hundreds, and the hundreds into tythings. By this regulation every man in the kingdom became a member of ſome tything; the houſholders became mutual pledges for one another; and each was anſwerable for his children, his ſervants, and his gueſts. Every youth, at the age of fourteen, was obliged to regiſter himſelf in ſome tything, when all the houſeholders immediately became anſwerable for his conduct. Nor could any perſon change his habitation, without a certificate from the head of the tything to which he belonged. As the tything was anſwerable for the conduct of each individual, ſo the hundred was anſwerable for the different tythings, and the county for its different hundreds. The county, the hundred, and the tything, had each its particular court. The aldermen, biſhop, and ſheriff, preſided in the firſt, the conſtable in the ſecond, and the tythingman in the third. By theſe admirable inſtitutions, rendered abſolutely neceſſary by the circumſtances of the times, every houſholder was obliged to watch over the actions of his neighbour; nor could any crime be long concealed, or long unpuniſhed. Smaller injuries were puniſhed in the tything court, but the larger were heard in that of the hundred. Twelve freeholders were choſen, who, upon oath, enquired into the crime of the accuſed, and he was either condemned or acquitted, according as they thought him guilty or innocent. This was the origin of juries, who ſtill determine all civil and criminal matters in the Engliſh courts. Perhaps it is not poſſible to deviſe an inſtitution better calculated to ſecure the liberty of the ſubject, or the equal diſpenſation of juſtice.

But the people had ſtill a greater confidence in the impartiality and integrity of their king, than in a jury of their neighbours. They perpetually appealed to him from the ſentence of the inferior courts. Alfred ſuſpected that the judges wanted either abilities or honeſty in their proceedings, and was determined to remove the complaint. He took particular care that his nobles and judges ſhould be well acquainted with the laws of their country; and, that none might plead ignorance, he formed a new code, which ſerved at once to inſtruct and direct his magiſtrates. This body of laws is now unhappily loſt, but is ſtill regarded as the foundation of the common law of England. It muſt, however, be remembered, that Alfred was not the ſole author of this code of laws; he collected them from the ſcripture, from the laws of Ina, Offa, Ethelbert, and the cuſtoms of the various nations that inhabited Britain; but in many places he reformed and extended previous inſtitutions. A body of new laws would have been dangerous to the peace of the kingdom.

But it was not enough to procure a body of excellent laws; it was neceſſary alſo to put them ſtrictly in execution. Alfred was equally diligent in this particular: he examined very ſtrictly the conduct of all his miniſters and judges, reviſed their deciſions, and ſeverely puniſhed all who were guilty of partiality. By purſuing theſe prudent meaſures, all violences and oppreſſions were baniſhed from a country where they had ſo long reſided. Robberies were no longer feared: a breach of the peace, a public offence, or a private injury, were almoſt unknown. He ordered gold bracelets to be ſuſpended in the highways, and no man ventured to take them down; and if a purſe of money was dropped on the road, no perſon dared to touch it but the owner. Nor was Alfred leſs attentive to the liberty of his people than to the execution of juſtice. He ordered that the ſtates of the kingdom, or general aſſembly of the nation, ſhould meet twice a year in London; and that the members ſhould owe their admiſſion to their own quality or virtue, independent of the king's pleaſure. He never invaded, he never wiſhed to invade the rights of his people. And we find in his teſtament this remarkable expreſſion, "That it was "juſt the Engliſh ſhould for ever remain as free as "their own thoughts."

It is, perhaps, impoſſible to reform and poliſh the manners of a rude, ferocious people, without the aſſiſtance of literature. Alfred was not to learn this truth: he knew that the rays of learning would diſpel the gloomy night of Gothic ignorance, at once the parent of vice and ſuperſtition; and therefore neglected not this noble object, whoſe advantage he well knew from his own experience. The education of Alfred had been greatly neglected, through the indulgent tenderneſs of his father. His mind had not received the leaſt tincture of knowledge when he had attained his twelfth year. His genius was firſt awakened by the peruſal of ſome Saxon poems, but they had no tendency to improve his mind. The Latin language opened to him inexhauſtible ſources of inſtruction and improvement; and the early taſte he diſcovered for works calculated at once to inform his underſtanding, and inſpire him with the noble ſentiments of honour and virtue, prognoſticated his future greatneſs. The whole kingdom was involved in a dreadful night of ignorance. There was hardly a perſon in the iſland that underſtood the Latin ſervice; many of the prieſts could not even read with propriety. Alfred laboured inceſſantly to diſpel this darkneſs. He erected ſchools in various parts of the kingdom; and obliged all freeholders, who poſſeſſed two hides of land, to keep their ſons at theſe ſeminaries till they reached their ſixteenth year. He invited learned men from every part of the continent. He founded, or at leaſt rebuilt, the univerſity of Oxford. Perſons of merit and learning only were appointed to offices of truſt; the ignorant and indolent gained not the favour of Alfred. His own example was a powerful incentive to the induſtry of his ſubjects; a noble emulation was excited, and emulation is the parent of improvement. He divided the natural day into three equal parts; and meaſured the time by burning wax-tapers, of equal lengths, in lanthorns. The keeper of his chapel had the care of theſe tapers; and it was his buſineſs to give him notice of every hour. The firſt of theſe portions of time was devoted to ſtudy, and acts of piety; the ſecond to the diſpatch of buſineſs; and the third to the relaxation and refreſhment of his body. By thus huſbanding every moment of his time, he became one of the moſt learned perſons of his time. He underſtood the Latin perfectly; and tranſlated the fables of Æſop, the hiſtory of Bede, and ſeveral other works, for the uſe of his ſubjects. He underſtood architecture and muſic, and was the beſt mathematician of that age. He compoſed ſeveral fables, parables, and ſhort poems, in the Saxon language, adapted to the capacities of a rude and ferocious people. How unjuſtly do we complain of our want of time to purſue the paths of knowledge! Alfred, who was afflicted with many bodily infirmities; who, during the greater part of his life, was ſurrounded with enemies, had fought thirty-ſix battles in perſon, and omitted nothing that had a tendency to increaſe the happineſs of his people, was maſter of every ſpecies of learning then cultivated. The fact is aſtoniſhing; we are but little acquainted with the powers of the human mind, when fully exerted.

The ſame œconomy prevailed with regard to the public revenues. Alfred divided theſe into two parts; one he dedicated to ſacred, and the other to civil uſes. The former he ſubdivided into four parts; the firſt was diſpenſed to the poor in general; the ſecond to the ſupport of religious houſes founded by himſelf; the third to the public ſchools; and the fourth to the building and repairing churches, monaſteries, and other public foundations. The moiety devoted to civil uſes was ſubdivided into three parts; the firſt was deſtined to the ſupport of his houſhold; the ſecond to the payment of his workmen; and the third to the entertainment and relief of ſtrangers who reſorted to his court.

The happineſs and advantage of his ſubjects formed one of the principal cares of Alfred. His court was the reſort of all who were eminent in their profeſſion; and Alfred omitted not this opportunity of enriching his country with all the improvements made in various countries. Agriculture, navigation and commerce, engaged his attention. He lent both ſhips and money to merchants of character, many of whom extended the trade of their country to Alexandria, and imported from thence the rich commodities of the Indies.

In private life he was great and amiable. His temper was even; his diſpoſition chearful; his converſation agreeable. He was temperate, charitable, beneficent, and generous; at once the prince and father of his people; poſſeſſed of every talent, of every acquiſition that adorns the human mind; without one vice to ſully the luſtre of his virtues. No prince had ever a better title to the ſurname of Great.

A. D. 900. He died on the ſixth of October, in the fifty-ſecond year of his age, and the thirtieth of his reign; leaving the nation to lament his death. The tears of a grateful people watered the tomb of Alfred. He left five children, two ſons, and three daughters; who all inherited a conſiderable ſhare of their father's talents and virtues.

EDWARD THE ELDER.

A. D. 900. EDWARD, who aſcended the throne on the death of his father Alfred, obtained the ſurname of Elder from his being the firſt prince of that name who held the Engliſh ſceptre. The Danes were in poſſeſſion of the kingdoms of Northumberland and Eaſt-Anglia, and had continued quiet during the latter end of Alfred's reign; they were afraid to provoke a prince of his abilities. But when Alfred paid the debt of nature, they formed a deſign for ſhaking off the yoke of ſervitude, and rendering themſelves independent of the Engliſh crown. They were perſuaded that Edward was not poſſeſſed of the great talents of his father, and that a fair opportunity now offered for breaking the ſhackles of obedience, and, perhaps, of becoming maſters of the whole iſland. Edward, doubtleſs, appeared to great diſadvantage, after ſo illuſtrious a father; but he was far from being unable to wield the ſceptre with honour to himſelf, and advantage to his people. He was, indeed, inferior to Alfred in capacity and knowledge; but he equalled him in military ſkill and conduct. The Danes were, however, fearful of the event; and, under a pretence of ſubmitting chearfully to the government, continued quiet in their territories, till an unforeſeen event called them to action.

A. D. 901. Ethelwald, the eldeſt ſon of Ethelbert, laid claim to the throne of his father. The Danes ſupported his pretenſions; and theſe barbarous people, who ſtill retained their native ferocity, ſent out bands of robbers, who laid waſte the country through which they paſſed. How feeble are the foundations of the wiſeſt ſyſtems of government, till the minds of the people are reclaimed from their vices, and are acquainted with the principles of religion and virtue! Inveterate evils muſt be deſtroyed by degrees; a conſiderable length of time is neceſſary to change the diſpoſitions of the human heart.

Ethelwald, at the head of a Daniſh army, made himſelf maſter of Wimborn, in Dorſetſhire, and Chriſtchurch, in Hampſhire; but, on the approach of Edward, he abandoned his conqueſts, and fled to Normandy, from whence he was afterwards conveyed to Northumberland, and acknowledged king of all the Daniſh territories in Britain. Edward, who followed the example of his father in giving the enemy no time for preparations, marched directly into Northumberland, reducing all the towns that lay near his route, and laying the whole country waſte. Aſtoniſhed at the expedition of Edward, and finding themſelves in no condition to defend their territories againſt the victorious army of Edward, they baniſhed from their kingdom the prince they had undertaken to protect, and ſubmitted entirely to the clemency of the conqueror.

A. D. 904. Deprived of a ſceptre he had hardly received, Ethelwald again returned to Normandy, where he ſollicited and obtained aſſiſtance. He immediately embarked his forces, and landed in Eaſt-Anglia. The Danes laid aſide their fears at the appearance of a Norman army, and declared openly for Ethelwald. But the abilities and alacrity of Edward rendered all his attempts abortive. He marched, indeed, into Glouceſter, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages on the peaceable inhabitants; but was obliged to fly into Eaſt-Anglia on the approach of the Engliſh army. Edward carried his arms into the enemy's country, and laid the frontiers waſte; but thinking it would be imprudent to penetrate into the heart of Eaſt-Anglia, retreated at the head of the main body of his army. A conſiderable body of Kentiſh forces, either to revenge themſelves on the perfidious Danes, or to acquire a larger ſhare of plunder, did not follow Edward, notwithſtanding repeated orders for that purpoſe. Ethelwald perceived the imprudence of the Kentiſh forces, and reſolved to take advantage of their temerity: they were accordingly ſurrounded, and cut to pieces. But the advantage was purchaſed too dear; both Ethelwald and Eric, the Daniſh leader, fell in the action.

A. D. 911. But the death of this pretender to the crown eſtabliſhed not the public tranquillity. The Danes continued their ravages, and the country again became a ſcene of miſery and diſtreſs. Exaſperated at the cruelty and perfidious behaviour of the Danes, Edward led his army againſt the inſurgents, totally defeated them, recovered all the booty they had taken, and ſuffered his army to lay waſte the country of theſe reſtleſs infringers of domeſtic peace.

Edward was nobly aſſiſted in his wars by Elfleda, his ſiſter: her maſculine ſpirit greatly contributed to his ſucceſs. This intrepid princeſs diſdained the occupations of her ſex, as unworthy of her care; the happineſs and peace of her country engaged her attention, and ſhe ſucceſsfully laboured to procure the one and eſtabliſh the other. Her prudence and virtue were equal to her courage; ſhe ſeemed to poſſeſs the ſoul of her father Alfred.

A. D. 913. Having, by the aſſiſtance of his heroic ſiſter, procured an interval of tranquillity, Edward applied himſelf to works of public utility, and the encouragement of learning. He rebuilt the city of Hereford, which the Danes had laid in aſhes; fortified Witham; repaired ſeveral churches and monaſteries; and erected the ſeminary of Cambridge into an univerſity.

A. D. 917. But this interval of peace was terminated too ſoon. Ever reſtleſs, and ever perfidious, the Danes again began their inroads. They delighted in a deſultory war; their ferocious ſouls rejoiced in cruelty; the unſettled occupation of a robber was more agreeable to the brutality of their nature than the placid labours of domeſtic life. Defeat ſucceeded defeat: in one part of the kingdom the inſurgents were cut to pieces by Elfleda, and routed by Edward in another. But they ſtill continued their depredations: an inſatiable love of plunder induced others to follow their example, though common prudence might have told them, that the ſame crimes would undoubtedly occaſion the ſame puniſhments.

A. D. 918. Theſe ſmall incurſions were, however, nothing more than a prelude to much greater misfortunes. A ſtorm was gathering which required all the abilities of Edward and his intrepid ſiſter to break its force. The Danes in Britany were now ſo prodigiouſly increaſed, that the country was unable to ſubſiſt them: an emigration became abſolutely neceſſary. A numerous body under the command of Otar and Rohault, embarked from the ſouthern coaſt of Britany, entered the mouth of the Severn, and ravaged the country both on the Welſh and Engliſh ſides of the river. Encouraged by their firſt ſucceſs, they extended their incurſions as far as Erchenfield, laying the whole country waſte. Alarmed at their danger, and exaſperated at the cruelties of the enemy, the inhabitants joined the forces of Edward, and marched againſt the invaders. A battle enſued, in which the Danes were totally defeated, and all the ſpoil they had taken fell into the hands of the conquerors. Rohault and a brother of Otar were ſlain in the action; and the fugitives obliged to take ſhelter in a wood, which was immediately inveſted by the Engliſh. The invaders had now no other method than that of negotiation to avoid inevitable deſtruction. They ſued for peace, and offered hoſtages for the performance of the conditions of the treaty, and promiſed to depart the kingdom immediately. But no promiſes, no treaties, no hoſtages, have power to bind barbarians, who live by plunder, and continually trample upon the laws of virtue and humanity. They embarked, indeed, and ſailed from the mouth of the Severn, but they landed again on the coaſt of Somerſetſhire, and again fell to plundering the country. They did not, however, long continue their depredations before they were attacked by the militia of the county, who put the greater part of them to the ſword, and the few that eſcaped fled to Ireland.

A. D. 920. But Edward ſoon perceived that the Danes were not the only enemies he had to fear. Leofrid the Dane, who was ſettled in Ireland, aſſiſted by Griffith ap Madoc, brother to the prince of Weſt Wales, landed on the coaſt, and penetrated as far as Cheſter. Edward flew at the head of a few forces to the defence of his people, and met the invaders at Sherwood, where a deſperate battle enſued. During the action Leofrid encountered hand to hand with Edward, and the conteſt continued equal for ſome time, till Edward in giving the Dane a violent blow, broke his ſword at the hilt, and he muſt have fallen a victim to Leofrid had not his ſon Athelſtan flew to his aſſiſtance. That prince was more fortunate than his father; he wounded Leofrid ſo deſperately in the arm, that he dropped his ſpear, and ſurrendered himſelf a priſoner. The forces of the enemy were totally defeated, and forced to abandon the kingdom.

A. D. 921. A general inſurrection of the Danes now threatened the Engliſh with all the horrors of ſavage barbarity. But the activity of Edward baffled all their deſigns; they were defeated in every attempt, and forced to abandon every enterprize. They were driven from one part of the country to another: their caſtles were taken, and their towns laid in aſhes; they felt the ſame diſtreſs they had ſo often inflicted upon the Engliſh. Submiſſion now became their only reſource: they accordingly laid down their arms, and readily embraced the terms offered by the victor. Edward, who knew from experience, how little confidence could be placed in the promiſes and oaths of the Danes, applied himſelf to render his conqueſts laſting, by fortifying ſeveral towns, and erecting caſtles in various parts of the kingdom. He even carried his arms beyond the former limits of his territories, and the princes of the Cumbrian and Strathcluyd Britons ſubmitted to his government. The Scots alſo ſued for peace, and their king conſented to hold his dominions in vaſſalage of the Engliſh crown.

A. D. 925. Edward had now attained the ſummit of human glory. He ſaw tranquillity eſtabliſhed in every part of his dominious. He ſaw his ſubjects happy under his government, and cultivating with the utmoſt aſſiduity, the arts of peace. But how ſhort are the periods of human felicity! Edward had hardly ſubdued his enemies, and terminated the calamities of war, when death put a period to his life in the twenty-ſixth year of his ~~age~~. Reign

Edward was a worthy ſucceſſor to his father: he imitated his conduct; he imitated his virtues. He was reſpected by his neighbours; and the ferocious Danes revered his abilities. Intrepid, vigilant and cautious, he was dreaded by his enemies; he never loſt a battle. Kind, generous and humane, he was beloved by his people; he laboured for their happineſs. He was an enemy to injuſtice; an implacable ſcourge to the ſons of rapine and violence. He was a friend to learning, and encouraged it to the utmoſt of his power; perſons of merit were ſure to meet with protection and encouragement at his court. His people revered his virtues while he lived, and watered his grave with the tears of affection.

ATHELSTAN.

A. D. 925. ATHELSTAN ſucceeded his father in the throne, by the unanimous voice of the people. A conſpiracy was, however, formed to wreſt the ſceptre from his hand, before he was fixed in the ſeat of power. Alfred, a nobleman of conſiderable authority, was at the head of this faction. But before the deſign was ripe for execution, the ſecret was diſcovered, and Alfred ſent to priſon. Strong ſuſpicions of guilt only appeared againſt the incendiary; no direct proof could be produced. Alfred reſolutely denied the charge, and offered to prove his innocence by an oath before the pope. In theſe times of ſuperſtitious bigotry it was thought, that ſuch a perjury could not eſcape the vengeance of heaven: the offer was therefore accepted, Alfred repaired to Rome, and the oath was adminiſtered by John X. who then filled the papal chair; but Alfred was immediately ſeized with violent convulſions, and in a few days after expired in the greateſt agonies. Whatever might be the cauſe of this tragical event, which bears a very ſuſpicious aſpect, the conſpirator was conſidered as guilty; Athelſtan confiſcated his eſtate, and gave it to the monaſtery of Malmſbury.

But the danger of the conſpiracy of Alfred did not terminate with his death. Perſuaded that a ſtrong party was formed againſt Athelſtan, the Danes of Northumberland revolted: they hoped to be joined by a powerful faction, and enabled to regain their independence. They penetrated as far as the city of York. Their army was led by their two chiefs Sithric and Inguald; and for ſome time ſucceſs followed their ſtandards. But Athelſtan marched with ſuch expedition, that the inſurgents were ſurprized, and Sithric was obliged to ſue for peace, which was granted. Athelſtan, who perceived that it would be impoſſible to eſtabliſh a laſting peace with the Danes in Northumberland, imagined, that by attaching Sithric firmly to his intereſt, an union might be effected between the two people. He therefore made Sithric king of Northumberland, and gave him his ſiſter Edgitha in marriage. This political ſtratagem might poſſibly have been attended with very happy effects, had not an unforeſeen event rendered the ſcheme abortive. Sithric unfortunately died a few months after his acceſſion to the throne, before the projected union could take place.

A. D. 926. Two of his ſons, whom he had by a former marriage, thought themſelves entitled to the ſeat of their father, and took poſſeſſion of the throne, without waiting for the conſent of Athelſtan, who reſented the inſult offered him, and drove them from the kingdom. One of theſe princes eſcaped into Scotland, and took refuge in the court of Conſtantine, who then filled the Scottiſh throne. Athelſtan demanded the fugitive; which being refuſed, he marched a ſtrong army into Scotland, and reduced the kingdom to ſuch diſtreſs, that, in order to preſerve his crown, Conſtantine was obliged to make the moſt humble ſubmiſſions. It is generally ſaid, that Conſtantine did homage to Athelſtan for his dominions; but this is diſputed.

A. D. 934. Ambitious of recovering the honour he had loſt, Conſtantine joined in a confederacy with Anlaff, a Daniſh prince ſettled in Ireland; and Owen, king of the Cumbrian Britons, in order to attack Athelſtan, and reduce his power to narrower bounds. Owen accordingly marched, at the head of his Britons, to join Conſtantine; and Anlaff came from Ireland with a numerous army, in a fleet of two hundred and ſixteen ſail of large ſhips. The forces of Anlaff were landed on the north ſide of the Humber, and marched immediately to join the allies. It was ſome time before Athelſtan could raiſe an army ſufficiently powerful to chaſtiſe the invaders of his country; and, during the interval, the troops of the enemy committed many diſorders in Northumberland: they even imagined that Athelſtan did not dare to meet them in the open field; and this opinion rendered them inſolent and careleſs. But they ſoon found themſelves miſtaken; Athelſtan appeared, and a deciſive battle became inevitable.

For ſome days the two armies continued quiet in their camps; no acts of hoſtility paſſed between them. During this interval of inaction, Anlaff formed a deſign of ſeizing or aſſaſſinating Athelſtan in his tent. He accordingly entered the Engliſh camp in the dreſs of a harper, and was well received by the ſoldiers. At laſt he was introduced to Athelſtan, who was ſo delighted with his muſic, that he rewarded him nobly. A ſoldier, who had formerly ſerved under Anlaff, had ſome ſuſpicion that it was his old general concealed in this diſguiſe, and determined to obſerve all his actions. Anlaff, who ſcorned to carry away the reward he had received from Athelſtan, was no ſooner beyond the limits of the Engliſh camp, than he cut a hole in the ground, and hid the money. The ſoldier was now convinced that it was Anlaff, and immediately informed Athelſtan of the diſcovery. The king, ſuſpecting ſome treacherous deſign, ordered his tent to be removed; and the ſpot being left vacant, was occupied by a biſhop, who had that evening joined Athelſtan with a reinforcement of troops. Every thing continued quiet till midnight, when Anlaff, at the head of a choſen body of troops, broke into the Engliſh camp, repaired immediately to the ſpot where he had obſerved the king's tent, and ſlew the biſhop, with all his followers. This action gave the alarm, and Anlaff eſcaped, with difficulty, to the allied army.

As ſoon as the morning appeared, the Engliſh attacked the enemy; and the action ſoon became general. The victory was, for ſome time, doubtful, but at laſt declared for the Engliſh. The allies were driven from the field of battle with prodigious ſlaughter; and the few that eſcaped, ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight. Anlaff and Owen, with a ſmall number of their followers, reached their ſhips with the utmoſt difficulty. Conſtantine was wounded, and taken priſoner: But unable to recover his ſpirits after this defeat, or determined not to do homage for his dominions, he reſigned his crown, and retired into a convent.

A. D. 941. Athelſtan now reſted from the toils of war, and applied himſelf to a taſk more agreeable to his nature, the cultivation of the arts of peace. He applied himſelf, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to promote the happineſs of his people, and render it laſting. But while he was labouring for the good of his country, he paid the debt of nature, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, and the ſixteenth of his reign.

Athelſtan was one of the greateſt princes among the Saxons. His valour and affability were equally great, and equally admired. Though ſucceſsful in war, he was naturally a lover of peace. He was at once intrepid, prudent, beneficent, and religious. He was learned himſelf, and a generous friend to the learned; reſpected by his enemies; and beloved by his friends. Convinced that commerce is the true ſource of riches, he encouraged it to the utmoſt of his power. He enacted a law, by which every merchant, who had made three long voyages to the Mediterranean, on his own account, was advanced to the rank of nobility. The ſame honour was conferred on a farmer who had acquired, by his own induſtry, five hides of land, and who poſſeſſed a chapel, a kitchen, a hall, and a bell. His deſire of ſpreading the knowledge of the goſpel among his ſubjects, ſhould be mentioned with honour. He cauſed the Bible to be tranſlated into the Saxon language, that every perſon might enjoy the advantage of being acquainted with the ſacred writings.

EDMUND I.

A. D. 941. EDMUND was not eighteen years of age when he aſcended the throne, on the death of Athelſtan his brother; but had given ſo many proofs of his valour againſt the enemies of his country, that the greateſt expectations were juſtly conceived of his reign.

The Danes, however, conſidered his youth as a favourable circumſtance, and that an opportunity now offered for recovering their independence, and placing one of their own countrymen on the throne of Northumberland. They conſidered Anlaff as a perſon well qualified for leading their armies, and ſupporting himſelf againſt the whole power of Edmund. Meſſengers were accordingly diſpatched to Ireland; and Anlaff, pleaſed with an opportunity of wiping out the ſtain of his late defeat, readily embraced the offer. But not thinking his own army ſufficient to oppoſe Edmund, he formed an alliance with Olaus, king of Norway, and received from that prince a ſtrong reinforcement of ſhips and men. With this additional force he invaded Northumberland; and the Danes, who were governed by the ſpirit of revolt, joined his ſtandards. He found means to carry on a ſecret correſpondence with the principal inhabitants of York, and was admitted into that city on his firſt appearance. Many towns opened their gates to the invaders; and others were eaſily reduced; ſo that Anlaff was ſoon in poſſeſſion of the chief places in Northumberland. But his ambition increaſed with his acquiſitions; the crown he came to receive was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the deſires of Anlaff. He advanced into Mercia, at the head of his army, and was very favourably received by his countrymen, who joined his ſtandards, and aſſiſted him to reduce ſeveral places that had been wreſted from that kingdom by Edward.

The inſolence of Anlaff fired young Edmund with a deſire of revenging the inſults offered to his country. He aſſembled his army with the utmoſt expedition, and marched immediately againſt the enemy. The two armies met at Cheſter, where a very obſtinate battle enſued, and continued till night put an end to the conteſt. The victory ſtill continued doubtful: neither appearing to have gained any advantage over the other. Both armies encamped upon the field of battle, in order to renew the fight as ſoon as the morning appeared. But Odo and Wulſtan, archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, laboured the whole night to put a ſtop to the further effuſion of human blood, and had the good fortune to ſucceed. A peace was concluded, by which all the country north of Watling-ſtreet was ceded to Anlaff, who now ſat down on the throne of Northumberland without oppoſition.

A. D. 943. The Danes ſoon perceived they were ſtrangers to their own intereſt, when they called Anlaff to the throne. He had agreed to pay Olaus, king of Norway, a very conſiderable ſum for his aſſiſtance, and ſoon after he received the ſceptre, laid a very heavy tax on his ſubjects to fulfil his engagements. The impoveriſhed ſtate of the country rendered this impoſt doubly ſevere. They complained, but obtained no redreſs: Anlaff was inexorable. The natural conſequences followed: the affections of the people were alienated from their king; they conſidered him as an uſurper whom they had invited to the throne. The inhabitants of Deïra went ſtill farther: they ſent for Reinald, the nephew of Anlaff, from Ireland, and crowned him at York. Anarchy ſucceeded unanimity: the kingdom was divided into parties, and each endeavoured to eſtabliſh their own power on the ruin of others.

A. D. 944. A favourable opportunity now offered to reduce the inſurgents, and Edmund was careful to embrace it. He made preparations for invading Northumberland, but carried them on in ſo ſecret a manner, that the Danes never ſuſpected that their country would ſoon become a ſcene of war and deſolation. They were wholly employed in haraſſing one another, when Edmund entered Northumberland, and laid it waſte with fire and ſword. The Danes were confounded: they had made no preparations for a defence, and were therefore obliged to ſubmit to the clemency of the Engliſh monarch. The ſoul of Edmund was too generous to inſult a fallen enemy. He even permitted each of them to wear the crown they had received from the people, but inſiſted on their embracing the chriſtian religion. The Daniſh princes made no difficulty of complying with the terms of the treaty. It was no uncommon thing for them to be pagans or chriſtians, as they were induced by circumſtances or conjunctures: they were always ſwayed by intereſt: they were too ignorant to comprehend, and too ferocious to embrace the tenets of the goſpel.

A. D. 945. The Cumbrian Britons having aſſiſted the Northumbrians in their late revolt, Edmund marched into their country at the head of his army; drove their prince from the throne, and beſtowed his dominions on Malcolm, king of Scotland; who undertook the defence of the northern border, and did homage to Edmund, as lord paramount of the ſoil.

A. D. 946. The ſucceſs of Edmund reſtored the tranquillity of England. Diſappointments and misfortunes had taught the Danes that oppoſition only accumulated diſtreſs; and that there was no other method of acquiring happineſs, than that of ſubmitting quietly to the government. The Engliſh, freed from the ravages of the ferocious Danes, applied themſelves to cultivate the arts of peace. They were happy under the government of a prince, whoſe valour had reduced their enemies to ſubjection, and whoſe generoſity and humane government, encouraged them to improve the advantages that reſulted from the tranquillity of their country. But while they were pleaſing themſelves with the hopes of enjoying, for a long interval of time, the bleſſings of uninterrupted happineſs, a tragical event blaſted all their hopes, and put a final period to all their expectations. While the king was celebrating the feaſt of St. Auguſtine in the church of Puckle in Glouceſterſhire, he obſerved at one of the tables a notorious robber called Leoff, whom he himſelf had baniſhed for his crimes. Provoked at his inſolence, he commanded the ſteward to apprehend the villain. But Leoff being too ſtrong for the officer, refuſed to quit the place. Exaſperated at ſeeing his orders diſobeyed even in his preſence, Edmund leaped from his ſeat, ſeized Leoff by the hair and threw him on the floor. Perceiving his death inevitable, the villain drew a dagger, and plunged it into the monarch's breaſt. Death followed the wound, and Edmund fell by the ignoble hand of a robber. His nobles, exaſperated to madneſs, fell upon the regicide and cut him to pieces with their ſwords.

The youth of this prince, and the ſhort time he ſat upon the throne, render it impoſſible to draw his character with juſtice and with truth. Too young to diſplay the talents which time would have unfolded, it can only be obſerved, that the imperfect ſpecimens he gave of his prudence ſeemed to indicate that he would have caſt no diſhonourable ſhade on the illuſtrious virtues of his father. Equally valiant with his immediate predeceſſors, he reduced the enemies of his country to obedience; he huſhed the jarring paſſions of different people into peace. His victories in the field are irrefragable proofs of his courage; the pains he took to render his people happy are demonſtrations of his humanity.

EDRED.

A. D. 946. EDMUND left two ſons, but being both infants, and therefore incapable of holding the reins of government with that ſteadineſs which the complexion of the times rendered neceſſary, they were ſet aſide, and Edred, brother to the deceaſed monarch, placed upon the throne.

A change of government was a ſignal of rebellion to the Northumberland Danes. They renounced their allegiance on the death of Edmund, and flew to arms to defend their independence. Edred, who was no ſtranger to their turbulent diſpoſitions, marched immediately into Northumberland, and waſted the country with fire and ſword. Terrified at the progreſs of the Engliſh army, the Danes had recourſe to their uſual method of negotiation: they ſued for peace in the moſt abject manner. Edred granted their requeſt; but to prevent any inſurrections for the future, he placed garriſons in all the fortreſſes of ſtrength, under an able governor, who was charged to watch the motions of the reſtleſs Danes, with the greateſt circumſpection.

A. D. 953. Peace being thus reſtored, Edred applied himſelf to exerciſes more agreeable to his inclinations than thoſe of war. Religion, or rather ſuperſtition, formed the chief feature in the character of Edred; and Dunſtan, the famous abbot of Glaſtonbury, was his adviſer, his director, and, in reality, the ſole governor of the kingdom. Dunſtan was one of thoſe bold and enterprizing men, whom pity cannot ſoften, and whoſe ſtubborn prejudices frequently interrupt the tranquillity of nations. He had no merits but thoſe of a churchman; as an Engliſhman, they were execrable. He was zealous without diſcretion; artful without wiſdom; profuſe without elegance; and open without ſincerity. The ſuperſtitious monarch was, however, deceived; he even ſubmitted to receive corporal puniſhment from his hands. The great object Dunſtan had in view, and which he purſued with the moſt unwearied diligence, was the celibacy of the clergy, which he was deſirous of extending over the whole kingdom; and, to effect this, he did not ſcruple to ſacrifice the lives of the innocent, or the peace and harmony of his country. Before this period, the monks in England lived without any other reſtraint than that of virtue; they were even at liberty to marry. The kingdom was full of prieſts and monks, who lived publickly with their wives. Celibacy was little known in England; the rule of St. Benedict principally prevailed. The new monks, under the patronage of Dunſtan, attracted the veneration of the people by the auſterity of their lives: they declaimed with warmth againſt the ſecular clergy, whoſe lives were immoral and offenſive. Provoked at this attack, and more at the loſs of their benefices, of which they were deprived to make way for the preferment of the new monks, the ſecular clergy inveighed againſt them in the moſt violent manner; their harangues were plentifully ſeaſoned with invective and abuſe. Theſe diſputes diſturbed the tranquillity of the kingdom; they excited very alarming commotions among a ſuperſtitious and bigotted people.

A. D. 955. But heaven thought proper to ſtop, for a ſeaſon, this unchriſtian contention. Edred was ſeized with a quinſey, and expired on the twenty-third of November, in the tenth year of his reign; lamented by Dunſtan and his monks, who loſt a powerful friend, and a generous benefactor.

The flatteries of the monks, and the ſervile applauſes of a deluded multitude, have given a falſe luſtre to the character of Edred. His valour was unqueſtionable; his virtue was never impeached. But ſuperſtition, the parent of miſery and diſorder, blaſted his fame, and tarniſhed his reputation. He diſcarded his reaſon, to follow the dictates of a blind enthuſiaſm; and expoſed his people to contentions and diſtreſs, to indulge the caprice of a blind and headſtrong zeal.

E D W Y.

A. D. 955. EDWY, who aſcended the throne on the death of his brother Edred, was not above ſeventeen years of age when he was placed in the ſeat of power by the unanimous ſuffrages of the people. His ſoul was very ſuſceptible of the tender paſſions; and the charms of Ethelgiva, a beautiful princeſs of the royal blood, had made a ſtrong impreſſion on his heart. She was related to him in the third or fourth degree; but his paſſion was too ſtrong to ſubmit to the eccleſiaſtical rules of conſanguinity; he married the princeſs without publiſhing his nuptials. Edwy did not tread in the ſteps of his predeceſſor; he was no ſlave to ſuperſtition. He had a piercing genius of his own, and dared to follow the dictates of his reaſon. Dunſtan ſaw that he ſhould no longer be truſted with the rod of power, and declaimed violently againſt the vices of Edwy. The whole fraternity of monks joined their leader, and concerted the diſgrace of the monarch. An opportunity ſoon offered for putting their ſcheme in execution. On the day of his coronation, Edwy, fatigued with the tedious ceremony, and willing to avoid the exceſſive drinking then univerſally practiſed, retired from table to the apartment of Ethelgiva. The nobles looking upon the abſence of their king as an affront offered to themſelves, complained of the inſult. Dunſtan ſaw their diſguſt with a ſecret ſatisfaction, and ſtarting from his ſeat, ruſhed into the apartment of Ethelgiva, reproached the king for his behaviour in the harſheſt terms, and dragged him forcibly back to the company of the nobles.

Exaſperated at this outrage of the inſolent monk, Edwy determined to reſtrain his power, and convince him, that a polite behaviour at leaſt is due to a monarch of England. His friends, who hated Dunſtan, cheriſhed the flames of reſentment, and made uſe of every method in their power to inſtigate Edwy to revenge. The prince accordingly called upon Dunſtan to render an account of his adminiſtration of the treaſury during the reign of Edred; Dunſtan refuſed to comply; upon which he was declared guilty of malverſation in his office, and baniſhed the kingdom.

This exertion of the royal authority rouſed the attention of the whole clergy. Odo, archbiſhop of Canterbury, one of the moſt virulent fanatics of the age, ſuſpecting that the reſentment of Ethelgiva had been the principal cauſe of Dunſtan's baniſhment, determined to take a ſevere revenge on that innocent princeſs. His ſoul was a ſtranger to compaſſion; he cheriſhed not the virtue of humanity. He ſent into the royal palace a company of ſoldiers, who, with more than brutal violence, dragged the fair Ethelgiva from the arms of her royal conſort, branded her face with a red-hot iron, and conveyed her into Ireland. Happily for Odo, and unfortunately for his country, the blind ſuperſtition of the times ſupported his inſolence. The monks had filled the minds of the people with a falſe, ridiculous terror; they pretended that chriſtianity itſelf muſt ſtand or fall with their order; they conſtrued the juſt reſentment of offended majeſty into an act of the higheſt impiety; they repreſented Dunſtan as one of the vicegerents of heaven, and his baniſhment as a prelude to the total deſtruction of the religion of the goſpel.

Exaſperated at the inſolence and barbarity of Odo, and afraid of his power, Edwy turned all his rage againſt the monks, whom he baniſhed from the kingdom. Had he purſued the blow, and drove Odo alſo out of the iſland; had he employed the ſame reſolution in ſecuring his throne, as in vindicating his honour; the wreath of royalty would, probably, have flouriſhed on his brow, and an interval of tranquillity ſucceeded the clamours of diſappointed bigotry. But the popularity of Odo intimidated Edwy: he ſuffered the inſolent prelate to enjoy his power unmoleſted, and loſt his crown by the very method he took to preſerve it.

A. D. 957. There is no difficulty in arming a ſuperſtitious people againſt their prince, when they are perſuaded he is an enemy to religion. The virulence of diſappointed malice had blackened the character of Edwy; he was conſidered as a monſter of impiety, whoſe actions cried to heaven for vengeance. The inhabitants of Mercia and Northumberland flew to arms; placed Edgar, a younger brother of Edwy, at their head, and proceeded to acts of violence. Dunſtan was recalled from baniſhment, and Edgar put himſelf wholly under his direction. The ſtandard of rebellion was changed into the ſtandard of religion, by the ſanction of a miracle. It was aſſerted that a voice was heard from heaven, commanding the nobles to ſet the crown on Edgar's head. Edwy was abandoned by all his ſubjects, except the Weſt Saxons, and finding it impoſſible to ſtem the torrent of oppoſition, ſhut himſelf up in the city of Glouceſter. About this time the lovely Ethelgiva, having been cured of her wounds, was returning from Ireland to enjoy once more the happineſs of her huſband's company. But the heart of Odo was ſteeled againſt the ſoft pleadings of compaſſion: his emiſſaries intercepted her in her journey, and Ethelgiva fell a victim to the fury of unrelenting bigotry.

The civil war ſtill raged with unrelenting violence, till at laſt both parties, ſatiated with blood and ſlaughter, and perhaps feeling ſome compaſſion for the miſeries of their country, agreed to terminate their quarrel by a treaty of peace; by which Edgar was permitted to enjoy all his conqueſts, with the title of king; and Edwy obliged to content himſelf with the kingdom of Weſſex. Odo paid the debt of nature during theſe unhappy diviſions: he died without ſeeing the triumph of the monks over the ſecular clergy. Dunſtan was promoted to the biſhopric of Worceſter, to that of London, and to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury. The conſcientious monk ſcrupled not to enjoy all theſe three benefices at the ſame time.

A. D. 959. Robbed of his amiable Ethelgiva, ſtripped of his kingdom by an unnatural uſurpation, and conſidered by his ſubjects as a monſter of impiety, Edwy became a prey to melancholy. He had loſt every thing that was dear to him, and life itſelf became a burden. He pined in ſecret, and at laſt paid the debt of nature; but not without ſome ſuſpicions of treachery. Several monks have related, that his ſoul having been carried into hell, one of thoſe malignant ſpirits flew immediately to Dunſtan with the news; but that the ſaint, inſtead of giving himſelf up to a cruel joy, prayed ſo fervently for the deceaſed, that the deity granted his ſalvation. Very little confidence ſurely can be placed in the veracity of writers, who ſcruple not to propagate ſuch abſurd relations.

The characters of few princes have ſuffered more from monkiſh malevolence than that of Edwy. They have loaded him with almoſt every vice, though they have not been able to bring a ſingle inſtance to ſupport the calumny. His ſeverity to Dunſtan has been repreſented as a crime of the deepeſt dye; a crime againſt the majeſty of heaven. But ſurely the inſolence of that reforming monk deſerved a ſeverer chaſtiſement. Whatever power the harangues of pretended ſanctity might, in that age of ſuperſtitious bigotry, have over the minds of an ignorant people, they have long ſince loſt their force. Reaſon has reſumed her throne, and ſtripped hypocriſy of the flimſy robe woven by the hand of monkiſh ſubterfuge to conceal her deformity; and expoſed to the deteſtation of the humane and the virtuous, the deteſtable vices that ſo long lurked under the cloak of religion. It is not, however, intended to repreſent the character of Edwy as perfect. Frailties form one of the characteriſtics of humanity. A prince abſolutely faultleſs muſt be more than man. His youth, however, may be urged as an apology for all his failings. Had he, like his predeceſſors, ſubmitted to the government of Dunſtan, all his faults had been forgotten, and his virtues diſplayed with all the powers of monkiſh eloquence.

EDGAR.

A. D. 959. COULD any excuſe be offered for rebellion, the merits of Edgar would have exculpated the inſurgents. Deſirous of cultivating the arts of peace, he took the moſt prudent methods to ſecure tranquillity. He was too well acquainted with the turbulent diſpoſition of the Northumbrian Danes to truſt them with any power. He divided their country into two governments, and ſtationed a ſtrong body of troops on the northern borders, that they might be always at hand to ſtop the inroads of an enemy, and quell any inſurrection that might happen among the reſtleſs inhabitants.

But what rendered him far more formidable, and will tranſmit his name with honour to poſterity, was his powerful navy, which was far ſuperior to any thing enjoyed by his predeceſſors. His fleet was ſuperior to all the marine forces in Europe. Authors are not agreed with regard to the number of his ſhips: Malmſbury ſays, that his navy conſiſted of no leſs than four thouſand eight hundred veſſels; others, that their number was not more than three thouſand ſix hundred. But however that be, this powerful navy was divided into three ſquadrons. The firſt was conſtantly ſtationed on the eaſtern, the ſecond on the weſtern, and the third on the northern coaſts of the kingdom.

Nor did he ſuffer this powerful navy to be idle and rotting in different harbours; he kept them cruiſing during the ſummer months, and always in readineſs to attack an enemy on his firſt appearance. He himſelf ſailed round the iſland conſtantly once a year. His cuſtom was to go on board the eaſtern ſquadron immediately after Eaſter, and ſailing to the weſtward ſcoured all the channel from the mouth of the Thames to the Land's-End in Cornwall. This being the limit of their cruiſe, he went on board the weſtern fleet, and ſtanding to the northward he looked into every bay and creek, on the Engliſh and Scottiſh coaſts, and alſo of Ireland and the Hebrides. Then going on board the northern ſquadron he viſited all the harbours in that quarter, and landed at the mouth of the Thames. Theſe and other regulations conceived with prudence and executed with vigour, preſerved his own ſubjects in a due ſubordination, and rendered him the terror of his enemies. But the favour he ſhewed the monks was the moſt powerful method he employed to eſtabliſh the public tranquillity. It is not, however, eaſy to determine, whether theſe indulgences flowed from his inclination, his gratitude, or his policy. This, however, is certain, that Dunſtan and two other biſhops, who were equally devoted to him, were conſulted in all the affairs of government; they may even be ſaid to have directed every meaſure of importance. The ſecular clergy were ignominiouſly expelled from the monaſteries, and their places filled with Benedictine monks, who were equally zealous in promoting the intereſts of their own order, and in expoſing the vices, and loading with obloquy the members of other religious eſtabliſhments. They were ſupported by the hand of power, and all arguments urged againſt them were in vain. Edgar convened a general council of the eccleſiaſtics of his kingdom, and pronounced in that aſſembly a long diſcourſe againſt the ſecular clergy. He painted their vices in the moſt glaring and odious colours. This ſpeech, which was then conſidered as a maſter-piece of eloquence, is deeply tinctured with the ſpirit of the times. Among a multitude of grave accuſations, there occurs a ridiculous charge againſt the ſecular clergy, on account of the ſmallneſs of their treaſure, which in that ſuperſtitious age, was conſidered as an accuſation of no ſmall importance.

This harangue procured him the moſt unbounded adulation of the monks. But their endeavours to change crimes into virtues have now loſt their force; their eulogiums are obnoxious to ſuſpicion, and their panegyrics to ridicule.

Edgar was remarkable for the diſſoluteneſs of his manners. The virtue of no lady was ſafe, if celebrated for her beauty. Even the ſacred receſſes of devotion were not ſufficient to protect innocence, nor ſeclude from the amorous monarch the votaries to religion. He carried off and raviſhed a nun, though oppoſed by the whole convent. Dunſtan, indeed, reproached him for this attrocious crime, but no other puniſhment was inflicted on him, than a prohibition from wearing his crown during ſeven years. Edwy, who had not been half ſo criminal, was deprived of his ſceptre. But Edwy oppoſed, and Edgar ſupported Dunſtan.

A. D. 961. But, among all the amorous adventures of Edgar, that by which he obtained the beautiful Elfrida is the moſt ſingular, and therefore muſt not be paſſed over in ſilence. Elfrida was the daughter and heireſs to Ordgar, earl of Devon, one of the firſt and richeſt noblemen in the kingdom. Deſirous of fixing in her mind the principles of virtue, Ordgar cauſed his daughter to be educated privately in the country; but the fame of her beauty could not be confined; it filled the whole kingdom. Edgar often heard the praiſes of Elfrida, and conceived a deſign of making her his partner in the throne. But, deſirous of knowing whether her charms were really equal to the portrait delineated by fame, Edgar diſpatched Athelwold, his favourite and firſt miniſter, into Devonſhire, with directions to pay a viſit to her father, in order to obtain a ſight of Elfrida, and bring him a certain account of her beauty. Athelwold himſelf was young, and very ſuſceptible of the tender paſſions; ſo that the charms of Elfrida ſtifled in his breaſt every ſentiment of duty, and inſpired him with a reſolution of attempting to gain her for himſelf. He returned to Edgar, and made a falſe report of the charms of Elfrida: he repreſented her as a perſon of ordinary beauty; and convinced Edgar, that ſhe was not an object proper for his affections. He, however, artfully inſinuated, that though ſhe was unworthy to be the conſort of a king, ſhe would be an advantageous match for a ſubject; and that the vaſt eſtate of her father would be to him a ſufficient compenſation for the want of beauty in her perſon. Edgar readily gave his conſent, and Ethelwold, ſoon after, married Elfrida. Conſcious of the danger that muſt attend him, ſhould Edgar diſcover the treacherous part he had acted, Athelwold took every precaution in his power to conceal the beautiful Elfrida from obſervation. But his perfidy was not long concealed. Edgar, either by chance, or the information of ſome enemy to Athelwold, was informed of the whole tranſaction. Exaſperated at the treachery of his favourite, Edgar determined to take a ſevere revenge; but, in order to render the blow more certain, he diſſembled his rage, and told Ethelwold, in a very careleſs manner, that he intended to hunt in the neighbourhood of his ſeat, and propoſed to pay him a viſit. The favourite, alarmed at the king's deſign, and being incapable of making any plauſible excuſe to elude the royal viſit, ſet out a few hours before the king, under pretence of making the neceſſary preparations. On his arrival, he diſcovered the whole to Elfrida, conjuring her to uſe her utmoſt addreſs to conceal from the amorous monarch thoſe charms which nature had ſo laviſhly beſtowed upon her, leſt they ſhould prove the deſtruction of their domeſtic peace. But his requeſt was made to a woman conſcious of the power of beauty, and enflamed with the ambition of ſeeing a monarch at her feet. Inſtead of purſuing the advice of her huſband, ſhe ſtudiouſly diſplayed all the graces of her perſon. Love and fury took poſſeſſion of the inſulted monarch's breaſt; but he concealed the gathering ſtorm from the eyes of his perfidious favourite. He carried him with him to hunt in the foreſt of Harewood, and ſtabbed him with his own hand. Elfrida, to expiate the guilt of being acceſſary to the murder of her huſband, erected a monaſtery on the ſpot where he was ſlain, and was, ſoon after, married to Edgar.

A. D. 974. But theſe ſallies of irregular paſſion did not divert the attention of Edgar from promoting the happineſs of his people. The whole kingdom had hitherto been infeſted with wolves, and Edgar nobly exerted his authority to extirpate that ravenous ſpecies of animals from the kingdom. But, on being cloſely purſued, they took ſhelter in the mountains and foreſts of Wales. Edgar, therefore, changed the tribute, which had been impoſed upon the Welſh princes, into an annual tax of three hundred heads of wolves. This produced the deſired effect; that creature, in a little time, was no longer to be found in any part of the kingdom.

The monks, who have given us the hiſtory of Edgar's reign, have ſhamefully neglected the chronology, in order to dreſs up every period of his government in the tinſel robe of flattery. The whole is rather a panegyric on his perſon and character, than a regular ſeries of his actions. It was, however, about this time, that Edgar gave an inſtance of his vanity, which it would have been no reproach to their endeavours to add a luſtre to his character, had his hiſtorians ſuffered it to glide down the current of time neglected and forgotten. Edgar ſummoned the tributary princes to attend him at Cheſter, and going on board his barge, they rowed him down the river Dee to the monaſtery of St. John the Baptiſt, while he himſelf ſat at the helm.

A. D. 975. The peaceable reign of Edgar now drew towards a cloſe. Few princes, in thoſe turbulent times, ever enjoyed a longer interval of tranquillity; indeed, few ever took ſuch prudent methods to obtain it. He was feared and reſpected by his enemies, from his acceſſion to the throne, till he paid the debt of nature, which happened in the thirty-third year of his age, and the nineteenth of his reign.

It is no eaſy taſk to draw a juſt character of Edgar. The monks, not ſatisfied with diſplaying his virtues as a king, have been ambitious of making him paſs for a ſaint. But ſurely it is difficult to reconcile his actions and the diſſoluteneſs of his manners with the chriſtian perfections that conſtitute that character. If the enriching churches and monaſteries be conſidered as the greateſt virtues, Edgar may be juſtly conſidered as a ſaint. This was indeed the opinion in that age of ignorance and bigotry; and on that baſis the ſanctity of Edgar is founded. The ages of ſuperſtition are not the ſame with the ages of morality.

But though Edgar has no claim to the title conferred upon him by the pen of adulation, his political talents for government add a real luſtre to his character. Notwithſtanding his youth, he was a conſummate politician, a wiſe legiſlator, a patriot king. The prudent methods he purſued for preventing invaſions, do him the higheſt honour. His laws for the preſervation of civil happineſs are equally admirable. Ever attentive to the trade of his ſubjects, he regulated the coin of the kingdom, and took care that it ſhould be of a proper degree of fineneſs, in order to ſupport the credit of the nation in foreign markets. He alſo reduced the weights and meaſures to one ſtandard. In a word, he exerted himſelf ſo nobly to procure the happineſs of his people, and maintain the honour of his crown, that it were to be wiſhed his failings had been leſs, or that they had been for ever buried in the gulph of forgetfulneſs.

EDWARD, ſurnamed THE MARTYR.

A. D. 975. DISCORD, and all the horrors of a civil war, threatened the nation on the death of Edgar. The great power of Dunſtan had alarmed the nobles, and they were now deſirous of preventing the mitre from giving laws to the crown. The ambitious Elfrida was no ſtranger to their ſentiments, and determined, if poſſible, to obtain for Ethelred, her own ſon, the ſceptre of his father, and exclude Edward from his birthright. She fanned the flame of ſuſpicion in the breaſts of the nobles, by placing the tyrannical deſigns of the monks in the moſt odious point of light. Succeſs at firſt attended the labours of Elfrida: the nobles were alarmed at their danger; the monks were driven from their benefices in many parts of the kingdom, and the ſecular clergy reſtored to their poſſeſſions. This ſucceſsful beginning encouraged Elfrida, whoſe credit increaſed in proportion as that of the monks declined. Some doubts had long ſubſiſted with regard to the former marriage of Edgar, and Elfrida loſt not the advantage: ſhe urged them, with all the force of female eloquence, as a ſufficient reaſon for ſetting aſide the ſucceſſion of Edward. Dunſtan ſaw his danger, and, by vigilance and activity, rendered the ſcheme of Elfrida abortive. He ſummoned an aſſembly of the ſtates, and met them in all the pomp of eccleſiaſtical greatneſs. He knew the power of Elfrida's party, and feared the majority would declare for Ethelred. No time was therefore given for debate: the archbiſhop, inſtead of explaining the intention of this general meeting, led Edward into the midſt of the aſſembly, and ſet the crown on his head. The members were aſtoniſhed at his arbitrary proceeding, but the great power of Dunſtan ſilenced every complaint. The reſentment of the people, who conſidered that prelate as a prophet, and one of the vicegerents of heaven, extorted a general conſent. Edward was placed upon the throne of his father.

The reins of government fell into the hands of Dunſtan on the acceſſion of Edward, who was only fourteen years of age when he received, from the hands of that prelate, the ſceptre of Edgar. The ſecular clergy were now expoſed to all the fury of monkiſh reſentment. But as the declarations of a prince in his minority, and wholly at the devotion of Dunſtan, would carry the moſt glaring marks of ſuſpicion, recourſe was had to miracles and revelations in behalf of the monks. A general council was held at Wincheſter, where a voice iſſuing from a crucifix declared in favour of the order of St. Benedict. But this pretended miracle was performed in too blundering a manner to extort conviction; the monks only aſſerted it was real. Dunſtan was exaſperated at the obſtinacy of his opponents, and took care his next miracle ſhould be attended with more alarming conſequences. A general council was held at Calne, in Wiltſhire, where, before the major part of the members were arrived, Beornholm, an Iriſh biſhop celebrated for his learning, offered to undertake the defence of the ſecular clergy; but Dunſtan declined the conteſt, under pretence that he was old and infirm; adding, that it would be the higheſt degree of impiety to diſpute on a ſubject which had been determined by a miraculous voice from heaven. Beornholm conſidered this anſwer as a mere ſubterfuge, and determined to maintain his theſis before the whole aſſembly; but a dreadful cataſtrophe prevented his deſign. He had hardly begun the debate, before the floor of the room, in which the aſſembly was held, fell down, and great numbers were cruſhed to death; but the beam which ſupported the ſeat of Dunſtan, ſtood firm, and the prelate remained unhurt amidſt the general ſlaughter. Theſe pious frauds, conſidered as miracles in theſe times of ignorant bigotry, put an end to the conteſt. It was thought that the Deity had viſibly interpoſed in favour of the celibacy of the clergy, and no farther oppoſition was made to the ſcheme for extending it over the whole kingdom.

Soon after Edward's acceſſion to the throne, Elfrida retired, with her ſon, to Corf-caſtle, in Dorſetſhire. All animoſities between her and the reigning prince ſeemed to be entirely forgotten, and the former peace and harmony to be reſtored. On the part of Edward, this reconciliation was real; but Elfrida nurſed in ſecret the fury of revenge, and waited only for a favourable opportunity to execute her horrid deſign.

A. D. 978. Edward, who harboured no ſuſpicion of treachery, left his attendants in the adjacent foreſt, where he was hunting, in order to pay a viſit to his mother-in-law. He was received with all the external marks of affection by Elfrida; but while he was drinking a cup of wine, he was treacherouſly ſtabbed in the back by one of her ſervants, whom the ambitious Elfrida had prevailed upon to execute her horrid purpoſe. Edward, on receiving the wound, immediately ſet ſpurs to his horſe, to eſcape a ſecond blow, and reach his companions; but the ſtroke was mortal. He fainted with the loſs of blood, fell from his horſe, and one of his feet catching in the ſtirrup, he was dragged a conſiderable diſtance along the road, and expired. The ſervants of Elfrida followed Edward, took up the body, and threw it into a well, to conceal, if poſſible, the horrid murder. But their attempts were in vain; the body was found a few days after, and buried at Wareham. Elfrida, either ſtung with remorſe for the horrid crime ſhe had committed, or to prevent the effects of the ſtorm which threatened to overwhelm her, retired into one of the monaſteries ſhe erected to expiate her guilt, and paſſed the remainder of her days in penitence and obſcurity.

The ſmall time the unfortunate prince Edward filled the throne, his youth, and the few civil events that happened in his reign, render it impoſſible to draw his character. The monks, who were the only hiſtorians of theſe times, have repreſented him as a ſaint, but without giving any reaſons for conferring the appellation upon him. They have, however, furniſhed us with the only plauſible reaſon that can be given for his acquiring the ſurname of martyr. They tell us, that miracles were wrought at his tomb. The peculiar favour conferred by the Deity on the ancient martyrs, was, if we believe the monks, extended to Edward.

ETHELRED II.

A. D. 978. ETHELRED was now the lawful heir to the throne of England. The crime of Elfrida, which ſecluded her from the world, procured the ſcepte for her ſon. Dunſtan ſaw it would be in vain to oppoſe his acceſſion, and therefore anointed Ethelred, and placed the crown upon his head. He knew the diſpoſitions of Ethelred were never favourable to the monks, and ſuſpected that his own behaviour in the conteſt between him and his brother had not rendered them more propitious. But he hoped that time might efface the injury, and the ſanctity of the monks recommend them to his protection.

Ethelred was only in the twelfth year of his age, when he aſcended the throne of his anceſtors. He was without experience, without learning, without knowledge. He had no capacity, no genius, no courage. His abilities were unequal to the taſk of governing a kingdom in the midſt of a profound peace, much leſs in times of danger and diſtreſs. The nation was rent into two factions, both courted the favour of Ethelred, and both endeavoured to blacken the character of each other. He wanted penetration to diſtinguiſh the careſſes of fidelity from thoſe of adulation, and became fluctuating and irreſolute: hence his whole conduct was a ſeries of timidity, indolence, perplexity and diſtruſt. The nobles had taken advantage of his brother's weakneſs, to render their power almoſt independent of the crown. The royal authority had, in a great meaſure, loſt its force, and the ſafety of the nation, which depended on the union of the nobility, was deſtroyed.

A. D. 987. The monks had more than once experienced that Ethelred was not a friend to their order. He beſieged the biſhop of Rocheſter in the capital of his own dioceſe; and the prelate was obliged to purchaſe his ſafety with a conſiderable ſum of money. But the oppoſition they met with from Ethelred, was only a prelude to their misfortunes; Dunſtan now paid the debt of nature, and left them expoſed to the malice of their enemies. A ſtrong conteſt enſued with regard to a perſon qualified to fill the ſee of Dunſtan. The monks were at laſt victorious, and Ethelgar, a monk of Glaſtonbury, was elected archbiſhop of Canterbury. He did not, however, long enjoy the archiepiſcopal dignity; and on his death, the ſee was occupied by Siricius, originally a monk of the ſame ſeminary. But he was not equal to Dunſtan either in abilities or affection for the monks.

Sixty years had elapſed ſince the kingdom had been deſolated by the ravages of the Danes. The navy of Edgar had ruined their fleets, and confined their pyratical cruiſes to the ſhores and harbours of the continent. But the feeble adminiſtration of Ethelred, and the deſtruction of the Engliſh ſhips, which had been ſuffered to rot in their harbours, encouraged that northern people to renew their ravages. They did not, however, attempt a general invaſion till by ſeveral previous trials they were aſſured of the weakneſs of the government. Having thus obtained ſufficient knowledge of the diſpoſition of the Engliſh, Guthmund and Juſtin, two Daniſh generals, landed with a powerful army at Ipſwich in Suffolk. But neither the calamities of his country, nor the danger of loſing his crown, could rouſe Ethelred from the couch of indolence. Inſtead of taking the field in perſon, or endeavouring to excite the courage of his ſubjects, he liſtened to the timorous counſel of Siricius, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and procured a reſpite from the horrors of devaſtation by a method calculated rather to ſtimulate their avarice, and augment their confidence of ſucceſs, than to procure a laſting peace to his ſubjects. He purchaſed the departure of the Danes, at the price of ten thouſand pounds. This infamous treaty was attended with the conſequences that muſt have been expected. The Danes employed the money they received from Ethelred in fitting out a more powerful fleet, not to ravage but to conquer the iſland.

A. D. 993. This formidable armament was commanded by Sweyn, king of Denmark, and Olaus, king of Norway. They ravaged Durham and Yorkſhire without oppoſition. At laſt the Engliſh army appeared, and the Danes would have paid dearly for their plunder, had not three of their leaders, all of Daniſh extraction, betrayed the cauſe they had undertaken to defend. They baſely went over to the enemy, and left their troops to be cut to pieces by the ſwords of the barbarians. Fluſhed with ſucceſs, and animated with avarice, the Danes advanced againſt London, but the citizens oppoſed the enemy with ſo much ſpirit and reſolution, that the invaders, after loſing a great number of men, were obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and make a precipitate retreat. This diſappointment raiſed the fury of the Danes to the higheſt pitch; they laid great part of Kent, Suſſex, and Hampſhire waſte, and committed the moſt horrid cruelties on the innocent inhabitants. In this diſtreſs, recourſe was again had to negotiation, and the Danes agreed to quit the country on receiving ſixteen thouſand pounds. The treaty was concluded and the enemy returned to their own country. Olaus, who embraced chriſtianity in England, and who is regiſtered among the ſaints, religiouſly obſerved the conditions of the agreement. He never more attempted to interrupt the tranquillity of England.

A. D. 999. The interval of peace purchaſed by this infamous treaty, was of no long duration. New armies of barbarians under different leaders ſoon returned, and ſpread the horror of war and devaſtation over various parts of the country. The cowardly indolence of the king, and the treacherous behaviour of his ſubjects, increaſed the dreadful calamities, and threatened the iſland with inevitable deſtruction. In this alarming criſis, an unexpected event ſaved the kingdom. The Danes whom the famous Rollo a century before had ſettled in Normandy, and who had always ſupported their countrymen in their deſcents on the Engliſh coaſt, now ſtood in need of their aſſiſtance. Robert, king of France, had defeated the army of Richard II. duke of Normandy, and threatened to drive him out of his dominions. The Danes in England flew immediately to the aſſiſtance of Richard, and the Engliſh enjoyed a ſhort reſpite from the miſeries of war.

A. D. 1000. But Ethelred was too indolent to make a proper uſe of this interval of tranquillity; the Danes when they returned from Normandy, found the kingdom as defenceleſs as before. They again commenced their ravages, and, if poſſible, exceeded their former acts of barbarity. Ethelred had now recourſe to his uſual expedients, in order to purchaſe a peace for a people he wanted courage to defend. He agreed to pay the enemy twenty-four thouſand pounds, provided they would immediately depart the kingdom. The money was raiſed by a tax levied on the people, under the denomination of Danegeld.

A. D. 1002. Ethelred was now convinced, that unleſs ſome expedient could be found to prevent the Danes from invading England, the whole kingdom muſt ſubmit to the yoke of ſlavery. He had no generals to lead his armies, no admirals to command his fleets, but thoſe of Daniſh extraction, and theſe always deſerted the cauſe of the Engliſh, and went over to the enemy in the day of battle. He therefore determined to ſtrengthen himſelf by forming an alliance with ſome foreign power, capable of aſſiſting him to repel the invaſions of the enemy. He knew the duke of Normandy capable of ſending him the ſuccours he wanted, and the Danes themſelves muſt deſiſt from their ravages, if deprived of his protection. Ambaſſadors were therefore diſpatched to Richard II. duke of Normandy, to demand his ſiſter Emma in marriage for Ethelred. The propoſals were accepted by Richard, and that princeſs, who was remarkable for her beauty, was conducted to the court of Ethelred, where the nuptials were celebrated with the utmoſt ſplendor and magnificence.

This alliance might have anſwered the moſt ſanguine expectation of Ethelred: he might have governed his kingdom in peace, had not he liſtened to the advice of perſons, who had often betrayed him, and under the pretence of inviolable attachment to his perſon, laboured to complete his ruin. Ethelred wanted capacity to perceive the tendency of their advice: he was prevailed upon to engage in a project that overwhelmed his people with miſery, and entailed eternal infamy on his memory.

Though the principal part of the Daniſh army had retreated to their own country, yet a very conſiderable number of them ſettled in England, and treated the inhabitants with every ſpecies of inſolence. Their ravages and perfidy drew on the hatred of the Engliſh. Stimulated to revenge, and with a cruelty incident to weak princes, Ethelred embraced a propoſal for making a general maſſacre of that turbulent people. Letters were diſpatched, with the utmoſt ſecrecy, to every part of the kingdom, ordering the Engliſh to put this horrid deſign in execution. The day on which the Danes uſually bathe themſelves, was choſe as the moſt proper to render it effectual. The orders were punctually obeyed: the Danes were maſſacred with ſuch circumſtances of brutality, as ſhock the ear of human nature. Neither age nor ſex were ſpared. The chriſtian and the pagan ſuffered the ſame fate. Even the famous Gunilda, ſiſter to the king of Denmark, fell a victim to barbarous brutality. She had long lived in England, had embraced the chriſtian religion, and was married to Paling, an Engliſh nobleman. When her brother Sweyn withdrew his forces from England, ſhe became an hoſtage for his duly performing the conditions of the treaty. She had always behaved with the greateſt prudence; her actions were conformable to the precepts of the goſpel. But the goodneſs of her heart had no effect to ſave her: the ſhield of virtue was held up in vain. She was devoted to periſh with her friends by the barbarous orders of a timorous monarch. Nor was her death ſufficient to ſatisfy the vengeance of barbarity. Cruelty was added to increaſe the horrors of execution. Her huſband and children were murdered before her eyes, and then ſhe herſelf ſuffered the ſame fate. But the fortitude with which ſhe underwent this horrid maſſacre, does honour to her memory. She betrayed neither fear nor timidity: not a feature in her countenance was diſtorted; ſhe was calm amidſt this ſcene of horror; and with her laſt breath told her inhuman murderers, that her death would involve the kingdom in the moſt dreadful diſtreſs.

A. D. 1003. Sweyn, who had impatiently waited for a pretence to renew hoſtilities, was now impelled to invade England from a motive of revenge; the death of his ſiſter filled his breaſt with the moſt implacable fury. He threatened to retaliate the miſeries ſuffered by his countrymen, and even devoted the whole iſland to deſtruction. He ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful army, and embarked his forces on board three hundred ſail of ſhips. The whole nation of Denmark was animated with revenge.

Cornwall firſt felt the fury of the Danes. Great part of the country was laid waſte, with ſuch complicated ſcenes of horror and diſtreſs, that the intention of Sweyn was ſufficiently evident. Deſtruction, not conqueſt, was the intention of the exaſperated Danes. The city of Exeter next became the victim of vengeance. The whole place was laid in aſhes, and the inhabitants treated with all the rage of Gothic barbarity. The alarming progreſs of Sweyn had rouſed Ethelred from his indolence. He aſſembled an army, and determined to march in perſon againſt the enemy. But he was intimidated at the approach of danger. He conferred the command of his forces on Edric Streon, duke of Mercia, and returned to his palace. The life of Edric was compoſed of a ſeries of treachery; he ſeemed born for the deſtruction of his country. He married Edgitha, daughter to Ethelred, who was rich, powerful, and inſinuating. He had more than once betrayed the ſecrets of his maſter, and even deſerted to the enemy. The late inhuman maſſacre of the Danes was principally owing to his infernal counſel. This traitor to his country was again entruſted with the command of the Engliſh army, by the weak and puſillanimous Ethelred; and even at a time when the liberties of Engliſhmen, and the exiſtence of the kingdom, depended upon the ſucceſs of this body of forces. Such prepoſterous conduct was followed by its natural conſequences: the attempts of the Engliſh to free their country from the dreadful ravages of a barbarous enemy, were rendered abortive. The ſoldiers, indeed, advanced towards the enemy with amazing intrepidity, and, with an enthuſiaſm of valour which gave every indication of ſucceſs, demanded to be led immediately againſt the Daniſh army. But Edric never deſigned to wreſt the ſtandard of victory from the enemy. He pretended to be taken ill ſuddenly, and ordered a retreat, which was conducted in ſo careleſs a manner, that the Danes fell upon the rear of the Engliſh, and put the whole army to flight.

This cheap victory, obtained by the treachery of the Engliſh general, increaſed the inſolence of Sweyn. He looked with contempt upon the forces of Ethelred. He ravaged the country without oppoſition, till his thirſt for vengeance was ſatiated with blood, and the mercenary diſpoſition of his ſoldiers gratified with plunder. He turned the country, through which he paſſed, into a deſart; and, embarking on board his ſhips, returned to his own country.

A. D. 1004. The Danes, who had acquired riches by their deſcent on England, encouraged their countrymen to make the ſame attempt. The love of booty rouſed the Danes to action. Sweyn himſelf made a deſcent in the country of the Eaſt-Angles, and laid the city of Norwich in aſhes. He met, indeed, with a noble oppoſition from Ulfketel, governor of Eaſt-Anglia. The diſtreſs of his country rouſed that patriotic nobleman to vengeance: he diſpatched a ſtrong party to burn the Daniſh fleet, while he himſelf attacked their army, diſperſed over the country in ſearch of plunder. Had his orders been executed, Sweyn would not, in all probability, have returned to his country, nor the Danes again invaded England. But the officers charged with the order for burning the Daniſh fleet, wanted ſpirit to conduct the enterprize; timidity rendered the attempt abortive. Ulfketel himſelf attacked the Daniſh forces; and, had he not been overpowered by numbers, would have obtained a complete victory. He expected to have found them in the utmoſt conſternation for the loſs of their fleet, and to have improved the opportunity to their deſtruction. He was unfortunately diſappointed; but his attacks were ſo well conducted, and made with ſuch fury, that great numbers of the Danes were ſlain in the action; and Sweyn, to avoid a ſecond engagement, embarked his forces, and returned to Denmark.

But the invaſion of the Danes was not the only diſtreſs experienced by the Engliſh: a long drought ſucceeding the ravages of the enemy, occaſioned a moſt dreadful famine. Many who had eſcaped the ſwords of the Danes, now periſhed for want. The Engliſh never experienced a more dreadful misfortune: they were driven to the brink of deſtruction; they ſunk under the weight of complicated misfortunes. Theſe were, indeed, the days of England's mourning.

A. D. 1006. This ſcourge of heaven was hardly removed, before the Danes again appeared, and renewed their ravages with their uſual brutality: they waſted the country, they laid the towns and villages in aſhes, and murdered all the inhabitants that fell into their hands. Treachery among the Engliſh officers rendered every attempt to oppoſe the enemy abortive. The country was ruined by the perfidy of the nobles. Reduced to this extremity, recourſe was again had to the only expedient that ſeemed to promiſe ſucceſs, that of purchaſing a peace from the enemy. But the Danes, grown inſolent by ſucceſs, refuſed to abandon the iſland till they had received the enormous ſum of thirty thouſand pounds.

The Engliſh ſeemed now to be rouſed to a ſenſe of their danger, and applied themſelves to provide the only defence capable of rendering the attempts of the enemy abortive. A powerful fleet was fitted out, and the pirates were ſoon obliged to fly to their own harbours for protection. But this noble armament, abundantly ſufficient to protect the nation from inſult, was rendered unſerviceable by the diſſentions that prevailed among the officers: they were ſtrangers to the virtue of forgiveneſs; they ſacrificed not their private animoſities to the ſafety of their country; they even betrayed the navy into the hands of the Danes.

The loſs of their fleet ſtruck the Engliſh with deſpair. The enemy returned, and renewed their ravages with more brutality than before. Canterbury experienced the utmoſt rage of brutal ferocity. The city had held out nineteen days againſt all the aſſaults of the enemy; but they having entered the city by the treachery of one of the inhabitants, exerciſed the moſt inhuman cruelties on the innocent citizens. Tortures, before unknown, were now exerciſed upon all without exception; neither age nor ſex were ſpared. Alphage, the archbiſhop, and the principal citizens, expired under tortures that depreſs human nature far below the brute creation. We wiſh, for the honour of religion, that truth did not oblige us to add, that the wretch who betrayed the city into the hands of the barbarous enemy, was a monk belonging to the monaſtery of St. Auguſtine; and whoſe life, a ſhort time before this event, had been ſaved by Alphage.

A. D. 1014. A total revolution in the Engliſh government now ſeemed inevitable. Every method had been tried to ſupport the ſinking ſtate of the kingdom, without effect. The treachery of the Engliſh commanders rendered every attempt abortive. It was in vain to purchaſe a peace with money. Regardleſs of promiſes, and regardleſs of oaths, the Danes broke through the moſt ſacred ſanctions; they paid not the leaſt regard to equity, to the laws of war, or to the laws of nations. In this deplorable diſtreſs, the nobles ſubmitted to Sweyn, ſwore allegiance to him, and delivered hoſtages for their good behaviour. Ethelred retired with his family to Normandy, where he was received with the greateſt marks of kindneſs and affection by Richard II.

The Daniſh monarch began his reign of uſurpation with levying heavy taxes on his ſubjects. This increaſed their misfortunes; but it was uſeleſs to complain. The Dane was a ſtranger to compaſſion; the ſoft whiſpers of humanity pleaded in vain the cauſe of a people ſinking under the burden of diſtreſs. They brooded in ſilence over their misfortunes, and gave themſelves up a prey to dejection. But fortunately for them, and fortunately for their country, this ſeaſon of calamity did not long continue; Sweyn died ſuddenly, in leſs than ſix weeks after Ethelred had left the kingdom.

The Danes immediately declared Canute king of England on the death of Sweyn his father, and imagined that no oppoſition would be made to his aſcending the throne; but they ſhould have remembered, that the exactions of Sweyn had rendered his memory deteſtable; and that a brave and hardy people, driven to deſpair, will make the moſt violent efforts for their liberty. Unanimity ſeemed now to preſide in the Britiſh council. The nobles, convinced of their error, declared for Ethelred. Canute was declared an out-law; and a deputation diſpatched to Ethelred, requeſting his return to take poſſeſſion of the throne, which had been uſurped by the enemy. Pleaſed with this teſtimony of the affection of his people, Ethelred promiſed to redreſs all their grievances, to pardon every offence which had been committed againſt his perſon and government, and to exert his whole power in the defence of his country.

On his return, he was received with the greateſt demonſtrations of joy. The people imagined, that having learned wiſdom in the ſchool of adverſity, he would govern them with more wiſdom and courage; and that the nobles, convinced of the fatal conſequences of diſcord among themſelves, would unite in oppoſing the attempts of the enemy, and ſoon reſtore the kingdom to its former ſplendor.

A. D. 1015. Canute perceived the defection of the Engliſh, and made preparations for ſeizing by conqueſt the crown he could not obtain by the ſuffrages of the people. But before he was ready to take the field, Ethelred appeared at the head of a numerous army. Surpriſed at this expeditious march of the Engliſh monarch, Canute declined an engagement, and retreated precipitately to his fleet. Nor did he continue long on the Engliſh coaſt; an event of importance called him to Denmark. His brother Harold had ſeized the throne on the death of his father, and ſeemed determined to keep poſſeſſion of it by force.

The departure of Canute removed the fears of Ethelred, who now forgot all the promiſes he made to his people. He diſcovered the ſame incapacity for government; and blindly delivered himſelf over to the counſels and directions of the traitor Edric, who had ſo often overwhelmed him with miſery and diſgrace. He even liſtened to the ſuggeſtions of that perfidious incendiary againſt two of his faithful adherents, and the firſt noblemen of his court. Edric pretended that they held a correſpondence with the Danes, and had even formed a deſign againſt his life. The timorous Ethelred believed the traitor; the noblemen were aſſaſſinated, and Ethelred confiſcated their eſtates.

But the attention of that monarch was ſoon diverted from meaſures which rendered him obnoxious to his people, by an event which threatened to put a period to his power. Canute having terminated the troubles in Denmark, embarked his army, and landed, without oppoſition, on the coaſt of Weſſex. The ravages of the Danes ſpread a general alarm through the nation. Edmund, the eldeſt ſon of Ethelred, raiſed a conſiderable body of troops in the north, while Edric levied a number of forces in Mercia. The junction of theſe forces formed a conſiderable army, and the two generals led them directly againſt the enemy. The ſoldiers placed the greateſt confidence in the great abilities of Edmund; and marched, under his banners, with the utmoſt intrepidity, againſt the invaders of their country. Had Edric been faithful, in all probability, Canute had been totally defeated. But ſincerity reſted not in the boſom of Edric: he formed a deſign to take away the life of Edmund, or deliver him into the hands of the enemy. Fortunately for himſelf and his army, the prince diſcovered the infernal contrivance juſt as the troops were making preparations for an engagement. A retreat now became abſolutely neceſſary; and Edric, finding his perfidy detected, went over to the enemy.

Canute now ravaged the country without oppoſition. The diſtreſs of the people was augmented by inſolence, and barbarity was added to deſtruction. The heart of Edmund was pierced by the miſeries of his country, but treachery prevented his affording them any relief. In the midſt of theſe dreadful ſcenes of adverſe fortune, Ethelred paid the debt of nature, in the fiftieth year of his age, and the thirty-ſeventh of his reign.

Few of the virtues that add luſtre to a crown fell to the ſhare of Ethelred. His cruelty in maſſacring the Danes has ſtained his character with infamy. His indolence, at the beginning of his reign, involved his country in misfortunes; and his attachment to the traitor Edric completed its diſtreſs. The moſt conſummate abilities would, indeed, have been hardly ſufficient to ſave the nation at this dangerous criſis, when diſſentions prevailed among the counſellors, and treachery among the generals. The timorous diſpoſition of Ethelred was ill adapted to hold the reins of government in thoſe times of danger and diſtraction. He wanted that fortitude which was neceſſary to ſupport him amidſt ſuch complicated ſcenes of national diſtreſs; and that intrepidity which would have animated him to puniſh treachery, and retaliate on the invaders of his country all the miſeries they had inflicted upon an innocent people.

Ethelred was not, however, wholly deſtitute of virtues. He enacted ſeveral excellent laws, by which the property and ſafety of the ſubject were ſecured, both from the oppreſſive power of the great, and the illegal innovations of the artful.

EDMUND II. ſurnamed IRONSIDE.

A. D. 1016. IF valour and intrepidity, blended with compaſſion, and directed by prudence, could have ſaved the nation from the yoke of ſlavery, Edmund would have accompliſhed the noble deſign. But the power of the enemy, and the treachery of pretended friends, rendered the taſk ſuperior to human abilities. Canute, at the head of a victorious army, threatened the deſtruction of Engliſh liberty. Unanimity was abſolutely neceſſary at this alarming criſis; but Edmund had reaſon to fear, that both his nobility and prelates were deeply tinctured with perfidy. The ſoul of Edmund, however, was ſuperior to fear: he nobly exerted all his abilities in the cauſe of his country; and having raiſed an army in Weſſex, took the field againſt the invader.

London had always continued faithful to the family of Edgar, and repelled every attempt that had been made againſt it. Canute well knew the importance of that city; he conſidered it as the principal ſupport of Edmund, and that both muſt ſtand or fall together. He therefore attempted to inveſt the city in the abſence of Edmund; but he ſaw no hopes of ſucceſs, unleſs he was maſter of the river both above and below the bridge, in order to prevent proviſions from being carried into the city by boats from the country. To effect this deſign, he dug a deep canal on the Surry ſide, through which he turned the current of the river, and, by that artifice, drew his ſhips above the bridge. He was now maſter of the ſtream, both above and below the city, which he ſurrounded with his works. But the Londoners defended the place with ſuch obſtinacy, and made ſo many ſucceſsful ſallies, that Canute was obliged to raiſe the ſiege, after loſing a conſiderable part of his army.

Edmund was advancing to the relief of his capital, when Canute abandoned the undertaking. At laſt the two armies met at Penne, in Somerſetſhire, and a bloody battle enſued. The victory was long doubtful, but at laſt declared in favour of Edmund; and Canute was obliged to retire to Wincheſter, to recruit his army.

The two kings now ſeemed determined to put an end to the war by a deciſive battle. They met at Sceorſtan, on the borders of Glouceſterſhire. The battle was fought with the utmoſt intrepidity by both armies; and night put an end to the conteſt, before any advantage had been gained on either ſide. As ſoon as the morning appeared, the battle was renewed with the ſame fury as before. Edmund flew from rank to rank, was preſent in every danger, and marked his tracks with ſlaughter. Victory hovered over his ſtandard, and was on the point of declaring in his favour, when the traitor Edric, by a ſtratagem, changed the fortune of the day. He cut off the head of one Oſmer, whoſe countenance greatly reſembled that of Edmund, fixed it upon the point of a ſpear, and ſhewing it in triumph, called out to the Engliſh, “Behold the head of your king! Edmund is no “more!” The forces of Edmund were ſeized with conſternation; and he was obliged to raiſe his helmet, before he could convince them of their miſtake; but he could not, by all his efforts, regain the advantage he had loſt. The victory was again doubtful, when night put an end to the ſcene of ſlaughter.

Edmund waited impatiently for the morning, not doubting but he ſhould ſoon obtain a complete victory over the Daniſh forces: but the firſt bluſhes of the dawn convinced him that no enemy was near. Canute, dreading the conſequence of a third engagement, had taken the advantage of the night to retreat from the field of battle, and was then at too great a diſtance for Edmund to fall upon his rear.

The infamous Edric now returned to Edmund's camp, and, with all the marks of ſincere contrition, implored his pardon for his former conduct. The ſoul of Edmund was too ſuſceptible of compaſſion; he believed the traitor's repentance to be real, and again admitted him into his favour. Succeſs, for ſome time, attended the ſtandards of Edmund; ſeveral parties of the Danes were defeated, and Canute was determined to riſk his fortune on one deciſive action. Edmund attacked the enemy with an irreſiſtible fury; and the Daniſh army muſt have been cut to pieces, had not the traitor Edric once more defeated the efforts of Edmund. Inſtead of charging the Daniſh army, he fled from the field of battle, at the head of the wing under his command. The flight of ſo large a part of the army ſtruck the Engliſh with a pannic; nor were all the attempts of Edmund ſufficient to rally the broken ſquadrons, and lead them once more againſt the enemy. A dreadful ſlaughter enſued, and Canute triumphed over the ſtandards of Edmund.

But the courage of that prince was not to be depreſſed by misfortunes. He applied himſelf, with the utmoſt alacrity, to recruit his forces, and ſoon found himſelf at the head of an army ſufficient to diſpute the palm of victory with the enemy. Canute was aſtoniſhed to ſee Edmund again approaching with the utmoſt intrepidity, and was alarmed for the conſequences. He had purchaſed the laſt victory with the blood of many of his beſt officers, and even owed his ſucceſs to treachery. He, however, led his forces againſt the Engliſh; but both armies ſeemed unwilling to engage. The two princes acted, on this occaſion, with the utmoſt caution; they ſtood oppoſite to each other, but neither gave the ſignal to engage. During this dreadful interval of inaction, a captain in the Engliſh army advanced, and, in a florid ſpeech, diſplayed the diſtreſs which this fatal war had brought upon the innocent inhabitants, in the moſt pathetic manner; and obſerved, that as the two kings were equal with regard to perſonal courage, it would be an act of humanity, by preventing the total depopulation of the iſland, for the leaders to put a final period to their quarrel by ſingle combat; adding, that the victor ſhould be acknowledged ſovereign by both armies. This propoſal obtained an univerſal approbation. A general ſhout enſued; the two leaders ſubmitted to the propoſed deciſion; and retired, with a ſmall number of their friends, into the iſle of Alney, an iſland in the Severn; their troops lining the oppoſite banks of the ſtream, and waiting impatiently the event of a combat, which was to decide the fate of the kingdom. Canute perceiving that he was overpowered by the great ſtrength and remarkable activity of Edmund, propoſed to make a diviſion of the kingdom, and terminate their quarrel by an act of mutual friendſhip. The generous Edmund liſtened to the propoſal; he was more deſirous of healing the wounds of his bleeding country, than of being placed in the ſeat of power. The fury of the paſſions immediately ſubſided, and malevolence gave place to kindneſs. The two princes threw away their ſwords, and flew into the embraces of each other. Both armies catched the generous flame of reconciliation, and gave a general ſhout of undiſſembled joy. The treaty was concluded in the preſence of the nobles and principal men of both nations; by which it was ſtipulated, that Edmund ſhould retain all the country to the ſouth of the Thames, together with the city of London, Weſſex, Eaſt-Anglia, and Eſſex; and the reſt of the kingdom to be ceded to Canute.

We have followed Hovenden, and Ethelred, abbot of Rieval, in relating the circumſtances which attended the reconciliation of Edmund and Canute; but think it neceſſary to add, that ſeveral of our ancient hiſtorians mention not the combat between the two kings; though they all agree, that a peace was concluded without a battle.

The Engliſh now flattered themſelves that a final period was put to their diſtreſs; that diſcord would be ſucceeded by harmony, and the noiſy horrors of war give place to the calm pleaſures of domeſtic peace. But the malignant breath of treachery blaſted all their hopes: the lovely plant of Britiſh liberty was cut down by the hand of a traitor. Ever reſtleſs, and ever uneaſy; terrified at the turpitude of his own crimes, and dreading the effects of Edmund's reſentment, Edric determined to prevent the ſtroke of juſtice, by committing an act that ſhocks humanity. He bribed two ruffians, acquainted with every vice, to aſſaſſinate his ſovereign. The attempt ſucceeded, and Edmund fell a victim to perfidy.

The reign of that prince was too ſhort; and even that ſmall interval ſo crowded with events, that his virtues could not be ſufficiently diſplayed to form an adequate idea of his character. It may, however, be ſaid with juſtice, that his courage was invincible, his activity amazing, his generoſity unbounded. He was intrepid in danger, patient in adverſity, modeſt in ſucceſs. He was a friend to the brave, a friend to the virtuous, a friend to his country. But as virtues become vices when carried to exceſs, ſo the magnanimous generoſity of Edmund degenerated into weakneſs. By pardoning Edric, who had ſo often betrayed the intereſt of his country, he loſt at once his kingdom and his life.

CANUTE THE GREAT.

A. D. 1017. EDMUND left two ſons, but they ſucceeded not to the throne of their father. Canute ſeized the ſceptre of Edmund, but endeavoured to conceal his uſurpation under the appearance of juſtice. He ſummoned a general aſſembly of the nobility and clergy, and produced witneſſes, ſuborned for that purpoſe, to declare, that in the treaty between the two kings, it was ſtipulated, that in caſe of the death of either of the contractors, the other ſhould ſucceed to his dominions, preferably to his own ſons. The members were aſtoniſhed at this new claim; but the dread of Canute's reſentment ſtifled all oppoſition. The voice of truth was ſilenced by the frowns of power. The aſſembly ſwore allegiance to Canute, and he was crowned king of England.

But, though he had ſucceeded in his attempt upon the government, he was perſuaded that the Engliſh would embrace the firſt favourable opportunity of placing one of the deſcendants of Edmund on the throne of his anceſtors. He, therefore, ſent the young princes to the court of Sweden, requeſting that they might be aſſaſſinated. Shocked at the thought of committing ſo horrid a crime, and afraid of the reſentment of Canute, the Swediſh monarch ſent the young princes ſecretly to Solomon, king of Hungary, who received them with the utmoſt kindneſs, and gave them an education ſuitable to their birth. Edmund, the eldeſt, died ſoon after; but his brother, Edward, married Agatha, daughter to the emperor Henry II.

The ſons of Edmund were not the only perſons whom Canute thought proper to remove for his own ſecurity. Several of the principal nobility, who were ſtill attached to the race of their ancient kings, fell victims to his ſafety. The traitor Edric ſuffered the puniſhment due to his crimes. He had the aſſurance to reproach Canute with ingratitude; and complained, that the rewards he had received were inadequate to his ſervices. Provoked at his inſolence, and deteſting his character, Canute immediately ordered him to be beheaded, and his body to be flung into the Thames. Thus periſhed Edric, whoſe crimes were a blemiſh to human nature, and have branded his memory with eternal infamy.

One obſtacle ſtill remained, and which required policy, rather than force, to remove it. Richard, duke of Normandy, who had given protection to Alfred and Edward, the two ſons of Ethelred, was diſpoſed to ſupport the claim of his nephews. He demanded the crown of their brother Edmund. Canute was alarmed at the meſſage of Richard. He well knew the Engliſh were ſtrongly attached to their ancient race of kings, and that Richard was able to give them the moſt powerful aſſiſtance. Edmund, unſupported by any foreign power, had wreſted the ſceptre from his hands, had he not been betrayed by an infamous traitor. Richard was a warlike prince, beloved by his ſubjects, and favoured by the Danes in general. Canute ſaw the danger, and determined to prevent it. He ſent a ſplendid embaſſy to Richard, demanding his ſiſter Emma in marriage, and offering his own ſiſter, Heſtritha, to the Norman prince. The propoſals were accepted, the nuptials were celebrated, and the double marriage cemented their friendſhip.

A. D. 1018. The wars of Canute had exhauſted his treaſury, and his officers and partiſans were ſtill unrewarded. He, therefore, loaded the Engliſh, particularly the citizens of London, with impoſts. Neceſſity, rather than tyranny, induced him to exerciſe a ſeverity not agreeable to his diſpoſition. The wiſdom of his adminiſtration ſoon after obliterated the impreſſions of this rigorous treatment. He made no diſtinction between the Engliſh and the Danes. He confirmed the Saxon laws and inſtitutions. He diſtributed juſtice impartially: no reſpect of perſons, no favour was obtained by either party. Innocence was ſure of protection, the guilty of puniſhment. Such meaſures ſoon conciliated the affections of the Engliſh. Canute was no longer conſidered as an uſurper. The two nations became one people; and happineſs and tranquillity ſucceeded a long ſeries of troubles and diſtreſs.

A. D. 1019. A war having broke out between the Danes and Vandals, Canute found it neceſſary to viſit his hereditary dominions, which were threatened with deſtruction. The Vandals had defeated the Daniſh army, and carried fire and ſword into the heart of their country. The utmoſt expedition therefore was uſed by Canute in fitting out a fleet, and embarking a number of forces ſufficient to ſtop the ravages of the enemy. A body of Engliſh troops, under the command of earl Godwin, one of the moſt powerful noblemen, was ſhipped for this expedition. The Vandals, not expecting Canute was landed in his dominions, took no care to guard the avenues to their camp, ſo that the Daniſh monarch marched unmoleſted to attack them; but before he could reach the enemy, night overtook him, and he was obliged to encamp. During the night earl Godwin, without communicating his deſign, threw himſelf, at the head of the Engliſh, upon the camp of the enemy, and obtained a complete victory. Charmed at this unexpected ſucceſs, Canute loaded the Engliſh with favours, and gave earl Godwin his ſiſter in marriage.

A. D. 1020. Canute on his return to England, removed every officer that had been guilty of oppreſſion in his abſence. Even Eric, duke of Northumberland, formerly one of the principal officers in the army, was baniſhed the kingdom. But what ſtill endeared him to the people was the ſorrow he expreſſed for the multitudes that had fell victims to his ambition. He built a church at Aſhdown, on the ſpot where he fought a bloody battle with Edmund; and founded chauntries in thoſe places where any ſlaughter had been made of the Engliſh. Every act of ſuperſtition was ſure to gain the affections of the people. Canute was now eſteemed for his piety and virtue.

A. D. 1028. Olave, king of Norway, had for ſome years laboured to reſtrain the ferocity of his ſubjects, and render their lives conformable to the precepts of religion. He would not ſuffer them to purſue their favourite profeſſion of piracy and plunder. Theſe reſtraints were odious to the Norwegians, and they determined to dethrone him. Canute took advantage of theſe diviſions, landed in Norway at the head of a powerful army, and drove Olave from the throne. And Canute, by being maſter of three great kingdoms, became the moſt powerful ſovereign in Europe. His ambition was now ſatisfied; but his own reflections on the fleeting nature of ſublunary objects, ſoon convinced him of the vanity of human greatneſs. Hiſtory has preſerved a very remarkable inſtance of his reverence for the power of the ſupreme Being, and the limited authority of earthly monarchs. One day when his courtiers were carrying their flatteries to an unbounded height, Canute, who then kept his court at Southampton, led them to the ſea ſide, and ordering a chair to be placed on the beach, near the ſurface of the tide, which was then flowing apace, ſeated himſelf, and with a majeſtic tone of voice thus addreſſed himſelf to the water: "Thou, " O ſea, art a part of my dominions, and the land " whereon I ſit is mine: my orders were never broke " with impunity. I therefore charge thee not to " encroach any farther on my land, nor preſume to " wet the feet of thy ſovereign." But deaf to his voice and fearleſs of his power, the ſea continued its uſual courſe, and waſhed him with its billows. On which he roſe from his ſeat, and turning to his courtiers, "Behold," ſaid he, "the narrow limits of " mortal power! the ſceptred hand of human greatneſs exerts its force in vain. The ſea rolls on in " contempt of its authority: the ſtorms of heaven " make no diſtinction between the monarch and the " ſlave. Learn then from this example to ſet a proper boundary to odious flattery: and remember " that he only deſerves unlimited praiſes, who holds " in his hands the powers of nature, and whoſe " voice both the winds and the ſea obey." It is added, that Canute would never after wear his crown; but ordered it to be placed on the head of the crucifix in the cathedral of Wincheſter.

Canute now devoted his whole time to what was then conſidered as the nobleſt and moſt acceptable acts of piety, the founding churches and monaſteries. He granted a charter to the celebrated monaſtery of St. Edmondſbury, by which all its lands and privileges were confirmed. He gave the profits of the port of Sandwich to Chriſt-church in Canterbury, and founded a monaſtery of Benedictine monks in Norfolk. But in order to eſtabliſh his character for piety beyond even the whiſpers of ſuſpicion, he undertook a pilgrimage to Rome, and engaged all the princes through whoſe dominions he paſſed, to exempt the Engliſh pilgrims and merchants from all tolls and duties, which had before been exacted from them. He viſited every ſhrine, and paid his devotions before every relic; but what rendered him a more welcome gueſt at the court of Rome, were the prodigious ſums he laviſhed in that city: riches were more welcome to the pope than devotions.

Canute on his return was received by his ſubjects with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy. All the laws paſſed by the former kings of England, particularly thoſe of Ethelred, were enforced; ſeveral new ones, adapted to the times, were added; and the moſt proper methods taken to render the people happy.

But while he was employed in cultivating the arts of peace, and endeavouring to diſſeminate the ſeeds of virtue in every part of his kingdom, his attention was diverted from theſe offices of humanity, to ſupport the dignity of his crown. Duncan, grandſon to Malcolm II. king of Scotland, being in poſſeſſion of Cumberland, refuſed to do homage to Canute for that fief, pretending it was due only to ſuch kings as were natives of England. Provoked at this inſolent allegation of the Scottiſh prince, Canute marched at the head of a powerful army: but by the interpoſition of the prelates and nobility of both kingdoms a peace was concluded without a battle; Duncan agreeing to pay homage for that fief, to the kings of England.

A. D. 1035. This was the laſt military action of Canute; he ſpent the remainder of his life in acts of piety and devotion. Tranquillity was eſtabliſhed in every part of his dominions, and he paid the debt of nature in the arms of peace.

Contradiction ſeems to have been a principal feature in the character of Canute. His youth was marked with blood and cruelty: his age with piety and devotion. He ſacrificed every thing in the morning of his reign to ambition; in the evening to piety. The ſceptre was at firſt the rod of tyranny; at laſt the index of mercy. No monarch ever raiſed popular odium ſo high, or allayed it ſo effectually. He was a great general, a conſummate ſtateſman, a wiſe legiſlator. He was perfectly acquainted with the temper of the human heart, and took care to turn the various diſpoſitions of his ſubjects to his own advantage. When age had ſoftened the paſſions of youth, and the precepts of religion had eraſed the impreſſions of a ferocious education, Canute became a moſt excellent prince; and the virtues he practiſed during the peaceable interval of his adminiſtration, gave him a much better claim to the title of Great, than all his victories. His laws are founded on the baſis of juſtice and humanity; they leave hardly any grievance without redreſs. Though ſurrounded with flatterers, he was impregnable to all their attacks; in the midſt of his victories he poſſeſſed humility.

The virtues he practiſed at the cloſe of his reign, totally obliterated his vices at the beginning. He lived beloved, and died lamented.

Canute left two ſons by his firſt wife, Alfwin, daughter of Elfhelm, earl of Northampton, named Sweyn and Harold: and by Emma, who ſurvived him, a ſon, named Hardicanute; and a daughter, named Gunhilda. Sweyn was placed upon the throne of Norway before the death of his father; and Gunhilda was married to the emperor Henry III. That princeſs, ſome time after her marriage, was accuſed of adultery; and the only means of vindicating her conduct, was by ſingle combat. The accuſer was a perſon of gigantic ſize, and famous both for his ſtrength and valour. For ſome time, no perſon could be found to undertake the vindication of Gunhilda's innocence. At length her page, who was a mere ſtrippling when compared to his antagoniſt, entered the liſts. The power of the champions was, indeed, unequal; but the youth having the good fortune to cut the ſinews of one of the legs of his antagoniſt, he fell to the ground; and the page purſuing his advantage, cut off his head, and laid it at Gunhilda's feet. Her innocence being thus vindicated, the princeſs renounced the emperor's bed, notwithſtanding his earneſt entreaties of forgiveneſs; and became a nun in a monaſtery at Bruges, where ſhe died.

HAROLD I. ſurnamed HAREFOOT.

A. D. 1036. According to the treaty made by Canute with Richard, duke of Normandy, Hardicanute, Emma's ſon, ſhould have enjoyed the Engliſh crown on the death of his father. But Canute thought proper to place Hardicanute on the throne of Denmark, and left the crown of England to Harold. This occaſioned a great diſſention in England; the people were divided into parties. The Engliſh declared for Hardicanute; the Danes for Harold. A civil war was thought inevitable; till the two brothers, in order to prevent the depopulation of the iſland, agreed to make a diviſion of the kingdom. Accordingly, all the country on the north ſide of the Thames was allotted to Harold, and the reſt of the kingdom to Hardicanute. But, as the latter was in Denmark, it was ſtipulated, that Emma, aſſiſted by earl Godwin, ſhould govern his part of the kingdom during his abſence.

The ambition of Harold was, however, far from being ſatisfied with part of the kingdom; he aſpired to the whole. Godwin was the only perſon capable of preventing his deſigns, and Harold took an effectual method to gain him over to his intereſt. Avarice was the ruling paſſion of that powerful nobleman, and Harold determined to gratify it. He, therefore, ſeized the treaſures of his father Canute, depoſited at Wincheſter, though they were the real property of Emma. Godwin could not withſtand the offers of Harold; he abandoned the intereſt of Hardicanute, and embraced that of his rival. Harold was declared king of England, and Emma devoted her time to works of piety and devotion.

The great talents of that princeſs were well known to Godwin, who dreaded the conſequences of a revolution. He inſinuated to Harold, that his throne could not be eſtabliſhed while the children of Emma ſurvived, and were aſſiſted by the intereſt and counſels of their mother. Harold ſaw the propriety of this remark, and formed a deſign for getting the two ſons of Ethelred, Alfred and Edward, into his power. A letter was accordingly forged, in the name of Emma, inviting them into England. The princes complied with what they thought the requeſt of their mother; and Godwin ſeized Alfred, after killing about ſix hundred of his attendants, and carried him to London. Harold, who poſſeſſed all the cruelties of the Danes, ſent Alfred to the monaſtery of Ely, where his eyes were put out, and he ſoon after expired under the moſt excruciating tortures. A timely retreat ſecured the ſafety of Edward. Emma was ordered to depart the kingdom; and ſhe accordingly retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders, where ſhe met with a kind reception, and Bruges was aſſigned for her reſidence.

A. D. 1038. Harold had now no competitor in the iſland for the crown of England; and, to prevent his brother, Hardicanute, from attempting any thing to his prejudice, he fitted out a powerful fleet to guard the coaſts from every inſult. The tax laid on the people, to ſupport this naval armament, occaſioned great uneaſineſs: the Welſh broke out into open rebellion, and laid a conſiderable part of the country waſte. An Engliſh army, however, ſoon reduced the inſurgents; and Harold, to prevent any future diſturbances in thoſe parts, paſſed a law, by which every Welſhman who croſſed Offa's dykes without permiſſion, was condemned to loſe his right hand.

A. D. 1040. The violence and cruelties of Harold had now procured him the hatred of his ſubjects, and would, probably, ſoon have deprived him of his crown. Hardicanute, his brother, was at Bruges with a powerful ſquadron, under pretence of paying a viſit to his mother; but it was ſtrongly ſuſpected that he had other views. The loſs of his Engliſh dominions had always ſat heavy on his mind. But whatever was his real intention, an event happened which baniſhed all the ideas of hoſtility. Harold paid the debt of nature on the eighteenth of May, and left the throne vacant for his brother, without a battle.

Harold had not the leaſt pretenſions to any of the good qualities of his father. He was headſtrong, obſtinate, brutal, and cruel. He was free from the ſuperſtition which prevailed in his time; he reverenced not the principles of piety. His vices have been handed down to us in odious colours; his virtues, if he poſſeſſed any, are buried in oblivion.

HARDICANUTE, or CANUTE II.

A. D. 1040. THE Engliſh had ſo ſeverely felt the miſeries of a civil war, that they made no oppoſition to Hardicanute's aſcending the throne. But he ſoon gave ſo odious an inſtance of his violence and inhumanity, that he loſt the affections of his ſubjects. He ordered the body of his brother Harold to be dug up, and thrown into the Thames. The body was found by ſome fiſhermen, and decently interred. Hardicamute was offended at this office of humanity, and again exerciſed againſt it the ſame indecent revenge.

This brutal and diſguſting conduct excited the indignation of the people. The exaction of heavy impoſts augmented the diſcontent. Powerful fleets were fitted out when no danger threatened the iſland: the neighbouring nations were all at peace with England. What increaſed the diſtreſs of the people, was a ſcarcity of corn. The ſeaſon had been unfavourable to the fruits of the earth, and the nation was threatened with the dreadful conſequences of a famine.

A. D. 1041. Alarmed at theſe apprehenſions, and exaſperated at the cruel perſeverance of the ſovereign, the inhabitants of Worceſter flew to arms, and put two of the king's collectors to death. The enraged monarch, who never felt for the miſeries of others, ſent a body of troops to revenge the inſult. His orders were obeyed with the brutality ſo conſpicuous in the character of their maſter; the city was pillaged, and laid in aſhes. The inſurgents were too well acquainted with the cruel diſpoſition of Hardicanute, to wait the approach of his meſſengers of deſtruction; they retired into an iſland in the Severn, and took proper precautions for their defence. The troops, after deſtroying the city, advanced to attack this reſolute handful of men, who were determined to ſell their lives as dear as poſſible. The aſſault was begun with great fury, but without ſucceſs: it was often repeated, but always rendered abortive. Perceiving all their efforts were in vain, the troops abandoned the enterprize, and left them at liberty to return to their deſolated city.

Fortunately for England, Hardicanute did not long wield the ſceptre. His reign of cruelty was ſoon terminated. Two years put a period to his power. He died ſuddenly at Lambeth, while he was celebrating the nuptials of a Daniſh nobleman.

The principal features in the portrait of Hardicanute were indolence, gluttony, cruelty, and exceſs. His courage was problematical; and the grievous burdens he laid upon his ſubjects, ſufficiently prove, that he acted rather as an enemy than a king. He had no claim to the glorious title of being the father of his country. His palace was one continued ſcene of gluttony and drunkenneſs; and it is ſtrongly ſuſpected, that he put a period to his life by eating immoderately. He always ſhewed the utmoſt filial duty to his mother, and fraternal affection to his brother Edward. Theſe were his only virtues; his vices were innumerable.

EDWARD THE CONFESSOR.

A. D. 1042. THE Daniſh yoke had long been heavily felt by the Engliſh, and an opportunity now offered of ſhaking it off for ever. Sweyn, the only ſurviving ſon of Canute the Great, was in Norway, and in no condition of making a deſcent on England with any hopes of ſucceſs. Edward, the ſon of Ethelred, was the only remaining branch of the Saxon kings, except the ſons of Edmund, who were then at the court of Hungary, and almoſt forgotten by their countrymen. Godwin was alone capable of oppoſing, with any chance of ſucceſs, the elevation of Edward. The friendſhip of that powerful nobleman was, therefore, thought neceſſary, but it was feared it could not be eaſily obtained. He was univerſally conſidered as the murderer of young Alfred, and the principal cauſe of all the misfortunes that had attended Emma. It was, therefore, natural for him to imagine, that Edward would take the firſt opportunity of revenging all the miſeries he had inflicted on the family of Ethelred. The advantages which it was hoped the nation would reap from the acceſſion of Edward, however, ſtifled all private animoſity. Godwin undertook to ſupport the intereſt of that prince, who engaged to marry his daughter, and continue the earl and his ſons in the poſts they had, for ſome time, enjoyed.

The election of a king came on in an aſſembly of the nobles ſummoned for that purpoſe at Gillingham; where Godwin, in a long and eloquent ſpeech, diſplayed the advantages of placing Edward on the throne of his anceſtors, and the miſeries that would, probably, overwhelm their country, if Sweyn were permitted to ſeize the ſceptre of power. At the concluſion of his ſpeech, he raiſed Edward in the midſt of the aſſembly, and cried out, "Behold your "king." No oppoſition was made to the attempt of Godwin; Edward was elected by the unanimous voice of the whole aſſembly.

A. D. 1043. The great ſcarcity that prevailed in England, rendered it prudent to defer the coronation of Edward; but as ſoon as that calamity was removed, he received the crown of his anceſtors, with great ſolemnity, at Wincheſter. This ceremony was attended with ſome inſult and virulence againſt the Danes; but the moderation with which Edward held the reins of government, reconciled them to his adminiſtration: they ſoon became blended with the Engliſh, and formed one people. No farther mention is made of any difference between them.

Edward began his reign with an act very incompatible with his character as a ſaint. He ſtripped his mother Emma of all the treaſures ſhe had amaſſed, and ſhut her up in a monaſtery. It is alſo ſaid, that he accuſed her of a criminal intercourſe with Alwin, biſhop of Worceſter, and other notorious crimes. No other method remained for Emma to vindicate her innocence, than by undergoing the fiery ordeal. She ſubmitted to the deciſion, which was then conſidered as an infallible teſt of innocence, and was acquitted: ſhe walked over nine red-hot ploughſhares, unhurt. This ſtory is, by many of our Engliſh hiſtorians, conſidered as a monkiſh fable, and, as ſuch, exploded. It muſt, indeed, be granted, that neither the Saxon annals, Cadmer, nor William of Malmſbury, have mentioned this circumſtance; which ſeems too remarkable to have been omitted, had it really happened. But however that be, the diſgrace of the queen-mother was not attended with any dangerous conſequences.

A. D. 1045. The great power of the Godwin family now filled the nation with apprehenſions. Sweyn, one of his ſons, whoſe paſſions hurried him to the commiſſion of many crimes, attempted the chaſtity of an abbeſs, and was baniſhed the kingdom. But he was not idle in his retreat; he fitted out a fleet of ſhips, and committed ſeveral outrages on the Engliſh coaſts. He afterwards murdered earl Bearn, who had kindly undertaken to procure his pardon from Edward. Theſe enormous crimes ſeemed to render him an object of deteſtation, rather than of mercy; but the great power of his father, joined with the intereſt of ſeveral of the prelates and principal nobility, procured his pardon, and he returned again to England.

Edward's behaviour, on this occaſion, gained him the applauſe of the whole kingdom; but he ſoon forfeited the eſteem of his ſubjects by the attention he paid to foreigners. His education at the court of Normandy had formed ſtrong attachments to the manners, cuſtoms, and inhabitants of that province. His court was filled with Normans, and the principal dignities of the church were conferred on theſe ſtrangers. Their language, their cuſtoms, and their laws, became faſhionable in England. Their intereſt was ſoon ſo great, that no favour was to be obtained from Edward, but by their interceſſion. Godwin perceived their influence, and was alarmed. He made loud remonſtrances to the king, but in vain; Edward continued firm to his attachments. Finding no redreſs from the throne, he complained to the people, and declared openly, that the good of the nation was in danger of being ſacrificed to ſome foreign intereſt. The people catched the infection; and Godwin perceiving he ſhould be ſupported by his countrymen, determined to take the firſt favourable opportunity of making theſe foreign favourites feel the effects of his reſentment.

A. D. 1048. He did not wait long; an event ſoon offered, which inflamed the minds of the Engliſh, and ſeemed to threaten the nation with the horrors of a civil war. Euſtace, count of Boulogne, having paid a viſit to the king, ſet out for Dover on his return to his own dominions. One of his ſervants, who was ſent before his maſter, to provide lodgings in the town, behaving in a very inſolent manner, a fray enſued, in which the Frenchman loſt his life. Exaſperated at the fate of his ſervant, Euſtace and his attendants fell upon the inhabitants, and ſeveral of them were ſlain in the conflict: the houſe, where the quarrel happened, was broke open, and the maſter fell a ſacrifice to the fury of Euſtace. The town was now alarmed; a general tumult enſued, in which twenty of the inhabitants were killed, and nineteen of the Count's ſervants. Euſtace himſelf found it difficult to make his retreat. He returned to Edward, attended by his followers who had eſcaped the fury of the townſmen, and made the moſt grievous complaints; but repreſented the circumſtances in the moſt partial manner. Candour was ſacrificed to paſſion, and truth to revenge. Edward, without examining carefully into the real cauſes of this inſurrection, ordered Godwin to march immediately into the place, at the head of a body of troops, and lay the town under military execution.

Surpriſed at the peremptory orders of the king, and determined to ſupport the liberties of his country, Godwin remonſtrated with his Majeſty: he juſtly obſerved, that by proceeding in ſo precipitate a manner, the conſequences would be highly injurious to his character, and deſtroy at once the claim and liberty of the ſubject: that the meaneſt perſon in his dominions had a right to be heard in his own defence; and that to inflict puniſhment before the party is convicted, would be an infringement of every law, either human or divine.

Edward had been ſo long uſed to the language of flattery, that he was aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of Godwin. The free manner in which he delivered his remonſtrances provoked Edward; he conſidered it as an inſult on majeſty. But Godwin was not to be intimidated by the frowns of power; he refuſed to obey the orders of his majeſty; he choſe rather to ſuffer the conſequences of diſobedience, than inflict puniſhment on the innocent, or ſacrifice the liberties of his country at the ſhrine of foreign inſolence.

Edward, either convinced of the injuſtice of his orders, or fearful of the reſentment of his ſubjects, did not inſiſt any farther on being obeyed; but determined to puniſh Godwin for his behaviour. An opportunity ſoon offered. The Welſh had taken advantage of the late diſturbances, and made inroads into the Engliſh territories, of which Sweyn was governor. Edward ſummoned a meeting of the nobility at Glouceſter, to enquire into the cauſe of theſe diſorders. The Welſh appeared before Godwin and his ſon reached the aſſembly, and accuſed them as the aggreſſors. The firſt impreſſions determined Edward; he did not give himſelf the trouble of hearing both parties; his meaſures were determined by the repreſentations of the firſt complaint. Nothing leſs than the deſtruction of Godwin and his whole family could ſatisfy the vengeance of Edward: they were accordingly cited before the council; and, on refuſing to obey the ſummons, were baniſhed the kingdom. Godwin himſelf retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders; and Harold to Ireland, where they found ſhelter from the frowns of incenſed majeſty. Edward was a ſtranger to the tender feelings of humanity: he was not ſatisfied with the baniſhment of Godwin and his ſons; his amiable conſort, the accompliſhed Edgitha, alſo felt the weight of his reſentment. He ſtripped her of every thing valuable, and confined her in the monaſtery of Werewell; determined (ſays Malmſbury) that ſhe alone ſhould not enjoy peace and plenty, while her huſband, and the reſt of her family, were plunged into difficulties, and abandoned to diſtreſs.

A. D. 1050. The tax, known by the name of Danegeld, had long been odious to the Engliſh. The reaſons which originally rendered it neceſſary had long ſince ceaſed, but the impoſt was ſtill continued; the danger was over, but the people were ſtill oppreſſed with the burden. Edward, perſuaded he could not perform an action more acceptable to the Engliſh, aboliſhed it. He went farther; he diſtributed all the ſurplus remaining in his treaſury among the original owners. This act of kindneſs endeared him to his ſubjects; they became more ſtrongly attached to his perſon.

About this time, William, duke of Normandy, paid a viſit to Edward, and was received with the warmeſt marks of gratitude. He had protected and ſupported Edward in his exile, and merited a ſuitable return. The duke was highly ſatisfied with his reception, and returned to Normandy loaded with preſents. This viſit, though it then gave no alarm to the people, proved fatal, in its conſequences, to the liberties of England. William pretended, that during his ſtay, Edward had conſtituted him heir to his dominions; and on this weak pretence, though wholly deſtitute of truth, he founded a claim that overthrew the conſtitution of this country.

A. D. 1052. Soon after the departure of William duke of Normandy, Emma paid the debt of nature; the cruel behaviour of a ſon put an end to a life which gave him being. Filial duty was not one of the virtues of Edward. The character of that princeſs has been treated with great rigour by moſt of our Engliſh hiſtorians, but without producing a ſingle fact to prove ſhe deſerved it. The monks, indeed, who will not admit the character of Edward to be ſtained with a ſingle vice, were under a neceſſity of blackening the memory of Emma; becauſe, if ſhe was innocent, Edward muſt have been guilty of the flagitious crime of ingratitude to a parent, and of bringing down the grey hairs of his mother with ſorrow to the grave. But ſurely there is no reaſon for hiſtorians of theſe times to follow their example; they have no cauſe to ſupport at the expence of truth. Juſtice ſhould be impartially adminiſtered, and every real blemiſh impartially diſplayed, even though it ſhould be found on the robe of a canonized monarch.

Godwin had now raiſed a powerful ſquadron; and being joined by his ſon Harold, with another fleet from Ireland, inſulted the coaſts of England, and entered the mouth of the Thames. Edward was greatly alarmed; the city of London was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion; and the king marched, at the head of an army, to oppoſe the landing of the inſurgents. Godwin ſaw the danger that might attend a battle, and was willing to avoid it. He ſent a very ſubmiſſive meſſage to Edward, proteſting, in the ſtrongeſt manner, that he had no other intention than that of ſubmitting his actions to a fair trial; nor wiſhed any thing more than that of being reſtored to his honours and eſtates. The principal nobility, who had imputed the ſole cauſe of theſe diſorders to the king's predilection for foreigners, interceded with the king in favour of Godwin and his family. Convinced that it would be at once imprudent and ineffectual to oppoſe their powerful interceſſion, Edward agreed to pardon Godwin, and a convention was concluded, which proved fatal to the royal authority. All the foreigners, who had ſo long baſked in the favour of royalty, were baniſhed from the kingdom; and Edward finding his power inſufficient to ſecure the hoſtages given by Godwin for his good behaviour, ſent them to the court of Normandy.

A. D. 1053. Peace was now reſtored; domeſtic diſcord ceaſed; and the Engliſh, freed from the inſolence of foreign favourites, enjoyed all the advantages reſulting from tranquillity. But a cloud, that threatened to involve this ſcene of happineſs, ſoon appeared. Godwin was ſtruck with an apoplexy while he was ſitting at the king's table, and died three days after. Thus fell the moſt powerful ſubject hitherto known in England. The monkiſh writers have attributed his death to a ſtroke of the divine vengeance, for the murder of Alfred; but the account they have given us is evidently calculated to render the memory of Godwin infamous. His behaviour to the Norman favourites filled them with implacable malevolence. But, as the more ancient writers mention nothing remarkable with regard to his death, it is ſufficiently evident that the whole is founded on calumny, and dictated by malice. Stowe, from an ancient manuſcript, ſays, that the death of Godwin occaſioned a general mourning; the people bewailed him as a father and a ſupport.

Fortunately for his country, his power did not terminate with his death. His eldeſt ſon, Harold, who far ſurpaſſed him in abilities, ſucceeded to all his authority, and proved an equal ſupport to the Engliſh againſt the Norman intereſt. Harold, by his great affability and addreſs, gained the friendſhip of Edward. The art of Godwin's ſucceſſor was equal to his power; both the nobles and people were firmly attached to his intereſt.

A. D. 1054. Scotland had, for ſome time, been leſs fortunate than England: the torch of civil diſcord had been lighted by the hand of ambition, and the whole kingdom was involved in horror and confuſion. Macbeth, the celebrated uſurper, had driven Malcolm from his dominions, and the unfortunate prince applied to Edward for ſupport againſt the tyrant of his country. The Engliſh monarch conſidered it as a duty incumbent on kings to aſſiſt royalty in diſtreſs. Ten thouſand men, under the command of Siward, earl of Northumberland, were ſent to ſupport the Scottiſh monarch, and drive the uſurper from the throne. Siward, one of the moſt celebrated generals and intrepid ſoldiers of the age, immediately joined his forces with thoſe under the command of Macduff, the Scottiſh commander, and marched againſt the rebels. A deſperate engagement enſued, wherein Macbeth was totally defeated, obliged to fly to the mountains for ſhelter, and Malcolm placed on the throne of his anceſtors. Siward, ſoon after, paid the debt of nature; and Toſti, one of Harold's brothers, ſucceeded him in the government of the northern provinces. Toſti inherited all the boiſterous intrepidity of his father: he was at once bold and reſolute, afraid of no danger, awed by no character: nothing ſtopped his courſe when impelled by ambition; and his zeal for the intereſt of his friends carried him far beyond the bounds of diſcretion.

A. D. 1056. The Welſh had made frequent inroads into the Engliſh territories, and committed many exceſſes. Alfgar, governor of Eaſt-Anglia, held a treaſonable correſpondence with theſe inſurgents; and being found guilty of the crime, was declared an out-law, and baniſhed the kingdom. He retired immediately to Ireland, where he raiſed a body of forces, joined a fleet of pirates, and landed in Wales. He was aſſiſted by Griffith, prince of North-Wales, and ſoon after defeated a body of Edward's forces. The victors now committed very dreadful ravages in Herefordſhire: they entered the capital of that county, maſſacred the inhabitants, killed ſeven canons who guarded the door of the cathedral, burnt the monaſtery of St. Ethelbert, and laid the city in aſhes.

Exaſperated at theſe inhuman proceedings, Edward ſent Harold, at the head of a body of forces, to chaſtiſe the inſurgents. The abilities of the Engliſh general ſtruck the invaders with terror; they fled into South-Wales, and applied, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, to Edward, for peace. Their requeſt was granted; the tranquillity of the country was reſtored, and Alfgar was reſtored to his eſtate and government.

Edward having no children of his own, becauſe he had refuſed all commerce with his wife, either on account of his natural inability, or pretended vow of chaſtity, was deſirous of ſettling the ſucceſſion to the crown, in order, if poſſible, to prevent the horrors of a civil war. He had recalled his nephew, the ſon of Edmund Ironſide, from the court of Hungary, but he died ſoon after his arrival; and Edgar Atheling, the ſon of that prince, was too young to hold the reins of government. Diſappointed in his deſign of placing a deſcendant from the ancient race of kings on the Engliſh throne, Edward turned his eyes towards his kinſman, William duke of Normandy, who had already ſufficiently eſtabliſhed his reputation for prudence and intrepidity. Secrecy was abſolutely neceſſary to procure ſucceſs, and it was accordingly obſerved with the greateſt caution. William received the intelligence with pleaſure, and eagerly embraced the flattering hopes of adorning his brow with the Engliſh diadem.

A. D. 1058. It has been already mentioned, that Edward had ſent the hoſtages delivered by Godwin to the court of Normandy. Among theſe hoſtages were Ulnoth, the brother, and Hacune, the nephew of Harold. They ſtill continued in confinement, though the death of Godwin had, long ſince, releaſed them from their obligations. Harold, commiſerating the condition of theſe exiles, obtained an order for their being releaſed, and embarked for Normandy; but a violent ſtorm overtook him in his paſſage, and drove him on the French coaſt, in the government of the count of Ponthieu, who detained him priſoner at his court, and demanded a very exorbitant ſum for his ranſom. Harold, who beheld with contempt the ungenerous action of this petty prince, applied to duke William, who immediately ordered the count to ſet the Engliſh nobleman at liberty. Harold repaired directly to William's court; and, by his great affability and polite addreſs, ſoon inſinuated himſelf into the friendſhip of the Norman. William was no ſtranger to the great power of Harold, and conſidered the acquiſition of his intereſt as a ſtep of the greateſt importance in his deſign upon the crown of England. He accordingly diſcloſed the ſecret correſpondence of Edward, and to attach him more firmly to his intereſt offered him his daughter in marriage. Harold, though aſtoniſhed at the diſcovery, and exaſperated at the behaviour of the Engliſh monarch, prudently concealed his reſentment. He knew he was now in the duke's power, and determined to temporiſe. He accordingly promiſed William all the aſſiſtance in his power. Pleaſed with the acquiſition of ſo great an ally, William loaded him with favours; but in order to render his engagements more ſolemn, he exacted from him an oath to obſerve the conditions of the agreement: and deſirous of rendering the oath ſtill more ſacred, William, in conformity to the idle ſuperſtition of the times, had concealed under the altar ſeveral relics; theſe, after the ceremony, he ſhewed to the Engliſh nobleman, imagining that by this artifice the oath was become inviolable.

But the ambition of Harold was much greater than his ſuperſtition. He looked with contempt on the ſtratagem of William, and laughed at the obligation of an oath extorted from him. He returned to England with the hoſtages, and determined to oppoſe the duke with all his power.

A. D. 1063. The Welſh, though they had been ſo often chaſtiſed by the Engliſh, and ſo often obliged to ſue for peace, continued their deſtructive inroads; Griffith was ſtill at the head of a band of plunderers, and ſtill carried fire and ſword into the Engliſh territories. Exaſperated at this perfidious conduct, Edward ſent Harold, at the head of a body of horſe, to ſurprize the invader; but Griffith made his eſcape. He was obliged, however, to leave moſt of his ſhips behind him, which Harold immediately deſtroyed, and returned to England. Some time after the Welſh, exaſperated at the conduct of Griffith, put him to death, and ſent his head, and the ſtern of his ſhip, to Harold, who tranſmitted them to the king.

Toſti had aſſiſted his brother in reducing the Welſh to obedience, and always behaved with the greateſt intrepidity; he was a ſtranger to fear. But his behaviour as a governor, was one continued ſeries of oppreſſion. He loaded the people with exceſſive taxes, and put every perſon to death that dared to oppoſe him. Unable to ſupport themſelves under ſuch complicated diſtreſs, the people flew to arms, drove Toſti from his capital, and elected Morcar, the ſon of their late governor, to fill the ſeat of Toſti. Alarmed at theſe inſurrections, Edward diſpatched Harold at the head of an army to enquire into the cauſe of this revolt, and, if neceſſary, to reduce the inſurgents to reaſon. Harold met the Northumbrians, who were now greatly reinforced, at Northampton, and endeavoured to procure a reconciliation between them and his brother; but this the inſurgents abſolutely refuſed. They told Harold that they were a free people, and would not be enſlaved; that they were willing to pay obedience to a juſt and humane ruler, but would defend their liberties againſt every ſpecies of tyranny, or periſh in the noble attempt. Harold, who admired their reſolution, examined into the cauſe of their complaints againſt Toſti, and finding they were well grounded, gave a ſignal proof his love of juſtice; he no longer ſupported the intereſt of his brother, but procured a confirmation of their election of Morcar. Toſti, finding himſelf abandoned by Harold, who alone had power to ſupport him, left the kingdom, and retired to the court of Baldwin, earl of Flanders. This noble example of equity, greatly increaſed the popularity of Harold, who ſoon after married Algitha, ſiſter to Alfgar, cementing by that act of prudence, the friendſhip that had for ſome time ſubſiſted between him and that nobleman.

A. D. 1065. Edward now ſtooped under the weight of age and infirmities. He had many years ſince vowed to undertake a pilgrimage to Rome; but finding it impoſſible to perform it, obtained the pope's diſpenſation, on condition of rebuilding the abbey of Weſtminſter, which the Danes had laid in ruins. This work engaged his whole attention, and on its being finiſhed, ſummoned a general council of the nation to confirm the charter he had granted to that edifice. He exempted it from all epiſcopal juriſdiction, ſettled large revenues on it, and granted it the privileges of a ſanctuary. He attended with great devotion the dedication of that religious ſtructure, and ſeemed to be re-animated on that ſolemn occaſion. But this was the laſt action of Edward's reign. He was ſeized with a violent fever, which put an end to his life on the fifth of January, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign; and his body, purſuant to his own requeſt, was buried in the abbey he had juſt conſecrated. He died without naming his ſucceſſor.

The monks, who taſted ſufficiently the bounties of Edward, extolled his virtues to the ſkies; they have even exalted his faults into acts of piety. His continence, from whatever cauſe it proceeded, occaſioned his being ranked among the ſaints: an action by which he forged new chains for his country, and drenched the ground with the blood of his ſubjects, was conſidered as the moſt exalted act of piety. A very ſuperficial attention to the actions of his reign will, however, be ſufficient to convince every unprejudiced perſon that he was far from deſerving the character given him by the monks. And that he was undutiful and cruel; faithleſs as a friend, and inexorable as an enemy. The moſt commendable circumſtance in his government was his attention to the adminiſtration of juſtice. As a legiſlator, he deſerves the higheſt applauſe. His laws were long the objects of the people's affection. They were dictated by mercy, and written with the pen of equity. Had his conduct in general been equal to his diſpenſation of juſtice, his memory would have been handed down with applauſe to the lateſt poſterity.

HAROLD II.

A. D. 1066. HAROLD had ſo effectually gained the affections of the Engliſh, that he was immediately declared the ſucceſſor of Edward; he ſtepped into the vacant throne without oppoſition. Edgar Atheling, the undoubted heir to the crown was forgotten; and the claim of the duke of Normandy, who had indeed no better title than the intentions of Edward in his favour, was not even mentioned. But though he had no competitor to fear at home, he well knew that William the Norman would exert all his power to wreſt the ſceptre from his hand; and that ſeveral of the European powers would lend him aſſiſtance. Nor was William the only enemy Harold had to fear; his brother Toſti vowed revenge for the aſſiſtance he had given the Northumbrians. He applied to Baldwin, earl of Flanders, and William, duke of Normandy for aſſiſtance. They both promiſed to aſſiſt him; and Baldwin immediately fitted out a ſtrong ſquadron, which enabled Toſti to commence hoſtilities againſt his brother, by inſulting the coaſts of England. But he was, ſoon after, defeated, and obliged to fly to Scotland, with the ſcattered remains of his fleet, for protection.

This attempt of Toſti did not prevent Harold from purſuing every prudent meaſure for procuring the affections of his people. He eaſed them of ſeveral taxes; he liſtened to their complaints, and diſpenſed juſtice with an impartial hand: he became the patron of the clergy, and a liberal friend to churches and monaſteries. He knew that Edgar Atheling was beloved by the people, as the only remaining heir of their ancient kings: he, therefore, took that prince under his protection, gave him a liberal education, loaded him with favours, and favoured all thoſe who were more immediately attached to his perſon and fortune. By theſe prudent meaſures he conciliated the affections of the Engliſh; the people conſidered him as their father, and the voice of faction and diſcontent was no longer heard.

While Harold was thus nobly employed in ſettling the domeſtic tranquillity, William the Norman exerted all his power in collecting an army, and fitting out a fleet to ſeize the crown, which the people had unanimouſly placed on the head of Harold. He could plead neither the right of election, nor that of inheritance; not even a party in England was formed in his favour. But impelled at once by ambition and revenge, he determined to purſue the meaſures he had formed, and place on conqueſt the right he could not ſupport by any legal pretenſion. He ſent ambaſſadors to Harold, upbraiding him with his breach of faith, and ſummoning him to reſign the poſſeſſion of the crown. Harold was not to be intimidated by threats; he was a ſtranger to fear. He returned a very ſpirited anſwer, and William was convinced that he had nothing to expect from negotiation. An invaſion of England was, therefore, reſolved on: nothing leſs than the conqueſt of the whole kingdom was to be effected. Many circumſtances concurred to favour an enterprize, which, otherwiſe, muſt have appeared chimerical. William was celebrated for his valour; he had triumphed over the joint efforts of France, and all its vaſſals. The Normans themſelves were a brave and warlike people: all the warriors of Europe were deſirous of ſerving under his ſtandards, and of ſharing in the ſpoil of a rich and flouriſhing people. War was the ſole employment of every chieftain, then almoſt independent of the power of his ſovereign. The fame of his intended expedition was ſoon ſpread over Europe, and multitudes flocked to his ſtandards. The emperor declared loudly in his favour: the imperial council iſſued a proclamation, permitting all the vaſſals of the empire to enter into his ſervice. The count of Anjou ſent him a conſiderable body of forces: the count of Ponthau followed his example. Euſtace, count of Boulogne, and the viſcount of Thouars, in Poictou, joined him in perſon, at the head of their vaſſals. The count of Bretagne ſent him a body of five thouſand men, under the command of his eldeſt ſon. But what tended ſtill more to render the duke's expedition ſucceſsful, was the pope's declaration in his favour. He ſent him a conſecrated banner; and publiſhed a bull, declaring the juſtice of William's cauſe, and animating all the Chriſtian powers to aſſiſt him in his attempt on the Engliſh throne. Harold was declared a perjured uſurper, and every perſon excommunicated who dared to oppoſe the armies of Normandy. But ſtill the great ſupport of war was wanted. The treaſures of William were far from being ſufficient, and the ſtates of Normandy abſolutely refuſed to grant the prodigious ſums he required. The wealth of individuals, however, ſupplied what the ſtates had refuſed; and William was ſoon enabled to collect a fleet of three thouſand ſail, and an army of forty thouſand men; a force which he imagined ſufficient to produce a fatal revolution in the dominions of Harold.

The ſtate of England, at that time, increaſed his hopes of ſucceſs. There were few places of ſtrength in the kingdom; London and Dover only were capable of ſuſtaining a ſiege. A peace of fifty years had ſoftened the diſpoſitions of the Engliſh, and rendered them incapable of ſuſtaining the fatigues of war. They were enervated by a long ſlumber on the bed of indolence; their manly diſcipline, and the love of their country, were exchanged for effeminate luxury. Many of the nobility were of Daniſh or Norman extraction, and were, therefore, inclined to favour William rather than Harold.

William did not, however, think all theſe advantages ſufficient to render his expedition ſucceſsful. He had engaged Harfager, king of Norway, in conjunction with Toſti, to invade the northern parts of England, in order to make a powerful diverſion in his favour. They accordingly landed at the mouth of the Humber, and ſpread over the whole kingdom. Harold advanced, at the head of an army, againſt the invaders, and totally defeated them: both Harfager and Toſti fell in the action. But this defeat, though glorious to Harold, was attended with fatal conſequences; he loſt many of his braveſt officers and ſoldiers in the action, and diſguſted the reſt, by refuſing to diſtribute among them the Daniſh ſpoils, which he reſerved to ſupply the exigences of the ſtate. A falſe report tended alſo to facilitate the enterprize of William. Harold received intelligence, that the duke of Normandy, diſcouraged by contrary winds, had abandoned his enterprize: the Engliſh fleet, collected to oppoſe the landing of the Normans, was, therefore, diſmiſſed the ſervice.

At length the Norman armament appeared on the coaſt of England; and Harold having no fleet capable of engaging ſo formidable a ſquadron, William landed his forces, without oppoſition, at Pevenſey, in Suſſex. The duke himſelf, in leaping on ſhore, fell down, and cried out, "Thus I take poſſeſſion of the country." The leaſt unexpected accident is ſufficient to ſtrike ſuperſtitious minds either with terror or with joy.

The landing of the Normans ſpread a general alarm through the kingdom. Forces were raiſed, to join the victorious army of Harold, in every county; and had that prince liſtened to the advice of his brother Gyrth, the expedition of the Norman had been rendered abortive. He repreſented, that to venture the crown upon one deciſive engagement, was highly imprudent, and contrary to all the rules both of policy and war. He very juſtly obſerved, that a general battle was the moſt favourable event the Normans could hope for in their preſent ſituation, becauſe deſpair would augment their courage; they muſt either conquer or periſh. But, by deferring a general engagement, the Norman army would ſoon be reduced to the greateſt extremity, eſpecially if they were perpetually haraſſed by flying ſquadrons, and their foraging parties cut off. He added, that by intruſting the army to his care, the enemy might be conquered without a battle; but if an engagement ſhould enſue, and his forces be defeated by the Normans, powerful reſources were at hand, and the enemy would be ruined even by a victory. The Engliſh nobles approved of this advice, and his mother joined her entreaties to enforce the arguments of her ſon. But Harold was inflexible; he determined to give the enemy battle, and riſk his crown on the fortune of a ſingle day.

This reſolution being taken, Harold marched againſt the enemy, notwithſtanding he was deſerted by many of his veterans. He encamped on a hill at ſome diſtance from the Normans; and the next morning, mounting his horſe, in company with his brother Gyrth, advanced to reconnoitre the ſtrength and poſition of the invaders. This view convinced Harold, that he had been too precipitate in his meaſures; and, at his return, propoſed retreating to London, in order to augment his army. Gyrth oppoſed the meaſure with ſome warmth: he juſtly obſerved, that he had now proceeded too far to decline a battle; that his honour was engaged; and that to retire a ſingle ſtep, would be conſtrued into cowardice, conſidered as a flight, and be attended with a fatal loſs of his reputation: that he ſhould have liſtened to the advice of his nobles before he had advanced againſt the enemy; at preſent, he muſt either conquer or periſh.

Convinced, by the reaſons of his brother, that there was now a neceſſity for giving battle to the enemy, Harold applied himſelf to make the neceſſary preparations for the deciſive event. While he was thus employed, ſome monks arrived from the Norman camp; and being introduced to Harold, declared, that William, to prevent the effuſion of human blood, ſent him the following offers; either to reſign the kingdom to him, or hold it of him in fealty; to ſubmit their cauſe to the arbitration of the pope, or to fight him in ſingle combat. Harold replied, that the God of battles would ſoon be the arbiter of their differences.

Negotiations were now at an end, and the hour was approaching which was to put a final prriod to the diſpute between theſe two powerful armies. The night preceding the battle was ſpent in a very different manner by the contending parties. The Normans paſſed it in prayer; the Engliſh in riot. The dawn put a period to their exerciſes, and both armies prepared for battle.

The Engliſh were greatly inferior to the Normans in number; and Harold, to compenſate for this diſadvantage, drew up his men in one column, upon the declivity of a hill, having a large ditch, and a line of hurdles, in their front. The Normans were drawn up in three lines, and advanced to the charge, carrying the pope's conſecrated ſtandard at their head, with great alacrity. The attack was made with the utmoſt fury; but the Engliſh ſtood firm, and obliged the aſſailants to retire. The Normans returned to the charge with redoubled fury, and were again driven back by the Engliſh. The battle continued the whole day, and victory, more than once, ſeemed to declare in favour of Harold. The abilities of the two commanders, and the valour of their troops, were equal. Liberty inſpired the Engliſh; glory, blended with deſpair, the Normans. The former knew, that every thing they held dear depended upon their valour; the latter, that a retreat was impoſſible. William flew from rank to rank, from ſquadron to ſquadron, animating by his words, and encouraging by his example. Harold, with equal ſpirit, with equal valour, and with ſuperior ſucceſs, oppoſed him. Death marched in his rear: the Normans were aſtoniſhed at the power of his arm. William perceived his danger, and had recourſe to artifice. He ordered his troops to make a haſty retreat. The ſtratagem ſucceeded. The courage of the Engliſh proved their deſtruction: they purſued the Normans, whom they conſidered as a flying enemy. Their phalanx, which had been hitherto impenetrable to all the attacks of the invaders, was broken. The duke perceived it; and facing about, repulſed the purſuers with great ſlaughter. The Engliſh, however, regained the advantageous ground they had quitted, and again bid defiance to the attacks of the enemy. At laſt Harold, and his two brothers, were ſlain at the head of their forces; and the ſoldiers, having loſt their leaders, fled from the field of battle. Above ſixty thouſand of the Engliſh fell in this dreadful engagement; and the Norman purchaſed the victory with the loſs of fifteen thouſand of his beſt troops.

The ſtandard of Engliſh liberty fell with Harold, a prince who merited a better fate. He was humane, generous, affable, and intrepid: he loved his ſubjects, he loved his friends, he loved his country: he was a champion for freedom, and fell in its defence: he wiſhed not to ſurvive the conſtitution of England. The Norman writers have laboured to blacken his memory, in order to render that of the conqueror more ſplendid; a circumſtance that too often attends a change of fortune. Had the Norman loſt the battle of Haſtings, we had never heard of Harold's vices, nor William's virtues; the former would have been extolled to the ſkies, and the latter painted in his true colours. He would have been repreſented as a lawleſs uſurper, who came to ravage the country of an innocent people; and wreſt the ſceptre from the hand of a ſovereign, whoſe principal care was the happineſs of his ſubjects. Time has deſtroyed the flimſy veil which the hand of partiality has thrown over the characters of theſe two princes, and placed their virtues and vices in a genuine point of light. A compariſon is unneceſſary; Harold fell in defence of that liberty which William deſtroyed.

Harold was the laſt of the Anglo-Saxon kings. The throne was filled by a ſtranger; and new laws, new cuſtoms, and even a new conſtitution, were introduced, inſtead of thoſe obſerved by the Saxons. It will, therefore, be neceſſary to give the reader ſome account of the government, manners, and learning of that people. Liberty conſtituted one of the principal features in the character of the Saxons: they had no idea of a deſpotic power: they conſidered a king only as a more diſtinguiſhed citizen, bound by the ſame laws, and ſubject to the ſame cuſtoms as his ſubjects. His murder was compenſated by a fine, as well as that of the loweſt of the people; the only pre-eminence he enjoyed was, that the fine was larger. They had no eſtabliſhed rule with regard to the right of ſucceſſion to the crown; the children, indeed, often ſucceeded their father in the ſeat of power; but a ſmall circumſtance was ſufficient to ſet it aſide. Preſent emergencies were more attended to than general principles: they thought not on future contingencies; the conſequences that might attend this breach in the ſucceſſion were not regarded. All affairs of moment, eccleſiaſtical or civil, were propoſed in the general aſſembly of the nation, called Wittenagemot; and without the conſent of that body, no laws were binding upon the ſubject. It is not eaſy, perhaps impoſſible, to determine with preciſion, who the members were that formed this national council. The biſhops, abbots, and aldermen, or governors of provinces, called earls after the Daniſh conqueſt, are known to have formed one part; but whether the repreſentatives of boroughs, or the more wealthy citizens, compoſed the other, is not determined.

The people were divided into three orders; nobles or thanes; creorles, or freemen; and ſlaves, or villeins. The nobles chiefly reſided on their eſtates: cities were then little frequented; attendance at court was eſteemed a ſpecies of oppreſſion. Their houſes were open to ſtrangers; they vied with each other in acts of hoſpitality. The buſineſs of the freemen principally conſiſted in cultivating their eſtates, the induſtry of the people being chiefly confined to agriculture. The villeins were employed in domeſtic occupations, or in cultivating their lord's demeſnes.

Death was never inflicted by the Anglo-Saxon laws; crimes of every ſpecies were compenſated with pecuniary fines. A price was fixed on the head of each perſon, according to his rank; even that of the king was not excepted. The price of wounds, and the loſs of members, was ſettled; and was always proportioned to the ſize and danger of the former, and the uſe of the latter.

Various methods of trial ſubſiſted under the Anglo-Saxon government; but that by juries generally prevailed. But where the crime could not be proved by witneſſes, recourſe was had to the moſt ridiculous methods, equally calculated to puniſh the innocent or the guilty. Single combat, the judgment of the croſs, and the trial by fire or water, called the ordeal, were the teſts introduced by a ſuperſtitious people, who were perſuaded that heaven would openly declare in behalf of the innocent, and pour deſtruction on the head of the guilty. The celebrated Monteſquieu very juſtly obſerves, that our anceſtors reſted the honour, the fortune, and the lives of citizens, on circumſtances which depend leſs on reaſon than chance; and inceſſantly made uſe of proofs incapable of convicting, and which had no manner of connection either with innocence or with guilt. The cultivation of reaſon has deſtroyed theſe prepoſterous methods of trial; and relieved ſociety from a ſeries of complicated diſtreſs.

The force of the iſland conſiſted of the militia. Every freeman was under an indiſpenſible neceſſity of arming in defence of the ſtate: he marched to battle under the ſtandard of his lord, and was not to leave the army till the time of his ſervice was expired. The whole nation were ſoldiers: every citizen fought in defence of his own property, and that of the whole ſociety.

Learning was at a very low ebb under the Anglo-Saxon government. The arts and ſciences cultivated by the Greeks and Romans were buried under the ruins of the empire. An impenetrable cloud of Gothic ignorance had ſtifled the rays of wiſdom; the avenues to knowledge were hardly known. Alfred, indeed, exerted himſelf nobly in defence of literature; during his reign, the glimmerings of ſcience appeared. He founded the univerſity of Oxford, and endeavoured to allure the muſes to the banks of the Iſis; but he died too ſoon. His ſucceſſor, Edward the Elder, followed his example, and founded the univerſity of Cambridge. But their labours were not ſufficient to complete the noble deſign. The ravages of the Danes deſtroyed the lovely branch which the generous Alfred and his ſon had planted, and ſpread over the whole kingdom a blacker cloud of ignorance than before. A few perſons of learning, indeed, flouriſhed during theſe uncultivated ages. Aſſer Menevenſis deſerves to be mentioned here: he was one of the moſt learned men of his time, and biſhop of Sherborne in the reign of Alfred, whom he greatly aſſiſted in his ſtudies. He wrote ſeveral books, but one only has reached our times: it is intituled, "Annales Rerum Geſtarum "Ælfredi Magni." Three editions of this work have been publiſhed; one by archbiſhop Parker, another by Camden, and another by Wiſe. St. Dunſtan is ſaid to have been a good muſician, painter and graver; but he has no title to be conſidered as a learned prelate. We wiſh, for the honour of our country, that we could have enlarged the catalogue of learned perſons that flouriſhed in theſe ages of military ferocity; but among the few that cultivated the muſes, the greater part of them are forgotten: their works, which, doubtleſs, long floated on the current of time, are now ſunk in the gulph of oblivion.

WILLIAM I. ſurnamed THE CONQUEROR.

A. D. 1066. THOUGH William had gained the battle of Haſtings, he was far from thinking he had conquered the ſpirit of Engliſh independence. He knew the nobles were brave, ambitious, and enemies even to the ſhadow of ſlavery; that they had powerful reſources; that they were totally devoted to the race of the Anglo-Saxon kings; and had reaſon to believe that Edgar Atheling, the undoubted heir to the Engliſh crown, was then in the capital; perhaps already placed on the throne of his anceſtors. The utmoſt caution was, therefore, neceſſary to ſecure the advantage he had gained. The Engliſh had, indeed, loſt much of their ferocious ſpirit of liberty by the conqueſts of the Danes; and the reign of Canute had rendered them familiar with the government of ſtrangers. The peaceable reign of Edward had greatly contributed to make them in love with the arts of peace, and to prefer domeſtic tranquillity to the boiſterous alarms of war. But ſtill they were powerful; and there was the higheſt reaſon to believe, that the loſs of their friends, and the dangers of their country, would rouſe them to vengeance. A ſingle defeat would be fatal to the Norman army. William, therefore, determined to make himſelf maſter of ſome place of ſtrength; that if the Engliſh ſhould unite in oppoſing his deſigns, he might wait in ſafety for reinforcements from Normandy. Dover was the only place that offered him a ſecure retreat; and William accordingly led his victorious troops before that fortreſs, which, by the joint efforts of art and nature, was rendered almoſt impregnable. The caſtle was full of ſoldiers, who had fled thither after the defeat at Haſtings; but ſo great was their conſternation, that they delivered up the fortreſs to the Norman upon terms of capitulation.

The death of Harold, and the total defeat of the Engliſh army, had thrown the capital into the utmoſt confuſion: anarchy preſided in the councils of the nobles. Edgar Atheling, though beloved by the people, wanted ſpirit and abilities to hold the helm of government in ſo tempeſtuous a ſeaſon. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, indeed, placed him on the throne, and nobly exerted all his abilities to reſtore order and ſubordination among a terrified and divided people. But his attempts were in vain: every ſalutary ſcheme was oppoſed; and every meaſure, which tended to promote unanimity, and prevent the crown from being placed on the head of a foreigner, was rendered abortive. They acted like people who courted the yoke of ſlavery.

William was informed of theſe diſſentions, and determined to turn them to his own advantage. He left a ſtrong garriſon in Dover; and dividing his army into three bodies, marched directly towards London. The only oppoſition he met with on his march, was from Fretheric, abbot of St. Albans. He cauſed a conſiderable number of trees to be felled, and placed in the roads, to impede the progreſs of the Norman. William ordered the abbot to appear before him; promiſing, that if he complied, no harm ſhould happen to his perſon. The abbot obeyed; and being aſked why he had endeavoured to ſtop the paſſage of his army, nobly replied, "I have done no more than my duty; and "had others of my rank equally exerted their abili-"ties, you had never penetrated ſo far into this "country, nor ſummoned me to give an account of "my conduct." Struck with the noble boldneſs of the anſwer, William diſmiſſed the abbot without paſſing the leaſt cenſure on his conduct.

In proportion as William advanced towards the capital, the confuſion among the Engliſh increaſed. No plan was formed for oppoſing the march of the Conqueror; no general was choſen to lead the troops againſt the enemy. The clergy, inſtead of employing their authority to heal the diviſions, and inſpire the people with courage and unanimity, laboured to increaſe the diſorder. Moſt of the dignified eccleſiaſtics were Normans, and declared in favour of William; they juſtified an enterprize which was conſecrated by papal authority. The friends to the conſtitution of England perceived it was now too late to ſupport the falling ſtate of their country; that oppoſition would only tend to exaſperate the Conqueror, and forge heavier chains for a brave and warlike people. They determined therefore to ſubmit to William, and ſheath the ſword of deſtruction, which threatened the ruin of their bleeding country. Accordingly the primate, the nobility, and even Edgar Atheling himſelf repaired to the Norman camp, and entreated William to accept a crown, which his virtues and abilities had rendered him worthy of enjoying. They were received with the greateſt politeneſs. It was the intereſt of William to endear himſelf to the nation, and acquire, by acts of humanity and kindneſs, the love and eſteem of the people.

The ceremony of the coronation was performed in Weſtminſter-abbey on Chriſtmas-day. But during the ſolemnity, a tumult enſued which threatened the place with deſtruction. The abbey was ſurrounded with a body of Norman ſoldiers, who hearing a confuſed noiſe occaſioned by the acclamations of the people, when the crown was placed on William's head, imagined it was the voice of tumult and diſorder, and that the life of their duke was in danger. Fired at what they conſidered as a perfidious ſtratagem of the Engliſh, without giving themſelves the leaſt time for examination, they ſet fire to the adjacent houſes, and aſſaulted the populace with the utmoſt fury. The alarm ſpread with amazing rapidity, deſpair was viſible in every countenance; the Norman himſelf fled trembling to the altar, and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that the tumult was at laſt appeaſed.

A. D. 1067. The victory at Haſtings had ſufficiently eſtabliſhed the valour of William; but it was neceſſary that he ſhould alſo eſtabliſh the character of a wiſe and humane governor. The firſt acts of his adminiſtration were well calculated for that purpoſe. He ſeemed deſirous of engaging the affections of his new ſubjects, by liſtening to their complaints, and removing every enormity, and correcting every act of oppreſſion. The impartial execution of juſtice practiſed in Normandy, he introduced into England. The ſevere diſcipline of his army was ſoftened by preſents and affability. The treaſure of Harold, which fell into his hands, was greatly increaſed by bounties and preſents from the rich and the powerful. This enabled him to give rewards to his followers, diſtribute charities to the monaſteries, to ſend preſents to the churches of France, Aquitain, and Burgundy, where maſſes had been ſaid for the ſucceſs of his expedition, and to remit large ſums to the pope, with coſtly preſents to the church of St. Peter at Rome. He alſo erected a church and monaſtery on the field where Harold was ſlain. The church was dedicated to St. Martin, and the abbey, which was filled with Benedictine monks, and exempted from epiſcopal juriſdiction, was called Battle-abbey. He granted the city of London a new charter, by which all the privileges and immunities that city enjoyed in the reign of Edward the confeſſor, were confirmed. He affected to treat the Engliſh nobility with the utmoſt kindneſs, and not only careſſed Edgar Atheling in a very particular manner, but granted him large eſtates, and confirmed to him the title of earl of Oxford, which had been conferred on him by Edward the confeſſor. Theſe acts of kindneſs produced the moſt pleaſing effects on the generous minds of the Engliſh; they flattered themſelves with a long ſeries of domeſtic tranquillity under a wiſe and impartial adminiſtration. But the ſubſequent actions of William convinced them that they formed their opinions too ſoon. He ſeized on all the eſtates of thoſe who had joined Harold againſt him, and gave them to his Norman officers; erected fortreſſes in various parts of the kingdom, and filled them with foreign troops. He diſarmed the people, and broke the militia. Theſe meaſures gave the Engliſh great uneaſineſs: they now perceived that William acted rather as a conqueror than a king; and wiſhed that power, rather than the affections of his ſubjects, might be the ſupport of his crown.

After taking every prudent precaution to ſecure his new kingdom, he paſſed over into Normandy, carrying with him the principal of the Engliſh nobility, under pretence of enjoying the pleaſure of their converſation, and of ſhewing them to the world as the greateſt ornaments of his court. But this was too groſs to impoſe on the underſtanding of the moſt credulous. It was ſufficiently evident they were carried abroad as hoſtages to ſecure his conqueſt, add a luſtre to his power and adorn his triumph. Their magnificence did him honour. The foreign princes were aſtoniſhed. Such a profuſion of ornaments was before unknown in Normandy. William kept his Eaſter in the abbey of Feſcamp, where he was viſited by Rodolph, uncle to the king of France, and a great number of the principal perſons in Normandy and the adjacent provinces. But while he was indulging himſelf in joy and feſtivity, all the precautions he had taken to ſecure the tranquillity of England were fruſtrated. The inſolence of the Normans could be reſtrained by no authority, but that of William. Proud from the victory they had obtained, greedy of plunder, and looking with contempt on a people who had ſo eaſily reſigned their liberties, they were guilty of every exceſs. They plundered the houſes of the Engliſh, violated the chaſtity of their wives and daughters, and practiſed ſuch enormous cruelties, that nothing but ſavage brutality could invent. Revenge rouſed the ſpirit of the Engliſh. They perceived their dreadful ſituation, and deſpair urged them to retaliate on the invaders of their country all the miſeries they had ſuffered from the hand of wanton deſpotiſm. They were not yet totally inſenſible to the charms of liberty, and determined either to drive their tyrannical maſters out of the kingdom or periſh in the attempt. But they were deſtitute of leaders, and could form no regular plan for executing their deſign. The inhabitants of Kent, who ſeverely felt the rod of power, applied to Euſtace, count of Boulogne, for aſſiſtance. He liſtened to their complaints, and promiſed them relief. The caſtle of Dover was conſidered as the moſt proper place for a retreat if the enemy ſhould prove too powerful, and they agreed to begin their operations againſt the enemy, with ſeizing that important fortreſs. The plan was conducted with the utmoſt ſecrecy, and Montfort the governor being abſent with part of the garriſon, there was great reaſon to hope that the attempt would be crowned with ſucceſs. The night appointed for the execution of this project arrived, and the Kentiſhmen repaired in ſmall parties to the place of rendezvous. About midnight Euſtace landed his forces, and led the combined troops immediately to the attack. The ſtrength of the caſtle ſaved the Normans from the reſentment of the Engliſh. They aſſaulted the gate with the utmoſt fury; but they ſpent their force in vain. The garriſon was now alarmed; they ſallied out upon the Engliſh, and put them to flight. Many were precipitately thrown headlong from the rocks, and the count's ſon taken priſoner. Euſtace himſelf, at the head of a few followers, eſcaped to his ſhips.

This miſcarriage was far from intimidating the Engliſh; they broke out into open rebellion in various parts of the kingdom. They even formed a ſcheme for maſſacring all the Normans. They never conſidered that it was almoſt impoſſible to conceal this dreadful contrivance. Some among the number of perpetrators would certainly reveal the ſecret. This actually happened; William received private intelligence of the deſign; he haſtened to England, and broke all their meaſures. The conſpirators had proceeded too far to retreat; they marched into the north, fortified the city of Durham, and ſet at defiance the whole Norman power. Had the Engliſh ſhewn the ſame ſpirit immediately after the battle of Haſtings, William had never ſeized the Engliſh ſceptre; but it was now too late. The people, in general, were without arms, and the Normans in poſſeſſion of the principal fortreſſes of the kingdom. Their attempts to regain their liberty had, therefore, now no other effect than to rivet more effectually the chains of ſlavery, and add a large increaſe to their weight. William immediately revived the tribute of Danegeld, in order to puniſh the Engliſh for their rebellions. This tax, which Edward the Confeſſor had abrogated, always gave the greateſt uneaſineſs to the people. William knew that this impoſt would render him odious, but was determined to proceed: he no longer courted the favour of the Engliſh. Aldred, archbiſhop of York, who had hitherto ſtrenuouſly ſupported all the meaſures of William, was alarmed at this exertion of arbitrary power, and laboured aſſiduouſly to render it abortive. He had recourſe to perſuaſions and remonſtrances; but finding all his attempts were vain, he not only abandoned the intereſt of William, but anathematized him, and all his family. This, however, had no effect upon William's conduct; he defied the eccleſiaſtical as well as the temporal power, and levied the tax with the utmoſt rigour.

A. D. 1068. William was not, however, ſatisfied with impoveriſhing the Engliſh by taxes and extortions; he determined to confiſcate the eſtates of all thoſe who had in the leaſt aſſiſted Harold. It was in vain to urge, that when William firſt landed in England, Harold was in actual poſſeſſion of the crown; that the whole nation had ſworn fealty to him; and, conſequently, that he had a right to their ſervices; that their ſubſequent ſubmiſſion had been accepted by William; and that he had himſelf promiſed to protect them in their rights and privileges. Theſe reaſons were unanſwerable; but they were urged without effect: William acted not on the principles of juſtice.

The nobles now felt the difference between the government of a king and the deſpotiſm of a tyrant, and determined not to ſubmit tamely to ſuch oppreſſions: paſſive obedience and non-reſiſtance were doctrines reſerved for after times; they were not known under the Anglo-Saxon government. The nobles joined the populace, and broke out into open rebellion. This inſurrection threatened the deſtruction of the Norman government: the moſt conſiderable perſons in the kingdom were among the inſurgents; and unanimity only was wanting to render their deſigns ſucceſsful. The kings of Denmark and Scotland promiſed them aſſiſtance. William was alarmed at the ſtorm that threatened to overwhelm him: he marched immediately againſt the inſurgents, before they were joined by the forces they expected. The great activity of the conqueror rendered the whole deſign abortive. The nobles ſubmitted, and were received into favour. William thought proper, for a time, to lay aſide his arbitrary ſcheme of oppreſſion. Edgar Atheling, whom the cries and intreaties of the people had rouſed to action, fled into Scotland, with his mother, and two ſiſters, and were received by Malcolm with the utmoſt kindneſs. Formerly an exile himſelf, he had learned compaſſion in the ſchool of adverſity. William demanded the fugitives; and Malcolm, with a noble magnanimity which does honour to his memory, treated the meſſage with contempt. A war between the two nations was the conſequence; and the northern parts of the kingdom became again obnoxious to the ſword of deſolation.

The court of Malcolm was ſoon crowded with Engliſh nobles; and the Northumbrians, ſure of being powerfully aſſiſted, committed the moſt dreadful ravages on the territories of the Normans; many of whom choſe to abandon their eſtates, and retire into their own country, rather than be perpetually haraſſed by the attempts of an exaſperated people. Nor were the Scots the only people that threatened to attack the Engliſh monarch; the Danes and the Iriſh had joined in the confederacy; and it was agreed to make the attack at the ſame time in different parts of the kingdom. Had this plan been executed with vigour, it would have ſhaken the foundations of William's power; but it was rendered abortive by the diſſentions that prevailed in their councils. The Danes, however, landed at the mouth of the Humber; and William thought it moſt adviſeable to purchaſe their abſence by a large ſum of money.

A. D. 1070. The Engliſh inſurgents, when deſerted by their foreign allies, were unable to ſupport themſelves againſt the Norman army: they were obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior force; and the Conqueror had now an opportunity of introducing into England the innovations he thought neceſſary to ſupport that deſpotic power by which he was determined to govern the kingdom. He had now the plea of rebellion to offer as a reaſon for his conduct; and he failed not to uſe it. He confiſcated the eſtates of the nobles, and gave them to the Normans and other foreigners who had aſſiſted him in the conqueſt of this unhappy country. For an Engliſhman to be poſſeſſed either of riches or power, was conſidered as a ſufficient crime to render him obnoxious to puniſhment. The innocent and the guilty ſuffered equally under the rod of oppreſſion. The moſt ancient and opulent families were reduced to indigence; they pined for want on the very eſtates which had deſcended to them through a long line of illuſtrious anceſtors.

The feodal polity, which had been long introduced into France and Normandy, was conſidered by William as the beſt, perhaps the only method of rendering the ſervitude, to which he had reduced his ſubjects, perpetual; by deſtroying the very idea of liberty, and rivetting the chains of ſlavery on a generous, though conquered people. He accordingly divided the kingdom into ſeven hundred baronies, which he beſtowed upon his particular friends. No Engliſhman was ſuffered to enjoy that honour. Theſe baronies were ſubdivided into ſixty thouſand, two hundred and fifteen knights fees; which were diſtributed among their retainers, and a few of the Engliſhmen who had been fortunate enough to gain the favour of the Conqueror.

Nor were the clergy excepted from theſe arbitrary proceedings: they were obliged to furniſh a certain number of ſoldiers; and in caſe of refuſal, to ſuffer the ſame puniſhment. The temporalities of the eccleſiaſtics enjoyed no greater favour than the eſtates of the laity. The pope remonſtrated againſt theſe proceedings, but without effect. William no longer wanted his aſſiſtance, and was not to be intimidated by the thunder of the Vatican. Alexander II. who then filled the papal chair, perceived it would be in vain to contend againſt the power of William, and determined to accompliſh by policy what he could not effect by force: he flattered himſelf with being able to extend his ſupremacy over the Engliſh dominions; but this, he knew, muſt be effected by an artful conduct: William was too violent to be openly oppoſed. Ermefroy, biſhop of Sion, appeared well qualified for carrying on this difficult and delicate negotiation; and accordingly Alexander ſent him into England with the character of legate. Several of the Engliſh clergy were become obnoxious to William: the arrival of the legate, therefore, was agreeable to the Conqueror, who now determined to puniſh them under the ſacred maſk of religion. Ermefroy, inſtructed to gain the favour of the Engliſh monarch, ſummoned a general council of the clergy; where Strigand, archbiſhop of Canterbury; Agelmar, biſhop of Helmham; Elgeric, biſhop of Durham, and ſeveral other prelates, were depoſed: one Engliſh biſhop only was ſuffered to keep his ſee; all the reſt fell victims to the reſentment or policy of the Norman. Nor was this ſufficient to ſatisfy his ambitious intentions: he prevailed upon Ermefroy to change the tenure of the church lands; and inſtead of holding them free of all ſecular dependence, to hold them in military tenure, or by knight's ſervice.

Thus William, by the aſſiſtance of the pope's legate, ſufficiently humbled the Engliſh clergy, and filled their poſts with foreigners. It muſt, indeed, be remembered to his honour, that he preferred none but perſons remarkable for their genius and learning. The celebrated Lanfranc, an Italian monk, was placed in the ſee of Canterbury; Thomas, one of the canons of Bayeux, was created archbiſhop of York; and the ſees of Wincheſter, Helmham, and Selſey, were filled by three of his own chaplains.

Ermefroy now imagined that very conſiderable conceſſions would be made to his holineſs, but he was miſtaken: William was jealous of his power, and determined to keep the church, as well as his lay ſubjects, in ſubjection: he required, that all the eccleſiaſtical canons voted in any ſynod, and even the bulls ſent from Rome, ſhould receive his ſanction before they were of any force in his kingdom. He had ſeen ſo many abuſes of ſpiritual power, that he was determined to prevent their repetition in his kingdom; and paſſed a law in the national aſſembly, that none of his miniſters or barons ſhould be excommunicated without his conſent. By theſe prudent meaſures, he flattered himſelf with having effectually clipped the wings of eccleſiaſtical ambition, and prevented the Roman pontiff from raiſing commotions in his kingdom. But he was miſtaken; Lanfranc effected, by his aſſiduous labour, what the pope himſelf had attempted in vain: he laid the foundation of that alarming authority which the Roman church afterwards exerciſed over this kingdom.

The Engliſh now ſeverely felt the chains of ſlavery which had, for ſome time, been forging for them. Some were intimidated into paſſive obedience, while others formed the noble reſolution of ſupporting their independency, or periſhing with the liberties of their country. Many of the latter retired to the iſle of Ely, and ſet at defiance all the power of the Norman. Among theſe was the brave Hereward de Wake, ſon to the late Leofric, lord of Brunne, reputed the greateſt warrior of his age. He was choſen captain of this reſolute band, and bravely exerted the great talents he poſſeſſed. William was alarmed at this oppoſition, and marched immediately a large body of troops to chaſtiſe the inſurgents. But it was no eaſy taſk to drive them from their retreat. He attacked the iſland ſeveral times in vain, and was at laſt obliged to convert the ſiege into a blockade. Malcolm, king of Scotland, took the advantage of William's being employed in this difficult attempt, and made an irruption into the northern provinces. William was therefore obliged to have recourſe to ſtratagem, and effected by art what he found exceeded his abilities to perform by force: he attacked the poſſeſſions of the monks of Ely, and laid them under military execution. Alarmed for their eſtates, the religious offered to betray the iſland, and pay him a thouſand marks, provided he would reſtore to the convent the lands he had ſeized. William readily embraced the offer; and the abbot, faithful in his treachery, opened a paſſage to the royal army. Finding himſelf betrayed, and diſdaining ſubmiſſion, the gallant Hereward cut himſelf a paſſage through the Norman forces, and made his eſcape; the reſt were obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion.

The Scots ſtill continued their ravages; and William having reduced the inſurgents, advanced, at the head of his forces, to give them battle. The two armies met at Nithiſdale, where the Scottiſh forces had intrenched themſelves in a very advantageous ſituation. William thought it imprudent to attack the enemy till his forces had recovered themſelves from the fatigue of a long and painful march. He therefore encamped near Malcolm's army, without making any attempt to begin hoſtilities. Several days paſſed, without either army's making the leaſt motion to diſturb the other. Equally valiant, and equally expert in military knowledge, the two kings were fearful of the conſequences of a battle. Their armies were nearly equal, and it was very doubtful to whom fortune would give the palm of victory. The Scot knew, that if his army was defeated, Scotland would be left open to the ravages of an enraged enemy. The Norman, already ſurrounded by enemies, his crown, perhaps his life, depended upon the iſſue of this ſingle action. Conſequences like theſe wholly engaged the attentions of the contending monarchs; both were unwilling to venture the important ſtroke, and both armies continued inactive. At laſt a negotiation for a peace was opened by the prelates that attended the two princes. No oppoſition was made to the treaty, which accordingly ſoon took place between them. By one of the articles, Edgar Atheling was to return to England, and renounce all his right to the crown, on receiving a ſufficient maintenance from the Conqueror.

A. D. 1073. It was now natural to expect, that William would have enjoyed ſome reſpite from the toils of war: he had reduced the Engliſh to ſubjection, and concluded a peace with the Scottiſh monarch. But the alarms of invaſion were not yet over: Philip of France was jealous of William's proſperity, and attacked the patrimonial dominions of the Norman. Godfrey de Mayenne joined the invading army, and drove the Normans entirely out of that country. Alarmed at this unexpected attack, William paſſed over to the continent, at the head of an Engliſh army. He immediately attacked the invaders, recovered the territories they had taken, and obliged Philip to conclude a ſafe and honourable peace. By this noble exertion of their innate bravery and reſolution, the Engliſh recovered the confidence of William, who ſoon after reſtored ſome of the laws of Edward the Confeſſor; a circumſtance which greatly contributed to render his government leſs odious to the people.

A. D. 1074. While William continued in Normandy, he received advice, that freſh troubles were excited in England by perſons whom he never ſuſpected of diſaffection. His Norman ſubjects were ſeized with the ſpirit of rebellion. Several of the chiefs who had engaged with him in the conqueſt of England, enriched by the wealth he had beſtowed upon them, diſdained to ſubmit to his imperious dominion. Roger, the youngeſt ſon of William Fitz Oſborne, earl of Hereford, had applied to William for licence to marry his ſiſter to Ralph de Guaer, earl of the Eaſt-Angles; and received a peremptory denial a little before the king paſſed over into Normandy. Enraged at this refuſal, eſpecially as there was no neceſſity for applying to William, the young lady not being an heireſs, it was reſolved to ſolemnize the marriage without waiting for the king's return, or making any farther application for his conſent. The ceremony was accordingly performed with great magnificence. The imperious behaviour of William naturally became the ſubject of converſation, and the moſt bitter reflections were made on his tyrannical government: they expreſſed their contempt for him as a baſtard, and determined to ſubmit no longer to his arbitrary adminiſtration. They accuſed him of uſing every ſpecies of tyranny over the Engliſh, who were unjuſtly ſubjected to the arbitrary nod of an uſurper. Earl Waltheof, one of the greateſt warriors of the age, was the only Engliſhman who retained any power. He had lately married Judith, the king's niece, and was created earl of Northumberland for his valour. This brave ſoldier was one of the gueſts, and joined with the reſt in the conſpiracy to dethrone William; but fearful of their own power, they agreed to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of Sweyn, king of Denmark, a ſworn enemy to the imperious Norman.

Calm reflection ſoon convinced Waltheof, that the conſpiracy was at once idle and unjuſt. Remorſe ſucceeded, and he informed Lanfranc of the whole deſign. The prelate perſuaded him to croſs the ſeas immediately, and reveal all he knew to William. Waltheof followed the advice of the archbiſhop; but unfortunately for him, he had alſo revealed the ſecret to his wife, who ſent an expreſs to the Conqueror, and uſed all her art to incenſe him againſt her huſband. Waltheof, however, met with a gracious reception, and flattered himſelf that he had nothing to fear. The conſpirators were alarmed at the diſappearance of Waltheof; and ſome ſteps taken by the regency convinced them that the ſecret was betrayed. They immediately flew to arms, without waiting the arrival of the Danes, on whoſe aſſiſtance they placed their chief confidence. But their efforts were in vain; they were every where diſappointed; ſo that when William landed in England, he found the conſpiracy intirely ſuppreſſed. The brave Waltheof, notwithſtanding the atonement he had made for his crime, was committed to priſon. Lanfranc exerted all his intereſt to ſave him, but in vain: the Norman was inflexible; Waltheof was tried, and executed. Thus fell the laſt Engliſhman who enjoyed any conſiderable degree of power or intereſt in the nation. His infamous wife did not long enjoy her inhuman triumph over her huſband; ſhe was univerſally deſpiſed, and ſuffered that diſgrace and contempt her perfidy ſo juſtly merited.

A. D. 1075. Though Alexander had met with ſuch bad ſucceſs in his attempt to extend the papal ſupremacy over England, his ſucceſſor, Gregory VII. was not in the leaſt intimidated. The unbounded ambition and ſuperlative inſolence of this pontiff had already ſet half Europe in a flame. He was diſpoſed to employ the moſt ſanguinary meaſures to eſtabliſh the projects he had formed for carrying the papal grandeur to an unbounded height. He was the principal agent in thoſe dreadful conteſts which had ſo long ſubſiſted between the courts of Germany and Rome. Perſuaded that St. Peter's ſucceſſor had a right to diſpoſe of crowns, he undertook to excommunicate and depoſe Henry IV. and to inſtigate his ſubjects to take up arms againſt their lawful ſovereign. Spain, Portugal, and Poland, felt the weight of his ambition; even the plains of Aſia were not exempted from his tyranny; the thunder of the Vatican was heard beyond the Boſphorus. Succeſs had increaſed the violence of his ambition; he was determined to extend the deſpotiſm of Rome over the iſlands, as well as the continent of Europe. He diſpatched a nuncio to William, inſiſting on his doing homage to him for his kingdom, as a fief of the Roman ſee; and demanding the payment of Peter's pence, which the pious liberality of the Saxon princes had conſtantly ſent to Rome; but without ever intending to render the cuſtom binding on their ſucceſſors, or conſidering it as a badge of ſubmiſſion to the holy ſee. William, however, was not to be terrified by the unreaſonable demands of an inſolent eccleſiaſtic: he told him, that the money ſhould be remitted as ſoon as it could be collected; but reſolutely refuſed to pay him homage. “Fealty, ſaid he, “I never have, nor ever will pay.” And, to convince the pope that he was in earneſt, and deſpiſed his power, he would not ſuffer the Engliſh biſhops to attend a general council which the pontiff had ſummoned to meet at Rome.

A. D. 1077. Ambition is often ſufficient to break the ſacred ties of nature. The family of William now became to him a ſource of misfortunes. That prince had promiſed before the peers of France, that as ſoon as he was ſettled on the Engliſh throne, Robert, his eldeſt ſon, ſhould be left in poſſeſſion of Normandy. Philip, king of France, deſirous of creating diſſentions in the family of William, inſtigated Robert to demand the poſſeſſion of his patrimony. Fired with what he conſidered as an injury, Robert laid his claim before his father, and urged the completion of it with ſome warmth. William was highly offended; and told him, that he never would part with any of his dominions, and that death only could put him in poſſeſſion of Normandy. The refractory ſpirit of Robert was exaſperated at this peremptory denial: he formed cabals againſt his father; and at laſt carried his imprudence ſo far, as to break out into open rebellion.

William ſaw with grief the undutiful behaviour of his ſon, and determined to chaſtiſe his inſolence. He tranſported an army, chiefly compoſed of Engliſh, into Normandy, and advanced againſt the inſurgents. Robert ſoon perceived he was in no condition to face his father's army, and retreated to Gerberoy, a ſtrong fortreſs in the Beauvoiſis. William followed him, and inveſted the caſtle. Several ſkirmiſhes happened between ſmall parties of the two armies, but with very little advantage to either. At laſt Robert, diſdaining to be thus ingloriouſly ſhut up within the walls of a caſtle, drew out his forces, and gave his father battle. The conteſt was very ſharp, and, for ſome time, continued equal. At laſt an arrow, from an unknown hand, ſtruck William's horſe, which immediately fell, and the king was thrown, almoſt breathleſs, to the ground, where he was in the utmoſt danger of being trod to pieces. In this deplorable ſituation, he called for help; and Robert hearing the well known voice of his father, was ſtruck with horror: all the ſentiments of duty and filial reverence were awakened in his breaſt; he raiſed him from the ground with the utmoſt tenderneſs, threw himſelf at his feet, implored his pardon, and offered to purchaſe his forgiveneſs by any atonement. But William was too deeply affected with the affront he had received, to pardon his ſon: he renounced not immediately his reſentment: he, however, drew off his army, and returned to Rouen. Robert diſmiſſed his forces, and followed his father. The queen interpoſed in behalf of her ſon; and her influence, added to the ſubmiſſion of Robert, produced, at length, a reconciliation. Robert was again received into the favour of his father; but William did not think it prudent to leave him in Normandy, leſt the ſame inſtigations ſhould again produce the ſame alarming events. He carried his ſon into England, and ſent him, at the head of an army, to repel the inroads of the Scots, who, taking the advantage of William's abſence, had invaded the northern parts of England.

A. D. 1079. William now reſted from the toils of war. The Engliſh were effectually ſubdued; and the greater part of all the eſtates in the kingdom poſſeſſed by Normans; ſo that, according to the emphatical expreſſion of William of Malmſbury, “England was become an habitation and dominion “of ſtrangers.” This interval of tranquillity enabled William to finiſh a ſurvey of the kingdom, begun by Edward the Confeſſor. In this ſurvey an account was taken of all the lands in England, their extent in each diſtrict, their value, their quality, and the number of the tenants, cottagers, freemen, ſockmen, villeins, and ſlaves; black cattle, ſheep, hogs, cattle for draught, and other animals, with the names of thoſe to whom they belonged; and the number of mills and fiſheries. This work was ſix years in compiling; and was at firſt called, The Roll of Wincheſter, becauſe originally kept in that cathedral; but it was afterwards named Domboc, or Domeſday-book, becauſe there was no appeal from its authority; its evidence was deciſive. It is ſtill preſerved in the exchequer, and committed to the care of the chamberlain.

WILLIAM the CONQUEROR Seizing his BROTHER ODO
Bishop of Bayeaux & Earl of Kent.

A. D. 1082. Odo, biſhop of Bayeaux, the king's uterine brother, lately created earl of Kent, and appointed chief juſticiary of the kingdom, had amaſſed immenſe ſums of money by the moſt illegal and oppreſſive methods. He was by nature turbulent and ambitious, and deeply tinctured with the folly of the times, in placing confidence in the idle predictions of aſtrologers. One of thoſe itinerant fortune-tellers, among other ridiculous aſſertions, foretold that Gregory, who then filled the papal chair, ſhould be ſucceeded by a prelate whoſe name was Odo. Animated with the hopes of obtaining that ſeat of envied greatneſs, Odo, who placed the moſt implicit faith in what was then called the language of the ſtars, determined to employ the vaſt treaſures he had collected by the rapacious hand of injuſtice, in procuring the chair of St. Peter. He purchaſed a palace at Rome, furniſhed it in the moſt ſuperb manner, and employed a great number of agents to engage the voices of the cardinals in his favour. He, however, kept his deſign a profound ſecret, and propoſed to withdraw privately out of the kingdom, and take up his reſidence at Rome, till the death of Gregory ſhould open a way to the ſucceſſion. But his intentions could not be concealed: one of his pretended friends informed William of the chimerical projects formed by his brother. The loſs of ſuch enormous ſums, and the conſequences that might attend his endeavours to obtain the papacy, determined William not to ſuffer him to leave the kingdom. He accordingly ordered him to be arreſted; but his officers being intimidated at the immunities enjoyed by the clergy, heſitated to execute his orders: they feared the eccleſiaſtical more than the civil power. William perceived their ſcruples; and ſeized the biſhop with his own hand. It was in vain that Odo pleaded his exemption from temporal juriſdiction; William anſwered, that he arreſted him not as biſhop of Bayeaux, but as earl of Kent. Gregory had recourſe alternately to perſuaſions and menaces to obtain the releaſe of Odo, but in vain. William ſet all the thunders of the vatican at defiance, and kept the ambitious prelate cloſely confined in one of the caſtles of Normandy.

William's favourite amuſement was hunting; and his extreme paſſion for that rural diverſion induced him to execute a deſign which has juſtly loaded his memory with reproach. He laid waſte a large extent of country in Hampſhire, in order to form a capacious foreſt. The ſpot devoted to deſtruction was remarkable for its fertility, and adorned with all the beauties of nature; it was full of churches, monaſteries, villages and farms. The inhabitants had never injured him; never joined in any rebellion againſt his government. But the voice of innocence and juſtice pleaded in vain. William drove the inhabitants from their dwellings, and the religious from their retreats. He demoliſhed the ſtructures, eccleſiaſtical and civil, ſeized the property of the inhabitants, without making the ſufferers the leaſt compenſation for their loſſes. Nor was he ſatisfied with this inhuman ſtretch of tyrannical power. He enacted the moſt ſevere laws relative to the foreſts, by which thoſe who dared to kill a deer, a boar, or even a hare, were condemned to loſe their eyes. And it ſhould be remembered, that at this very time the killing a man might be compenſated by paying a very moderate fine. Humanity is not in the catalogue of a tyrant's virtues.

It was uſeleſs to complain. Every oppreſſion was laid upon the Engliſh. He not only robbed them of their wealth and eſtates, but even formed a project for depriving them of their language. He ordered the French to be taught in the ſchools throughout the kingdom. It was ſpoken at court, and therefore ſtudied by the polite part of the inhabitants. It was uſed in the courts of juſtice, and all the public acts, and private contracts, were written in that language.

A. D. 1087. The French barons having made incurſions into the territories of Normandy, William croſſed the ſea in order to put an end to their depredations. This attempt to diſturb the tranquillity of William's hereditary dominions, occaſioned a miſunderſtanding between him and Philip I. During his ſtay in Normandy, William was taken ill, and for ſome time confined to his bed. He was always corpulent, and this misfortune increaſing with his years, he was now become very unwieldy. Philip turned this natural infirmity into ridicule, and expreſſed his ſurprize, that his brother of England ſhould be ſo long in being delivered of his big belly. This pleaſantry being reported to William, he reſented it in the higheſt degree; and declared, that he would celebrate his recovery at Notredam with ten thouſand lances inſtead of lights, alluding to the practice of women, who then offered wax-tapers at the altar after their recovery from child-birth.

His health was no ſooner reſtored, than he entered France at the head of a powerful army, and committed the moſt inhuman ravages that fury, blended with malice, could invent. Towns and villages, churches and chapels, palaces and huts, were alike deſtroyed: a ſmoking deſert cloſed the rear of his army. The city of Mantes was one of thoſe unfortunate places that fell into his hands, and felt the dreadful effects of his unbounded rage. He laid it in aſhes, and beheld with ſatisfaction this horrid ſacrifice to his revenge. But his triumph was of no long continuance; his horſe, terrified by the ſmoking ruins, ſuddenly ſtarted aſide, and bruiſed his belly againſt the pommel of the ſaddle. A rupture attended by a fever was the conſequence. He was carried to Rouen; and ſenſible that his end was approaching, he was ſtruck with remorſe for the many violences and cruelties he had committed to ſatisfy the cravings of an unbounded ambition. He laviſhed donations on churches and monaſteries, and practiſed all the external acts of religion, which in that bigotted age, were conſidered as the higheſt, and moſt powerful acts of religion. He gave Normandy and Maine to Robert his eldeſt ſon, and named William his ſecond ſon, as his ſucceſſor to the crown of England. Henry, his youngeſt ſon, he left only the portion of his mother Matilda; but foretold, that he ſhould one day ſucceed to the undivided inheritance of his father, and ſurpaſs his brothers in power, in prudence and in riches. He paid the debt of nature on the ninth of September, in the ſixty-firſt year of his age.

The attendants of William no ſooner perceived that the ſtroke of death was over, and had heard the groan of expiration, than they immediately deſerted the lifeleſs body to plunder his coffers and ſeize on his valuable effects. They even ſtripped his corpſe of the rich mantle with which it was covered, and left the remains of this mighty conqueror, whoſe nod had decided the fate of thouſands, naked and expoſed. A country gentleman beheld this ſcene of rapacity, and was touched with compaſſion. He cauſed the body to be embalmed at his own expence, and made the neceſſary preparations for interring it in the church of St. Stephen in Caen, purſuant to William's own requeſt. The proceſſion was awfully ſolemn, and an elegant funeral oration was pronounced by Gilbert, biſhop of Evreux, who, with ſix other prelates, attended this mournful ceremony. But juſt as they were going to depoſit the body in the earth, one Anſelm Fitz-Arthur, a Norman gentleman, preſſed forward through the croud, and with an audible voice, forbad the prelates to inter the body. "That "ſpot," ſaid he, "was once the floor of my father's "houſe, which was unjuſtly ſeized by William, who "I now ſummon before the tribunal of the Moſt "High, to anſwer for that flagrant act of tyrannical "oppreſſion." The people trembled, and the biſhops were ſtruck with terror at the ſolemnity of this invocation. At laſt it was agreed to give thirty ſols for leave to bury the royal body, and Henry promiſed, if his claim ſhould appear to be well founded, to make him a reaſonable ſatisfaction for his eſtate.

Thus died William the mighty conqueror of England; a prince liberally endowed by nature with all the talents neceſſary for placing him on the pinnacle of human greatneſs. His genius was piercing, and improved by a noble education. He was intrepid in danger, and fruitful in reſources; a great general, and a valiant ſoldier. He was formed to ſhine both in the council and the field. He was an excellent judge of men, and employed none but thoſe of the greateſt capacity either in church or ſtate. But his ambition carried him beyond the bounds of humanity. He availed himſelf of the right of conqueſt, the only title by which he had acquired a great kingdom, to trample upon the laws of juſtice, and erect the throne of deſpotiſm upon the ruins of the conſtitution of a free people. Avarice and oppreſſion were two of the principal features in his character; he ſacrificed to the former every principle of juſtice, and to the latter every dictate of humanity. He extended the iron rod of tyranny over a people his arms had conquered; he felt not for the miſeries of innocence in diſtreſs. William was not, however, wholly deſtitute of virtues. The noble ſtand he made againſt the inſolent demands of the Roman pontiff, deſerves the higheſt applauſe: he expoſed his ſubjects to no tyranny but his own. In private life he was a tender huſband, an indulgent parent, and, where political intereſt did not interpoſe, a generous maſter. He introduced the regulation of the curfeu into England, by which all the inhabitants were obliged to extinguiſh their fires, and put out their lights, at the ſound of a bell, which was tolled about eight o'clock in the evening. This has been unjuſtly repreſented by ſeveral hiſtorians as the badge of Engliſh ſervitude: for it is known that William had eſtabliſhed the ſame cuſtom in Normandy before he landed in England; and it appears that it alſo prevailed in Scotland.

WILLIAM II. ſurnamed RUFUS.

A.D. 1086. THOUGH the Conqueror was deſirous of placing his ſecond ſon, Rufus, on the Engliſh throne, he was aware of the difficulties that would, probably, attend his acceſſion. The right of primogeniture was, undoubtedly, veſted in his brother Robert. It was alſo natural to imagine, that the Engliſh were not yet ſufficiently reconciled to the Norman government, to admit a deſcendant from the Conqueror to take poſſeſſion of the throne without one ſtruggle for their liberty; and that the Norman barons would oppoſe any diviſion in the dominions of their late maſter: it was for their intereſt that the ſame perſon ſhould ſway the ſceptres of England and Normandy. Rufus was no ſtranger to theſe difficulties; and knowing that his right of ſucceſſion was founded on a letter the late king had written to Lanfranc, archbiſhop of Canterbury, he haſtened to England, before any intelligence of the death of his father reached that kingdom, in order, if poſſible, to ſecure the poſſeſſion of a throne which, of right, belonged to his brother.

Lanfranc had been entruſted with the care of William's education, and looked upon him with the affection of a father: but he refuſed to exert his intereſt in his favour, unleſs he would promiſe, in the moſt ſolemn manner, "To govern with equity "and moderation, maintain the liberties of the people, and behave like a dutiful and obedient ſon to "the church." Rufus readily conſented; and the prelate applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to remove every difficulty, and procure for his princely pupil the ſceptre of England. He well knew that the government of the Conqueror was obnoxious to the inhabitants; and that all his endeavours would, therefore, prove abortive, unleſs ſome method could be deviſed to remove the prejudice of the people. A change of meaſures was univerſally deſired, and it was therefore neceſſary to promiſe, that their wiſh ſhould be granted. A report was accordingly propagated, that William had contracted a natural affection for the Engliſh; that he had ſeen with grief their oppreſſions, and earneſtly wiſhed to alleviate all their miſfortunes: that he conſidered the foreſt laws as ſhamefully oppreſſive, and fit only for a nation of the moſt abject ſlaves: that he thought the Engliſh and Normans equally his ſubjects, and intended to make no difference between them: and that he intended to reſtore the nation to its former liberty, and govern intirely by the laws of Edward the Confeſſor. Theſe reports excited a joy in the breaſt, of the Engliſh more eaſily imagined than expreſſed. They looked upon Rufus as a perſon ſent by Providence to remove their complicated diſtreſs, and once more reſtore that happineſs and domeſtic tranquillity which the iron rod of tyranny had deſtroyed. They wiſhed to ſee Rufus placed in the ſeat of power.

But the taſk was ſtill more difficult to gain the Norman barons over to the party of Rufus: they could not behold the disjunction of England and Normandy without regret: they were poſſeſſed of large eſtates in both, and deſirous of avoiding the inconvenience of being ſubject to two maſters. They foreſaw, that if a war ſhould break out between England and Normandy, an event highly probable, they muſt ſacrifice the eſtates they poſſeſſed in one province to the preſervation of thoſe in the other. Theſe conſiderations induced them to favour the pretenſions of Robert. The temper of William alſo rendered them averſe to his government. Cruel, inſolent, and rapacious, he had inſpired them with deteſtation inſtead of love. Recourſe was, however, had to the art of perſuaſion. They were taught to believe, that if Robert obtained poſſeſſion of the throne, there would be no hopes of their keeping poſſeſſion of their Engliſh eſtates: his Norman friends would be gratified with the poſſeſſions they themſelves had formerly wreſted from the natives of the country: that their intereſts were therefore cloſely connected with thoſe of Rufus, to whom their great benefactor, with his dying breath, had bequeathed the crown of England.

Theſe lenient and perſuaſive arts would, however, have failed of the deſired effect, had not the inactivity of Robert given them a force much greater than their own. Rufus owed the Engliſh crown to the indolence of his brother. Robert was ſo ſure of the affections of the people, that the ambitious deſigns of his brother gave him no uneaſineſs; and when his friends adviſed him not to truſt his intereſt wholly to precarious hope, probably founded on deception, but to croſs over immediately into England, and conciliate, by his preſence, the affections of that generous people; he anſwered, with a haughtineſs which nothing but the moſt ſuperlative vanity could inſpire, "That precipitation was unneceſſary; "the ſceptre was his undoubted right; the Engliſh "were his inſeparable friends, and would never preſume to appoint a ſucceſſor to the throne in his "abſence." He was, however, for once, miſtaken, and became the dupe of his own vanity. Lanfranc's unwearied application in favour of Rufus, prevailed over the intereſt of an abſent prince; and William was crowned by that prelate on the ſeventh of September.

William knew the popularity of Robert, and that the Norman barons would not fail to join his ſtandards, ſhould he land in England at the head of a powerful army. He therefore juſtly conſidered the Engliſh as his only ſupport, and determined to court their affections by the moſt lenient and conciliating meaſures. He practiſed not theſe aſſuaſive arts in vain. Flattered by the particular attention of their ſovereign, the Engliſh paid him unbounded obedience. They conſidered him as their friend, their protector, their father, and determined to ſupport his government againſt the attempts of every enemy. Their natural honeſty and oppenneſs of temper always rendered them the dupes of ambitious or deſigning men. The time-ſerving meaſures of Rufus both gained and ſecured him the Engliſh crown.

Odo, biſhop of Bayeaux, the chief miniſter and favourite of Robert, jealous of the authority of Lanfranc, whoſe great abilities and high ſtation he envied, paſſed over into England, under pretence of ſolliciting the reſtitution of an eſtate he formerly poſſeſſed as earl of Kent, and which had been confiſcated by the Conqueror. He was received with great affection, and reinſtated in his former poſſeſſions. But the recovery of an eſtate was not the principal deſign of Odo's viſit: he intended to wreſt the ſceptre from the hand of Rufus, and give it to Robert, as the undoubted heir of the Conqueror. He accordingly applied to ſeveral of the principal barons, and found them ready to ſupport the pretenſions of his patron, provided they could be aſſured of a ſufficient force from Normandy to ſecond their attempt. Robert promiſed them all the aſſiſtance in his power; and that he would land, at the head of a powerful army, as ſoon as his preſence became neceſſary.

Animated by theſe encouragements, the partiſans of Robert broke out into open rebellion. Several parts of the kingdom were at once thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, and many of the counties again laid waſte by the ſword of deſolation, William was alarmed; but that remarkable preſence of mind which never forſook him, ſupported him amidſt the rebellion of the Norman barons. He ſhewed not the leaſt ſigns of uneaſineſs; his paſſions precipitated him not into violent meaſures: he followed the advice of Lanfranc, and laboured to ſtifle the rebellion by the gentle methods of reaſon and conciliation. He choſe rather to convince the inſurgents of the folly of ſupporting a cauſe pregnant with deſtruction, than to force them to ſubmiſſion by blood and ſlaughter. The ſucceſs of theſe prudent meaſures was ſoon apparent; the chief of the conſpirators abandoned the cauſe of Robert, and became the firm friends and adherents of Rufus. The prudent counſels of Lanfranc triumphed over the violent inſtigations of the biſhop of Bayeaux. Odo himſelf eſcaped to Normandy; but his large poſſeſſions were ſeized by Rufus, who diſtributed them among thoſe who had ſerved him faithfully in this alarming criſis of danger. Robert loſt all his intereſt in England; and Rufus was firmly eſtabliſhed on the throne he had uſurped from his brother.

A. D. 1088. Proſperity is, perhaps, the ſureſt touchſtone of virtue. While William was ſurrounded with enemies, and felt the crown totter on his brow, he diſtinguiſhed the Engliſh by every mark of favour. But he no ſooner ſaw all his enemies at his feet, and himſelf firmly fixed in the ſeat of power, than he forgot all his promiſes, and treated them with the cruelties of a conqueror. He increaſed, inſtead of mitigating the ſeverity of the foreſt laws. The complaints of the Engliſh were urged in vain; he was deaf to their petitions, and beheld their miſeries without redreſs. Lanfranc ſaw theſe meaſures with grief and aſtoniſhment: he remonſtrated againſt the deſpotic adminiſtration of his ſovereign in the moſt forcible manner; he urged his own ſolemn promiſes when a candidate for the crown; he urged the noble and generous behaviour of the Engliſh; but his efforts were in vain: Rufus, indeed, proceeded with more caution; the great character of the archbiſhop, and his prodigious intereſt with the people, kept the king within the bounds of decency. But this check was ſoon removed: Lanfranc, who had kept the paſſions of Rufus under ſome reſtraint, paid the debt of nature, and allowed his tyranny a full career. The death of that worthy prelate was juſtly regretted by all the virtuous part of the nation, Normans and Engliſh. He made no diſtinction between the two nations; every good man was ſure of his favour and protection. He gained the love of all parties; and was juſtly conſidered as a faithful and vigilant paſtor, and an able and upright ſtateſman.

The whole nation now felt all the weight of arbitrary power; the Engliſh were at once inſulted and oppreſſed: even the privileges of the church, ſo ſacred in thoſe early times, proved a feeble rampart againſt his uſurpations. Mitres and croſiers were put up to ſale, and the higheſt bidder was ſure to be the purchaſer. Nor were theſe illegal methods ſufficient to ſatisfy his avarice; the appointing of ſucceſſors to vacant benefices was delayed by this all-graſping monarch, that he might ſeize their revenues. The alarm occaſioned by his tyrannical adminiſtration was univerſal; but the terror of his authority ſtifled the voice of complaint; even the murmurs of the eccleſiaſtics were in vain; their diſtreſs produced no tumult or commotion.

A. D. 1090. The indolence of Robert, which had loſt him the Engliſh crown, threatened alſo to deprive him of his Norman dominions. Robert was valiant, and at the head of an army prudent and intrepid; but he was a ſtranger to policy; he had no talents for holding the reins of government. The reſtleſs and independent ſpirit of his vaſſals was greatly increaſed by his looſe and negligent adminiſtration. The ſword of civil diſcord was drawn, and Normandy felt all the horrors of an inteſtine war. Robert had mortgaged the Contantin to his brother Henry for three thouſand pounds. Perhaps a leſs degree of natural affection never ſubſiſted than between the three ſons of William the Conqueror. Henry, fearful of loſing the dominions he had obtained, applied to William for aſſiſtance; and adviſed him to attack the Norman dominions of his brother, where he could not fail of the greateſt ſucceſs. Rufus, whoſe avaricious ſoul was never ſatisfied, paſſed over to Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. Robert was in no condition to oppoſe his brother; he beheld with aſtoniſhment his towns ſucceſſively taken, and even the capital itſelf on the point of falling into the hands of the invader, by the treachery of the governor. He applied in vain to the king of France for aſſiſtance; that monarch was attached to the intereſt of William. Henry now ſaw his error, and trembled for his own dominions. He deſerted the party of Rufus, and joined Robert with an excellent body of forces. The two brothers arrived juſt ſoon enough to ſave the capital; and Robert, exaſperated at the perfidy of the governor, cauſed him to be thrown headlong from the battlements of the caſtle.

A. D. 1091. William having thus miſcarried in his attempt upon Rouen, laid aſide his deſign of making himſelf maſter of Normandy, and returned to England. Perhaps he did not think it prudent to engage the combined army of his two brothers: a defeat might have been attended with the loſs of his crown. His tyranny had rendered the Engliſh ripe for a revolt, and they would gladly have joined the victorious army to hurl him from the throne. A peace was, ſoon after, concluded between Robert and William; by which it was ſtipulated, that on the death of either, without iſſue, the ſurvivor ſhould ſucceed to his dominions. The intereſts of Henry were totally forgotten; his name was not mentioned in the treaty.

Alarmed and exaſperated at this contemptuous treatment, Henry reſolved to revenge the inſult upon Robert, and accordingly made himſelf maſter of Mount Michael. This inſult rouſed the indolence of Robert: he informed his brother William of this act of hoſtility, and it was agreed to march a powerful army againſt Henry, in order to chaſtiſe him for diſturbing the peace of his brother's dominions. They began with taking poſſeſſion of the Conſtantin, and then advanced to the ſiege of Mount Michael, where Henry had ſhut himſelf up, and determined to defend the fortreſs to the laſt extremity. The place was ſtrongly fortified both by art and nature: it was ſituated on a rock, one ſide of which was waſhed by the ſea, and wholly ſurrounded by the tide at high water. Inſtead, therefore, of attempting to reduce it by ſtorm, the two brothers prudently turned the ſiege into a blockade, and determined to continue before the place till famine ſhould force the beſieged to ſurrender.

While the army lay thus inactive, William uſed frequently to ride round the camp, to ſee that a proper diſcipline was obſerved among the ſoldiers. One day, as he was employed in this exerciſe, he obſerved two men advancing full ſpeed from the caſtle. William, who was a total ſtranger to fear, inſtead of retreating, advanced to meet them, not doubting but he ſhould be able to take one, if not both of them, priſoners. They met with equal fury; but the launce of one of the ſoldiers piercing the cheſt of William's horſe, he fell, and the king was thrown violently to the ground. The ſoldier leaped from his ſaddle, and raiſed his hand to diſpatch his fallen adverſary with his ſword, when William exclaimed, "Hold, fellow! I am the king "of England!" Struck with veneration, the aſſailant ſheathed his ſword, raiſed him from the ground with the higheſt expreſſions of reſpect, and received a noble reward. This is, perhaps, the only commendable action in his whole reign. Henry was, however, ſoon after, obliged to ſurrender the caſtle to his brother Robert; and being deprived of all his poſſeſſions, wandered from one place to another, with few attendants, and often in the greateſt poverty and diſtreſs.

A. D. 1094. William ſtill entertained the dangerous ambition of making himſelf maſter of Normandy. He had, indeed, concluded a peace with Robert, who had ceded to him ſeveral towns; but treaties were feeble bars to the ambition of William. He made a ſecond invaſion of Normandy, and ſoon made himſelf maſter of ſeveral important places. But the king of France, alarmed at his progreſs, marched, at the head of a powerful army, to the aſſiſtance of Robert. The ſcene was now totally changed: the towns and caſtles which Rufus had taken were ſucceſſively recovered, and William reduced to the neceſſity of acting on the defenſive. He immediately diſpatched an expreſs to England for a large reinforcement of troops; and threw up ſtrong intrenchments round his camp, to render abortive any deſign Robert might form againſt his army.

The levies were immediately raiſed in England; and a general muſter was appointed at Haſtings, where the number was found to amount to twenty thouſand men. It was an eſtabliſhed cuſtom for the barons or knights, under whom ſoldiers were raiſed for foreign ſervice, to furniſh each man with ten ſhillings towards defraying the expences of the campaign. William wanted money more than men; and therefore, when the ſoldiers were drawn up on the ſands, the treaſurer told them, that they might be diſmiſſed from the ſervice, on paying to him, for the king's uſe, the bounty-money they had received. The offer was readily embraced; they paid the money to the treaſurer, and were immediately diſcharged. This money enabled William to put an end to the campaign with honour. He corrupted many of Robert's vaſſals, and detached the king of France from his intereſt. But an incurſion of the Welſh obliged him to return to his own dominions ſooner than he intended, and ſaved Robert the mortification of ſeeing his towns taken from him, without being able to give the invader battle.

The Welſh had been exaſperated by the tyranny of the Norman barons whoſe eſtates lay on the borders of their country; and, to revenge the injuries they had received, poured like a deluge into the Engliſh territories. Their routes were marked with deſtruction; neither age nor ſex were ſpared. They laid in aſhes all the towns, villages, and farms, they met with; and rendered the counties of Salop, Cheſter and Hereford, a ſmoaking deſert. Exaſperated at their cruelties, William advanced againſt them at the head of a numerous army. But the Welſh, not thinking themſelves able to meet him in the open field, wiſely retreated to their mountains, whence they continually detached flying parties, who haraſſed the rear of William's army with perpetual ſkirmiſhes, and cut off his convoys; ſo that he was obliged to return without effecting his purpoſe.

A. D. 1095. An affair of much greater importance now called for his attention. A dangerous conſpiracy was formed againſt his life by ſome of the principal barons of the kingdom. Robert Mowbray, the moſt powerful ſubject in England, was at the head of this dangerous deſign. The great intereſt and connections of Mowbray had engaged many of the nobility to join his party, which now became very numerous. William took the moſt prudent methods to render the deſign abortive. He ſummoned Mowbray to attend him at Wincheſter, to anſwer for his plundering four merchant ſhips, which had put into an Engliſh port under his juriſdiction. Robert, conſcious of his guilt, or vain of his ſervices, refuſed to obey the royal mandate. William, therefore, marched immediately againſt him; and Mowbray being in no condition to give William battle, ſhut himſelf up in Bamborough caſtle, which the king immediately inveſted. Mowbray knowing that the fortreſs, though impregnable, muſt, for want of proviſions, be forced to ſurrender, found means to eſcape from the caſtle. He repaired to Tinmouth, and endeavoured to corrupt the governor; but before he could effect his purpoſe, a detachment of William's army followed him, and took him priſoner. The caſtle of Bamborough ſurrendered, and the governor impeached all the conſpirators. Mowbray was ſentenced to be confined for life in Windſor-caſtle, ſeveral were executed, and the eſtates of the greater part of them were confiſcated.

Geoffrey count D'Eu was impeached by Geoffrey Baynard of high treaſon, in being privy to the late conſpiracy. He denied the charge, and offered to vindicate himſelf by ſingle combat; but being defeated by his antagoniſt, he was condemned to be caſtrated, and loſe both his eyes. His couſin, William D'Alderi, was ſentenced to be publickly whipped, and afterwards hanged on a gallows thirty feet high. He ſuffered the whole puniſhment with the greateſt intrepidity, and, with his dying breath, declared himſelf innocent of the crime laid to his charge. What bitter reflections muſt theſe dreadful ſeverities have excited in the minds of the Engliſh! How different are theſe tyrannical proceedings from the mildneſs of the Saxon laws!

A. D. 1096. William had ſome time ſince appointed the famous Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury. It was cuſtomary at that time for perſons raiſed to any place of dignity to make preſents to the king proportional to the value of the poſt; and William, in conſequence, expected a very conſiderable ſum from Anſelm. But to his aſtoniſhment, the prelate's offering amounted to no more than five hundred pounds. Enraged at this parſimonious gift, the king refuſed to take it, and treated Anſelm with great indignity. The archbiſhop left the preſence, carrying the money with him; and could not be prevailed upon to furniſh any aid towards the expences of government. Anſelm was as tenacious of the church, as William was of the prerogatives of the crown.

A ſchiſm now happened in the Roman church. Two prelates claimed the pontifical dignity. Odo, biſhop of Oſtia, under the name of Urban II. was acknowledged pope in Italy and France; while his competitor, Gilbert, archbiſhop of Revenna, under the title of Clement III. was conſidered as the ſucceſſor of Peter, by ſeveral of the European powers, and particularly by the king of England. Anſelm oppoſed his ſovereign. The haughty prelate diſdained to ſubmit to any temporal authority. He even determined to mortify William, and accordingly demanded leave to repair to Rome, and receive his archiepiſcopal pall from the hands of Urban II. adding, that he regarded him as the true head of the church. Provoked by this inſolence, William was with the utmoſt difficulty prevented from laying violent hands on the churchman; and Anſelm, perceiving that he ſhould not be ſupported by the prelates and clergy, retired out of the kingdom. William ſeized immediately on the temporalities of the archiepiſcopal ſee; nor could he ever be perſuaded to reſtore them to the church: They continued in his hands till he paid the debt of nature.

Superſtition and enthuſiaſm form two of the principal features of theſe times, and produced ſuch conſequences as have aſtoniſhed people of more enlightened ages. A monk of Picardy, known by the name of Peter the hermit, having made a pilgrimage to Jeruſalem, repreſented, at his return, in ſuch ſtrong colours, the outrages and oppreſſions exerciſed by the Turks on the chriſtian pilgrims, that Urban II. conſidered him as a proper inſtrument to exhort the ſovereigns of Europe to undertake the conqueſt of the Holy Land. Peter was accordingly ſent from province to province, in order to ſow the ſeeds of enthuſiaſm, and rouſe the people to action.

Urban II. perceiving that the ſtrong paintings of Peter began to produce the deſired effect, held a council in the open fields near Placentia, at which above thirty thouſand ſeculars, beſides eccleſiaſtics, were preſent. The project of invading Paleſtine was univerſally applauded; but none engaged in the enterprize. Urban, therefore, held a ſecond council at Clermont in Auvergne, where he made a ſpeech in the market-place, in which he expatiated on the miſeries ſuffered by the Chriſtians in the Holy Land, and painted, in the ſtrongeſt colours, the ſcandal that was daily offered to the Chriſtian princes by the Turks, in not ſuffering their ſubjects to viſit a city, where the great author of their religion had laid down his life for the redemption of the human race. This ſpeech, exactly calculated to the meridian of the times, produced the deſired effect. The Italians had wept over the miſeries of the Chriſtians in Aſia; the French took up arms in their defence. That country was then peopled with a great many new lords, reſtleſs, independent, and fond of a life of war and diſſipation. Moſt of them plunged in crimes the natural attendants of debauchery, and in an ignorance equal to their guilt. The pope promiſed them the remiſſion of all their ſins, and to open to them the gates of paradiſe, on the eaſy conditions of gratifying their predominant paſſion for war and tumult. No wonder that ſuch terms were readily embraced by a multitude of enthuſiaſtics. An infinite number of perſons took the croſs, and were ready to precipitate themſelves upon Aſia. Many even forgot, on this occaſion, the duties they owed to themſelves, to their families, and to their country. The glory of the undertaking baniſhed all other conſiderations. They reflected not on the fatigues, the obſtacles, and the dangers they muſt meet with before they trod the plains of Paleſtine. The churches and cloiſters made their advantage of this enthuſiaſtic madneſs; they purchaſed, at very low rates, many of the eſtates of the barons, who imagined that a little money and their arms were ſufficient for them to conquer kingdoms in Aſia. Every thing conſpired to fill their minds with the moſt chimerical ideas. The glory of the enterprize, the piety which it indicated, the advantages that might reſult from it to religion, the honour of extirpating the infidels, and the brilliancy of an eaſtern conqueſt, acted too powerfully on the minds of a ſuperſtitious people to be withſtood. The meaneſt lords of manors ſet out at their own expence, and the poor gentlemen followed them as ſquires. They inliſted an infinite number of cavalry and infantry, under a thouſand different banners.

This fanatical fury, though it robbed Europe of millions of inhabitants, had alſo its advantages. It tended greatly to eſtabliſh the peace of nations. Great part of the turbulent barons with their vaſſals were removed to a diſtance, and their eſtates veſted in the hands of more peaceable proprietors. The ſovereigns enjoyed their crowns, and the people their eſtates in more tranquillity: they were no longer alarmed with the fury of thoſe reſtleſs ſpirits that had often ſpread the horrors of civil diſcord over their reſpective kingdoms. The French monarchy recovered its luſtre by this enthuſiaſtic inſanity: the principal part of the large eſtates of the moſt opulent and powerful barons being purchaſed by the crown. But no prince gained more, or deſerved it leſs than Henry. Robert, his brother, infected with the enthuſiaſm of the times, and impatient to undergo all the fatigues of a holy war, took the croſs, and applied himſelf to make preparations for leading an army into Paleſtine. But he ſoon perceived that the revenues of his dutchy were too ſmall to anſwer this purpoſe: they were not ſufficient to enable him to appear in a manner ſuitable to his rank and ſtation at the head of his vaſſals. He had therefore recourſe to his brother, and mortgaged his dutchy for three years to Rufus, for the trifling ſum of ten thouſand marks. William raiſed the money by contributions on his ſubjects; and Robert, after putting him in poſſeſſion of Normandy, ſet out at the head of his vaſſals to gather laurels on the plains of Paleſtine.

A. D. 1099. William was now conſidered as one of the moſt powerful princes of his time. England and Normandy were once more united, and the many contentions that had ſubſiſted between the barons of the two provinces entirely laid aſide. Both were ſubjects to William, and both felt the weight of his tyranny. But notwithſtanding the great power of Rufus, a ſingle baron dared to ſet that power at defiance. Helie, lord of la Fleche, a ſmall town in Anjou, alarmed the monarch of England. That nobleman made ſo many inroads into William's dominions, and ſtruck ſuch terror into the inhabitants bordering on his dominions, that Rufus was obliged to croſs the ſeas ſeveral times, in order to drive him out of his territories. But Helie was not to be intimidated; he embraced the firſt opportunity of William's abſence to renew his incurſions, and this year laid ſiege to the city of Mans. William was hunting in the new foreſt when he received advice of this tranſaction; when, turning to his attendants, he aſked them in what direction the city of Mans lay from them. He was immediately anſwered, and turning his horſe's head towards the place, rode full ſpeed to the ſea ſide, calling to thoſe that were about him, "Let him that loves me, follow me." Dartmouth was the firſt ſea-port town, and there they found only an old and crazy veſſel, which William entered notwithſtanding all the perſuaſions of his attendants to the contrary. The maſter of the veſſel declared, that the tempeſtuous weather rendered it madneſs to put to ſea, it was nothing leſs than running into unavoidable deſtruction. But the ſoul of William was not to be terrified by danger. "What!" ſaid he to the maſter, "didſt thou ever hear of a king that was "drowned?" Silenced by this reproof, the maſter ſailed immediately out of the harbour, and the next morning reached Barfleur in ſafety.

Surpriſed at the aſtoniſhing diſpatch of William, Helie, after a few ſkirmiſhes, raiſed the ſiege, and retreated with the utmoſt precipitation. William followed the flying enemy, attacked their rear, and took Helie himſelf priſoner. The captive was treated with inſult; which ſo incenſed that intrepid nobleman, that he told Rufus, "He had little cauſe "for triumph, as his ſucceſs was owing rather to "ſurpriſe than valour." Adding, "That if he were "again at liberty, he would not find it eaſy to defeat "him in a fair engagement." This ſpeech awakened all the ſentiments of valour in the breaſt of Rufus. He immediately ordered the count to be ſet at liberty. "Be gone," ſaid he fiercely, "do thy worſt; and, "by the face of St. Luke, if thou haſt the good "fortune to conquer me, I will not aſk the ſmalleſt "return for the freedom I now confer upon thee." But no farther action happened between them.

While William was pleaſing himſelf with the acquiſition of Normandy, Robert was diſplaying his intrepid courage againſt the infidels. After the greateſt fatigues, and the loſs of multitudes of enthuſiaſtic ſoldiers, the famous city of Jeruſalem was taken, and the diadem of that celebrated capital offered to Robert. But whether that prince was not deſirous of a crown that muſt be ſupported by continual wars, or preferred the Engliſh ſceptre to that of the Holy City, is uncertain: he, however, declined the offer, and the crown was placed on the head of Godfrey of Boulogne. Had Robert perceived the conſequences that followed his declining this honour, he would not, poſſibly, have refuſed it. He was conſidered as a perſon without the leaſt regard for religion, becauſe he refuſed to ſupport the advantageous conqueſt which had been obtained at the expence of the lives of thouſands.

A. D. 1100. Though Jeruſalem was recovered from the infidels, the enthuſiaſtic madneſs of the times ſtill continued: numbers of warriors were daily flocking to the plains of Aſia. Among thoſe who were ſeized with the fanatical inſanity, was Henry, earl of Poictou, who offered to mortgage his dominions to William for a ſum of money ſufficient to defray the expences of the holy war. Rufus, who joined impiety to his other vices, and ridiculed both the motive which gave riſe to the cruſades, and the madneſs of thoſe who engaged in ſo chimerical an undertaking, liſtened to the offers of Henry. He agreed to pay down the ſum demanded on being put in poſſeſſion of the provinces; and ordered a numerous fleet to be fitted out, on board of which he propoſed to embark in perſon.

While theſe preparations were making, William amuſed himſelf daily with hunting in the New Foreſt. Sir Walter Tyrrel, a French knight, and famous as an archer, attended the king in theſe diverſions. One day, as they were returning from the chaſe, and at a diſtance from his attendants, William alighted from his horſe, to wait till they joined him. He was hardly on the ground, before a ſtag, ruſhing from an adjacent thicket, paſſed near the king. William immediately let fly an arrow, which wounded the deer, and he followed the creature, expecting he would ſoon fall. While William was engaged in watching the wounded ſtag, another iſſued from the ſame thicket, and croſſing the path between Tyrrel and the king, the knight ſhot an arrow, which, either by glancing againſt a tree, or the horns of the deer, changed its direction, ſtruck the monarch in the breaſt, and piercing his heart, he fell dead on the ſpot, without uttering a word. Tyrrel, who had been the innocent cauſe of this fatal cataſtrophe, fled immediately to the ſea-ſide, and eſcaped to France. The royal corpſe was treated with the ſame neglect as that of his father. His attendants, who feared his power, and had followed his fortunes, paid no regard to his remains. The body was ſuffered to lie in the very poſture it fell, till they perceived a peaſant approaching with his cart, into which they threw the body, and in that ignominious manner it was conveyed to Wincheſter, and buried in the cathedral. No funeral pomp attended this monarch to his tomb; his grave was not watered with the tears of his people. An accidental blow put an end to his life, on the ſecond of Auguſt, in the forty-fourth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

William had ſome virtues, and many vices. He was intrepid and magnanimous, a lover and encourager of arts and learning, a friend to military merit, and an implacable enemy to every ſpecies of ſuperſtition. But he was ungrateful, avaricious, tyrannical, perfidious, cruel, rapacious and diſſolute. In a word, his few virtues were obſcured by his vices, which have fixed an eternal ſtain upon his memory. He built Weſtminſter-hall, London-bridge, and the greater part of the Tower. He acquired the ſurname of Rufus from his hair being of a red colour.

HENRY I. ſurnamed BEAUCLERC.

A.D. 1100. THE throne of England, by the death of William Rufus, without iſſue, undoubtedly belonged to Robert; who, after the reduction of Jeruſalem, returned to Italy, where he married Sibylla, daughter of William, count of Converſana, a lady celebrated for her beauty and accompliſhments. In that delicious climate he was enjoying the delights of love and repoſe, when the throne of England became vacant by the untimely death of his brother. But indolence and pleaſure were more prevalent with Robert than the acquiſition of a diadem. He continued in Italy till the throne was filled by another.

Henry, the younger brother of William, was hunting in the ſame foreſt when the arrow from the bow of Tyrrel put a period to the life of Rufus. He knew the indolence of his brother Robert, and determined to ſeize the crown in his abſence. He poſted directly to Wincheſter, and made himſelf maſter of his brother's treaſures. This acquiſition almoſt inſured his ſucceſs. He now eaſily gained over the nobility and prelates to his intereſt; and he was crowned at London on the fifth of Auguſt, three days after his brother's deceaſe.

Henry was aware of the danger that might attend this act of uſurpation. He knew that Robert, with all his faults, was a favourite of the Engliſh; and therefore wiſely determined to gain the love of his people, and colour the unjuſt meaſures he had purſued to ſeize the ſceptre of his brother, by the appearance of juſtice and humanity. Henry was not to learn, that the firſt acts of a king make the ſtrongeſt impreſſions on the minds of the people. He granted a famous charter, under the great ſeal of England, whereby he reſtrained himſelf from ſeizing the revenues of vacant biſhopricks and abbies. He engaged to admit the heirs of barons to the enjoyment of their eſtates, without exacting thoſe enormous fees which had been required by the two preceding princes. He promiſed to remit the wardſhip of minors, minors, by which the crown received the profits of their poſſeſſions during their minority. He engaged not to oppoſe any marriages which the barons might contract for their daughters, ſiſters, nieces, or kinſwomen, unleſs the perſons propoſed were his enemies. He promiſed to exerciſe with juſtice and moderation the right of levying impoſts, to pardon all paſt offences, to remit all debts due to the crown; and to maintain, in their full force, the laws of Edward the Confeſſor.

This charter was ſigned, with great ſolemnity, before all the archbiſhops, biſhops, barons, earls, ſheriffs, &c. in England; as many copies of it were taken as there were counties in the kingdom; and the tranſcript was lodged in the principal abbey of each diviſion.

The ſigning of this charter was followed by an act of juſtice which endeared Henry to his ſubjects. Ralph Flambard, biſhop of Durham, the oppreſſive and deteſted miniſter of Rufus, was thrown into priſon, and fell a victim to the reſentment of the public. He aboliſhed the curfeu; and granted the citizens of London a new charter, containing very ample privileges.

Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had rendered himſelf extremely popular by the vigorous oppoſition he made to the meaſures of the late king; and his reputation for ſanctity had greatly increaſed during his baniſhment. The Engliſh were, therefore, very deſirous of ſeeing that famous prelate reſtored to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury. Henry was no ſtranger to the affection of the people for their paſtor, and immediately recalled Anſelm from his exile. On his arrival, Henry propoſed that he ſhould renew the homage he had done to his brother; but this the lofty prelate abſolutely refuſed; the pope having very lately declared, in a council held at Rome, that it was highly abſurd to ſuppoſe, that hands deſtined to create God ſhould be profaned by being ignominiouſly inſerted between hands ſtained with blood, and polluted with rapine and impure contacts. Henry, though he deſpiſed the ſhallow reaſoning of the Roman pontiff, thought it prudent not to inſiſt any farther on the homage, leſt he ſhould involve himſelf in a diſagreeable conteſt with the primate. He was, indeed, deſirous of procuring his aſſiſtance in effecting a deſign he had conceived of marrying Matilda, daughter of Malcolm king of Scotland, by Margaret, ſiſter to Edgar Atheling. That princeſs had reſided in the monaſtery of Wilton ever ſince the death of her father, and had, for ſome years, worn the veil, but never taken the vows; and it was queſtioned whether it was lawful for her to marry.

Anſelm refuſed to decide this queſtion by his own authority. He ſummoned a general council at Lambeth; where, after the caſe of Matilda was thoroughly examined, Anſelm declared the princeſs free from all religious engagements, and at full liberty to marry. The ceremony was accordingly performed by the archbiſhop himſelf, and Matilda ſeated on the Engliſh throne. Henry could not have performed an act more agreeable to the Engliſh nation. The people looked with the higheſt veneration on their ancient race of kings; and beheld, with love and admiration, the only remaining branch of the Saxon line ſeated on a throne ſo long filled by her illuſtrious anceſtors.

A. D. 1101. Robert now returned from the plains of Italy, and took poſſeſſion of his dutchy without oppoſition. He alſo made preparations for recovering by force the crown of England, which had been ſo unjuſtly uſurped by his brother during his abſence. The ſeparation of England and Normandy was repugnant to the intereſt of the moſt powerful barons, and they were, therefore, well diſpoſed to ſecond the attempts of Robert, provided he landed, at the head of a reſpectable army, in England. Beleſme, earl of Shrewſbury; Warrenne, earl of Surry, and ſeveral other nobles, were the firm friends of Robert, and exerted themſelves in his intereſt. Henry perceived the gathering ſtorm, and was perſuaded, that the ſureſt way to break its force was to cultivate the friendſhip of Anſelm, whoſe influence was boundleſs. He conſulted him on every occaſion, and followed implicitly his advice. The prelate was deceived by his careſſes; he thought him ſincere; he ſupported his intereſt, and kept his troops from deſerting. A general meeting of the ſtates was ſummoned; where Anſelm ſolemnly engaged, that the king would govern his kingdom according to the laws of equity and juſtice in all matters, religious and civil.

Robert now landed at Portſmouth, at the head of a numerous army, and was joined by ſeveral of the moſt powerful barons in the kingdom. The crown tottered on Henry's brow: he ſaw his brother advancing towards the capital, and feared the conſequences. The power of Anſelm alone ſupported the drooping monarch. The prelate declared publickly, that if Robert perſiſted in his deſign of driving Henry from the throne, he would excommunicate him, and all his adherents. The cenſures of Anſelm were more dreaded than the armed force of Robert. The thunder of the church was then conſidered as the voice of heaven, and the ſoldiers refuſed to fight againſt their Maker. Robert ſoon felt the conſequences of Anſelm's threatenings: his forces, inſtead of increaſing in ſtrength, grew weaker daily; and even thoſe that continued firm to his intereſt advanced with timidity. The two armies met near Wincheſter, but continued inactive. Henry was fearful his troops would deſert him in the day of battle, and Robert was deſirous of waiting for freſh reinforcements.

Anſelm exerted all his intereſt, during this interval of inaction, to ſheathe the ſword of war, by concluding a peace between the two brothers. He was at laſt ſucceſsful, and a treaty was ſigned by the contending princes, Robert was to receive an annual penſion of three thouſand marks; and the friends of each party to be reſtored to their lands and eſtates, both in England and Normandy. Peace being thus reſtored, both armies were diſbanded; and Henry carried his brother to his court, where they lived in the greateſt harmony during two months, when Robert returned to his own dominions.

Though this treaty was very advantageous to Henry, he was the firſt that violated the articles. Determined to revenge the deſertion of his barons, he commenced proſecutions againſt them; and they thinking it imprudent to appear, their eſtates were confiſcated, and they themſelves baniſhed from the kingdom. Robert, who was ſtrongly tinctured with the ſpirit of chivalry, conſidered his honour as concerned in recovering the honours and eſtates of thoſe noblemen who had ſuffered in violation of the treaty between him and his brother. Benign and generous himſelf, he was perſuaded that his preſence alone was ſufficient to kindle the flame of candour and humanity in the breaſt of his brother; but he was miſtaken. Henry was determined not to part with the large eſtates he had confiſcated, as he was now in no fear of the attempts of an enemy. Robert arrived in England; but ſoon found that he had followed the warmth of humanity at the expence of his intereſt, and almoſt of his ſafety. Henry refuſed to hear his remonſtrances, and even hinted that his own liberty was in danger. Robert ſaw his error when it was too late, and was glad to make his eſcape at the expence of his penſion.

But Henry found a more formidable competitor in Anſelm than in the duke of Normandy. Conſcious of the merits of his late ſervices, the prelate determined, if poſſible, to render the clergy independent of the crown. He was no ſtranger to the violent temper of Henry, nor the jealouſy with which he beheld every attempt to leſſen the prerogatives of the crown. But he was not to be deterred by difficulties, nor intimidated by dangers. He well knew, that the ſuperſtition of the people would ſupport him, and that perſeverance only was neceſſary to render the authority of the mitre little inferior to that of the crown. Henry ſaw his danger, and was alarmed for the conſequences. The power of the church had grown to ſuch an enormous height, that the thrones of the princes of Europe tottered under them. The beneficent religion of the meek and humble Jeſus was changed into a ſyſtem of the moſt tyrannical power. Ambition and prejudices had effaced the pure principles of the goſpel. Anſelm knew the power of the Roman pontiff, and that it would be exerted in his favour. He was deſirous of eſtabliſhing the celibacy of the clergy, and of wreſting from the crown the right of giving inveſtiture to biſhops and abbots. A ſynod was accordingly convened, in which a ſentence of excommunication was fulminated againſt married prieſts. Pleaſed with this ſucceſs, Anſelm determined to proceed, notwithſtanding he perceived he ſhould be oppoſed by the whole power of the crown. Nor was he contented with depriving Henry of a prerogative enjoyed by all the monarchs that had filled the Engliſh throne from the firſt eſtabliſhment of chriſtianity; he propoſed, that all the biſhops who had received inveſtiture from the king, ſhould immediately reſign their ſees, or ſtand abſolutely excommunicated. Exaſperated at this inſolent attempt, Henry ſummoned Anſelm to appear in the king's court. He obeyed; and was commanded inſtantly to do homage to the king, to conſecrate ſuch perſons as had been nominated to vacant ſees, or to depart the kingdom immediately; the king declaring, in expreſs terms, "That no perſon ſhould reſide in any part of his dominions, who refuſed to pay the allegiance due to a ſovereign." But Anſelm deſpiſed the threats of royalty; and with the reſolution of a man conſcious of his power, told the court, "That he was not to be intimidated from doing his duty; that he ſhould immediately retire to Canterbury, where he ſhould continue to exerciſe his archiepiſcopal functions, and wait the iſſue with reſignation and tranquillity." As Henry was determined not to part with ſo valuable a branch of his prerogative, and the prelate not to recede from the cauſe he had undertaken, there remained no hopes of an accommodation. At laſt it was agreed by both parties to ſend a deputation to Rome, in order to lay the whole diſpute before his holineſs; and that in the mean time the biſhops and abbots ſhould continue to exerciſe the functions of their reſpective offices.

A. D. 1105. Robert, though a brave and generous prince, was incapable of governing his own dominions. Abandoned alternately to devotion and diſſolute pleaſures, the affairs of his dutchy were neglected; his ſubjects became a prey to the avidity of his officers; and rapine and injuſtice ranged at large over the dominions of Normandy. The mildneſs of his diſpoſition gave a boldneſs to depredation, and his indolence a tacit ſanction to outrage. The complaints of the people were uttered in vain; nothing could rouſe Robert from the couch of ſuperſtitious inattention. Neglected by their own prince, and ſubject to the continual inſults of rapine and violence, the Normans applied to Henry for redreſs. That prince liſtened with pleaſure to their complaints; but not having even the ſhadow of a pretence to juſtify a rupture with his brother, he contented himſelf with writing a letter to Robert, in which he repreſented, in the ſtrongeſt terms, the enormity of his conduct in not redreſſing the grievances of his ſubjects, and ſecuring their properties from the hand of the ſpoiler. He intreated him, in the moſt preſſing manner, to reſume the conduct of a prince, and to act in ſuch a manner as might acquire him the glorious title of being the father of his people. He added, that he thought it his duty as his brother, and the relation he bore to the inhabitants of Normandy, to uſe every means in his power to redreſs their grievances; and if, contrary to his wiſhes, this epiſtle produced no effect, his brother muſt not think it ſtrange if he himſelf eſpouſed the cauſe of the oppreſſed Normans, ſhould they apply to him as their protector.

This letter ſoon produced the intended effect. The hopes of aſſiſtance animated the Normans; their complaints againſt the government increaſed to an amazing height. Robert was alarmed, and applied himſelf to remove the complaints of his people; but it was now too late. Henry had raiſed a ſtorm which threatened deſtruction to his brother's authority. His letter had inflamed the minds of the people; they formed themſelves into parties againſt the government; and the nobility joined in a requeſt to Henry, begging he would take a diſtreſſed province under his protection.

Henry had now obtained the ſecret purpoſe of his ſoul, and ſoon after paſſed over into Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. The nobility flocked to his camp; but the ſeaſon being too far advanced before his troops were ready to take the field, Henry did not think it prudent to begin hoſtilities. Many of the Norman and Engliſh barons now feared the conſequences that might attend an open rupture between the two brothers, and laboured aſſiduouſly to bring about a reconciliation between them. Robert accordingly paid Henry a viſit; and, by the interpoſition of their nobles, their diſputes ſeemed to be amicably terminated. But before Henry paſſed over into England, he ſeized the ſtrong towns of Bayeaux and Caen, belonging to Robert, in defiance of the laws of nature and nations, and garriſoned them with Engliſh troops.

A. D. 1106. Robert, aſtoniſhed at this act of hoſtility, paſſed over into England; and, with great mildneſs, though with a reſolution becoming an injured prince, expoſtulated with his brother on his late conduct in Normandy. He diſplayed the injuſtice of the action in its proper colours, and peremptorily demanded the reſtitution of the towns he had ſeized, contrary to every law, both human and divine. Henry abſolutely refuſed to make any reſtitution; he even treated the remonſtrances of his brother with contempt. Convinced that nothing could be obtained by negotiation, and that war alone muſt decide the controverſy, Robert returned to Normandy, and determined to defend his territories to the laſt extremity.

Had his own commanders behaved faithfully, and exerted themſelves, in defence of their country, in any degree equal to their maſter, Henry would, in all probability, have fallen into the hands of his brother; but, through the cowardice of one of their generals, the Norman army was defeated, and Robert himſelf, with ſeveral of his nobles, and Edgar Atheling, were taken priſoners. Henry reduced the whole dutchy to obedience, and returned, with his captives, in triumph, to England. Edgar Atheling was ſet at liberty, with a trifling penſion; and lived to a good old age, neglected and forgotten. But Robert was committed, a cloſe priſoner, to Cardiff-caſtle, where he continued till he paid the debt of nature, which did not happen till twenty-ſeven years after his defeat. The example of this intrepid duke of Normandy affords a convincing proof, that a prince endowed with a large ſhare of good nature and affability, without wiſdom and diſcernment, is incapable of holding the reins of government, ſo as to acquire either honour to himſelf, or happineſs to his people.

A. D. 1107. The deputies were now returned from Rome, charged with a fulminating letter againſt the king, for his aſſuming the right of inveſtitures. "Becauſe," ſaid the pontiff, "Chriſt is called the door, therefore all eccleſiaſtics muſt enter into the church through Chriſt alone; not through any profane layman, however great in temporal power." This ſpecies of reaſoning was far from convincing Henry; he treated it with the contempt it deſerved. But he feared the power of the pontiff, and was deſirous of avoiding an embarraſſing diſpute with his clergy. He, therefore, ſuppreſſed the pope's letter; and prevailed on the biſhops, who had attended the Roman council, to declare, that the pontiff did not diſapprove of his granting benefices, though he did not chuſe to declare his opinion in writing. Anſelm, who was acquainted with every thing that had paſſed at Rome, ſupported the cauſe he had undertaken with firmneſs and reſolution. He not only refuſed to conſecrate ſome new biſhops, who had received inveſtiture from the king, but alſo to communicate with them. Henry was irritated to the greateſt degree; and the prelate, to avoid the ſtorm, retired to Rome. The people were alarmed at the departure of their archbiſhop; they dreaded the conſequences of an excommunication; and remembered with terror all the horrid ſcenes exhibited in Germany, in conſequence of an anathema fulminated by the Roman pontiff againſt the emperors Henry IV. and V. They already ſaw, in imagination, the flames of diſſention and diſcord lighted up in their own country, by the dreadful torch of religious fury. Henry himſelf was deſirous of avoiding the conſequences, and diſpatched an ambaſſador to Rome, who told Paſchal, that his maſter would ſooner loſe his crown than part with the right of granting inveſtitures. "And I," replied Paſchal, "would rather loſe my head than allow him to retain it." Every thing indicated a rupture between Henry and the pope; but the former not chuſing to ſee his country waſted by the unrelenting hand of religious bigotry, wiſely gave up the claim of inveſtitures, and the pope conſented to his exacting from biſhops the homage they owed him as temporal peers. An accommodation having thus taken place between Henry and the church, Anſelm was re-eſtabliſhed in his archiepiſcopal chair.

A. D. 1109. During this interval of public tranquillity, ambaſſadors arrived from Henry IV. emperor of Germany, to demand Matilda, Henry's daughter, in marriage; and the terms of the treaty were adjuſted in the preſence of the council. Soon after this tranſaction, the famous Anſelm paid the debt of nature and was univerſally regretted by the clergy. He was a prelate of great learning, conſidering the age in which he lived; but ſo ambitious, haughty, and bigotted, that he deſtroyed the peace of the church, which it was his duty to preſerve. Power, and not piety, was the end he wiſhed to attain. He ſacrificed internal purity to external magnificence; and preferred the ſhadow to the ſubſtance of religion.

A. D. 1116. Though Henry had, for ſome time, been maſter of his brother's territories, he found it very difficult to defend his uſurpation. He was frequently involved in wars; and found it often neceſſary to croſs the ſea, in order to ſtop the inroads of the neighbouring princes and diſcontented barons. William, the ſon of duke Robert, a prince of the greateſt hopes, had fled to the court of Anjou for protection; and the juſtice of his cauſe, with the unnatural cruelty of his uncle, exciting in the breaſts of the neighbouring princes a deteſtation of Henry's proceedings, they reſolved to reinſtate him in the dominions of his father. Lewis the Groſs, king of France, was at the head of this aſſociation. That prince, as ſovereign lord of Normandy, had granted William inveſtiture of all the territories of duke Robert; and reſolved, in conjunction with the reſt of the confederates, to ſupport him in his juſt rights againſt all the power of the uſurper. Henry was now ſufficiently alarmed, and croſſed over into Normandy, at the head of a powerful army. But the ſeaſon was too far advanced for any military operations of conſequence to take place; and the two armies, after a few ſkirmiſhes of no conſequence, retired into winter quarters.

A. D. 1119. The two preceding campaigns were ſpent to very little purpoſe. Henry was obliged to act on the defenſive, and the allied army made but a ſlow progreſs in reducing the fortified towns of Normandy. But having gained over the earl of Anjou to his party, Henry was now able to meet the enemy in the open field. The two armies met in the plain of Brenneville, where a bloody battle enſued. William, at the head of a choſen body of troops, attacked the van of Henry's army with ſuch impetuoſity, that he broke their ranks, and penetrated to the main body, where the king of England commanded in perſon. But Henry maintained his ground with ſurpriſing coolneſs and preſence of mind; he rode from rank to rank, encouraging thoſe who ſtood firm, and rallying the ſquadrons which had been broken by the intrepid attack of the young Norman prince. The engagement now became general; and while Henry was employed in leading his troops againſt the enemy, he was in the utmoſt danger of falling a victim to one of thoſe chances ſo frequent in war, by which the monarch and the private ſoldier, the coward and the brave, are equally expoſed. William de Criſpin, a Norman knight, celebrated at once for his ſtrength and intrepidity, cut his way to the ſpot where Henry, regardleſs of his own ſafety, fought in perſon. Pleaſed with the glorious opportunity of gaining the victory by a ſingle blow, Criſpin fell, with the utmoſt fury, on the king of England, and gave him two ſuch violent blows on the head, that the blood guſhed out from his mouth and ears, and he ſeemed, for a moment, to have loſt his ſenſes. Criſpin perceived his advantage, and was juſt going to ſtrike a third blow, when Henry, with ſurpriſing reſolution, ſtruck his adverſary with ſo much fury, that he fell headlong from his horſe, and was taken priſoner.

This perſonal bravery of Henry had no other effect than defeating the intention of the Norman knight: the battle raged with the utmoſt fury, and Fortune ſeemed inclined to give the palm of victory to the French and Norman army. Henry himſelf began to tremble for the conſequences. In this alarming criſis, the Engliſh, who formed the rear of the army, advanced, and charged the enemy with ſo much fury, that, unable to ſuſtain the ſhock, they gave way, and fled with the utmoſt precipitation. All attempts to rally them were in vain. Lewis himſelf was hurried away with the torrent, thrown from his horſe, and eſcaped by the aſſiſtance of a peaſant, who conducted him from this dreadful ſcene of confuſion, through woods and bye-paths, to the caſtle of Andeli.

Lewis, notwithſtanding his late defeat, was ſoon able to take the field againſt the enemy; and a ſecond battle, more furious than the firſt, enſued, in which both claimed the victory, and, perhaps, with equal reaſon. The French monarch now perceived that it would be difficult, perhaps impoſſible, to reſtore the young prince to the dominions of his father by force of arms; and therefore applied to the council of Rheims, aſſembled by pope Calixtus II: flattering himſelf with being able to turn the thunder of the church againſt the Engliſh monarch. Aware of the danger, Henry took the moſt prudent method to divert the ſtorm. He ſent large preſents to the pontiff, and brought over Calixtus to his intereſt; ſo that all the attempts of Lewis were rendered abortive. The pope declared himſelf ſatisfied with the reaſons Henry had offered for his conduct, and diſſolved the aſſembly. A peace was, ſoon after, concluded between the contending monarchs, and Henry was permitted to keep poſſeſſion of Normandy.

A. D. 1120. But the ſucceſs of Henry was greatly overbalanced by a domeſtic misfortune, which embittered the remainder of his life. William, his only ſon, who had been recognized as his ſucceſſor in a general council of the nation, and attended him into Normandy, was now on his return, with his father, to England. The ſhip in which the prince embarked was, by ſome accident, detained ſeveral hours after the reſt of the fleet; and the interval being ſpent in drinking, neither the maſter, nor any of the ſeamen, were capable of carrying the ſhip out of the harbour. They ran her upon a ſunken rock, where ſhe immediately foundered. All was now a ſcene of hurry and confuſion: the boats were hoiſted out, and every one endeavoured to provide for his own ſafety. The prince, with a conſiderable number of his companions, leaped into the long-boat, and, with great difficulty, got clear of the ſhip. But hearing the cries of Matilda, his natural ſiſter, who had been left in the general confuſion, he ordered the ſeamen to row back to the ſhip, and, if poſſible, ſave her life. He never conſidered, that in ſuch diſtracting incidents, all reſpect for perſons is loſt, and ſelf-preſervation the only principle that then fills the human breaſt. Fatal experience convinced him of his error. They no ſooner reached the ſide of the ſhip, than ſuch numbers jumped into the boat, that they ſunk, and every ſoul periſhed. No leſs than one hundred and forty young noblemen loſt their lives by this dreadful accident. The king was inconſolable for the loſs of his ſon: he endeavoured to conceal his grief, but without ſucceſs: he never got the better of his misfortune; a cloud of melancholy ſpread over his countenance, and the loſs of his ſon hung heavy on his heart.

A. D. 1121. Deſirous, however, of having an heir to ſucceed him in the throne, Henry, who had, ſome years ſince, loſt his amiable queen Matilda, married Adelais, daughter to the duke of Louvain, a young lady amiable at once for her beauty and accompliſhments. But the hopes both of the king and the nation were diſappointed; Adelais brought Henry no child.

A. D. 1127. Diſappointed in having a ſon to ſucceed him on the throne, Henry was deſirous of ſecuring the crown for his daughter Matilda, who had lately loſt her conſort, Henry V. emperor of Germany, and was now returned to her father's court. He accordingly ſummoned a meeting of the ſtates at Windſor, where it was unanimouſly agreed to acknowledge the empreſs Maud, or Matilda, as queen of England, in caſe Henry died without male iſſue. The Engliſh beheld that princeſs with affection, as ſhe was deſcended, on her mother's ſide, from the ancient race of their Saxon kings, whoſe memories they revered.

A. D. 1128. But Henry was not ſatisfied with this acquiſition; he was alſo deſirous of ſecuring to her the dutchy of Normandy. Accordingly he married her to Geoffrey Plantagenet, ſon of Fulk, earl of Anjou. By this political ſtratagem, he effectually detached Fulk from William, ſon to duke Robert, and all the allies of that unfortunate prince. But this ſtep, which was taken without the advice of his barons, was extremely diſagreeable to the Engliſh; and Henry had reaſon to dread the effects of their reſentment. The young duke of Normandy, whom Lewis the Groſs had put in poſſeſſion of Flanders, conſidered this as a proper opportunity for re-commencing the war, and wreſting his hereditary dominions out of the hands of the Engliſh monarch; but before he could carry his deſigns into execution, he was killed in a battle with the landgrave of Alſace. By the death of this young prince, Henry became the undiſputed heir to the dutchy of Normandy, Robert having no other legitimate iſſue.

A. D. 1129. Henry had now ſurmounted all oppoſition, and a ſeries of profound tranquillity ſucceeded the boiſterous ſeaſons of war and devaſtation. The loſs of his ſon, which ſtill oppreſſed his ſpirits, had tended greatly to convince him of the vanity of human enjoyments. He ſaw the folly of graſping at power, that eludes the touch; and of labouring to ſecure enjoyments as fleeting as the morning cloud. The milder ſentiments of mercy and forgiveneſs ſucceeded to thoſe of fury and reſentment, which had ſo long filled his breaſt, and proved a continual ſource of uneaſineſs. He extended his pardon to all who implored it; and attached to his intereſt, by acts of kindneſs and generoſity, ſeveral perſons of great influence and power; but not a ſingle ray of pity was extended to his brother Robert, who was ſtill a priſoner in Cardiff-caſtle.

A. D. 1135. Henry often viſited his Norman dominions, and enjoyed the pleaſure of being preſent at the birth of ſeveral of his daughter's children. While he continued in that country, which ſeemed the favourite place of his reſidence, he received advice that the Welſh had renewed their incurſions. Exaſperated at the behaviour of that reſtleſs people, Henry reſolved to paſs over into England, and chaſtiſe the invaders; but before he could embark, death put a final period to all his undertakings. He died at the caſtle of Lyons, near Rouen, on the firſt of December, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-ſixth of his reign. His brother Robert had paid the debt of nature about ten months before him, in the caſtle of Cardiff.

The charrcter of Henry exhibits a ſeries of inconſiſtencies, which too often fall to the portion of frail humanity. He poſſeſſed many valuable qualities, but they were ſullied by a greater number of faults. His behaviour to his brother and nephew have thrown ſuch a ſtain upon his memory, as all his good actions can never obliterate. The bands of fraternal affection were ſeparated by the ſword of ambition; and the laws of juſtice, of humanity, of nature, and of nations, were ſacrificed at the ſhrine of unnatural uſurpation. At the ſame time, it muſt be acknowledged, that the wiſdom and vigour of his adminiſtration procured to the diſtreſſed Normans that tranquillity, happineſs, and ſafety, which they had ſo long ſollicited in vain. Like all his predeceſſors of the Norman race, he was jealous of every encroachment on his power; but he relieved his ſubjects from ſeveral oppreſſive grievances, under which they had long laboured, and from which they had often petitioned to be relieved. He protected, by his power, the liberties of England; and guarded, by his addreſs, againſt the inſolent uſurpations of the Roman pontiff. He was ſevere in the execution of juſtice; the licentiouſneſs of the times rendered it neceſſary. He was an implacable enemy to extortion; the officer who made uſe of oppreſſion was ſure to feel the whole weight of his anger. If he often broke ſome of the articles in his charter, it ſhould be remembered, that he was the firſt of the Norman race that made any contract with the people; and that the charter of Henry formed the baſis of Engliſh liberty. Learning and learned men were not common in theſe times of ſuperſtitious ignorance: Henry cultivated the one, and encouraged the other. He obtained the ſurname of Beauclerc, or the fine ſcholar, from the progreſs he had made in the ſciences; which, conſidering the bigotry and barbarity of the age, was not contemptible. If, therefore, the vices of Henry have fixed an eternal ſtain upon his memory, his virtues were of the utmoſt ſervice to his country.

STEPHEN.

A. D. 1135. NO prince ever took more pains to ſecure the crown to his family, with ſo little effect, as Henry. His conduct affords a ſtriking example of the vanity of human foreſight. Stephen, earl of Boulogne, ſon of Adela, one of the daughters of William the conqueror, was the firſt among the favourites of Henry. He had beſtowed upon him ſeveral large eſtates in England. But gratitude was not in the catalogue of Stephen's virtues. He had ſworn eventual fealty to the empreſs Maud; the remembrance of his oath was buried in the grave with Henry; and perſuaded that riches and intrigue were ſufficient to over-balance the claim of that princeſs, he haſtened to England to ſeize, by uſurpation, the crown which had adorned the brow of his patron. Stephen's younger brother had been bred in the monaſtery of Augny, and the late monarch had made him abbot of Glaſtonbury and biſhop of Wincheſter. He was of an active and turbulent diſpoſition; bold, diſſembling, and faithleſs; ready to adapt himſelf to the circumſtances of the times, and always prefered his own intereſt to that of his country: even fraternal affection had little weight with this dignified eccleſiaſtic. By a pleaſing addreſs and fluency of ſpeech, he had gained the eſteem and admiration of an ignorant populace: while his frank and familiar addreſs procured him an unbounded influence over the clergy. The biſhop of Saliſbury was alſo a perſon of great abilities, great riches, and great influence with the people. Theſe two prelates were the principal ſupporters of Stephen's pretenſions. On his arrival in London, he was received with open arms by the citizens, and the two prelates in his intereſt inſiſted on the primate's placing the crown upon his head. The archbiſhop, who with them, had ſworn fealty to Maud, refuſed to perform the ceremony. Artifice was therefore neceſſary to gain him over to his intereſt; and theſe conſcientious prelates had recourſe to perjury. Hugh Bigod, ſteward of the houſhold, made oath before the primate, that Henry on his death-bed, had expreſſed his intention of placing Stephen on the Engliſh throne, in preference to his daughter. This oath removed all the ſcruples of the archbiſhop, and Stephen was crowned with the uſual ceremonies.

That prince was not to learn that riches are the genuine ſource of power; and that partiſans to any cauſe are eaſily procured by bribes and promiſes. The firſt act of his reign therefore was to ſeize the late king's treaſures, which amounted to one hundred thouſand pounds, an enormous ſum in thoſe days. By a proper diſtribution of this money, he gained over to his intereſt many of the indigent nobility, and ſtill more of the indigent ſoldiery. The people, who were more guided by ſuperſtition, than by the principles of reaſon or equity, conſidered Stephen as their lawful ſovereign; the religious ceremony of the coronation had removed every ſuſpicion, and ſilenced every doubt that aroſe in the mind. It was impoſſible, they thought, for the head of the church to be miſtaken; whoever he anointed muſt be the undoubted heir to the crown of England.

But it was not enough that the populace were gained over to the intereſt of Stephen, it was alſo neceſſary to prevail on the more thinking part of the nation, the nobles and the clergy, to embrace the ſame ſentiments. He paſſed a charter, whereby he promiſed many advantages to the clergy, particularly, that on the demiſe of a biſhop he would inſtantly give the inveſtiture to the perſon appointed by a regular canonical election. He promiſed the nobility that they ſhould not be proſecuted for taking the diverſion of hunting in the royal foreſts; and to the people, that the tax of Danegeld ſhould be aboliſhed, that the laws of Edward ſhould be reſtored, and executed in their full extent. Theſe flattering acts were the artifices of his ambition; the ſtratagems by which he fixed the crown of England on his head.

But Stephen found the Engliſh noblemen were determined to oblige him to keep his promiſes, and not like his predeceſſors, break them as ſoon as he was firmly fixed in the ſeat of power. Robert, earl of Glouceſter, a natural ſon of the deceaſed monarch, led the way to theſe neceſſary reſolutions. He was determined to ſupport the cauſe of his ſiſter; but the power of Stephen rendered it neceſſary for him to conceal his deſign. He accordingly ſwore allegiance to Stephen; but with this reſerve, that he ſhould not invade any of his rights or dignities. Stephen ſaw the full force of this reſerve, but the great influence of that popular nobleman, rendered it neceſſary to receive him upon theſe terms. The clergy, pleaſed with the cautious reſerve of Glouceſter, annexed conditions to their oath of allegiance: they declared that it ſhould be binding no longer than while he defended the eccleſiaſtical liberties of England, and ſupported the diſcipline of the church. The barons were determined not to be wanting to themſelves in this fortunate criſis, when the ſceptre trembled in the hand of an uſurper. Accordingly they required, in return for their ſubmiſſion, the liberty of fortifying and putting their own caſtles in a poſture of defence. By this ſtep the tranquillity of the nation was ſacrificed to the ambition of the nobles. Theſe were long the ſource of civil diſcord, and often filled the kingdom with blood and ſlaughter.

A. D. 1137. The licentious deſigns of the nobles were ſoon apparent. Many of them had no ſooner finiſhed the fortifications of their caſtles, than they renounced their allegiance, and ſet the power of the crown at defiance. Stephen ſaw his error, but it was now too late to correct it. The diſorder ſpread every day, and threatened the kingdom with the moſt deſtructive conſequences. The oaths they had taken were renounced or forgotten: power only was the idol worſhipped by the nobles. It was in vain to attempt the removing of theſe enormities by reaſon or perſuaſions: Stephen therefore made his own power the ſole meaſure of his conduct. He ſacrificed to the rage of deſpotic government, both his own conceſſions, and the ancient privileges of his ſubjects. His authority was chiefly ſupported by mercenary ſoldiers, who, having exhauſted the royal treaſury, ſubſiſted by depredations. Stephen, however, found means to procure the dutchy of Normandy, as well as the ſceptre of England. His eldeſt ſon did homage for that province to Louis the younger, king of France, and received his daughter in marriage. The count of Blois, and even Geofrey, count of Anjou, reſigned their pretenſions to that dutchy, in exchange for penſions. Normandy and England were governed by an uſurper.

A. D. 1138. But this acquiſition of power increaſed the diſturbances in England. The people were exaſperated at the government: they were now deſirous of hurling from the throne a prince they had ſo lately conſidered as their protector. The duke of Glouceſter perceived the general defection of the people, and diſplayed the ſtandard of rebellion. His intereſt was ſupported by David, king of Scotland, who entered England at the head of a powerful army, and penetrated as far as Northallerton, in Yorkſhire.

Several of the Engliſh barons, who ſtill continued firm in their allegiance, entered into an aſſociation to give battle to the northern invaders, and deliver their country from the dreadful ravages of the enemy, or periſh in the noble attempt. They erected upon a wheel-carriage the maſt of a ſmall ſhip, on the top of which was a ſilver crucifix; and the pole decorated with the enſigns of St. Peter, St. John of Beverly, and St. Wilfred.

The Engliſh ſurrounded this ſuperſtitious enſign in a cloſe compacted body; and to break the firſt ſhock of the enemy, the front was compoſed of pikemen and archers intermixed. The attack was begun by the Galloway men, who formed the van of the Scottiſh army, with all the fury ſo natural to their character. But their efforts were in vain; the Engliſh ſtood firm, and plied them ſo inceſſantly with their arrows, and other miſſiles, that they were put to flight. The prince of Scotland now advanced, at the head of a choſen body of knights and archers, and attacked the Engliſh with ſo much impetuoſity, that they gave way, and he pierced to the rear-guard; but not being properly ſupported by his followers, he was in the utmoſt danger of being taken priſoner; and eſcaped by throwing away his badge of diſtinction, and mixing with the Engliſh; where he remained undiſcovered till the battle was over, and then made his eſcape. The other part of the Scottiſh army, by a falſe report that their king was ſlain, were ſeized with a panic; and David himſelf, after exerting in vain his utmoſt power to rally them, was hurried away with the torrent, and obliged to retreat to Carliſle, where he was afterwards joined by his ſon, and great part of his army.

This engagement, known by the appellation of the battle of the ſtandard, might have been fatal to the intereſt of Maud and her brother, had Stephen known how to profit by his victory. But flattering himſelf that he had now ſecured the peaceable poſſeſſion of the throne, he ſet no bounds to his ambition. Succeſs rendered him confident: he engaged in a controverſy with his clergy, to whom he was indebted for the crown, and to whoſe authority he could not be a ſtranger. Stephen had for ſome time determined to correct the error he had committed, in permitting the nobility to fortify their caſtles. The evil was every day increaſing, and the monarch perceived that the kingdom was garriſoned againſt himſelf. The biſhops, in imitation of the temporal lords, had erected caſtles on their eſtates; and Stephen determined to begin his intended reformation by attacking the ſtrong holds of the clergy. Accordingly he ſeized the biſhops of Saliſbury and Lincoln, and obliged them, by menaces, to deliver up their caſtles.

A. D. 1139. Exaſperated at the attempt of his brother to infringe the privileges of the church, Henry, biſhop of Wincheſter, who had lately been inveſted with the legantine authority, convoked a ſynod at Wincheſter, and ſummoned Stephen to appear in perſon. The king, who deſpiſed the hypocritical pretences to ſanctity, whereby the eccleſiaſtics impoſed upon the credulity of the people, refuſed to obey the ſummons. He, however, ſent one Aubery de Vere, the moſt learned lawyer of his age, who juſtified the king's proceedings with great eloquence and force of argument. He obſerved, that the followers of the meek and humble Jeſus could not, with the leaſt pretence to propriety, endeavour to oppoſe their ſovereign with the arm of fleſh: that it was irreconcileable with their functions as the preachers of peace, to engage in the tumults of civil diſcord; and that the caſtles they had fortified could be conſidered in no other light than the ſanctuaries of diſcord, and the aſylums of rebellion. The legate loſt all patience at this bold remonſtrance; and he was juſt going to pronounce an eccleſiaſtical anathema on the king, and all his adherents; when Aubery gave him to underſtand, that whoever dared to pronounce any ſpiritual interdict againſt his and their ſovereign, ſhould never live to behold the fruits of his inſolence. This ſpirited declaration had more effect than all his reaſoning. Aſtoniſhed at the boldneſs of the deputy, and dreading the conſequences of Stephen's reſentment, the ſynod did not think it prudent to proceed. The prelates departed; and the two complaining biſhops were obliged to part with their caſtles.

The empreſs Maud conſidered the differences that ſubſiſted between Stephen and the church as a very fortunate circumſtance, and determined to turn it to her own advantage. She ventured to come over to England, attended by her brother the earl of Glouceſter. Their whole retinue, however, conſiſted of no more than an hundred and forty men; a force that could give no alarm to Stephen. But the earl of Glouceſter was himſelf an army. He was the idol of the people, who were deſirous of fighting under his banners, and driving from the throne a prince who had forfeited, by his actions, every claim to ſincerity. The empreſs repaired to Arundel caſtle, where ſhe was affectionately received by the queen dowager, who reſided in that fortreſs. The earl of Glouceſter retired to Briſtol, a great number of his friends reſiding in the neighbourhood of that city.

Stephen was alarmed at the arrival of the empreſs and her brother. He feared the popularity of Glouceſter, and that the nation would join his ſtandard, in order to place his ſiſter on the throne of her anceſtors. He advanced immediately to Arundel-caſtle, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, in order to make himſelf maſter of that fortreſs. The queen dowager was alarmed at the approach of Stephen; and diſpatched a meſſenger, requeſting that he would not beſiege the empreſs in her palace, but give her liberty to retire to ſome other place; aſſuring him, that ſhe had received her as a gueſt only, not as a competitor for the crown; and flattered herſelf, that ſhe ſhould not be compelled to violate the rights of hoſpitality. Stephen very readily complied with her requeſt; and the empreſs naming Briſtol as the place ſhe choſe for her reſidence, the king ordered his brother Walleran, earl of Mellent, to eſcort her to that city.

On her arrival at Briſtol, ſhe openly declared her title, and aſſerted her claim to the crown of England. The people flocked to her ſtandard; and Miles, high conſtable of England, having recognized her title, carried her to the caſtle of Glouceſter, which he had prepared for her reception.

A. D. 1140. The whole kingdom now became a ſcene of anarchy and confuſion; almoſt every individual declaring for one or other of the contending parties; ſome ſwayed by affection, and others by intereſt. The powerful barons attacked each other's territories with all the rage of the moſt implacable enemy. Caſtles, churches, monaſteries, towns and villages, were every day levelled to the ground, or laid in aſhes, to gratify the private animoſity of contending nobles. The moſt inhuman cruelties were practiſed on the innocent inhabitants, whoſe only crime conſiſted in their weakneſs. It muſt, however, be acknowledged, that theſe horrid attempts received no countenance, either from Stephen or the earl of Glouceſter; they ſaw with concern the miſeries of the people, and exerted all their force to terminate this ſcene of deſtruction, and bring the ferocious barons to a ſenſe of their ſhocking enormities.

A. D. 1141. Several negotiations were begun, but ſoon rendered abortive; and the horrors of a civil war continued to increaſe. All hopes of peace were now abandoned, and both parties propoſed to decide the important controverſy by a deciſive action. But the ſiege of the caſtle of Lincoln being undertaken by Stephen, precipitated theſe meaſures, by bringing on a battle between the two armies much ſooner than was expected. That caſtle was conſidered as a place of the utmoſt importance; and Glouceſter determined, if poſſible, to relieve it. Accordingly he marched with the utmoſt expedition, and his troops having forded the Trent, appeared in the neighbourhood before Stephen had received any information of his approach. A general engagement was now irretrievable; and both armies prepared for a conteſt that was to decide the fate of the crown of England. The battle was begun by William de Ypres, one of Stephen's generals, and conſidered as the beſt general of his age. He fell with the utmoſt fury on a body of Welſh poſted in the left wing, and put them to flight; but purſuing the broken ſquadron too far, his diviſion was charged in flank, and entirely broken. The earl of Glouceſter, taking advantage of this ſucceſs, fell with amazing impetuoſity on the infantry, which compoſed the center of the royal army, where Stephen himſelf fought in perſon. The conteſt was dreadful; the field was covered with the ſlain; but Stephen's infantry, being deſerted by the the horſe, were obliged to retreat. Stephen himſelf, diſdaining to turn his back to the enemy, diſputed every inch of ground againſt an amazing ſuperiority. At laſt, he was felled to the ground by a ſtone thrown by an unknown hand, and obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner to the earl of Glouceſter. He was treated with the greateſt reſpect by that accompliſhed nobleman; but he experienced a humiliating reverſe of fortune, on his being delivered into the hands of the empreſs. That imperious princeſs treated him with every indignity, committed him a cloſe priſoner to the caſtle of Briſtol, and loaded him with chains like a common malefactor.

The friends of Stephen deſerted him on this reverſe of fortune; the city of London, and the county of Kent, where his queen Matilda, his ſon Euſtace, and his friend William de Ypres, ſtill retained their authority, were the only places that continued faithful to the impriſoned monarch. Even his brother, the biſhop of Wincheſter, courted the favour of the empreſs: the attractions of power were ſtronger than the bonds of fraternal affection. Henry declared for Maud, who, in return, promiſed him all the honours his ambition could deſire, or which a churchman could receive. Armed with the legantine authority, and proud of diſplaying his power, Henry ſummoned a ſynod, and after aſſerting that the clergy were intruſted by heaven with the right of electing and ordaining kings, he declared that it was the will of the Moſt High, that the empreſs Maud ſhould be placed on the throne of England. The only laymen ſummoned to this council were the deputies of London. Their preſence alarmed the legate; for they were ſo far from agreeing with the unexpected declaration of Henry, that they peremptorily demanded the liberty of their king. The legate only anſwered, by recapitulating the errors of Stephen's adminiſtration. "He connived," ſaid the prelate, "at the licentious behaviour of all men; ſo that virtue and peace abandoned this country, and tyranny and oppreſſion filled their ſeats: biſhops have been impriſoned contrary to law; abbies have been put up to ſale; and churches and convents plundered of their treaſures tho' devoted to the ſacred purpoſes of religion. For theſe and other offences, heaven itſelf has viſibly interpoſed, and wreſted the ſceptre from the hand of my brother; and this aſſembly have unanimouſly agreed to preſent it to the empreſs Maud, to whom it of right belongs." Aſtoniſhed at the inſolence and wickedneſs of the legate, the deputies, after ſolemnly proteſting againſt the proceedings of the ſynod, returned to London; and Henry pronounced an anathema againſt all the adherents of the impriſoned monarch. Thus was the ſceptre of England diſpoſed of by an aſſembly of ambitious churchmen, who dared to trample upon the authority of the nobles, and deſpiſed the liberties of the people. The power of the mitre was exalted above the power of the crown: and the rights of Engliſhmen ſacrificed at the ſhrine of eccleſiaſtical tyranny.

Had Maud ſtill ſuffered herſelf to be guided by the counſels of the earl of Glouceſter, ſhe had enjoyed, during her life, the crown of her father: but pride and inſolence, the two capital features in her character, ſoon rendered all his attempts abortive. Beloved by the people for his virtues, and feared for his valour, that accompliſhed nobleman found means to procure a majority in the magiſtracy of London in favour of his ſiſter, and ſhe was received into the capital with great demonſtrations of joy. The ceremony of the coronation only was now wanting to conſtitute Maud the ſovereign of England: but that impotence of mind which proſperity alone diſcovers, delayed the ſolemnity and hurled her from the throne. Haughty and contemptuous by nature, and obſtinate from power, ſhe formed the ridiculous opinion, that no human being had a right to examine her actions; and reſolving to ſhew her independence, ſhe determined to refuſe every petition. Neither the ſoft whiſpers of humanity, aſſiſted by the powerful interceſſions of the earl of Glouceſter, could prevail over the obſtinacy of her ſoul; ſhe perſevered in her reſolution, till ſhe loſt the affections of her people. The city of London requeſted her either to mitigate the ſeverity of the Norman laws, or reſtore thoſe of Edward the confeſſor. But ſhe was deaf to their petition; even the remonſtrances of Glouceſter, who placed in a proper light the madneſs of ſuch proceedings, were urged in vain: ſhe looked upon all advice as an inſult on her underſtanding.

Glouceſter ſaw with grief the inflexibility of his ſiſter, and trembled for the conſequence. The citizens were at once incenſed and alarmed. They complained loudly of the tyranny of the empreſs; and the people catched the infection from the capital. The Londoners entered into a conſpiracy to ſeize her perſon. The earl of Glouceſter was apprized of the aſſaſſination, and uſed every method in his power to ſoothe the citizens, and fix them in the intereſts of his ſiſter; but his attempts were in vain; they conceived ſo deep a deteſtation of her inſolent behaviour, that all the endeavours of that popular nobleman could not eraſe. He was greatly affected at this reverſe of ſentiments; he perceived the gathering ſtorm that threatened the empreſs and her whole party with deſtruction, and prudently withdrew with Maud and her friends to Oxford. They had hardly left the city, when the populace aſſaulted the palace of the empreſs, and ſtripped it of all its rich furniture.

The legate ſaw this reverſe of fortune, and again embraced the party of his brother. The allegiance he had ſworn to the empreſs was forgotten: his oaths were not proof againſt intereſt. He, however, reſolved to conceal his ſentiments, but fortified his caſtle at Wincheſter, and furniſhed it with proviſions and military ſtores. Maud was no ſtranger to the real ſentiments of the legate, but reſolved to practiſe the diſſimulation of the churchman. She advanced at the head of her troops, and encamped in the neighbourhood of Wincheſter. Orders were immediately diſpatched to Henry, commanding his attendance at a council the empreſs had ſummoned to meet in her camp. The legate ſaw the ſnare, and eſcaped through a poſtern gate; but the caſtle fell into the hands of the empreſs. Henry fled to London, joined Euſtace and William de Ypres, and openly declared in favour of Stephen. A reſpectable body of forces were ſoon raiſed, and the legate, attended by his aſſociates, marched to Wincheſter with ſuch expedition, that the empreſs and her friends had hardly time to ſhut themſelves up in the caſtle before it was inveſted by the enemy.

Henry had furniſhed the fortreſs with ſuch a ſtock of proviſions that the beſieged held out ſeven weeks, and every attempt to take it by aſſault was rendered abortive by the valour and conduct of the earl of Glouceſter. But famine at length effected what force had attempted in vain; the garriſon had but one alternative, either to cut themſelves a paſſage through the legate's forces, or ſurrender at diſcretion. They choſe the former, and made the neceſſary preparations for the deſperate attempt. The care of the perſon of the empreſs was committed to the main body of their forces; while Glouceſter himſelf, at the head of two hundred followers, ſallied out of the caſtle, and atttacked the beſiegers with the utmoſt fury. Alarmed at the vigour of this party of the beſieged, the legate's army left their poſts to repulſe ſo formidable a band of deſperate aſſailants. The expected opportunity now offered; and the empreſs, attended by the principal part of the army, made her eſcape. She fled to Glouceſter, where ſhe was joined by Miles, who had long ſerved her with great fidelity.

But though the empreſs eſcaped by the noble efforts of the earl of Glouceſter, his valour proved fatal to his liberty. He was taken priſoner, and ſent to the caſtle of Rocheſter. The empreſs, ſenſible that every hope of ſucceſs depended on the valour and abilities of her brother, conſented to exchange Stephen for him.

The legate now ſummoned a ſynod of the clergy, and endeavoured to vindicate his conduct with regard to his brother; but even the clergy ſeemed not affected by his harangue. The legantine power, indeed, with which he was inveſted, commanded their ſilence; they feared the anger of the pope more than the anger of heaven. But a lay-deputy from the empreſs nobly undertook what a daſtardly clergy had refuſed. He entered a proteſt againſt the legate's proceedings; accuſed him of complicated perjury; affirmed, that the landing of the empreſs in England was owing to his repeated invitations; and the cruel treatment his brother had met with, was in conſequence of his pernicious advice. He concluded with charging him, on the faith he had ſworn to the empreſs as his ſovereign, not to do any thing in that aſſembly againſt her title and dignity. The legate anſwered only by a profound ſilence; conſcious guilt, or a policy beyond the depth of common comprehenſion, effectually ſealed his lips. He, however, recollected himſelf ſufficiently to pronounce the ſentence of excommunication againſt the counteſs of Anjou, and all her adherents. The whole aſſembly were ſtruck with ſurprize and indignation: they could not hear, without horror, eccleſiaſtical cenſures, ſo directly oppoſite in their tendency, pronounced, without any other reaſon than that of ſatisfying his own pride and malevolence. This was, however, the laſt time he exerted this authority. Pope Celeſtine II. on his acceſſion to the papal chair, deprived him of the legantine power, and beſtowed it on Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

A. D. 1142. The ſword of civil diſcord was now once more unſheathed, and threatened to ſpread deſtruction over this unhappy country. But Glouceſter ſoon perceived the alarming effects of his ſiſter's unſeaſonable pride and obſtinacy. Her party was conſiderably decreaſed in numbers, and even many of her powerful friends had forſook her ſtandard. He ſaw that ſhe could now never hope to aſcend the throne by the ſuffrages of the Engliſh, and feared it was too late to recover the popularity ſhe had loſt through her own haughtineſs. He, however, determined to perſevere in the cauſe he had undertaken, till death, or a deciſive victory, put an end to the conteſt. A council of Maud's principal friends was ſummoned at the Devizes, where it was reſolved to ſollicit a foreign aſſiſtance; and Glouceſter was diſpatched to the continent to engage Geoffrey of Anjou to land in England at the head of his forces.

Stephen exerted all his abilities to profit by this defection of Maud's friends, and the abſence of the earl of Glouceſter. The empreſs had no army capable of meeting the enemy in the open field, and was obliged to elude the forces of Stephen by retreating from one caſtle to another. At laſt ſhe retired to Oxford, then one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in the kingdom, and determined there to wait the arrival of the ſuccours from her huſband. Stephen immediately made himſelf maſter of the city, and laid cloſe ſiege to the caſtle.

Glouceſter could not prevail upon the earl of Anjou to paſs over into England at the head of his forces: all he could obtain was a reinforcement of four hundred men, under the command of Henry, his eldeſt ſon. With this ſmall body of troops the earl of Glouceſter landed in Dorſetſhire, and immediately laid ſiege to Wareham caſtle, in order to induce Stephen to abandon Oxford; but that prince was not to be diverted from his purpoſe. The arrival of Glouceſter, and the young prince Henry, greatly leſſened his army: the troops under his command deſerted in ſuch numbers, that ſome of the avenues to the caſtle were left open. Maud determined to ſeize this favourable opportunity of making her eſcape. It was now the depth of winter, the ground covered with ſnow, and the waters of the river entirely frozen. Encouraged by theſe favourable circumſtances, ſhe dreſſed herſelf, and all her attendants, in white, in order to prevent their being ſeen by the centinels; croſſed the river on the ice, and walked on foot above ſix miles to Abingdon, the ſnow driving all the way full in their faces. The caſtle of Oxford ſurrendered the next morning to Stephen, who was ſufficiently mortified in finding all the fruits of his labours ſnatched from him at the very time when he thought himſelf ſure of ſucceſs. The empreſs retired the next day to Wallingford, where ſhe was joined by her brother, and the young prince her ſon. The ſight of this object of her affections excited the full force of parental tenderneſs; and ſhe forgot, for a moment, all her afflictions, and all her fears.

A. D. 1147. From the time of the eſcape of the empreſs from Oxford, nothing material happened between the two contending parties; a few caſtles were taken, and ſome ſkirmiſhes happened between detachments from each army, but nothing deciſive. This year was, however, marked with an event of the utmoſt conſequence to the empreſs. The earl of Glouceſter, the principal ſupport of her cauſe, died of a fever, and was buried at Briſtol. In this accompliſhed nobleman, the empreſs loſt the only perſon that deſerved her intire confidence, perhaps the only one that ſerved her without views of intereſt. He was prudent, intrepid, generous and ſincere; an enemy to tyranny, an enemy to injuſtice, an enemy to deceit. He was beloved by his friends, beloved by his ſoldiers, beloved by his country. His death was lamented by the good and the virtuous, and even Stephen himſelf dropped a tear of reſpect to his memory.

The death of this gallant nobleman gave a mortal blow to the party of the empreſs. She ſaw it would be impoſſible for her to contend any longer for the crown. Her troops deſerted, her friends acted with coolneſs, and every thing indicated a ſad reverſe of fortune. She wiſely prevented the blow that was aimed at her liberty, by paſſing over to the continent, and leaving Stephen in the quiet poſſeſſion of the throne.

A. D. 1150. Geoffrey Plantagenet, the huſband of Maud, now perceived his end approaching; and deſirous of ſettling the ſucceſſion of his dominions on the ſureſt foundation, inveſted young Henry with the honours and revenues of his dutchy. The king of France, incenſed at this reſignation without firſt obtaining his conſent as ſovereign lord of the fief, invaded Normandy, and laid ſiege to Arques. He ſuſpected that Henry was too young to give him any great oppoſition; but he was miſtaken: he made ſo powerful a diverſon in France, that Lewis was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. and march to the defence of his own dominions. A peace was ſoon after concluded, and Lewis inveſted Henry with the dutchy of Normandy. Geoffrey now paid the debt of nature. Henry was left in poſſeſſion of Normandy, Maine, and Anjou; and his power was ſoon after greatly increaſed by an unexpected event.

Lewis the younger, king of France, was more ſcrupulous than virtuous. In one of thoſe petty civil wars, which the feudal government in France rendered inevitable, the king's troops had ſet fire to the church of Vitry, and all the people who had taken ſanctuary in it periſhed in the flames. St. Barnard, who had exerted all his abilities in preaching up a cruſade againſt the infidels, perſuaded Lewis, that the only method of expiating the crime committed by his forces, was that of going to Paleſtine. He liſtened to the voice of the eccleſiaſtic, took the croſs, and, with his young queen, Eleanor, of Guienne, ſet out for the Holy Land. The hopes of certain victory drew after him a prodigious number of knights, all clothed in complete armour. It is ſaid that they did not amount to leſs than ſeventy thouſand men. He croſſed the Boſphorus, and was ſurprized, among the rocks near Laodicea, by the ſultan of Iconium, and loſt the greater part of his army. He retired to Antioch, where Raymond, prince of that city, was ſuſpected of having fallen in love with Eleanor: it is even ſaid that ſhe forgot all the fatigues of ſo painful a journey in the arms of a young Turk of exquiſite beauty. Lewis, on his return, diſſolved his marriage, under a pretence of conſanguinity, and returned Eleanor all her large poſſeſſions. Henry, ſoon after, married this young heireſs; and obtained the rich provinces of Guienne, Poictou, and Xaintonge, which Lewis had returned. Theſe acquiſitions rendered him the moſt powerful ſubject in France. But, according to the inſtitutions of chivalry, all gentlemen, and even kings themſelves, were deſirous of receiving the honour of knighthood; a ceremony which was deemed abſolutely neceſſary to all who were deſirous of diſtinguiſhing themſelves in the military profeſſion. Henry obtained this honour from his great uncle, David, king of Scotland; and making ſeveral incurſions into England, he ſignalized himſelf by his abilities and valour. His conduct gave the moſt flattering proſpect of his future greatneſs, and raiſed the hopes of his party, ſo much depreſſed by the death of the earl of Glouceſter.

Stephen had imprudently involved himſelf in a quarrel with the pope, at a time when his crown tottered on his brow. The holy father had, indeed, given him ſufficient reaſon for his reſentment. He had ſummoned a council to meet at Rheims; but inſtead of permitting Stephen, or even the church of England, to elect the five deputies required, the pope nominated them himſelf. Stephen complained loudly of this breach of national privilege; but Eugenius, who then filled the papal chair, regarded not his remonſtrances. Enraged at this inſult, the king refuſed them permiſſion to attend; and the pontiff, in revenge for this interpoſition, laid the kingdom under an interdict. By this ſentence all the offices of religion were ſuſpended; the churches ſhut up, and the dead were not ſuffered to be interred in conſecrated ground. An univerſal terror ſpread through the nation; and it became neceſſary to make ſubmiſſions to the pope, in order to procure a reverſion of the ſentence.

A. D. 1152. The quarrel with his holineſs being thus happily finiſhed, Stephen, deſirous of fixing the Engliſh ſceptre in his family, attempted to procure his ſon Euſtace to be crowned with the uſual ſolemnities. Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, whoſe power was increaſed by the legantine authority, abſolutely refuſed to aſſiſt at the ſolemnity. Incenſed at this peremptory denial, Stephen ordered the archbiſhop to be confined; but he found means to corrupt his guards, and paſſed over to the continent. This flight rendered the king's attempt to ſecure the ſucceſſion in his family abortive; it being then conſidered, that the archbiſhop of Canterbury poſſeſſed an unalienable right to crown the kings of England.

A. D. 1153. Henry was now convinced that the Engliſh were far from being ſatisfied with Stephen's adminiſtration, and determined to attempt the recovery of a crown which had been wreſted from his family. He landed on the ſixth of January, at the head of a very ſmall body of troops; but their number was ſoon increaſed by the greater and moſt reſpectable part of the nobility in the kingdom. Stephen ſaw the gathering ſtorm, and laboured aſſiduouſly to break its force. The ſeverity of the ſeaſon had no effect to leſſen his ardour. He marched, at the head of his forces, to meet the duke of Normandy; but the badneſs of the roads ſo greatly retarded his progreſs, that Henry made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſtrong caſtles before Stephen could afford the garriſons the neceſſary relief. At laſt the two armies met in the neighbourhood of Wallingford, and made preparations for deciding, by a general action, the great conteſt for the Engliſh crown. But the nobles, unwilling to ſheathe their ſwords in the bowels of their countrymen, interpoſed their authority: a ceſſation of arms was concluded; and, ſoon after, a general peace took place between the contending princes; by which it was ſtipulated, that Stephen ſhould enjoy the crown during his life, and Henry ſucceed him as lawful heir by hereditary right.

A. D. 1154. Stephen being, by this reconciliation, freed from all apprehenſions of an enemy, employed himſelf to remove the ſufferings of the people, and heal the wounds of his bleeding country. He reformed many abuſes; he iſſued ſeveral wiſe and ſalutary edicts, and gave many ſtriking inſtances of his great abilities and love of juſtice. In a word, he ſeems to have determined to devote the remainder of his days to the eaſe and benefit of his ſubjects; to purſue every method for ſecuring their properties, protecting their perſons, and diffuſing through the whole kingdom univerſal harmony and undiſturbed repoſe. But while he was employed in theſe offices of juſtice and humanity, death put a period to his life, on the twenty-fifth of October, in the nineteenth year of his reign.

Ambition was the ruling paſſion of Stephen. To gratify this darling object of his ſoul, he trampled on the laws of juſtice, and plunged an innocent people into all the horrors of civil diſcord. He ſought happineſs (where it can never be found) in ſwaying the ſceptre of a divided people. At the ſame time, it muſt be acknowledged, that he was a prince of great fortitude, courage, activity, prudence, and generoſity. He harboured not the paſſion of revenge, and malevolence ſeems to have been a ſtranger to his breaſt. He diſpenſed juſtice impartially to his ſubjects, and cheriſhed the virtue of forgiveneſs. In a word, he was poſſeſſed of ſo many amiable virtues, that had he aſcended the throne by the right of inheritance, and lived in happier times, he would, in all probability, have been tranſmitted to poſterity with applauſe, and conſidered as one of the moſt illuſtrious princes of the Norman race.

The hiſtory of learning during this period is ſhort and defective. The numerous rebellions and civil wars that deſolated the kingdom, diſturbed the repoſe of the ſtudious, and prevented the muſes from taking up their abode in Britain. The little learning that ſubſiſted was confined to the cloiſter, and chiefly employed in eccleſiaſtical controverſies, that had no other tendency than that of ſetting the nation in a flame, and exalting the authority of the mitre above the power of the crown; of rendering eccleſiaſtics independent of the laws of civil government, and of placing the obſervance of ſuperſtitious ceremonies above the practice of pure morality. A few, indeed, there were, who employed ſome part of their time in the ſtudy of hiſtory and the antiquities of their country, and to whoſe labours we are indebted for our knowledge of the tranſactions of theſe uncultivated ages. Like beacons diſperſed on the ſummits of diſtant mountains, they have thrown a glimmering light over this night of ſuperſtitious ignorance, and faintly irradiated the gloom of Gothic barbarity. Their names, therefore, claim a place in the hiſtories of this country, becauſe their memories deſerve to be handed down with applauſe to poſterity.

Florence, a monk of Worceſter, often called Florentius Baronius, compoſed a chronicle of the world, from the creation to the year 1118. He was never celebrated for his genius, but always conſidered as a careful and indefatigable hiſtorian. His ſtyle, tho' unpoliſhed, abounds not with thoſe abſurd and groſs barbariſms, which have crept into the writings of his cotemporaries. He paid the debt of nature in 1119.

Alfred, or Alured, a prieſt and treaſurer of the college of Beverly. He appears to have been a writer of genius and abilities; but his hiſtory has ſuffered greatly by the hands of ignorant tranſcribers. He died in 1136.

Eadermus, an author of ſenſe and gravity, was cotemporary with Alfred, and intimately connected with the famous Anſelm, archbiſhop of Canterbury. He wrote the hiſtory of William I. William II. and Henry I. and, if we make ſome allowances for his being a profeſſed advocate for the papal authority, his works may be conſidered as impartial. The time of his death is uncertain.

William of Malmſbury is deſervedly placed at the head of all the Engliſh hiſtorians of his time. His ſentiments are bold and manly; his ſtyle nervous and elegant, far ſuperior to what might have been expected from the barbarous age in which he lived. His principal work is intituled, De Geſtis Anglorum, with an appendix called Hiſtoriarum Novellæ. He was a monk, and librarian of the college of Malmſbury, in Wiltſhire; and died in 1142.

Simeon of Durham compoſed an hiſtory of the Engliſh Tranſactions till the year 1129. He was both a monk, and preceptor in the convent of Durham; but the time of his death is uncertain. Leland tells us, that he diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his indefatigable care and aſſiduity in collecting the monuments of Engliſh learning that had eſcaped the ravages of the Danes.

Henry of Huntingdon wrote an hiſtory of England in ten books, ending with the death of king Stephen. This work is very defective in method; and abounds with a number of fabulous ſtories, tranſcribed from Geoffrey of Monmouth's hiſtory. Beſides this work, he wrote a continuation of Bede's Eccleſiaſtical Hiſtory, and a chronological table of the kings of England. He was archdeacon of Huntingdon, and the time of his death is uncertain.

But the moſt eminent monument of the learning of theſe ages, is the Saxon Chronicle, which begins with the birth of Chriſt, and ends with the death of Stephen. It is ſufficiently evident from the difference of the ſtyle, and other infallible marks, that theſe annals were compoſed by ſeveral authors, and at various periods of time. But their authenticity has never been diſputed, eſpecially with regard to the wars between the Anglo-Saxons and Britons; and has been the foundation of all our hiſtories to the Norman conqueſt. Dr. Gibſon, afterwards biſhop of London, publiſhed at Oxford, in 1692, an accurate edition of this celebrated Chronicle, with an elegant tranſlation.

HENRY II.

A.D. 1154. THE death of Stephen reſtored the Engliſh crown to the undoubted heir of Henry I. The king of France, though he was already alarmed at the great power of Henry, oppoſed not his acceſſion to the throne of his anceſtors; and the Engliſh, worn out with the miſeries of civil diſcord, joyfully acknowledged a ſovereign whom they flattered themſelves would eſtabliſh tranquillity in their exhauſted country. Henry was received with great affection by the nobility, and crowned at Weſtminſter on the nineteenth of December, amidſt the acclamations of the people.

The Engliſh had conceived a very flattering idea of the virtues and abilities of Henry; and the firſt acts of his government convinced them that their opinion was founded on juſtice. He exerted himſelf to remove the complaints of his ſubjects, and introduce univerſal harmony among his people. The mercenary ſoldiers of Stephen were diſmiſſed, by which the kingdom was freed from a burden that had occaſioned the moſt affecting complaints. The bands of robbers, who had ſo long ravaged the country, were deſtroyed, and every ſpecies of violence repreſſed; the powerful were reſtrained from acts of tyranny, and the licentious from diſturbing the repoſe of the innocent. The laws were armed with authority; none dared diſpute the power of the magiſtrate. The fortreſſes raiſed by the nobles, who had ſo often ſpread deſolation over various counties, were demoliſhed; the coin was regulated; and the turbulent barons reduced to obedience. Henry wanted not aſſiſtance in eſtabliſhing theſe meaſures of national utility; the people ſupported their king; he had nothing to fear from a few turbulent barons, who at firſt oppoſed the deſtruction of their caſtles. But what rendered Henry ſtill dearer to his ſubjects, was his paſſing a charter of liberties, in which all the privileges granted by his grandfather Henry I. were confirmed, with ſeveral additional immunities. Theſe, and other acts of popularity, endeared Henry to the Engliſh; and a perfect tranquillity reigned in every part of the kingdom.

A. D. 1156. While Henry was employed in promoting the happineſs of his people, his brother Geoffrey endeavoured to make himſelf maſter of Maine and Anjou; but Henry ſoon reduced the inſurgents; and Geoffrey conſented to accept of a penſion, and relinquiſh his title to the countries in queſtion. Indeed, he had no other claim than a promiſe made him by his brother, before he obtained the crown of England, that he would put him in poſſeſſion of theſe dutchies as ſoon as he was ſettled on the throne of his anceſtors.

A. D. 1157. The Welſh, ever reſtleſs and uneaſy, had invaded ſeveral of the counties bordering on their territories; and Henry marched, at the head of an army, to revenge the inſult; but the cowardice of his ſtandard-bearer rendered the attempt abortive, and had almoſt proved fatal both to Henry and his whole whole army. The attack of the Welſh was made with all the fury inherent in that valiant people, and ſo terrified Henry de Eſſex, who carried the royal ſtandard, that, throwing down the enſign, he fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Alarmed at miſſing the royal ſtandard, the Engliſh were intimidated, and, perſuaded that the king was ſlain, fell into confuſion. Henry perceived the cauſe, and rode through the ranks bare-headed, to convince them of their miſtake. Aſhamed of ſuch puſillanimous conduct, the Engliſh returned to the charge and drove back the enemy, but not without conſiderable loſs. A peace ſoon after enſued, and the king diſbanded his army.

A. D. 1159. Henry, who was ſtill deſirous of encreaſing his poſſeſſions, laid claim to the county of Thoulouſe, in right of his queen, to whom it belonged; but Raymond, count of Thoulouſe, refuſed to deliver up the territories, pleading preſcription, and his right of purchaſe. Both were determined to ſupport their rights, and the ſword therefore was to decide the controverſy. Henry ſaw the difficulties that muſt attend the reduction of Thoulouſe, a city remarkable for its ſtrength. He knew that the uſual method of raiſing armies would never anſwer his purpoſe, and therefore determined to have recourſe to an innovation which he flattered himſelf would be of equal advantage to the prince and his people. The uſual method of raiſing armies conſiſted in the king's ſending orders to his military tenants to take the field at the head of a certain number of their vaſſals, in proportion to the value of their fiefs. Henry was diſguſted at this ſpecies of military ſervice; becauſe it never anſwered the monarch's intentions. The great ſlowneſs with which the military tenants came into the field, the ſpirit they poſſeſſed of independence, and the ſhortneſs of the time they were obliged to ſerve, being only forty days, rendered the armies not only of little uſe, but even dangerous. Nor was this method leſs inconvenient to the ſubject. When a war was to be carried on in remote countries, the expences of going to and returning from the army, and which they were obliged to bear themſelves, was very great; their domeſtic affairs ſuffered; the tillage of their lands was neglected, and a famine was often the conſequence of military ſervice. Henry, therefore, commuted the perſonal ſervice of his military tenants, for a proportional ſum of money. The people were delighted with this exchange; it was far more agreeable to them to advance money than to furniſh troops, and to head them in perſon. And Henry was pleaſed to find he had united his intereſt with the happineſs of his people. He received the ſtipulated ſums, and hired mercenary forces, over whom he had a more certain authority, and whoſe time of ſervice was unlimited.

Henry began his military operations againſt Cahors, the capital of the generality of Quercy, and was ſoon maſter of the place; but the city of Thoulouſe made a noble defence, and the Engliſh monarch exerted all his abilities to take it. Lewis, king of France, was alarmed at Henry's progreſs. He feared that if the Engliſh monarch was ſuffered to make himſelf maſter of the principal places in the heart of France, his ambition might puſh him on to farther conqueſts, and even advance to the very gates of Paris. He therefore marched at the head of a ſmall body of forces, and threw himſelf into Thoulouſe, before Henry could completely inveſt the city. The military operations immediately ceaſed, Henry declaring that he owed ſo much reſpect to his ſuperior lord, that he would not attack a place defended by him in perſon. He raiſed the ſiege, and a treaty of peace was ſoon after concluded between the monarchs of France and England.

A. D. 1161. But this peace was of no long continuance: ambition ſoon diſſolved the bands of amity. Henry's eldeſt ſon had, for ſome time, been affianced to Margaret, the daughter of Lewis, and it was agreed by the marriage treaty, that the princeſs ſhould have city of Giſors with part of Norman Vexin, for her portion; and that theſe places ſhould remain in the cuſtody of the Knights Templars, till the marriage was celebrated. Deſirous of obtaining the poſſeſſion of thoſe valuable places, Henry prevailed upon the cardinals Piſa and Pavia to grant him a ſynodical decree, diſpenſing with the nonage of the parties. The nuptials were immediately celebrated, though the prince was but ſeven, and the princeſs only three years of age; and the Templars, conſidering themſelves as free from their engagements, delivered up the caſtle of Giſors and the other places aſſigned as Margaret's dower to Henry.

Lewis was highly offended at the ſtratagem of the Engliſh monarch, and a war broke out between them; but pope Alexander III. deſirous of preventing the effuſion of human blood, offered his mediation, and brought about a reconciliation. Alexander, who the preceding year had been driven from Rome, by the anti-pope Victor IV. had retired into France, Lewis as well as Henry having acknowledged him for the true ſucceſſor of St. Peter, and the pontiff in return was deſirous of bringing about a peace between the two princes, who were equally his friends. The contending monarchs met his holineſs at the caſtle of Torci on the Loire. They immediately diſmounted to receive him, and each of them holding one of the reins of his bridle, walked on foot by his ſide, and in this manner conducted him into the caſtle. Such was the ſuperſtitious bigotry of the times! Can we wonder at the pride and inſolence of the Roman pontiff, when two of the moſt powerful monarchs in Europe were guilty of ſuch unpardonable weakneſs?

The power of Henry was now ſufficiently eſtabliſhed, and he flattered himſelf with a long ſeries of peace and tranquillity: but he was deceived; he was rendered unhappy by a perſon, who owed his whole fortune to his bounty. This was the celebrated Thomas Becket, whoſe conduct ſet the nation in a flame, and rendered abortive the ſcheme which Henry had formed for confining the eccleſiaſtical juriſdiction within proper bounds; and of repreſſing the licentiouſneſs of the clergy, who had for ſome time expreſſed an open contempt of the laws of their country. Forgetting that religion is the genuine baſis of civil order, they had inverted its tendency, and endeavoured to demoliſh the very ſtructure it was intended to ſupport. They arrogated to themſelves rights and immunities totally ſubverſive of the peace of ſociety. Henry was determined to correct theſe enormities, and, without depriving the church of her real privileges, to eſtabliſh proper limits to the pretenſions of the clergy. Becket was conſidered as a proper perſon for executing this noble deſign, and whoſe utmoſt aſſiſtance Henry flattered himſelf he might command.

That famous eccleſiaſtic was the ſon of a citizen of London, and had ſpent his youth in the ſtudy of the civil and canon law at Boulogne. He was endowed with very ſingular talents, and with a ſpirit not to be daunted even by the frowns of royalty. Theobald, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had recommended him to Henry, who made him his chancellor. In the execution of that high office he was equally diſtinguiſhed by the extent of his capacity, and the ſplendor and gaiety of his life. Far from being tinctured with the ſuperſtitious bigotry of the times, he abandoned himſelf to the pleaſures of the age. He was an aſſiduous courtier, and ſhared with his prince his amuſements and his military toils.

A. D. 1162. Perſuaded that Becket would readily ſacrifice his own intereſt to promote that of his ſovereign, Henry, on the death of Theobald, promoted him to the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury. The whole behaviour of Becket was changed on his being placed at the head of the Engliſh church. He reſigned his office of chancellor, and ſent the ſeals to Henry, who was then in Normandy; renounced all concern in ſecular affairs, ſubmitted to the moſt rigid mortifications, and became laviſh in his generoſity to the poor. The gay and ſplendid miniſter was changed into a ſaint.

Becket having thus acquired the veneration of the people, ſoon convinced Henry that he muſt not expect any aſſiſtance from him in limiting the privileges of the clergy. He attempted to recover all the lands that had been alienated from the ſee of Canterbury : pretending that none of his predeceſſors had any right to diſpoſe of the property of the church. Nor was he contented with this attempt to extend his juriſdiction, he aſſerted that it was the prerogative of the archbiſhop to fill vacant church livings in the manors of his military tenants, as well as thoſe of the churches of Canterbury. Accordingly, he collated one Laurence to the rectory of Areſford ; but the patron, who was a peer of the realm, reſolved not to ſubmit to ſo inſolent an intruſion, and immediately ejected Laurence from the benefice. Becket conſidered this as an unpardonable affront offered to the mitre, and pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt the patron.

Henry was at once aſtoniſhed and alarmed. He wrote to Becket, inſiſting that the cenſure ſhould be taken off, which the haughty prelate peremptorily refuſed. A little reflection, however, convinced him of his error : a law, paſſed in the reign of William the conqueror, inflicted the penalty of high-treaſon on any churchman, who ſhould promulgate an eccleſiaſtical cenſure on any military tenant of the crown, without the king's conſent. The prelate did not chuſe to incur the penalty, and therefore annulled the ſentence. Henry was now ſufficiently convinced that he had been deceived in the opinion he had formed of Becket, and at the ſame time confirmed in his former reſolution of reducing the authority of the eccleſiaſtics. An event ſoon after happened, that called upon him, as the father of his people, to carry his deſign into immediate execution.

A clergyman in Worceſterſhire having debauched a gentleman's daughter, murdered the father to conceal the offence. Henry ordered that the criminal ſhould be tried in the ſecular court, and puniſhed according to the laws of the kingdom. Becket inſiſted on the immunities of the church, and maintained that no greater puniſhment could be inflicted upon him than that of degradation, and his being ſhut up in a monaſtery during the remainder of his life. Adding, that to ſubject an eccleſiaſtic to the cognizance of the civil magiſtrate, was a high infringement of the privileges of the church, and which he would always oppoſe to the utmoſt of his power. Aſtoniſhed at the inſolence of the prelate, and diſdaining to anſwer a declaration ſo ſubverſive of the peace of civil ſociety, the king turned his back upon the prelate, and left him with contempt.

Henry now aſſembled an aſſembly of all the prelates of England at Weſtminſter, and ſolemnly demanded, " whether they conſented and allowed, that ſuch clergymen as were convicted of felony ſhould be degraded, and immediately upon their degradation be delivered over to a ſecular officer for corporal puniſhment." This demand, which was perfectly agreeable to juſtice, and the ancient laws of England, met with very little oppoſition from any of the clergy, except the archbiſhop, who peremptorily refuſed his aſſent, alledging, that it was contrary both to the divine law, and the inſtitutions of the church, for a delinquent to undergo a double puniſhment for one offence. Telling his brethren at the ſame time that it ill became them, who were forbid, by the ſacred writings, to have any concern in ſentences of death, to expoſe any perſon of their own order to capital puniſhment. Swayed by the authority, and fearing the power of Becket, the biſhops declined coming to any reſolution on the ſubject of the king's demand. Henry was exaſperated at their obſtinacy, and aſked them this preciſe and deciſive queſtion, " Whether or not they were willing to ſubmit to the ancient laws of the kingdom ?" The anſwer was equivocal ; a ſalvo was added, with regard to their order and immunities of the church ; and Henry left the ſynod with all the marks of indignation and contempt.

Alarmed at the abrupt departure of the king, the biſhops repreſented to Becket, that his unſeaſonable obſtinacy would, in all probability, be fatal to the privileges of the clergy ; and therefore adviſed him, from the regard to the common cauſe of all the eccleſiaſtics in this kingdom, to make ſome conceſſions to offended majeſty : but the archbiſhop was deaf to their intreaties, declaring, that he was ready to lay down his life in ſupport of the canons of the church. Aſtoniſhed at his inflexible obſtinacy, the biſhops, who were not equally blinded by enthuſiaſm, conſidered that whatever honour their perſeverance might reflect upon them at the court of Rome, yet as Engliſh barons, they had every thing to fear from the reſentment of an active and warlike prince. Inſtigated by theſe motives, they waited upon the king, and gave him an abſolute promiſe to ſubmit themſelves to the laws of the kingdom. Becket himſelf followed their example, and promiſed, upon the faith of an honeſt man, to obſerve the laws of the kingdom without any ſalvo or qualification.

A. D. 1164. The only difficulty that now remained was, to explain and define thoſe laws, and to aſcertain the proper limits of the civil and eccleſiaſtical juriſdictions. For this purpoſe a general council of the nobility and prelates was aſſembled at Clarendon. And in this aſſembly the following articles were framed into the form of laws.

" I. All ſuits about the preſentation and advowſon of churches, between either laity or clergy, ſhall be tried and determined in the king's court.

" II. Churches of the king's fee cannot be given away in perpetuity without his conſent.

" III. Clergymen accuſed of any crime whatever, and ſummoned by the king's juſtices, ſhall appear in the king's court, and plead to ſuch articles as the court ſhall require, and in the eccleſiaſtical court, to ſuch as are cognizable therein ; provided the king's juſtices ſend an officer to inſpect the proceedings of the eccleſiaſtical court ; and in caſe a clerc is convicted, or pleads guilty, he is to loſe his privilege, and be protected by the court no longer.

" IV. No archbiſhops, biſhops, or prieſts, may go out of the realm without the king's leave ; and if they have leave, they ſhall give ſecurity not to aſk or attempt any thing either in their paſſage, ſtay, or return, to the prejudice of the king or kingdom.

" V. Excommunicated perſons ſhall not be obliged to make oath, or give ſecurity, to continue upon the place where they live, but only to ſtand to the judgment of the church in order to their abſolution.

" VI. Laymen ought not to be accuſed in the eccleſiaſtical court, but by legal and reputable promoters and witneſſes, and in the preſence of the biſhop ; yet ſo as the archdeacon loſe not his right or any of his dues : and if the offenders are ſuch that nobody will or dare accuſe them, the ſheriff, at the biſhop's requeſt, ſhall cauſe twelve legal men of the town or vicinage to make oath before the biſhop, that they will declare the truth of the matter, according to the beſt of their knowledge.

" VII. None, either of the king's tenants in capite, or of his miniſterial officers, may be excommunicated, nor any of their lands put under an interdict, unleſs application be firſt made to the king, if he be in England, or, in caſe he be out of the realm, to his juſticiary, that he may ſee juſtice done in their caſe ; ſo that what is cognizable in the king's court may be there determined, and what belongs to the eccleſiaſtical may be remitted thither.

" VIII. If appeals ariſe in eccleſiaſtical cauſes, they are to be made from the archdeacon to the biſhop, and from the biſhop to the archbiſhop ; in failure of juſtice from the archbiſhop, recourſe muſt be had to the king, that by his precept, the ſuit may be determined in the archbiſhop's court. Nor ſhall it be lawful to proceed farther without the king's conſent.

"IX. If a ſuit ariſe between a clergyman and a layman, which the firſt pretends to be held by Frank-Almoine; (a tenure of lands or tenements beſtowed for perpetual alms) and the latter maintains it to be a lay-fee, the tenure ſhall be tried before the king's juſticiary by the verdict of twelve legal men, ſummoned according to the cuſtom of the courts, by the order of the king's chief juſtice; and if the tenement is found to be held in frank-almoine, the ſuit ſhall be tried in the eccleſiaſtical court; but if the verdict brings it in a lay-fee, the ſuit ſhall be carried on in the king's court, unleſs they both hold of the ſame lord, either ſpiritual or temporal, in which caſe it ſhall be tried in his court; provided, however, that the perſon ſeiſed with the tenement in queſtion be not, on account of ſuch verdict, diſſeiſed till the ſuit is determined.

"X. If any inhabitant of a city, caſtle, borough, or demeſne manor of the king, be cited for any time by the archdeacon or biſhop, and will not make ſatisfaction upon their ſummons, they may interdict him from divine ſervice; but they ought not to excommunicate him, till the king's principal officer of the place be made acquainted therewith, that he may oblige the perſon to make ſatisfaction to the church; and if ſuch officer fail in ſo doing, he ſhall be fineable at the king's pleaſure; and the biſhop may then exert his eccleſiaſtical authority upon the accuſed perſon.

"XI. All archbiſhops and biſhops, and other clergymen poſſeſſed of eccleſiaſtical dignities or benefices, who hold of the king in capite, are to look upon their eſtates as baronies, and ſhall appear before the king's juſtices and officers, to anſwer the duties of their tenure; and ſhall obſerve and perform all the royal cuſtoms, rights, and ſervices; and ſhall hold themſelves, as other barons, obliged to be preſent at judicial proceedings in the king's court, till ſentence comes to be given againſt life or limb.

"XII. When any archbiſhopric, biſhopric, abbey, or priory, of royal foundation or patronage, becomes vacant, the king ſhall enter thereupon, and receive all the iſſues and profits thereof as of his own demeſne lands; and when he ſhall think fit that ſuch church be provided for, the king ſhall ſend his mandate to the chief chapter or convent, and the election ſhall be made in the king's chapel, with the king's conſent, and by the advice of ſuch dignitaries of the realm as the king ſhall call together for that purpoſe: and the perſon ſo elected ſhall there, before his conſecration, do homage and fealty to the king, as to his liege lord, for life, limb, and earthly honour, ſaving his order.

"XIII. If any of the chief nobility of the realm ſhould violently oppoſe the archbiſhop or biſhop, or archdeacon, in doing juſtice on themſelves, or on their tenants, the king ſhall take cognizance of the matter, and oblige them to ſubmit to juſtice. And if any deny the king his rights, and decline ſtanding to the judgment of the court, the archbiſhop, biſhop, and archdeacon, ſhall employ their authority and cenſures to oblige them to make the king ſatisfaction.

"XIV. The goods and chattels of ſuch as have forfeited to the king, ſhall not be detained in any church or church-yard, to ſecure them from being ſeized according to law, becauſe they belong to the king wherever they are found, as well within the precincts of the church as without.

"XV. All actions and ſuits for debt, due either upon oath, or ſolemn promiſe, or otherwiſe contracted, ſhall be tried in the king's court.

"XVI. The ſons of villeins, or copyholders, are not to be ordained without the conſent of the lord of the manor where they were known to be born."

Such are the famous articles, ſo well known under the title of "The Conſtitutions of Clarendon." The biſhops, overawed by the barons, who were all gained over to the king's party, readily ſigned the Conſtitutions; but Becket had now changed his reſolution, retracted his promiſe, and abſolutely refuſed to ſet his hand to the articles. At laſt, by the repeated ſollicitations of the nobility and clergy, he relented, ſigned the Conſtitutions, and promiſed "legally with good faith, and without fraud, to "obey them."

Henry tranſmitted the articles to pope Alexander, in order to have them confirmed by a bull. But the pontiff was ſo far from complying with the wiſhes of the king, that he did not heſitate to condemn and annul them, as incompatible with the rights of the church. Becket no ſooner perceived that he might hope for ſupport from the ſee of Rome in his oppoſition to the conſtitutions, than he expreſſed the deepeſt ſorrow for having joined in theſe conceſſions: he redoubled his auſterities, and refuſed to exerciſe any part of his archiepiſcopal function, till he ſhould receive abſolution from the pontiff.

Henry was now ſo thoroughly exaſperated againſt Becket, that it was generally feared his ruin was determined. The archbiſhop himſelf was alarmed, and applied to Henry for leave to viſit the pope, in order to confer with him on ſome important affair relative to his church, but was refuſed. The prelate then repaired to Woodſtock, where Henry reſided, and was refuſed an audience.

Another council was now ſummoned at Northampton, where no leſs than four impeachments were preferred againſt him. Paſſion now, rather than juſtice, dictated the proceedings of Henry. Becket was convicted of contumacy, and condemned to pay a very large fine. The king commanded him to give an account of his adminiſtration while chancellor, which the archbiſhop abſolutely refuſed. It was now apparent that Henry was determined to humble this imperious churchman; but Becket was not to be intimidated. He dreſſed himſelf in his pontifical robes, and carrying the croſs of Canterbury erect before him, entered the preſence chamber. Every perſon preſent was ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at his inſolence and folly. The biſhops were aſhamed and confounded; and the biſhop of Hereford requeſted that he might bear the croſs before him, but he aſked in vain. Henry himſelf remonſtrated concerning his conduct, and reminded him, that he had himſelf ſubſcribed the articles of Clarendon. Becket replied, that the cauſe of God and the church had rendered his conſent to thoſe articles of no force; and that he put himſelf under the protection of the Roman pontiff, the ſupreme head of the church, to whom he appealed againſt the ſentences that either had or might be pronounced againſt him, and ſtrictly inhibited his ſuffragans not to join in any enterprize contrary to the immunities of the church. The barons, exaſperated at his conduct, determined to commit him to priſon; but he refuſed to hear the ſentence pronounced, left the aſſembly immediately, and retired, with his croſs erect before him, to the monaſtery of St. Andrews. He ſoon after ſent three biſhops to aſk a ſafe conduct for his departure; but being denied, he retired privately in the night, attended only by two ſervants, and eſcaped to the continent. He was received by Lewis king of France, and pope Alexander, who was ſtill at the court of that monarch, with every mark of reſpect and eſteem. By the munificence of the former, he lived with the utmoſt magnificence in the monaſtery of Pontigni, and the latter prepared to iſſue bulls to revenge his diſgrace. All the thunder of the Vatican was intended to be launched againſt the head of the Engliſh monarch and his miniſters.

Henry was no ſooner informed of the eſcape of Becket, than he immediately diſpatched a very reſpectable embaſſy to the pope, to ſollicit the depoſition of the primate; offering to double the revenue of Peter's-pence, and render it a perpetual tax. But the pope was inflexible; he refuſed the offer, and the ambaſſadors immediately returned to their maſter. On their arrival, Henry ſummoned an aſſembly of the nobles, where it was determined to ſequeſter all the poſſeſſions of the ſee of Canterbury, together with all the revenues of the churches, chapels, and rents of the clergy, who adhered to Becket; and all the primate's relations and domeſtics, both clergy and laity, were baniſhed the kingdom.

A. D. 1165. But Henry was ſtill uneaſy. The troubles excited in Germany and Italy by the thunder of the Vatican, alarmed both him and his nobles. He therefore paſſed over to the continent, in order, if poſſible, to prevent an interdict being laid on the kingdom, by a perſonal conference with the pope. An interview was accordingly propoſed, and it was agreed that Becket ſhould not be preſent. The archbiſhop was alarmed at this excluſion; he feared that the pope, on hearing a fair account of the whole proceedings, would withdraw his protection, and abandon him to the vengeance of an enraged monarch. He therefore ſuggeſted to his holineſs, "that he might be impoſed upon by the fluent and plauſible ſpeeches of Henry, unleſs he himſelf was preſent to interpret their meaning by what he knew of the inward ſentiments of his heart." The weak pontiff liſtened to this artful ſuggeſtion of the prelate; he gave up his own infallibility to depend upon that of Becket, and inſiſted on the archbiſhop's being preſent at the interview. Henry diſdained to ſubmit to this propoſal, and immediately embarked for England.

A. D. 1166. The king, convinced that the pope would now exert all his power in favour of Becket, took every precaution in his power to render the attempt abortive. He prohibited all his ſubjects, under ſevere penalties, from receiving any mandates either from his holineſs or the archbiſhop, and from making any appeals to them. Becket now exerted all his power; he thundered out anathemas againſt his enemies, and at laſt denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all that adhered to the conſtitutions of Clarendon; and abſolved every one from the oaths which they had taken to obſerve them. At the ſame time, by virtue of the legantine authority conferred on him by Alexander, he commanded the Engliſh biſhops to attend him under the penalty of an anathema, and even proceeded ſo far as to write threatening letters to the king. But Alexander being engaged in a dangerous war with the emperor Frederic Barbaroſſa, was afraid of drawing upon him the reſentment of ſo powerful a prince as Henry; he therefore ſuſpended the effects of Becket's denunciations.

A. D. 1167. Henry, however, was unwilling to expoſe his kingdom to thoſe revolutions which the thunder of the Vatican had produced in other parts of Europe; but unfortunately, the obſtinacy of the archbiſhop was equal to the ſtatelineſs of the monarch. Lewis, king of France, interpoſed his good offices to bring about an accommodation. Becket declared he was ready to put an end to all diſputes; and to ſubmit to the king, ſaving his honour, the poſſeſſions of the church, and the rights of others. At laſt an interview was agreed to, and Becket met the kings of France and England at a village in the neighbourhood of Paris; but the primate was ſo unreaſonable and haughty, that Lewis was perſuaded it would be impoſſible to bring about an agreement. Henry, deſirous of a pacification, ſaid to Lewis, "There have been many kings of England, and there have alſo been many archbiſhops of Canterbury; let Becket act towards me with the ſame ſubmiſſion which the greateſt of his predeceſſors have paid to the leaſt of mine, and I ſhall be ſatisfied." But Becket refuſed to acquieſce in ſo reaſonable a propoſal. Lewis was, or at leaſt ſeemed to be, diſguſted, and the two kings departed without taking leave of the archbiſhop; but the correſpondence and friendſhip between the monarch of France and the prelate was ſoon after renewed.

A. D. 1169. Henry now gave Normandy, Le Maine and Anjou, to his eldeſt ſon, Henry; Poictou and Guienne to his ſon Richard; and Britanny to Geoffrey, who held it as a fief depending upon Normandy, and ſwore fealty to his eldeſt brother. Lewis, as lord paramount of theſe fiefs, confirmed the grants, and the young princes did homage to the French monarch for their reſpective territories.

A. D. 1170. Having provided for the tranquillity of his foreign dominions, Henry returned to England, and ſummoned a parliament, or great council of the nation, to meet at Windſor. In this aſſembly the kingdom was divided into circuits; and certain earls, knights, and clergymen, appointed commiſſioners, to make a progreſs through theſe diviſions, in order to take cognizance of all abuſes committed by the ſheriffs, bailiffs, and other inferior officers. This inquiſition produced the moſt ſalutary effects; the ſubject was eaſed of many exactions, various grievances were redreſſed, and peace eſtabliſhed in every part of the kingdom.

But theſe acquiſitions, however great, however valuable, were not the only objects of Henry's deſign; he had formed another of ſtill greater importance, which he thought proper to conceal till the very moment of its execution, leſt the turbulent primate ſhould find means to render the whole abortive. He remembered with ſorrow the little regard the Engliſh had paid to their oaths of eventual fealty in the caſe of his mother, and was therefore determined not to ſubject his own children to the ſame misfortune, by placing the crown on the head of Henry, his eldeſt ſon, then in the ſixteenth year of his age. He accordingly adjourned the national aſſembly from Windſor to London. No perſon, not even the young prince himſelf, was acquainted with the real intention of Henry. The aſſembly was, however, remarkably full, in order to receive the report of the commiſſioners. As ſoon as the report was read, Henry informed them of the reſolution he had formed with regard to the coronation of his ſon, and was pleaſed to find it received with univerſal approbation. The only difficulty conſiſted in finding a prelate who was properly authoriſed to perform the ceremony. It was generally underſtood to be a prerogative peculiar to the archbiſhop of Canterbury; but on this occaſion it was performed by Roger, archbiſhop of York, who had lately been inveſted with a legantine authority for Scotland; together with a bull, which granted him the eventual privilege of crowning the king of England, an immunity which ſome of his predeceſſors had formerly enjoyed. Accordingly that prelate, aſſiſted by the biſhops of London and Durham, placed the crown upon the head of young Henry. And immediately after the ceremony, William king of Scotland, his brother David, and all the earls, barons, and franktenants of England, took the oaths of fealty and allegiance to the new king.

The younger Henry was of a haughty and imperious diſpoſition; he was a ſtranger to generous paſſions; gratitude was not among his virtues. His father, deſirous of diſplaying, before this auguſt aſſembly, every mark of paternal love and diſtinction for his favourite ſon, ſerved the firſt diſh at his table with his own hands, ſaying, with an endearing ſmile, "You may now boaſt, my ſon, of being as honourably ſerved as any monarch upon earth." But the ſoul of young Henry was too haughty to make a proper return to this engaging condeſcenſion in a parent. He turned to the archbiſhop of York, and whiſpered, with a contemptuous ſneer, "That he thought it no great degradation for the ſon of a petty count to ſerve the heir of a great king." Henry heard not the ungenerous reflection of his ſon; he was yet a ſtranger to his ingratitude.

The coronation of young Henry, without his aſſiſtance, filled the breaſt of Becket with malevolence and rage; he threatened vengeance againſt the prelates who had performed the ceremony, but his fury ſpent itſelf in vain; the pope ſuſpended the effect of his anathemas, till a proper inquiſition could be taken. In the mean time Henry paid a viſit to his foreign dominions, where another effort was made for terminating the differences between the king and the ambitious primate. The pope, indeed, was juſt going to launch the flaming bolt of interdiction upon all Henry's dominions; the day was fixed, and the Roman council ſummoned to attend. The powerful effects of ſuperſtitious bigotry, on the minds of the moſt daring, was now conſpicuous. The intrepid ſoul of Henry could not ſupport the ſhock; the mighty monarch, at whoſe nod the nations trembled, crouched like an abject ſlave beneath the uplifted rod of papal tyranny. A conference was held in a meadow between Charton and Maine, where all differences between the king and the archbiſhop were finally adjuſted. It was agreed, that the king ſhould receive the archbiſhop, his exiled clergy, adherents, and relations into his favour; that the prelate ſhould be reſtored to his rights and poſſeſſions in the ſee of Canterbury, and be empowered to hold them in the ſame manner as before the conteſt began; that ſatisfaction ſhould be made to the ſee of Canterbury for the violation of its rights, in the coronation of the young king.

Theſe terms were certainly as favourable as even Becket himſelf could wiſh; and Henry hoped, that the archbiſhop, in return for theſe conceſſions, would lay aſide all rancour and malice, and apply himſelf to the proper duties of his office, the cultivation of peace, and promoting brotherly love and charity throughout the kingdom. He was deceived. Becket no ſooner mounted his archiepiſcopal chair, than he thundered out the ſentence of excommunication againſt the biſhops of London and Durham, ſeveral of the king's miniſters, officers of the houſhold, juſticiaries, and the moſt conſiderable perſons in the kingdom. Henry was informed of thoſe violent meaſures at Bayeaux, and cried out in the bitterneſs of grief and aſtoniſhment, "What! will none of my ſervants rid me of this ungrateful and imperious prelate." This exclamation was not uttered in vain. Four barons, or knights of his houſhold, ſwore to revenge the cauſe of their maſter, privately withdrew from court, and paſſed over into England. Henry was informed of their departure, and fearing his exclamation might induce them to violent meaſures, diſpatched meſſengers after them, to prevent any fatal accident. But it was too late. The four conſpirators followed the archbiſhop into the church, and murdered him before the altar of St. Benedict.

Such was the tragical end of St. Thomas of Canbury, a prelate of the moſt imperious and inflexible ſpirit. He fell a victim to his own pride and obſtinacy in a cauſe which he fancied juſt, and in which he was guided by the moſt deſtructive prejudices. Unable to bear the leaſt contradiction, and fond of directing affairs of every kind, he treated all that oppoſed him with a virulence of behaviour, and a ſeverity of vengeance, which neither ſuited the character of a chriſtian biſhop, nor a decent member of ſociety. He ſcrupled not to add the ſanction of the moſt ſacred oaths to infamous falſehoods, in order to carry any favourite point. And we may learn from his example the amazing influence, which opinion often obtains over the minds even of ſuperior men, and thence perceive the dangers of thoſe falſe principles which ignorance and ſuperſtition have too often ſubſtituted in the place of the genuine and pure maxims of the goſpel. Alexander, convinced of the great ſervices of Becket in promoting the exorbitant power aſſumed by the papacy, cauſed him to be canonized and revered as a martyr about two years after his death, without the uſual proceſs generally obſerved in caſes of a ſimilar nature. Pilgrimages were made to Canterbury, and devotions made at his tomb.

A. D. 1171. The death of Becket deeply affected the mind of Henry. He dreaded the conſequences of the papal thunder, and knew that his enemies would exert all their influence with the pontiff to launch the flaming bolt of interdiction on his dominions. He feared the ſpiritual much more than the temporal ſword. He diſpatched a ſplendid embaſſy to Rome, to clear him of all ſuſpicion of being concerned in the death of Becket, and to avert the thunders of the vatican. Alexander, at firſt, refuſed an audience to Henry's ambaſſadors; but by the proper diſtribution of large ſums among the members of the ſacred college, the intention of Henry was fully anſwered. The pope, however irritated againſt Henry, contented himſelf with iſſuing general denunciations againſt the principa's and accomplices of Becket's murder. The archbiſhop of Sens, who had always been an implacable enemy to the Engliſh monarch, laid an interdict upon all the French provinces ſubject to Henry; but the pope prevented the conſequences that might have reſulted from that ſentence. Two cardinals were ſent with legantine powers into Normandy, in order to examine into the king's conduct with regard to the murder of Becket, and a conference was opened at Avaranches, where Henry and his eldeſt ſon aſſiſted, together with all the clergy of Normandy. After long debates the whole affair was ſettled, and all differences between Henry and the pope were terminated on the following conditions: The king declared, upon oath and the relicts of the ſaints in the church of St. Andrew, that he had neither commanded nor deſired the murder of Becket; but that as ſome words had eſcaped him, in his agony of grief, which might have given occaſion to it, he was deſirous of atoning for that offence by ſtipulating to pay a ſum of money ſufficient to maintain two hundred knights for one year in the Holy land; and, if the pope required it, to ſerve himſelf three years againſt the infidels. He farther engaged not to inſiſt on any cuſtoms derogatory to eccleſiaſtical privileges, that had been introduced during his own reign; nor to hinder appeals to the pope; but content himſelf with exacting ſufficient ſecurity from thoſe who left his dominions, that they ſhould attempt nothing againſt the rights of his crown and kingdom. Thus Henry, by a maſter-ſtroke of policy, extricated himſelf from the moſt difficult ſituation on the eaſieſt terms. For notwithſtanding his promiſe, he had it always in his power to prevent appeals to Rome, by demanding ſuch ſecurities as the parties could not procure. And becauſe the conſtitutions of Clarendon were nothing more than the ancient cuſtoms of the kingdom, they were ſtill in force.

A. D. 1172. Henry having now no enemy to fear, reſumed the ſcheme he had ſome years ſince formed for the conqueſt of Ireland. Adrian IV. who at that time filled the papal chair, deſirous of augmenting the powers and revenues of the holy ſee, encouraged Henry to purſue the plan he had formed, and granted him a bull with ample privileges. The reader will not, perhaps, be diſpleaſed to ſee this curious inſtrument at large, as it affords a convincing proof, that the popes of Rome, even in theſe early times, uſurped the power of conferring kingdoms and ſtates on whom they pleaſed.

" ADRIAN ſervant of the ſervants of God, to his ſon in Chriſt Jeſus, Henry king of England, ſends greeting and apoſtolical benediction.

" The deſire your highneſs expreſſed to advance the glory of your name on earth, and to obtain in heaven the prize of eternal happineſs, deſerves commendations. As a good catholic prince you are very careful to enlarge the borders of the church, to ſpread the knowledge of the truth among the barbarous and the ignorant, and to extirpate the weeds of vice in the garden of the Lord, for which you apply to us for countenance and direction. We are confident that your enterprize will be crowned with ſucceſs, becauſe you have undertaken it from the nobleſt motive; for whatever is taken in hand from a principle of faith and religion, is always ſure to ſucceed. It is certain, as you yourſelf acknowledge, that Ireland, as well as all other iſlands that have the happineſs of being enlightened by the ſun of righteouſneſs, and have embraced the doctrines of Chriſtianity, are undoubtedly St. Peter's right, and belong to the juriſdiction of the Roman ſee. We, therefore, think, after mature conſideration, that to ſettle in that iſland colonies of the faithful, will be well-pleaſing to God.

"You have informed us, that you intend to make an expedition into Ireland, to ſubject the iſland to juſt laws, and to extirpate vice, which has long prevailed in that country. You promiſe to pay us, out of every houſe, a yearly acknowledgment of one penny, and to maintain the rights of the church without the leaſt infringement or diminution. Upon theſe conditions, we conſent and allow, that you make a deſcent upon that iſland, to enlarge the bounds of the church, to check the progreſs of immorality, to reform the manners of the inhabitants, and to promote the growth of virtue and the Chriſtian religion. We exhort you to do whatever you ſhall judge neceſſary to advance the honour of God, and the ſalvation of the people, whom we charge to ſubmit to your juriſdiction, and own you for their ſovereign lord; provided always that the rights of the church be inviolably obſerved, and Peter-pence duly paid. If, therefore, you think proper to carry your deſign into execution, labour, above all things, to improve the inhabitants in virtue. Uſe both your own endeavours, and the endeavours of ſuch as you ſhall judge worthy of being employed in this work, that the church of God be more and more enriched, that religion flouriſh in the country; and that the things tending to the honour of God, and the ſalvation of ſouls, be diſpoſed of in ſuch a manner, as may entitle you to an immortal fame upon earth, and an eternal reward in heaven."

Such was the bull granted by Adrian for the conqueſt of Ireland, which had excited the ambition of Henry. There is the greateſt reaſon to believe that Ireland was originally peopled from England; but the Iriſh ſtill remained in the ſtate of ſavages; they were even ignorant of agriculture; no traces of the arts were found among them; they were deſtitute of laws, of manners, and of learning. The iſland was divided into a number of ſmall principalities, each governed by its own prince, but all forming a political confederacy, though they exerciſed perpetual violences againſt each other. They were incapable of making any defence againſt regular forces; but it was no eaſy matter to unite them into one body or nation, and govern them by wholeſome laws. Ferocious by nature, and fond of liberty, they oppoſed every attempt to civilize them; and, like the ancient Britons, when attacked by a ſuperior force, fled to their foreſts, mountains and caverns, for ſafety.

An accident happened about this time, which gave Henry a favourable opportunity of claiming the pretended title he had derived from the bull of Adrian. Dermot, one of the petty kings of Ireland, being driven out of his dominions by a neighbouring chief, whoſe wife he had carried off, applied to the Engliſh monarch for aſſiſtance to recover his territories. Henry liſtened to the Iriſh chief, and empowered him to levy troops in England. He alſo gave a general leave to his ſubjects to aſſiſt the prince in perſon, but declined to embark himſelf in the enterprize. The romantic notions of valour that then prevailed, excited the ambition of ſeveral of the Engliſh barons to aſſiſt the Iriſh prince. Among theſe, Richard, earl of Striguel, ſurnamed Strongbow, called by ſeveral of our hiſtorians Richard earl of Pembroke, was the chief. That nobleman, whoſe ambition was boundleſs, enjoyed ſeveral large eſtates in Wales, where his tenants were numerous, and the ſituation of his territories very convenient for paſſing over into Ireland. Strongbow undertook to aſſiſt the Iriſh chief, on condition of his giving him his daughter in marriage, and leaving him his dominions. Accordingly theſe adventurers, at the head of a ſmall body of troops, landed in Ireland, defeated very numerous armies of the wild Iriſh; and, not content with recovering the territories of Dermot, meditated the reduction of the whole iſland. Jealous of their ſucceſs, and deſirous of acquiring the honour of being the conqueror of Ireland, Henry paſſed over in perſon, at the head of a powerful army; but the Iriſh were already conquered; there remained nothing for him but to receive the ſubmiſſion of a vanquiſhed people. Henry, without the effuſion of a ſingle drop of blood, became maſter of Ireland in leſs time than would have been neceſſary to travel over it. Moſt of the tributary princes attended his court at Dublin, and ſwore allegiance to the Engliſh monarch. The clergy, who had laboured to render their country ſubject to England ever ſince Adrian had iſſued a bull for that purpoſe, met in a general aſſembly at Waterford, where they ſigned their ſubmiſſion, and delivered the inſtruments to Henry, who tranſmitted them to Rome. Alexander, pleaſed with acquiring ſo conſiderable an addition of power and intereſt to the ſee of Rome, readily confirmed the title.

Henry had now reached the pinnacle of human grandeur, and flattered himſelf with enjoying a ſeries of happineſs and tranquillity. He was deceived. His children proved a ſource of the moſt ſevere diſquietude. Henry, his eldeſt ſon, a prince of a very haughty and inſolent temper, was weary of bearing the royal title without authority. He had married Margaret, daughter to Lewis king of France; and the ceremony of his coronation had been repeated, in order that his conſort might be included in the ſolemnity. He had alſo been permitted to pay a viſit to his father-in-law, and continued ſome time at the court of France. Lewis, ever attentive to excite commotions in England, embraced this opportunity of kindling the flames of domeſtic diſcord in the family of Henry. He perſuaded the prince, that in conſequence of the ceremony of the coronation, he was intitled to an immediate poſſeſſion of a part of the dominions of his father. Imperious by nature, and full of this extravagant idea, young Henry returned to England, and demanded from his father, either the kingdom of England, or the dutchy of Normandy. Henry was aſtoniſhed at this unexpected requeſt, and began to fear that his hopes of happineſs were built on a chimerical foundation. He endeavoured to convince his ſon of the extravagance of his demand; and painted in proper colours the folly of a requeſt which could only tend to weaken the power of his family, and, ultimately, his own authority. But his endeavours were in vain: the prince diſcovered the higheſt diſcontent, blended with inſolence, at his father's refuſal; retired to France, and put himſelf under the protection of Lewis, whoſe deſire of leſſening the power of Henry had given riſe to this domeſtic diſcord. But the diſobedience of his eldeſt ſon was not the only misfortune that diſturbed the happineſs of Henry. His queen, Eleanor, carrying her jealouſy of her huſband to extremity, encouraged her two younger ſons, Richard and Geoffrey, to follow the example of their brother, fly to the court of France, and inſiſt upon being put into actual poſſeſſion of the territories aſſigned them by their father.

A. D. 1173. Lewis was not the ſole monarch who dreaded the too great power of Henry. William, king of Scotland, had long beheld it with terror, and trembled for the conſequences. He followed young Henry to France, under pretence of renewing the league that had long continued between the Scottiſh and French nations; but in reality to concert proper meaſures for diſtreſſing the king of England. Several of the moſt powerful barons both in England and Normandy, joined in the unnatural alliance for ſupporting the unreaſonable claim of an undutiful ſon, on the dominions of an indulgent parent. Henry, alarmed at the departure of his ſon, demanded him from the court of France; but received a very inſolent anſwer.

Nothing leſs than the amazing abilities of the Engliſh monarch could have extricated him out of the innumerable difficulties with which he was now ſurrounded. The deſertion of many of his powerful barons gave him reaſon to fear, that his own ſubjects would deſert him in the day of battle; and he was therefore determined to have recourſe to foreign mercenaries for aſſiſtance. He accordingly took twenty thouſand Brabanders, all of them veteran troops, into his pay, and by his liberality attached them firmly to his perſon and fortunes. Theſe Brabanders, ſometimes called Routiers, and Colleraux, were a kind of banditti, or free-booters, who lived upon plunder; they infeſted, at that time, all the ſtates of Europe, defied the cenſures of the church, and engaged in the ſervice of any prince who could pay them punctually. But though they were mercenaries by profeſſion, yet, when well paid, no troops could behave with greater fidelity: and though accuſtomed to plunder, yet, in time of action, they were rigid obſervers of military diſcipline.

Henry had experienced the power of the papal thunder in the cauſe of Becket, and hoped it might have the ſame effect on his rebellious ſons. He was ſenſible, indeed, of the danger attending the interpoſition of eccleſiaſtical authority in civil diſputes; but the alarming conſequences of the unnatural attempts of his own children, induced him to ſacrifice political caution to his own ſafety. He accordingly applied to pope Alexander, who immediately promulgated anathemas againſt young Henry and all his adherents. But the ſpiritual thunder, whoſe effect was irreſiſtible in eccleſiaſtical cauſes, loſt its power when employed in a diſpute merely temporal: the flaming bolts of the vatican fell harmleſs to the ground.

But Henry was far from placing his whole dependence on the ſpiritual arm of the Roman pontiff; his own abilities, and the powerful aſſiſtance of his foreign forces, rendered him ſuperior to all his enemies. His virtues never ſhone with ſo much luſtre as in this alarming criſis. The ſight of impending dangers animated him with freſh courage. Bleſt with the moſt aſtoniſhing preſence of mind, and wholly a ſtranger to fear, he viewed, with the moſt intrepid coolneſs, the many dangers with which he was ſurrounded, and planned the moſt prudent meaſures to render them all abortive. He was perſuaded, and perhaps with reaſon, that Eleanor his queen was the principal cauſe of this domeſtic inſurrection, and accordingly cauſed her to be impriſoned, at the very moment ſhe was endeavouring to make her eſcape.

The operations of the confederated princes begun by Richard, who repaired into Guienne, and excited the greater part of the inhabitants to take up arms againſt his father. Geoffrey ſtirred up a rebellion in Britany, and put himſelf at the head of the inſurgents. Normandy was invaded by the king of France, aſſiſted by the earls of Flanders, Boulogne, and Blois. The Scottiſh monarch led an army into the northern parts of England. And the earl of Leiceſter, landed in Eſſex at the head of a large body of Flemiſh troops, to excite an inſurrection among the Engliſh. The ſoul of Henry now towered above misfortunes. He ſaw his dangers; but was not intimidated. He had taken ſuch precautions in providing for the defence of the frontiers, that the French monarch, after loſing the greater part of his army, was obliged to abandon the enterprize. Ten thouſand Brabanders, ſent by Henry into Britany, defeated the rebels, and obliged them to return to their duty. The army of Leiceſter was routed at St. Edmundſbury in Suffolk, and above ten thouſand Flemings ſlain on the ſpot. Henry advanced at the head of his army againſt the inſurgents in Guienne, retook the places they had ſeized, and obliged them to lay down their arms, and ſubmit to his authority.

A. D. 1174. Henry now haſtened to the defence of his kingdom, which the Scottiſh army threatened with deſolation. He landed at Southampton, and in order to gain the affections of his people, ſubmitted to an act of humiliation, which all the power of the church could not impoſe upon him. He knew the powerful effect of ſuperſtition over the minds of the vulgar; he knew that the ridiculous ſtories of Becket's miracles were firmly believed by a weak and bigotted people; and that he himſelf lay under very ſevere ſuſpicions of being acceſſary to his death; and therefore determined to remove every ſhadow of complaint, by joining in the reigning devotions of the times. He ſet out immediately for Canterbury, and as ſoon as he perceived the cathedral, though three miles diſtant, he alighted from his horſe, and walked barefoot to the tomb of the ſaint; proſtrated himſelf before the ſhrine of Becket, continued the whole day in prayer, and watched all night the holy relicks. When the morning appeared he aſſembled a chapter of the monks, diſrobed himſelf before them, put ſcourges into their hands, and preſented his bare ſhoulders to the diſcipline and laſhes of theſe eccleſiaſtics. He afterwards made a ſolemn proceſſion to all the altars in the cathedral; and, retiring to the ſhrine of the canonized prelate, made an offering of forty pounds per annum to ſupport a number of lamps kept continually burning before his tomb. True devotion is more decent and leſs oſtentatious. Henry was deſirous of acquiring the affections of a ſuperſtitious people, and a ſecret penance, however ſevere, would not have anſwered his purpoſe.

The king had hardly left the cathedral, before advice arrived that a deciſive victory had been obtained over the Scottiſh army, and their king taken priſoner. Such remarkable ſucceſs was immediately attributed to the protection of the ſaint; and this opinion ſpreading through the whole kingdom, tended greatly to ſoften and repreſs the ſpirit of rebellion. Many of his reſtleſs barons were, however, ſtill in arms, and Henry marched immediately to chaſtiſe them, and reſtore that peace to his kingdom which their unnatural rebellion had deſtroyed. He firſt inveſted the caſtle of Framlingham, belonging to Hugh Bigod, one of the moſt powerful of the Engliſh malecontents. Bigod was too well acquainted with the diſpoſition of Henry to attempt defending his fortreſs to extremities; he opened a negotiation, and obtained his pardon on condition of delivering up his caſtles of Framlingham and Bungay. The biſhop of Durham, who had effected an entire independence, delivered up the caſtle of Norham and Alverton. The officers of the earl of Leiceſter followed the biſhop's example; they gave up the caſtles of Montſorrel, Groby and Leiceſter. Mowbray delivered up the caſtle of Thirſk, and the earl of Ferrers thoſe of Stotville and Duſelde.

Such was the iſſue of this unnatural rebellion in England. The whole kingdom, in a few days, from the moſt imminent danger of being loſt to the younger Henry, was reduced under his government. Lewis had laid ſige to Rouen, and was now joined by the earl of Flanders. This reinforcement enabled the French monarch to puſh the ſiege with great vigour; and he flattered himſelf with being able to make himſelf maſter of the place before the arrival of Henry. He was deceived. The garriſon made a noble defence, and Henry landed before Lewis could ſubdue even the outworks. The preſence of the Engliſh monarch ſtruck the enemy with terror, the ſiege was immediately raiſed; and the combined forces fled with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving all their baggage behind them.

A peace now became neceſſary. Henry's three rebellious ſons made their ſubmiſſion, and were received with the indulgence and affection of a parent. All their adherents were pardoned, and large penſions ſettled upon themſelves. William, king of Scotland, gave up the ancient independency of his crown as the price of his liberty: he did homage to Henry as his liege lord; and engaged, that the nobility and prelates of his kingdom ſhould alſo do him homage. The caſtles of Berwick, Roxburgh, Jedburgh, Edinburgh, and Stirling, were delivered up to the Engliſh as ſecurities; and William returned to his own kingdom.

A. D. 1176. Henry now applied himſelf to cultivate the arts of peace, and gain the affection of his Engliſh ſubjects. He ſummoned a general council of the barons and prelates at Northampton. In this aſſembly the laws of Edward the Confeſſor were revived, to the intire ſatisfaction of the people. And in order to carry thoſe laws into execution, he cauſed the kingdom to be divided into ſix parts, and aſſigned to each three itinerant juſtices. Thoſe diviſions differ very little from the circuits ſtill in uſe. Henry alſo reſtored the barons, who had joined his rebellious ſons, to their eſtates. But as he had learned from experience the danger of ſuffering ſo many caſtles to ſubſiſt in the very heart of his kingdom, he ſeized many of them into his own hands, and demoliſhed others. Theſe wiſe regulations eſtabliſhed tranquillity in his kingdom, and afforded him that ſatisfaction which he had ſought in vain from power and grandeur. His people were protected, contented, and happy.

A. D. 1179. While Henry was enjoying the fruits of his labours for the ſervice of his people, Lewis, alarmed at the danger of his ſon, who was ſeized with a violent diſtemper, reſolved to make a pilgrimage to Becket's ſhrine, in order to obtain the interceſſion of that ſaint for the recovery of his ſon. Henry met the French monarch at Dover, and conducted him to Canterbury, where they both paid their devotions at the altar of St. Thomas; and Lewis offered at his tomb a maſſy cup of pure gold, and beſtowed upon the monks a grant of two hundred gallons of wine annually, and freed them from all duties on ſuch goods as they might purchaſe in his dominions. Lewis died ſoon after his return, and was ſucceeded by Philip, an ambitious and politic prince, who took every occaſion to depreſs the power of the Engliſh monarch.

A. D. 1180. Henry was deſtined to experience all the calamities which undutiful children can inflict on an indulgent parent. Young Henry now renewed his pretenſions, again unſheathed the ſword of rebellion againſt his father; and was protected by Philip, who favoured his unnatural deſigns. But while he was preparing to commence hoſtilities, he was ſeized with a violent fever at Martel, a caſtle in the neighbourhood of Limoges. Perceiving himſelf paſt all hopes of recovery, he diſpatched a meſſenger to his father, intreating the favour of a viſit, that he might die with the ſatisfaction of having procured the forgiveneſs of a parent he had ſo groſsly offended. But fearing to truſt himſelf in the power of thoſe about the perſon of his ſon, Henry refuſed to viſit him; but ſent one of his prelates, together with a ring, as a token of his bleſſing and pardon. The biſhop found him tottering on the brink of eternity; and received his dying requeſt, that his father would forgive his undutiful behaviour; that he would pay his knights and attendants their ſalaries; and pardon the barons of Guienne, whom he had excited to rebellion. The biſhop promiſed to relate his requeſts to his father. He faithfully performed his promiſe; but before any anſwer could be returned, the prince paid the debt of nature, on the eleventh of June, in the twenty-eighth year of his age.

Henry was inconſolable for the loſs of his ſon. He fainted thrice, and burſt forth into the moſt exceſſive lamentations of grief and ſorrow. He accuſed himſelf of inhumanity in having refuſed his dying requeſt, in not giving him in perſon that aſſurance of forgiveneſs, which he had only ſent by another hand. The death of this prince, however, ſuſpended for a time the rebellion concerted by the three unnatural brothers; and an event that happened ſoon after, ſeemed to have put a period to Henry's domeſtic miſfortunes.

A. D. 1185. Heraclius, patriarch of Jeruſalem, arrived in England, attended by the grand-maſters of the Knights Templars and Hoſpitalers, on an embaſſy from Baldwin, king of Jeruſalem, to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of Henry againſt the infidels in the Holy Land. The patriarch preſented the Engliſh monarch with the keys of the Holy Sepulchre, and the Tower of David, in token of their deſire of placing the crown of the Holy City on his head. Henry, however, refuſed the offer, but promiſed to aſſiſt the Chriſtians with a large ſupply of money.

A. D. 1187. It was now hoped that the two ſons of Henry, Richard and Geoffrey, had laid aſide their rebellious intentions; but the Engliſh monarch perceived himſelf miſtaken. The former, diſguſted at a deſign formed by his father of ſettling Guienne as an appanage upon John, his youngeſt brother, departed the kingdom, and prepared to ſeize by force the dominions to which he was intitled by his birth. And Geoffrey demanded that Anjou ſhould be annexed to his dutchy of Britany. This demand was abſolutely refuſed by Henry; and Geoffrey repaired immediately to the court of France, to ſollicit aſſiſtance againſt his father. But before Philip had given any anſwer to his requeſt, Geoffrey was killed in a tournament at Paris. That accident delivered Henry from the enterprizes of the moſt vicious of his ſons. Geoffrey was a prince in whom pride, diſſimulation, and perfidy, were equally united. No principle of honour could bind, no precept of religion could reſtrain that headſtrong prince. He was acquainted with every vice, and generally diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of The Child of Perdition.

Soon after the death of Geoffrey, the melancholy news arrived, that the city of Jeruſalem was taken by the valiant and politic Saladine, ſultan of Egypt; and that Guy de Luſignan, the laſt prince that ſwayed the ſceptre of that kingdom, was in the hands of the infidels. This diſmal intelligence rekindled at once the ardour and the enthuſiaſm of the warriors of Europe. Philip and Henry, for a time, ſuſpended their quarrels, and vied with each other in their readineſs to ſuccour Paleſtine. They both took the croſs; and both ordered, that ſuch of their ſubjects as did not chuſe to engage in the cruſade, ſhould pay the tenth part of their revenues and moveable effects to defray the expence of the armament. This impoſt was called "Saladine's tax." The clergy inſiſted that they ought to be excepted, notwithſtanding they were the chief inſtigators of theſe pious enterprizes.

A. D. 1188. But Philip, who was more deſirous of enlarging his own dominions than of recovering Paleſtine, took advantage of a quarrel that happened between Richard, and Raymond, count of Thoulouſe, and led his army into Berry, burnt Mount-Richard, and took ſeveral towns in Auvergne. Henry upbraided him with this flagrant breach of faith. He had not only ſworn to ſuſpend all hoſtilities till the cruſade was over, but alſo to undertake the protection of Henry's foreign dominions. While Richard continued to aſſiſt his father, Philip was every where defeated; and peace again took place between them. But this was of no long continuance. Richard revolted anew againſt his father, did homage to the king of France for the provinces poſſeſſed by Henry on the continent, and received the inveſtiture of them.

The pope, alarmed at the war between theſe two princes, interpoſed his authority, and excommunicated Richard, as the principal cauſe of hindering the cruſade. But this cenſure produced not the expected effect. The king of France told the legates, “that the pope had no right to intermeddle in the affairs of his kingdom, eſpecially as nothing more was intended than the chaſtiſement of a vaſſal who had taken up arms againſt his lord.”

A. D. 1189. Henry now found it impoſſible to defend his Norman dominions againſt the joint efforts of Philip and Richard. He found himſelf abandoned by his friends and ſubjects, and on the point of being ſtripped of his dominions, his crown, and perhaps his life, by the unnatural rebellion of an undutiful ſon. The neutral princes could not behold this inhuman connection without regret. They interpoſed their authority to ſtop the flames of rebellion, and ſheathe the ſword of deſolation. A treaty was accordingly concluded at Azay near Tours; by which it was ſtipulated that Henry ſhould pay twenty thouſand marks to Philip; that all his ſubjects both in England and his tranſmarine dominions, ſhould ſwear fealty to Richard; that thoſe barons who had entered into a confederacy with Richard, ſhould receive an indemnity for their offence; that his own nobles ſhould engage to compel him to obſerve this treaty; and in caſe of his violating it ſhould join Philip and Richard againſt him.

Henry ſigned this humiliating treaty; and to complete his misfortunes, when he demanded a liſt of the barons who were to receive his pardon, he found at the head of them the name of his ſon John, who had always been his favourite, and in whom he had placed the moſt implicit confidence. This ſhock was too great to be ſupported by human nature, already ſtooping under a weight of infirmities, and a ſeries of ill ſucceſs. He broke out into expreſſions of the utmoſt deſpair, curſed the hour of his birth, and laid his irrevocable malediction on his ſons. He retired to Chinon, in all the anguiſh of a forſaken father, where he died of a broken heart on the ſixth of July, two days after he had ſigned the treaty of Azay, in the fifty-ſeventh year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign.

Henry was endowed with many virtues, but they were allayed with many faults. His genius was piercing, and his learning, conſidering the age in which he lived, uncommon. His judgment was ſolid, and his memory remarkably tenacious. He was prudent in council, moderate in proſperity, firm in adverſity. He was the moſt conſummate general of his age, and always collected amidſt the greateſt dangers. He was a generous enemy, a wiſe legiſlator, a faithful friend. His religion was that of the pious and ſenſible chriſtian. The princes of Europe entertained ſo high an idea of his ſtrict regard for juſtice, that the kings of Caſtile and Navarre ſubmitted their differences to his deciſion; and the ſentence he pronounced was revered by both parties. He was temperate, good-natured, and the politeſt prince of his age. But he was ambitious, violent and haughty. His paſſion for women awakened the jealouſy of his queen, and proved the ſource of thoſe numerous calamities which diſturbed the latter part of his reign, and embittered his domeſtic happineſs. But notwithſtanding all his faults and all his misfortunes, he is juſtly placed in the firſt claſs among the kings of England. His virtues were beneficial to his ſubjects, his vices pernicious only to himſelf. He was at once the king, the prieſt, and the father of his people.

He enacted many wholeſome laws for ſecuring the peace and promoting the happineſs of his ſubjects; thoſe againſt murder, robbery, falſe coining, and the burning of houſes, were remarkably ſevere; becauſe their conſequences were highly pernicious; and experience had ſufficiently ſhewn, that pecuniary commutations for crimes were ineffectual to anſwer the purpoſe intended. He did not, indeed, aboliſh the ordeal and ſingle combat, becauſe the people were ſtill ignorant and ſuperſtitious; but he admitted either of the parties to challenge a trial by a jury of twelve freeholders. It is aſſerted, that from the beginning of his reign till his diſpute with Becket, no leſs than an hundred aſſaſſinations were committed with impunity by eccleſiaſtics. It was therefore abſolutely neceſſary to aboliſh their immunities, in order to preſerve the lives of the innocent. The conſtitutions of Clarendon were calculated to remove this egregious enormity. The clergy were ſubjected to a trial before a civil magiſtrate; and the murderers of clergymen, beſides the common puniſhment, were ſubjected to the forfeiture of their eſtates, and the confiſcation of their goods and chattels. Before theſe laws were enacted, the clergy were equally expoſed to the ſwords of the laity; penances and ſubmiſſion only formed the puniſhment inflicted on the aſſaſſin of an eccleſiaſtic. Hence the murderers of Becket, after making a pilgrimage to Rome and performing the penances required, were acquitted of their crime. The conſtitutions of Clarendon, therefore, were calculated to protect and promote the happineſs both of the clergy and laity.

RICHARD I. ſurnamed Coeur de Lion.

A. D. 1189. The death of Henry put the undutiful Richard in poſſeſſion of that crown he had endeavoured to obtain by an unnatural rebellion. But Richard, though of a furious and headſtrong diſpoſition, was no ſtranger to the ſoft whiſpers of humanity. At the firſt ſight of the dead body of the late king, he felt the whole force of the ſtings of a guilty conſcience, and exclaimed that he had been the murderer of his father. He viewed with horror his baſe and unnatural conduct; and ſaw in a very different point of light the ſervices of his pretended friends, who had inſtigated him to draw the ſword of rebellion, and lift his hand againſt the life of the moſt indulgent parent. He diſcharged them from his ſervices, and, inſtead of the recompences they expected, he loaded them with reproaches. He deſpiſed the courtiers who had baſely deſerted the intereſt of their maſter, and gave his confidence to thoſe who had ſerved his father with zeal and fidelity. It would have been happy for himſelf and happy for his people, had theſe prudent meaſures flowed entirely from wiſdom or virtue. But it ſoon appeared, that Richard was governed by the ſallies of paſſion: his conduct was founded on no ſettled principles; he formed no regular plan for the government of his people. One of his firſt acts of regal power, was the releaſing his mother from her confinement, and beſtowing on her the adminiſtration of affairs in England during his abſence. He remembered not the unnatural part ſhe had acted in arming children againſt their father, and ſacrificing the lives of thouſands at the altar of jealouſy.

Eleanor, however, exerted all her authority in favour of Richard; ſhe ſecured for him the oaths of allegiance from all the orders of the ſtate; ſo that on his arrival, nothing remained but to have them renewed and ratified. This was accordingly done on the third of September, when he was ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter by Baldwin, archbiſhop of Canterbury.

The ceremony, which was prodigiouſly magnificent, occaſioned a ſcene of deteſtable barbarity. The expeditions to the Holy Land, and the cruelties inflicted on the Chriſtians by the Infidels, had filled the minds of the people with a kind of enthuſiaſtic madneſs. Whatever had even the moſt remote connection with this ſpiritual warfare, was ſufficient to ſet the whole nation in a flame. The Jews had long been a deſpiſed people, and the ſufferings of the Chriſtians at Jeruſalem now raiſed the hatred of the people againſt them to the higheſt pitch. Richard knew this, and prudently iſſued a proclamation, forbidding any of them to appear at Weſtminſter during the ceremony of the coronation. That deſpiſed people had long endeavoured, by their aſſiduous application to traffick, to compenſate for the infamy with which they were treated. But their riches, inſtead of procuring them favour, excited the avarice, as much as their religion did the fury of the people. Deſirous of obtaining the protection of the new monarch, the Hebrews collected among themſelves a very conſiderable ſum of money, which they were deſirous of preſenting to Richard on the day of his coronation. Several of the moſt eminent among them were accordingly ſelected; and, thinking their buſineſs a ſufficient exemption from the general prohibition, waited at the gates of Weſtminſter-hall to tender him their preſent, and their compliments of congratulation. The ſight of theſe Jews, and their diſregard of the royal mandate, awakened in the people all the fury of reſentment. A tumult was immediately excited, and the poor defenceleſs Hebrews torn in pieces by the populace. But this ſacrifice was far from ſatisfying the fury of the multitude; they entered the city, and maſſacred all the Jews that fell into their hands, plundered their houſes, and laid them in aſhes. The conflagration and carnage continued the whole night, notwithſtanding all the endeavours of the chief juſticiary to appeaſe the tumult. Several thouſands of that unfortunate people fell a ſacrifice to the blind enthuſiaſtic fury of a bigotted populace.

Richard was highly incenſed againſt the authors of this inhuman tragedy. He cauſed ſeveral of the principal leaders of the tumult to be put to death, as a warning and terror to others. He alſo publiſhed an edict, ſtrictly forbidding any inſult to be offered to the Jews, whom he declared to be under his immediate protection.

Richard had always, during the life of his father, expreſſed the utmoſt jealouſy of his brother John, whom he conſidered as a very dangerous rival. But either this paſſion was now totally annihilated, or abſorbed in political conſiderations; for immediately after his coronation, he laviſhed his favours on a brother who deſerved not his confidence. He granted him the eſtate of William Pepperel, the caſtles of Marlborough, Luggerſhal, Le Pec, Balſover, Lancaſter, Nottingham, Tikhill, and Wallingford, with all the honours and foreſts annexed to them. Nor were theſe thought ſufficient by the imprudent Richard; he gave him alſo the earldoms of Cornwall, Devon, Dorſet, Somerſet, Nottingham, Derby, Lancaſter, and Glouceſter. This generoſity was at once profuſe and dangerous. But his zeal againſt the infidels opened another, and more fruitful ſource of misfortunes.

Richard had, ſome time ſince, taken the croſs from the hands of the archbiſhop of Tours, and was now determined to make an expedition to the Holy Land in perſon. He was, indeed, more a ſoldier than a devotee; and, to gratify his paſſion for military glory, and gather laurels in the fields of Paleſtine, he ſcrupled not to ſacrifice at once the intereſt of his crown and the welfare of his people. His whole attention was now engroſſed with forming ſchemes for raiſing money to defray the neceſſary expences of the expedition. He had already ſeized upon his father's treaſures; and the biſhop of Ely happening to die without a will, Richard confiſcated his eſtate, which was very conſiderable. He exacted the moſt rigorous impoſts from the people; he expoſed the crown lands to ſale; and even diſpoſed of the great ſeal of England to William Longchamp, his firſt miniſter. Ralph de Glenville, chief juſticiary, expoſtulated with Richard on theſe proceedings, at once ſo derogatory to his own dignity, and oppreſſive to the ſubject. The king replied, "That he would ſell the city of London itſelf, if he could find a purchaſer." This anſwer ſhocked the upright juſticiary; he was alarmed for his country, and remonſtrated freely with the king on the conſequences that muſt attend ſuch precipitate meaſures. But Richard was not patient of admonition; he ſo highly reſented the liberty taken by the juſticiary, that he deprived him of his poſt, and committed him to priſon; nor would he ſuffer him to be releaſed, till he purchaſed his freedom at the price of the fifteen thouſand pounds. At the ſame time, he ſold the poſt of juſticiary to the biſhop of Durham for a thouſand marks. He obtained a bull from pope Clement, empowering him to diſcharge from the cruſade all who were unable to undertake the expedition; and excuſe others who were unwilling to undergo the fatigues, on paying a proportional ſum of money. The king of Scotland purchaſed, for ten thouſand marks, his right of ſuperiority over that kingdom, together with the important fortreſſes of Roxburgh and Berwick; acquiſitions of the greateſt conſequence ever made by his father. By theſe iniquitous proceedings he acquired a prodigious ſum, amounting, on a moderate computation, to ſeven millions and a half of our preſent money.

While Richard was accumulating treaſures to defray the expences of the expedition, the clergy were zealouſly labouring to procure him ſoldiers. The pulpits reſounded with the great merit of ſerving in the holy war. The confeſſors enjoined no penances but what tended to promote the grand deſign of recovering Paleſtine out of the hands of the infidels, and freeing the Chriſtians in that country from the dreadful burdens laid upon them by the declared enemies of the goſpel. The people were fired with enthuſiaſm; the army ſoon became numerous; nor was there an officer or common ſoldier but what furniſhed himſelf with common neceſſaries, either from his own ſtock, or by the aſſiſtance of his friends.

The ſame caprice and unaccountable ſpirit of deſpotiſm that had directed Richard in amaſſing treaſure, directed him alſo in the choice of perſons to conduct the adminiſtration of affairs during his abſence. He conſulted not his council, nor liſtened to the voice of the people. Longchamp, biſhop of Ely, and Pudſey, biſhop of Durham, were conſtituted regents of the kingdom. The former was a Norman of mean extraction, of a dangerous character; and being inveſted with a legantine commiſſion, he ſeemed to be armed with authority for the deſtruction of England. Four of the principal barons of the kingdom were appointed their aſſiſtants and counſellors in the adminiſtration.

A.D. 1190. Having thus provided for the ſafety of his kingdom, Richard paſſed over to the continent, and met Philip of France at Gue de St. Remi. Here the two princes ſwore mutually to maintain an uninterrupted peace; and defend each other's territories, in caſe either ſhould be attacked by any other power. It was alſo agreed between them, that in caſe either of them died during the cruſade, the other was to ſucceed to the command of his army, and become maſter of his treaſures, in order to carry on the war with ſucceſs againſt the infidels.

While Richard was engaged in ſettling the neceſſary articles with Philip, Longchamp was employed in raiſing farther aids for his maſter; who was hardly departed the kingdom, before the Jews were threatened with a general maſſacre. Mad with enthuſiaſm, and exaſperated at the cruelties exerciſed on the Chriſtians in Paleſtine, the people were perſuaded it was a meritorious act to extirpate every perſon who refuſed to believe the doctrines of the goſpel. Reaſon and humanity pleaded in vain; the unfortunate Hebrews were deſtined to deſtruction. The maſſacre began at Lynn, where theſe diſtreſſed people were murdered, and their houſes burnt to the ground. A ſimilar fate attended thoſe who reſided at Stamford, Norwich, St. Edmundſbury, and Lincoln. But the moſt bloody perſecution raged at York, where five hundred men, beſides women and children, fell a ſacrifice to the barbarous fury of religious zeal. The deſpiſed Hebrews, dreading the fate of their brethren, prevailed upon the governor to admit them into the caſtle; hoping, by that means, to avert the ſtorm of popular fury, which threatened their deſtruction. They were fatally deceived: the bigotted multitude ſurrounded the caſtle, and attacked the works with the utmoſt violence. The Jews offered to purchaſe the liberty of retiring at the price of all their riches; but they pleaded in vain! the ear of bigotry was deaf to the voice of compaſſion. Driven to deſpair, and finding it impoſſible to defend the place againſt ſuch multitudes of enemies, they murdered their wives and children; and after throwing the dead bodies over the walls upon the populace, they ſet fire to the houſes, and periſhed in the flames. Longchamp made a ſtrict but fruitleſs inquiry after the authors of this horrid tumult. The laws wanted power to curb the licentiouſneſs of a ſuperſtitious people.

The two princes, Philip and Richard, now embarked for the Holy Land; the former at Genoa, and the latter at Marſeilles. They met at Meſſina, where contrary winds, and other accidents, detained them ſeveral months. Here thoſe feuds and animoſities firſt broke out, which ultimately defeated the principal deſign of the expedition. It was not, indeed, reaſonable to expect, that two kings, in the flower of youth, haughty and violent, ambitious, valiant, competitors in power, and rivals in honour, would long continue to act in concert, and ſacrifice their own paſſions to the intereſt of the cruſade. Could this, indeed, have been effected, the intention had been anſwered, and the Holy Land intirely recovered from the infidels. But it ſoon appeared that a mutual harmony was not to be expected; the torch of diſcord was lighted up by the hand of jealouſy, and threatened both armies with deſtruction. Philip could not behold, without envy, the forces of his vaſſal ſo much ſuperior to his own. The power of Richard filled the breaſt of Philip with malignity.

Tancred, the king, or rather tyrant, of Sicily, trembled for his dominions. He knew that his deſpotic adminiſtration had excited the hatred of his people, and dreaded the conſequences of their putting themſelves under the protection of either of theſe powerful princes. He therefore determined to ſow the ſeeds of animoſity between them; and prevent, by their diſcords, any application being made by the Sicilians. Richard had long been affianced to Alice, the ſiſter of Philip; and the princeſs had been ſent, when very young, to the court of England. The conſummation of this marriage, which had been delayed on various pretences, had furniſhed Philip with reaſons for quarrelling with Henry II. but now ſeemed to be forgotten. Tancred revived the contention, by inſinuating to Philip, that his honour was concerned in the marriage of his ſiſter, and that there was room ſufficient to ſuſpect the ſincerity of Richard. Philip, alarmed at the ſuggeſtions of Tancred, immediately demanded that Richard ſhould conſummate the nuptials; but the Engliſh monarch furniſhed proofs that Alice had been with child by Henry. Philip was amazed; but thought it more prudent to bury in ſilence the diſhonour of his family, than inſiſt any farther on the performance of his rival's engagement. Richard ſoon after married the princeſs Berengara, daughter to Sanchez, king of Navarre, and carried her with him to Paleſtine. Queen Eleanor conducted the princeſs to Meſſina, and gave her ſon a faithful account of the ſtate of affairs in England. Longchamp, diſdaining to have a colleague of equal authority, had thrown the biſhop of Durham into priſon, and governed the nation by his ſole authority, and with all the ſtate and tyranny of a deſpotic monarch. The king was now convinced of his error, in appointing a perſon of ſuch mean extraction to direct the affairs of government. He ſigned a charter, appointing a council, without whoſe concurrence Longchamp was not to act. This charter Richard ſent to England by the archbiſhop of Rouen and the earl of Striguel. But Longchamp was ſo confirmed in his power, that it was thought proper to conceal, for ſome time, the charter of Richard; John, the king's brother, only was informed of this commiſſion.

An event, however, ſoon happened, which exaſperated the nobility, clergy and people, againſt this imperious churchman. Geoffrey, the king's natural brother, had, ſome time before Richard's departure for the Holy Land, been elected into the ſee of York; but ſome diſputes ariſing between them, Geoffrey had promiſed his brother not to reſide in England during his abſence in Paleſtine. Queen Eleanor, however, having procured a diſpenſation of his promiſe, Geoffrey paſſed over into England to take poſſeſſion of his ſee. Longchamp ordered him to be arreſted; but the archbiſhop having received intelligence of his deſign, fled to the monaſtery of St. Martin, and took ſanctuary in the church. The regent's officers paid no regard to the ſanctity of the place; they dragged him from the altar in his ſacerdotal robes, and committed him to Dover caſtle.

This tyrannical proceeding excited the deteſtation of all ranks of people. The clergy were particularly alarmed. The biſhop of Lincoln excommunicated all concerned in this ſacrilegious violence, and the ſentence was confirmed in a general convocation held at Reading. The biſhops even threatened the kingdom with an interdict, if Geoffrey was not immediately releaſed. The regent was now ſufficiently alarmed, and Geoffrey was ſet at liberty. But this was not ſufficient: it was determined to put a final period to the deſpotic adminiſtration of Longchamp. A general aſſembly of the nobles and prelates was accordingly aſſembled, where the king's charter was read, and the legate ſummoned to attend. He promiſed to aſſiſt at the conference; but conſcious that his actions would not bear inſpection, he fled to London, and ſhut himſelf up in the Tower. He ſoon found that it would be impoſſible to defend the fortreſs any length of time, and therefore ſubmitted to appear before the great council of the nation, where he was deprived of his poſts; and finding himſelf deſerted by thoſe who had baſked in the ſunſhine of his greatneſs, he paſſed over to the continent, in order to apply to the pope for redreſs. The great ſeal of England was given to Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, a perſon of great prudence, modeſty and integrity. He always conſulted his colleagues in the affairs of government; and, by his prudent management, reſtored peace and tranquillity to the kingdom.

When Eleanor departed from Sicily, the two princes made preparations for paſſing into Paleſtine. The emperor Frederic had left Germany ſome time before the kings of France and England were ready to embark; and paſſed into Aſia, at the head of an army of one hundred and fifty thouſand men. He obtained two victories over the ſultan of Cogni; but bathing himſelf in the river Cydnus, when in a profuſe ſweat, he was ſeized with a violent fever, and died a few days after. This misfortune rendered his conqueſts of no advantage to the Chriſtians.

His victories muſt, however, have been dearly purchaſed; for at the death of the emperor, when the command devolved upon Conrade, his ſon, the army was diminiſhed to eight thouſand fighting men. During two years, theſe troops, joined with the Chriſtians of Aſia, had been employed in the ſiege of Acre; but the city receiving continual ſuccours by ſea, and the army of Saladine haraſſing the beſiegers by land, very little hopes remained of their becoming maſters of the city, or even of being able to ſupport themſelves againſt the attacks of the enemy. Repeated diſpatches were therefore ſent to Meſſina, imploring the aſſiſtance of Philip and Richard. The former embarked his forces, and ſailed immediately to the relief of the Chriſtian army before Acre; but the latter continued ſome time longer in Sicily, waiting for expreſſes from England.

Richard left Meſſina on the tenth of April, with a fleet of one hundred and fifty large ſhips, and fifty-three gallies, and directed his courſe towards Acre. But before he could reach the coaſt of Syria, a dreadful ſtorm aroſe, which ſeparated his fleet, and ſtranded three of his largeſt ſhips on the iſland of Cyprus. Iſaac, the emperor, or tyrant of that iſland, though a profeſſor of the Chriſtian religion, was ſo far from aſſiſting theſe diſtreſſed ſoldiers, who were paſſing into Aſia, to defend the perſecuted followers of their common Maſter, that he uſed them in a very cruel manner, and committed them to priſon. Exaſperated at this ungenerous treatment, Richard, who had taken ſhelter in the harbours of Candia, ſent a meſſenger to the tyrant, demanding that his ſubjects ſhould be ſet at liberty, and their effects reſtored. But Iſaac, inſtead of complying with ſo reaſonable a demand, returned an inſolent anſwer. Richard immediately ſailed to Cyprus, landed his forces, and totally routed the tyrant's army. Iſaac, whom a ſingle ſtroke of adverſity humbled in the duſt, laid his crown at the feet of Richard, who ſent him, in ſilver chains, to Tripoli; and Richard was placed, by the general conſent of the people, on the throne of Cyprus.

The Engliſh monarch, however, ſtaid no longer in the iſland than was neceſſary to ſecure his new conqueſt. He embarked his forces, and ſailed for Paleſtine. In his paſſage, he took a very large ſhip belonging to Saladine, having on board proviſions and military ſtores for the garriſon of Acre, together with a reinforcement of fifteen hundred men. The loſs of this ſhip was of the moſt fatal conſequence to the Infidels, who were now driven to deſpair; while the appearance of the Engliſh fleet inſpired the Chriſtian army with the ſincereſt joy. The military operations, which had languiſhed for ſome time, were now revived with double fury; the moſt amazing acts of valour were every day performed, and the beſieged ſoon reduced to the utmoſt extremity. Saladine, finding it impoſſible to ſuccour the city, gave the garriſon leave to ſurrender. The articles of capitulation were accordingly ſigned, and the city delivered up to the cruſaders, together with five hundred Chriſtian captives.

Elated with this ſucceſs, the two leaders formed the deſign of marching directly to Jeruſalem, in order to wreſt that city out of the hands of the Infidels. Every thing was ready for the march of the army, and the hopes of the cruſaders were raiſed to the higheſt pitch, when a diſſention aroſe between the two chiefs, and fruſtrated all thoſe pleaſing expectations. The prodigious valour of Richard during the ſiege of Acre, his liberality to the ſoldiers, and the magnificence he diſplayed on every occaſion, procured the hearts of the cruſaders, and filled the breaſt of Philip with malignant jealouſy. He, however, concealed his paſſion, till a diſpute, which now happened between Guy of Luſignan, and Conrade, marquis of Montferrat, relative to the crown of Jeruſalem, gave him an opportunity of expreſſing his reſentment. Richard eſpouſed the pretenſions of the former, and Philip thoſe of the latter. During this conteſt, which, in reality, had nothing more than an empty title for its object, ſeveral ſharp meſſages paſſed between them; and Richard complained that Philip obſtructed the progreſs of the confederate army; adding, that he was ready to ſacrifice every perſonal conſideration to the intereſt of the cauſe they had undertaken to ſupport at ſuch immenſe expence.

Philip was now determined to abandon the enterprize; but aſhamed to avow his real motives, had recourſe to artifice and deception. He pretended, that the climate of Paleſtine did not agree with his conſtitution, and therefore deſired Richard would permit him to return. The moſt ſolemn promiſe having been made between them not to abandon the expedition without their joint conſent; Richard, after exacting from him the moſt dreadful oath, that he would not attempt any thing againſt his dominions, but, on the contrary, protect and defend them to the utmoſt of his power, conſented to his departure, and even furniſhed him with two of his beſt ſhips for carrying that prince and his retinue to Europe.

Philip left the command of his army to the duke of Burgundy; and after giving him public orders to pay the ſame obedience to the king of England as to himſelf, he ſailed for his own dominions, which he ought not, perhaps, to have left, but to which he certainly ought not to have returned without bringing with him new acquiſitions of glory. Nor was Philip the only perſon who deſerted the enterprize; multitudes followed his example; ſo that the numerous army of the Chriſtians was very greatly reduced.

Richard now remained the undiſputed maſter of the field of honour, and determined to attempt ſome enterprize worthy the name of the leader of the Chriſtian armies. He accordingly made a general attack upon Saladine's camp; but met with ſo noble a reſiſtance, that he was obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. This check, however, made no change in Richard's reſolutions: that martial ſpirit, which formed his ruling paſſion, ſupported him under every misfortune. He determined to march from Acre to Joppa, and fortify all the places that fell into his hands. Saladine poſted himſelf in the road, at the head of an army of three hundred thouſand men, to oppoſe his paſſage. The martial ſoul of Richard glowed at this opportunity of ſignalizing his courage. He was alſo perſuaded, that by defeating the army of Saladine, he ſhould open to himſelf a free paſſage to Jeruſalem, and, perhaps, make himſelf maſter of that famous city in a ſhort interval of time. Both armies prepared for a general engagement, which was to decide the fate of thouſands, and, poſſibly, of Paleſtine itſelf.

The right wing of the Chriſtian army was commanded by James d'Aveſnes, the left by the duke of Burgundy; while Richard in perſon led the center, or main body. Saladine had concealed part of his troops on the right behind ſome hills, which covered them from the ſight of the Chriſtians. On this body of reſerve he placed his greateſt hopes of victory; and therefore, without altering his poſition, waited the attack of the enemy, who began the action with their right wing. The Saracens ſupported the ſhock with great reſolution; and, by the ſuperiority of their numbers, put that body into great diſorder. Their leader, James d'Aveſnes, was ſlain, in endeavouring to rally his broken troops, and lead them once more againſt the Infidels. The duke of Burgundy, at the head of the left wing, made a furious attack upon the right of the enemy. The Saracens, for ſome time, ſupported themſelves with great reſolution; but on receiving orders from Saladine to retreat as they fought, the duke was deceived, and followed them a conſiderable way beyond the body of the army. Saladine perceiving that his left wing ſtood firm, and that the duke of Burgundy was ſeparated from the reſt of the army, ordered the body that lay concealed behind the hills to move forward. Theſe troops deſcending the eminences in prodigious numbers, ſurrounded the duke's forces, and made a dreadful ſlaughter.

The fate of the Chriſtian army now depended on the valour and conduct of Richard. He had been very ſucceſsful where he had made his attacks; and though he met with a ſtout reſiſtance, had compelled the troops that oppoſed him to retreat in diſorder. He was ſtill purſuing the broken forces, when he was informed of the diſorder of his right wing, and the danger of his left. He immediately gave over the purſuit; and marching to the duke of Burgundy's aſſiſtance, fell upon the victorious troops of Saladine with ſuch impetuoſity, that he ſoon wreſted from them the palm of victory, which they thought they had obtained. Richard, on this occaſion, performed the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour; and thoſe who before were filled with envy, were now ſtruck with admiration. He is ſaid to have met the famous Saladine, and to have diſmounted that celebrated leader, who muſt have fallen into the hands of the Engliſh monarch, had not the Saracens uſed more than common efforts to reſcue him from his dangerous ſituation. But however that be, the valour of Richard entirely changed the fortune of the day, and Saladine was obliged to reinforce his right wing with part of his victorious troops on the left. This motion, which cauſed ſome diſorder in that part of the Saracen army, gave the right wing of the Chriſtians time to recover themſelves; and finding the oppoſition they had before met with to grow weaker and weaker, they quickly rallied; and falling with the utmoſt fury on the Saracen troops that oppoſed them, forced them to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

Richard ſtill maintained the battle on the right with an intrepidity more than human, in ſpite of the vaſt ſuperiority of the enemy, who now directed their whole force againſt the Engliſh monarch. He was, however, in danger of being overpowered by numbers, had not his right wing, meeting with no farther oppoſition, advanced to his aſſiſtance. Finding themſelves attacked in flank by a freſh body of forces, the Saracens began to give way; nor was it in the power of Saladine, though he exerted his utmoſt, to rally them. The Chriſtians took advantage of this diſorder, and preſſed the Saracens with ſo much vigour, that they betook themſelves to flight. Above fifty thouſand of the Infidels were left dead on the field of battle. James d'Aveſnes was the only perſon of diſtinction among the Chriſtians that fell in this memorable engagement.

This defeat ſtruck the Saracens with a panic: they abandoned the maritime cities of Aſcalon, Cæſarea, and Joppa, after demoliſhing the fortifications. Richard marched directly to Joppa, where he ſtaid ſome time to repair the fortifications; that if he ſhould be obliged to retreat, he might have a ſecure port to embark his forces for Europe. While he continued at Joppa, he frequently amuſed himſelf with hunting in the neighbourhood, attended only by a few of his intimate friends. As he was one day returning from the chace, with only ſix perſons in his train, he alighted from his horſe, laid himſelf down under a tree, and fell aſleep. He was, however, ſoon rouſed by the approach of a ſmall party of Saracen horſe, paſſing by the place. Richard immediately mounted his horſe; and as the Saracens were few in number, purſued them to ſome diſtance. The enemy pretended to fly before him, but artfully drew him into an ambuſcade, where he was ſuddenly ſurrounded by a ſquadron of horſe. He defended himſelf for a conſiderable time with great bravery, without the leaſt thought of retreating, notwithſtanding the prodigious diſparity of numbers. But even the valour of Richard would have been exerted in vain, had not one of his attendants, by a remarkable preſence of mind, ſaved him from the impending danger. Four of his attendants were already ſlain, when William Deſpreaux, the only ſurviving friend of Richard, cried out, in the Saracen language, "Hold! "I am the king of England!" Every eye was now directed to Deſpreaux; and thoſe who were engaged with Richard immediately left him, that they might have a ſhare in ſeizing the perſon they imagined to be the Engliſh monarch. This ſtratagem gave Richard an opportunity of eſcaping from the enemy. Deſpreaux did not diſcover himſelf till he came before Saladine; when falling at his feet, he ingenuouſly confeſſed the deception he had made uſe of to ſave his maſter. Saladine commended his fidelity, and treated him with the utmoſt reſpect; but ſenſible that Richard would never ſuffer a perſon who had ſo ſignally aſſiſted him to remain in confinement, demanded ten Saracen emirs in exchange for ſo faithful a ſervant.

Having finiſhed the fortifications of Joppa, Richard began his march towards Jeruſalem, fully determined to wreſt that famous city out of the hands of the Infidels. Saladine drew up his army on the plains of Rama, to oppoſe his paſſage. A ſecond battle enſued, and Saladine was a ſecond time defeated. Nothing now oppoſed his march to Jeruſalem; but the Knights Templars, who were in the intereſt of Philip of France, and therefore envious of the glory which Richard muſt obtain by the conqueſt of the Holy City, perſuaded the Engliſh monarch to lay aſide his deſign till the enſuing ſpring, and take up his winter quarters at Aſcalon. Richard, who ſuſpected not the real motive of the knights, followed their advice, marched directly to Aſcalon, and repaired the fortifications which Saladine's forces had demoliſhed.

A. D. 1192. The diſpute between Guy de Luſignan and Conrade, with regard to the crown of Jeruſalem, was now revived; and the duke of Burgundy refuſed to act any longer in conjunction with the Engliſh. The French troops retired into places of ſafety, and paſſed their time in luxury and indolence. Still deſirous of making himſelf maſter of Jeruſalem, the great object for which the cruſade had been undertaken, Richard put an end to the diſpute, by declaring Conrade king of Jeruſalem. But at the ſame time, he indemnified Guy for the loſs of a nominal, by preſenting him with a real crown. He beſtowed upon him the kingdom of Cyprus. Pleaſed with having obtained the honour he had ſo long deſired, Conrade, who was now at Tyre with his fleets, made preparations for joining the Chriſtian army at Aſcalon. But before he could embark, he was ſtabbed in the ſtreets of that city by two aſſaſſins ſent for that purpoſe by a Saracen prince, generally ſtiled The Old Man of the Mountains. The ſubjects of that chief eſteemed aſſaſſination meritorious, when ſanctified by his mandate: they courted death, were it even in the extremities of Europe, in the execution of his orders. The prince juſtified this cruel proceeding, in a letter he wrote to the duke of Auſtria, ſome time after; and declared, that the marquis fell by the poniards of his ſoldiers, in revenge for his having put to death one of his merchants, whoſe ſhip was forced into Tyre by a ſtorm.

The death of the marquis proved a freſh obſtruction to the progreſs of the Chriſtian army; but his widow being ſoon after married to Henry, count of Champagne, that nobleman was, in her right, declared king of Jeruſalem; and, at his inſtances, the French conſented to join the army of Richard, who immediately marched towards the capital of Paleſtine, which he was determined to beſiege. But juſt as he reached the neighbourhood of that city, he fortunately met the caravan paſſing from Babylon to Jeruſalem. The whole conſiſted of three thouſand camels, and four thouſand mules, loaded with the rich merchandize of the Eaſt, and eſcorted by ten thouſand horſe. The Saracens no ſooner perceived the Chriſtian army than they began to retreat; but Richard, at the head of five thouſand cavalry, attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were put to flight; and the whole caravan fell into the hands of the Chriſtians. Richard, who was equally generous and brave, diſtributed the whole booty, which was of prodigious value, among the ſoldiers.

Soon after this ſucceſsful incident, the army aſcended the neighbouring eminences, from the ſummits of which they had a fair proſpect of the celebrated city of Jeruſalem, and the reduction of which was the great object of all their labour and toil. But when Richard thought himſelf ſure of conqueſt, and of putting a glorious period to the expedition, his hopes were rendered abortive by diviſions among the leaders of the confederated army. It was urged, in a council of war, that the ſcarcity which then reigned in the neighbouring countries, would render it difficult, if not impoſſible, to procure proviſions neceſſary for their ſubſiſtence. Theſe reaſons were far from convincing Richard; he was determined to beſiege the city, which was now almoſt deſtitute of troops, the greater part of the garriſon having been drawn out to reinforce the army of Saladine. The duke of Burgundy perceiving it would be impoſſible to divert Richard from his purpoſe, and envious of the glory which the Engliſh monarch would acquire by the reduction of Jeruſalem, ſeparated his forces from the allied army, and marched directly to Tyre. The duke of Auſtria followed the example of the French general: he abandoned Richard at a time when fortune offered them the palm of victory, and the Saracens, ſhut up within the walls of Jeruſalem, trembled for their liberty.

Richard now ſaw all his hopes of conqueſt vaniſh like the morning cloud. It would have been abſolute madneſs for him to beſiege a city famous for its ſtrength, eſpecially as Saladine, at the head of a numerous army, hovered on the mountains, ready to ſeize the maritime places the moment they were deſerted by the Chriſtians. But the deſire of reducing Jeruſalem was ſtill the darling paſſion of his ſoul. He even ſubmitted to ſollicit the aſſiſtance of the duke of Burgundy, and the king of Jeruſalem himſelf undertook the office of ambaſſador. But every attempt was made in vain. Steady to his purpoſe of depriving Richard of the glory of taking the capital of Paleſtine, he refuſed to join the Chriſtian army, under pretence of his having no authority to expoſe the troops of his maſter in ſuch deſperate ſervice. The Engliſh monarch was therefore obliged to abandon the enterprize, and accordingly marched his army to Acre. But he had hardly reached the neighbourhood of that city, before advice arrived that Saladine had taken Joppa, and was preſſing the ſiege of the caſtle with ſo much fury, that the garriſon muſt ſurrender, unleſs ſpeedily relieved. Richard, who never abandoned his ſoldiers in diſtreſs, ordered his army to march to the relief of Joppa; while he himſelf, at the head of a ſmall body of choſen troops, embarked at Acre, and reached Joppa ſome time before his army. The name of Richard was terrible to the Infidels: he fell immediately on the beſiegers with ſuch irreſiſtible fury, that the Saracens, who were very ſlightly armed for defence, abandoned the enterprize, and retreated to the neighbouring mountains.

But it was impoſſible for valour, however extraordinary, when aſſiſted only by a handful of followers, to defeat the numerous armies of Saladine, and carry their victories to the gates of Jeruſalem. At the ſame time, the enthuſiaſm of the cruſaders began to yield to time and fatigue: they were now more deſirous of viſiting their own country than the capital of Paleſtine; and of forgetting their labours and toil in their native vallies, than repoſing on the top of the hill of Sion. Richard was no ſtranger to their wiſhes, and therefore determined to ſeize this favourable opportunity of concluding a three year's truce with Saladine, on the following conditions: That the ſea-coaſt from Tyre to Joppa ſhould remain in the hands of the Chriſtians, without any moleſtation from the Saracens: That the Chriſtians ſhould have free liberty to go in pilgrimage to the Holy Sepulchre, and be permitted to trade in any part of the Sultan's extenſive dominions.

Saladine, who ſurpaſſed all the princes of the cruſade in humanity and moderation, in ſcience and knowledge, continued faithful to his engagements. He gave an illuſtrious proof, at the taking of Jeruſalem, that he was always attentive to the ſoft whiſpers of compaſſion. He granted to the wife of Luſignan a capitulation ſhe could not hope to obtain. He permitted her to retire wherever ſhe pleaſed, without demanding any ranſom for the Greeks who inhabited the city. On his making his entry into Jeruſalem, many women came and threw themſelves at his feet; ſome begging he would reſtore to them their huſbands; and others, their children or their fathers, who were then his priſoners; and he granted their requeſts with a generoſity of which that part of the world had yet afforded no example. But that generous prince, who had formed the higheſt idea of Richard's military virtues, lived not to ſee the expiration of the truce; he died at Damaſcus juſt before that period arrived, lamented even by the Chriſtians. The laſt action of his life deſerves to be handed down with applauſe to poſterity; it would have ſhone conſpicuous even in a conſtellation of Chriſtian virtues. He ordered his winding-ſheet to be carried through every ſtreet of Damaſcus; while a crier, preceding it, proclaimed with a loud voice, "This is all that remains to the mighty Saladine, the "conqueror of the Eaſt." By his laſt will, he left large charities to be diſtributed to the poor of every denomination: the Chriſtian, the Jew, and the Mahometan, ſhared equally his bounty.

Richard, deſirous of paſſing, with the utmoſt expedition, into England, where his preſence was abſolutely neceſſary to regulate the affairs of government, embarked in a ſingle veſſel, but was unfortunately ſhipwrecked near Aquileia. He knew the danger of croſſing ſo large an extent of territory with his numerous attendants, and therefore diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a pilgrim, intending to travel through Germany, as the ſafeſt way, to his own dominions. But he was unable to conceal himſelf from the piercing eye of curious inquiry. Some German officers, who had ſerved under duke Leopold of Auſtria, at the ſiege of Acre, knew the royal pilgrim, and gave their maſter the pleaſing information. Rejoiced at having it in his power to retaliate the affronts he had received from Richard in the Holy Land, he cauſed him to be ſeized in the night, at Gynacia, a village near Vienna, and ſent in chains to the emperor Henry VI. A Chriſtian prince did not bluſh to load with irons, and confine in a loathſome priſon, the hero of the cruſade.

It has been already mentioned, that Longchamp was obliged to quit the kingdom for his mal-adminiſtration. Practiſed in the paths of vice, and a ſtranger to every ſentiment of juſtice, he exerted all his abilities to excite the reſentment of the Roman pontiff againſt the Engliſh. He repreſented them as a rebellious generation, ready to trample upon the ſpiritual authority of St. Peter's ſucceſſors; and that their proceedings againſt him were nothing more than a prelude of attempts of a much higher nature, the deſtruction of the pontifical dignity. Celeſtine III. who now filled the papal chair, was alarmed for his power. Without making any inquiry into the truth of Longchamp's report, he furniſhed the prelate with letters to the Engliſh biſhops, commanding them to excommunicate prince John, and all who were concerned in the deprivation of the late chancellor. But the people of England no longer trembled at the papal thunder; they had learned to diſtinguiſh between fanaticiſm and a reaſonable ſubmiſſion to the orders of the church: they firmly defended the conſtitution of their country, and the flaming bolt of ſpiritual tyranny was launched in vain.

But this oppoſition, though virtuous in its nature, was excited in defence of a perſon who merited not the care of the Engliſh. John never ſcrupled to trample upon the laws of equity and religion, when impelled by his own intereſt. Ambitious of power, and careleſs of the means by which he attained it, he exerted all his abilities to pave his way to the crown, ſhould any accident happen to his brother during his abſence. He was, indeed, ſenſible that he had no claim either to the ſceptre of England, or the foreign dominions of Richard, while Arthur, duke of Britany, ſon to his elder brother Geoffrey, lived; and therefore had recourſe to every artifice for depriving the legal heir of his juſt rights, and uſurping a throne to which he had no pretenſions. He invited Longchamp, whom he had formerly baniſhed from the kingdom, to return, hoping, that by joining their intereſt, they ſhould be able to diſtreſs an adminiſtration that had ſo nobly defended the liberties of England. Pleaſed with the acquiſition of ſo powerful a protector, the biſhop landed in England, and diſpatched a meſſenger with the news of his arrival. But the miniſtry were not to be intimidated; they informed the prelate, that unleſs he immediately left the kingdom, they would ſeize his perſon as a traitor. Longchamp, whom vice had rendered timorous, waited not the conſequences; he embarked directly, and returned to the continent.

Soon after his departure, the news of Richard's impriſonment reached England, and cauſed a general conſternation. John conſidered it as a very fortunate event, and determined to improve it to his own advantage. He paſſed over into France, and threw himſelf into the arms of Philip, the ſworn enemy of his brother. Queen Eleanor, on the other hand, exerted herſelf in the cauſe of Richard, and conjured the council to take every precaution to prevent the fatal conſequences that might attend this alarming accident.

A. D. 1193. Philip now hoped to be amply revenged on Richard for the indignities he had ſuffered. He revived the calumny, that the marquis of Montferrat was aſſaſſinated by Richard, though it was well known that he fell by the enthuſiaſtic ſubjects of the Old Man of the Mountains. But under this frivolous pretence he perſuaded his vaſſals, that the oaths they had taken not to invade the dominions of a prince engaged in the cruſade, were no longer binding in regard to the king of England. He alſo concluded a treaty with John, who now proved himſelf at once an unnatural brother and a traitor to his country. He ſtipulated to deliver into the hands of Philip a great part of Normandy; and received, in return, the inveſtiture of all Richard's tranſmarine dominions. The title of young Arthur, as well as his own oaths, were forgotten by the ambitious Frenchman. In conſequence of this treaty, Philip invaded Normandy, at the head of a powerful army, made himſelf maſter of ſeveral places, and extended his ravages to the gates of Rouen. But the time of the ſervice of his vaſſals being expired, he concluded a truce with the Engliſh, who ſtipulated to pay him twenty thouſand marks.

While the ſword of perfidy was thus laying waſte the dominions of Richard, that prince himſelf was ſuffering, in a German priſon, every kind of inſult and indignity. A warrior, who, at the head of his army, made even the mighty Saladine tremble, was now treated with contempt by a petty prince of the empire. He was produced before the diet, and accuſed of ſeveral crimes, which had no exiſtence but in the malignant minds of his enemies. He juſtified himſelf with an eloquence that confounded his perſecutors, and covered them with confuſion. He remonſtrated againſt the ungenerous treatment he had met with from thoſe whom he had reſcued from the power of the Infidels before Acre; and complained, that after demonſtrating his zeal in the cauſe of Chriſtianity, he had been confined in a priſon, and experienced a treatment hardly proper for ſlaves, in a country that had expreſſed the utmoſt ardour for the cruſade, and by princes who profeſſed the tenets of the goſpel.

The pope now declared loudly in his favour: he threatened to lay the whole empire under an interdict, if Richard was not releaſed. The princes of the diet were aſhamed of the emperor's conduct; and loudly declared, that they could not ſuffer the Germanic body to be ſtained with the imputation of violating the laws of nature and nations, by detaining in priſon, without any juſt cauſe, the perſon of a great king, who had ſo nobly ventured his life in the cauſe of Chriſtianity. The emperor was alarmed, and offered to ſet Richard at liberty; but demanded one hundred and fifty thouſand marks, about three hundred thouſand pounds of our preſent money, for his ranſom; of which one hundred thouſand were to be paid before he was releaſed from priſon, and hoſtages delivered for the payment of the remainder.

The demand of the emperor was no ſooner known in England, than every method was put in practice for raiſing the enormous ſum. Twenty ſhillings were levied on every knight's fee, and the money already paid into the treaſury applied to purchaſe the liberty of a prince, who had ſo nobly reſiſted the power of the Infidels. The churches and monaſteries melted down their plate; the nobles, biſhops, and abbots, paid a fourth part of their annual revenues, and the parochial clergy a tenth of their tythes. William, king of Scotland, contributed two thouſand marks towards the king's ranſom. The neceſſary ſum being thus raiſed, queen Eleanor, and Walter, archbiſhop of Rouen, paſſed over to the continent, paid the money to the emperor and the duke of Auſtria; and Richard was ſet at liberty, in preſence of the archbiſhops of Mentz and Cologne, and moſt of the German nobility.

A. D. 1194. Fortunately for Richard, he eſcaped the perfidy of the emperor. Ambaſſadors from Philip of France arrived ſoon after his deliverance, offering prodigious advantages, if the emperor would confine the Engliſh monarch one year longer. The baſe ſoul of Henry embraced the offer, and diſpatched meſſengers to arreſt Richard, and bring him back to the Imperial court. But his treacherous deſigns were rendered abortive by the agility of Richard, who embarked at the mouth of the Schelde, and loſt ſight of the German ſhore before the emperor's meſſengers arrived at Antwerp. Philip was aſtoniſhed when he heard that Richard was ſet at liberty; and wrote a letter to John in the following terms: "Take care of yourſelf; the devil is broke looſe."

Richard was received with the utmoſt demonſtrations of joy and affection by his ſubjects. They beheld with rapture a prince who had ſuffered ſuch a dreadful captivity, after ſo nobly defending the cauſe of the Chriſtians, and cauſing the name of an Engliſhman to be revered in nations before unacquainted with the appellation. This endearing behaviour baniſhed from the mind of Richard the idea of all the indignities he had experienced during his impriſonment; all his alarms, his fatigues, and his ſufferings, were buried in oblivion. He ſeemed even deſirous of wiping off the ignominy of his captivity by ordering the ceremony of his coronation to be repeated. He ſoon after declared his intention of making a reſumption of all the crown revenues, and annulling all the contracts he had made before his departure for the Holy Land. He alledged, that the purchaſers had already indemnified themſelves by the profits of the eſtates; that neceſſity had compelled him to make theſe grants; that the money had been ſpent in an expedition favoured both by the clergy and laity; and that therefore it was unjuſt the crown ſhould bear the whole burden. Theſe reaſons were unneceſſary; none diſputed the juſtice of this reſumption. All the purchaſers gave up the poſſeſſions they had obtained from the king, and ſeemed to vie with one another who ſhould be the firſt to make the required ſurrender. A parliament was alſo called at Northampton, where Richard demanded juſtice againſt his brother John, and his principal abettor, Hugh, biſhop of Coventry. They were both cited to appear within forty days, and anſwer the charge exhibited againſt them. They refuſed to obey the ſummons; on which John was attainted of high treaſon; and the prelate ordered to be tried by the biſhops in his ſacerdotal capacity, and in the king's court, as ſheriff of the county.

Theſe tranſactions did not, however, divert the attention of Richard from the reſolution he had formed of taking ample vengeance on Philip for his perfidy. A monarch leſs paſſionate and haughty than Richard could not have been eaſily prevailed upon to pardon ſuch deteſtable conduct. He raiſed a powerful army, and paſſed over into Normandy, vowing to execute the moſt dreadful revenge againſt the faithleſs Philip, who, contrary to the moſt ſolemn oaths, and in defiance of all laws, both human and divine, had invaded his territories, and endeavoured to prolong the time of his captivity. But the hoſtilities between two ſuch powerful monarchs, thoroughly exaſperated againſt each other, produced no memorable events. A few caſtles taken, a few ſtraggling parties ſurpriſed, and a rencounter of horſe, form the principal actions of this campaign. The only action of any conſequence happened at Fretteval, between the French and Engliſh cavalry, when the former were totally routed; and Philip loſt his chartulary, or regiſter of charters, which he always carried with him, containing the ſeveral particulars of the revenues of the prince, a liſt of his vaſſals, and the ſtate of the ſlaves and freemen. This misfortune obliged Philip to make a new regiſter, in which his prerogatives were rather increaſed than diminiſhed. During this war, prince John, who was deſtitute both of honour and integrity, deſerted the king of France, as he had formerly done his brother. Having invited to dinner all the officers of the garriſon of Evreaux, where he commanded, he cauſed them to be maſſacred, put the whole garriſon to the ſword, and delivered up the place to the king of England, of whom he craved pardon for his offences. Queen Eleanor interceded, and the king received him into favour. "I forgive him," ſaid Richard, "and hope to forget his injuries as eaſily "as he will my clemency."

About this time the duke of Auſtria having cruſhed his leg by a fall from his horſe at a tournament, was ſeized with a fever; and finding his end approaching, was ſtruck with remorſe for his cruel behaviour to Richard. An intire reſtitution was not in his power; but he ordered, by his will, that all the Engliſh hoſtages ſhould be ſet at liberty, and the remainder of the king's ranſom remitted. His ſon ſeemed inclined to diſobey the orders of his father; but the clergy interpoſed, and obliged him to perform them.

A. D. 1196. The animoſities which ſubſiſted between Philip and Richard occaſioned a continual ſeries of hoſtilities and truces, which were broken almoſt as ſoon as concluded. They were, indeed, nothing more than neceſſary ceſſations from war, till both princes could recruit their armies. To ſupport theſe military expeditions, Richard was obliged to load the Engliſh with taxes, which excited an univerſal complaint among the people; and the great talents of Hubert, the chief juſticiary, were hardly ſufficient to prevent the general diſcontent from breaking out into open rebellion.

Theſe diſturbances were greatly increaſed by the daily harangues of one William Fitz Oſbert, a perſon of mean birth, and ſtill meaner appearance. He was a lawyer by profeſſion, but pretended to be the advocate of the poor; and in order to render himſelf ſtill more remarkable, he ſuffered his beard to grow to an enormous length, from which circumſtance he acquired the appellation of Longbeard. He was continually exciting the ſpirit of reſentment in the poor againſt the rich, by the moſt inflammatory ſpeeches; pretending there was a colluſion among the great to eaſe themſelves of the load of public taxes, and throw the whole weight on the ſhoulders of the labouring people, who were conſidered in no better light than that of beaſts of burden. Theſe inſinuations produced the deſired effect; the fury of the people was raiſed to a height bordering upon madneſs; and a tumult enſued in St. Paul's church, where ſeveral perſons loſt their lives.

This dangerous inſurrection alarmed the juſticiary, who ordered Longbeard to appear before him; but he was ſo far from obeying the ſummons, that he killed the officer who delivered the citation. The more rational part of his followers were ſtruck with horror at this inhuman action: they abandoned the pretended advocate for the rights of the people, and a few of the loweſt of the rabble only now followed Longbeard. He ſaw the deſertion of the greater part of his audience, but continued, for ſome days, to rob and murder his fellow citizens with great barbarity. It was now time for the government to interpoſe, in order to prevent an open rebellion. A ſtrong party of ſoldiers were accordingly ſent into the city, with ſtrict orders to apprehend the incendiary, dead or alive. The rioters were ſtruck with terror, and retired, with Longbeard at their head, to the church of St. Mary le Bow, where they ſhut themſelves up, hoping that a general inſurrection would be excited in their favour. They were deceived; the citizens ſaw their error, and abandoned the wretch, who had deceived them, to puniſhment. Longbeard, however, refuſed to ſurrender; and being driven from the body of the church, he retreated, at the head of his followers, into the ſteeple, from whence they diſcharged a ſhower of ſtones, darts, and other miſſiles, on the heads of the aſſailants. Unwilling to expoſe the lives of his ſoldiers to the attacks of a company of deſperadoes, the officer cauſed a large quantity of wet ſtraw to be carried into the body of the church, and ſet on fire. The ſmoke effectually put an end to all oppoſition; and the inſurgents, to avoid ſuffocation, ſurrendered at diſcretion. Longbeard was ſentenced to be drawn at a horſe's tail through the principal ſtreets of the city, and afterwards to be hung in chains, with nine of his principal accomplices.

A. D. 1197. The war in Normandy was ſtill carried on with unremitted animoſity, but produced few remarkable events. In one of theſe battles, Peter de Dreux, biſhop of Beauvais, a martial prelate, and couſin-german to the king of France, was taken priſoner. Richard, who hated that prelate, threw him into priſon, and loaded him with irons. The biſhop applied to the pope for redreſs. The pontiff immediately demanded his liberty, calling him his ſon, and inſiſting highly on the privileges of the church. The king ſent the coat of mail, which the biſhop had worn in battle, and which was beſmeared with blood, with the words of Jacob's ſons to their father, "This have we found: know now "whether it be thy ſon's coat or not." The pontiff replied, "That the coat ſent by the king did not "belong to a ſon of the church, but to a ſon of "the camp; and that the priſoner was at Richard's "mercy." The prelate, thus abandoned, was obliged to purchaſe his liberty at the price of ten thouſand marks.

A. D. 1199. Philip finding no advantage could be gained over the Engliſh monarch by arms, and weary of a war which exhauſted his country, applied to pope Innocent III. who then filled the papal chair, to employ his good offices in bringing about a peace with Richard. The pope readily complied with his requeſt; and ſent cardinal Peter into France, to act as mediator between the contending parties. A negotiation was accordingly begun, and a conſiderable progreſs made in a treaty for a durable peace, when the death of Richard put a final period to the labours of the pontiff.

mar, viſcount of Limoges, found a treaſure, containing, beſides money, ſeveral valuable pieces of antiquity. The peaſant delivered the whole to Vidomar, who ſent a part of it to Richard as a preſent. This did not ſatisfy the prince; he claimed the whole, as ſuperior lord of the ſoil; and, at the head of a company of Brabanders, beſieged the count in the caſtle of Chalus. The garriſon offered to ſurrender; but Richard replied, that ſince he had given him the trouble of coming in perſon to beſiege the place, to recover what was properly his own, he would enter the caſtle by force, and hang every one of them upon the walls. The ſame day, Richard, attended only by Marcadee, the leader of the Brabanders, approached the caſtle, to ſurvey the works; when one Bertram de Gourdon diſcharged an arrow from a croſs-bow, which pierced his ſhoulder. Richard, however, gave orders for the aſſault, took the caſtle by ſtorm, and hanged up the whole garriſon, except Bertram, whom he reſerved for a more cruel death. The wound was not, of itſelf, dangerous; but the ſurgeon, by his prepoſterous treatment, rendered it mortal. Richard perceiving his end approaching, ordered Gourdon to be brought into his preſence. "Wretch," ſaid the king, "what have I ever done to you, that you have ſought my life?" "What have you done to me," replied the priſoner with a cool and intrepid air, "you killed my father, and my two brothers, with your own hand, and you intended to hang myſelf. I am now in your power; take your revenge: I ſhall willingly ſubmit to the ſevereſt tortures, provided I can think I have delivered the world from ſo great a tyrant." Richard felt the juſtice of the reply, and ordered Gourdon to be ſet at liberty. But Macardee ſeized the unhappy archer, cauſed him to be flea'd alive, and then hanged. Richard did not long ſurvive the fate of Gourdon: he paid the debt of nature on the ſixth of April, in the tenth year of his reign, and the forty-ſecond of his age. He died without iſſue.

Richard excelled all the princes of his age in heroic valour; nor were his abilities as a general inferior to his courage. Theſe talents form the moſt ſhining part of his character, and procured him the appellation of The Lion-hearted, Coeur de Lion. Military glory was the darling paſſion of his ſoul, and hence his reign became a continual ſcene of oppreſſion and miſfortunes. His character is a compound of remarkable virtues, and remarkable vices. He was open, generous, valiant, and ſincere; but he was revengeful, ambitious, haughty, and cruel. He was at once both meanly avaricious, and idly profuſe. Few princes ever poſſeſſed a greater ſhare of underſtanding, a more ſolid judgment, or a more perſuaſive eloquence; but his headſtrong paſſions too often diverted them to improper objects. His ingratitude and want of filial affection are unpardonable. He was no friend to the ſuperſtitious bigotry of his age; the love of glory carried him into the fields of Paleſtine. He ſaw and deteſted the practices of the greater part of his clergy. Being preſſed by Fulk, a zealous preacher of the cruſades, to abandon his vices, particularly his pride, avarice, and voluptuouſneſs, which he called the king's three favourite daughters, he returned him the following anſwer: "Your counſel is juſt. I give my pride to the Templars, my avarice I beſtow upon the monks, and my voluptuouſneſs I reſign to my prelates." But, with all his faults, he was beloved by the Engliſh, though they ſeverely felt the weight of the taxes neceſſary to ſupport his military expeditions.

JOHN, ſurnamed LACKLAND.

A. D. 1199. JOHN, who obtained the appellation of Lackland becauſe his father left him no inheritance, had made preparations for aſcending the throne during the captivity of his brother; though Richard, before his departure for the Holy Land, had appointed Arthur, ſon to his brother Geoffrey, his ſucceſſor, and who was confeſſedly the lawful heir to the crown. Richard, indeed, afterwards changed his mind, and, by his laſt will, left his ſceptre to his brother John. Poſſibly he imagined, that Arthur, who was only twelve years of age, and wholly a ſtranger to the Engliſh, was incapable of ſupporting his pretenſions againſt the faction of his brother.

Strengthened by the declaration of Richard, John found no difficulty in prevailing on the Engliſh to declare in his favour; but the barons of his tranſmarine dominions ſupported the pretenſions of Arthur, whom they conſidered as their lawful ſovereign, whoſe right his predeceſſor had no power to ſet aſide. Anjou, Maine, and Touraine, declared openly in his favour. But Conſtantia, the mother of Arthur, fearing the barons would not be able to ſupport the title of her ſon againſt the forces of his rival, ſent the prince to Paris, and put him under the protection of Philip. Pleaſed with the opportunity of embarraſſing the affairs of the king of England, Philip declared in favour of the young duke of Britany; garriſoned all his towns and caſtles, and cauſed him to be educated with his own ſon. But being involved in a quarrel with the court of Rome, on the ſubject of his divorce with his queen Inſelburga, he found it neceſſary to agree to an accommodation, and a final period ſeemed to be put to all diſputes.

John was now at liberty to paſs over into England, where he met with no oppoſition; and was crowned at Weſtminſter on the twenty-ſeventh of May, in preſence of a numerous aſſembly of the principal nobility and clergy.

A. D. 1200. But John's vices were alone ſufficient to raiſe him very powerful enemies. He fell in love with Iſabella, daughter and heireſs of Aymar, count of Angouleſme, one of the moſt celebrated beauties of the age. His queen, the heireſs of the Glouceſter family, was ſtill alive; and Iſabella was betrothed to Hugh, earl of Marche. The nuptials, indeed, on account of her tender age, had never been conſummated; but ſhe had, ſome time ſince, been delivered into the hands of that nobleman. So many difficulties ſeemed to form an unſurmountable barrier to John's deſtructive paſſion; but he diſdained to ſubmit to the laws of his country, though founded on the ſolid baſis of virtue. Under pretence of conſanguinity, he procured a divorce from Rome; and perſuaded Aymar to carry off his daughter, whom he ſoon after married. The pope was highly exaſperated at theſe irregular proceedings; but John regarded neither the thunder of the Vatican, nor the reſentment of the injured earl.

A. D. 1201. The art of conciliation was not in the catalogue of John's virtues. He took no care to ſoften the reſentment of the earl of Marche; he conſidered even the moſt diſtant advances towards ſubmiſſion as a diſgrace to royalty. He purſued the ſame imprudent conduct in England, by rigorouſly executing the foreſt-laws, which were thought to be ſufficiently abrogated by the charter of Henry II. The earl of Marche ſaw the miſunderſtanding between

John and his Engliſh ſubjects with pleaſure; and being joined by his brother the count d'Eu, they excited commotions in Poictou and Normandy. John ſummoned an aſſembly of his barons; but they refuſed to attend him into Normandy, unleſs he confirmed their privileges. But the aſſociation was not yet ſufficiently eſtabliſhed for them to ſupport their noble reſolution. The threatenings and power of royalty engaged the greater part of them to ſubmit, and John paſſed over into Normandy at the head of an army more than ſufficient to reduce the inſurgents; but he purſued no prudent methods: he advanced claims that gave univerſal diſcontent: he added daily to the public grievances. The barons complained to the king of France, as ſuperior lord; and that prince inſiſted upon John's doing them juſtice. He promiſed to redreſs all the grievances that were founded on juſtice; but as the juriſprudence of the times permitted that the cauſes in the lord's court might be decided by ſingle combat, John carried with him a number of barons whom he retained as champions to fight with his diſappointed barons. His vaſſals, deſpiſed, offended, and reduced to deſpair, once more applied to Philip; he received their appeal, and began to exert his authority, in order to prevent their oppreſſion. John again promiſed to do them juſtice, and again broke his engagements. This conduct rendered him at once odious and contemptible. His perfidious and puſillanimous meaſures lighted up the torch of war and civil diſcord.

A.D. 1203. Alarmed at the dangerous character of his uncle, young Arthur determined to ſeek ſecurity in an union with Philip and the diſcontented barons. He joined the French army, which had already begun hoſtilities. Philip received him with great affection, gave him his daughter in marriage, and promiſed to ſupport him againſt the king of England. The progreſs of the French forces was remarkably rapid, and John was now deſirous of putting a period to the military operations. But Philip was thoroughly exaſperated, and openly declared that he would not ſheathe the ſword of war, unleſs the king of England would ſubmit to reſign all his tranſmarine dominions to his nephew, the lawful and undoubted heir.

But John was not yet reduced to ſuch humiliating conditions; he determined to defend his territories to the laſt extremity; but ſtill preſſed Philip for an accommodation upon more reaſonable terms. Young Arthur gave ſeveral inſtances of his courage and intrepidity; but he wanted prudence to conduct military expeditions with ſucceſs. He knew that queen Eleanor was a ſworn enemy to his intereſt, and was therefore deſirous of ſecuring her perſon. She reſided in the caſtle of Mirabel, the fortifications of which were in a ruinous condition, and the garriſon too few to make any long reſiſtance. Arthur determined to embrace the firſt opportunity of attacking the caſtle, and being placed by Philip at the head of two hundred knights, he precipitately led his ſmall body of forces againſt Mirabel. The caſtle was taken at the firſt aſſault, but the queen, with the greater part of the garriſon, retired into the tower, and made a gallant defence. The danger of his mother rouſed John from the couch of indolence; he marched at the head of an army of Engliſh and Brabanders, attacked the camp of Arthur, put his army to flight, and took the young prince, together with the earl of Marche, and moſt of the revolted barons, priſoners. The greater part of the captives were ſent over to England, but Arthur was ſhut up in the caſtle of Falaiſe, and afterwards removed to the citadel of Rouen.

John improved not his victory. He retired in triumph into Normandy, and Philip abandoned the ſiege of Arques on his approach. Succeſs is often the deſtruction of the timorous and bloody tyrant; it rendered John the execration of mankind. He was a ſtranger to the gentle feelings of compaſſion, and poſſeſſed not the virtue of magnanimity. He conſidered young Arthur as an eternal bar to his ambition; a perpetual evidence of his treaſonable uſurpation; and imagined that he could never be truly happy till he commenced aſſaſſin. Soon after accounts were received that the young prince was no more, and no one doubted but he fell by the treacherous hand of aſſaſſination. The crime was certain, but ſome dubious circumſtances attended the execution. D'Argentré, in his Hiſt. de Bretagne, gives the following account of the death of prince Arthur. "John, ſays that hiſtorian, leading his nephew after him like a lamb to the ſlaughter, brought him from Rouen to Cherbourg, that the infernal deed might be executed with more privacy. There, late in the evening, followed only by a few friends, he mounted his horſe, and leaving his attendants, ordered the prince to ride on before him. In this manner they paſſed along the ſea-ſide, till a place was diſcovered fit for the bloody purpoſe: it was a high cliff hanging over the ſea. John immediately ſpurred his horſe cloſe to the ſide of that of Arthur, and laying hold of one of the reins of the bridle, ſtabbed the young prince ſeveral times through the body, while the terrified victim cried in vain for mercy. Having finiſhed the infernal deed, he threw the body over the precipice into the ſea." Others ſay that John aſſaſſinated the young prince in the priſon at Rouen, and threw his body into the Seine.

But in whatever manner the horrid action was performed, all Europe juſtly accuſed John of the murder: and fortunately for the inſtruction of all kings it may be ſaid, that this firſt crime was the cauſe of all his misfortunes. The feudal laws, which in other countries had been productive of ſo many diſorders, were in this inſtance attended with a ſignal example of juſtice. Conſtantia, mother of young Arthur, preſented to the court of peers in France, a petition ſigned by all the barons in Britany. The king of England was ordered to make his appearance; and the ſummons was ſerved upon him by the ſerjeant at arms. This accuſed prince ſent a biſhop to demand a ſafe conduct. "Let him come, ſaid that monarch, he ſafely may." "But will he, aſked the biſhop, be ſafe alſo in returning." "Yes, anſwered Philip, if the judgment of his peers will permit." John refuſed to obey, and ſentence was paſſed againſt him. He was declared guilty of felony and parricide; and all his ſeignories and fiefs in France were declared to be forfeited.

Philip immediately prepared to put the ſentence in execution: a more favourable event could not have happened for annexing to the crown of France ſo many conſiderable fiefs, which, during ſeveral centuries, had been diſmembered from it. His vaſſals were in no condition to oppoſe his intention: the inhuman action of John ſilenced all oppoſition, and carried his victorious arms into Normandy. Nor was the hatred which the inhabitants of that dutchy bore to the French of any great conſequence: it formed but a feeble obſtacle to the rapidity of Philip's conqueſts. The count of Alençon deſerted the king of England, and delivered up all the places under his command to the French monarch, who now ſeparated his army. Exaſperated at the deſertion of ſo powerful a vaſſal, John determined to retake Alençon, and immediately inveſted the place. Philip ſaw himſelf expoſed to the diſgrace of ſuffering the capital of his new ally to be wreſted from him. Fortunately a tournament was now held at Gatinois, and the fertile genius of Philip furniſhed him with an expedient for obtaining a powerful aſſiſtance. He repaired to the tournament, and pointed out the plains of Alençon, as the proper field for diſplaying their military talents, and inflicting on a baſe parricide the puniſhment due to his crimes. The knights vowed to chaſtiſe the aſſaſſin, and marched immediately to the relief of the beſieged. John fled at their approach; and never more made any attempt to defend his dominions. He even affected to be unconcerned at the ſucceſs of Philip. "Let him go on," ſaid the the puſillanimous monarch, “I ſhall retake in one “day what has coſt him years to acquire.” John inherited the ſame diſpoſition as all tyrannical and daſtardly princes: he ſuffered himſelf to be ſtripped of his dominions, without making any efforts againſt the enemy.

But though John made no uſe of the temporal, he was deſirous of employing the ſpiritual ſword in his quarrel. Innocent III. whoſe protection he ſollicited, was pleaſed with any opportunity of exerting the authority he had aſſumed over the princes of Europe. He wrote to Philip, commanding him to put a final period to the war, and conclude a peace with the king of England. But Philip nobly oppoſed the tyranny of the pontiff, and diſclaimed the temporal authority he challenged over kings.

A. D. 1204. Richard de Laci, conſtable of Cheſter, and one of the moſt able generals of the age, was of more ſervice to John than the thunder of the Vatican. He defended Chateau Galliard for a whole year, with the greateſt firmneſs and intrepidity. The fortreſs was remarkable for its ſtrength, and Philip was obliged to ſubdue it by famine. The intrepid governor, after having repulſed every attempt, ſupported, with remarkable patience, all the miſeries of famine, was at laſt ſubdued by a ſudden attack in the night-time, and taken priſoner, with his whole garriſon. Philip was charmed with the abilities of Laci; and notwithſtanding he had given him ſo much trouble, treated him with the utmoſt civility. True magnanimity reſpects valour even in any enemy.

A. D. 1205. Philip found little oppoſition in reducing the other towns and fortreſſes of Normandy. The inhabitants of Rouen, indeed, at firſt determined to defend the capital; but finding all reſiſtance would be in vain, they agreed to deliver up the place, provided they were not relieved in thirty days. No ſupply arrived, and the French monarch took poſſeſſion of the city. The other towns followed the example of the capital; and Philip enjoyed the honour of re-annexing to the crown of France one of the fineſt provinces of the kingdom, near three centuries after it had been ceded by Charles the Simple to Rollo the Dane.

John returned to England, covered with diſgrace. He found at firſt ſome relief in the pride of the Engliſh, who were provoked at the inſolence of the French barons, who had dared to paſs ſentence upon their king. But his conduct, which was at once tyrannical and puſillanimous, ſoon convinced them, that the loſſes he had ſuſtained in France were the natural conſequences of his perſonal cowardice. He was now looked upon with contempt; and his barons began to form conſpiracies for reducing within proper limits the exorbitant prerogatives of the crown. Nothing was wanting to complete his misfortunes, but a quarrel with the church, and this he ſoon effected by his imprudence.

Innocent III. who then filled St. Peter's chair, carried the papal uſurpations much higher than any of his predeceſſors. Not contented with endeavouring to extend the authority of the Roman pontiff over all the potentates of Europe, he was ambitious of reducing the eccleſiaſtics themſelves to the ſame degree of ſervitude. He pretended, that the diſpoſal of all benefices juſtly belonged to the ſucceſſors of St. Peter; and that they had a right to employ all the revenues of the church whenever the intereſt of the papal ſee demanded aſſiſtance. The imprudence of the monks of Canterbury ſoon furniſhed him with an opportunity of carrying theſe pretenſions into execution.

A. D. 1206. Theſe monks enjoyed the privilege, on the death of a primate, to name a ſucceſſor; but it was uſual, before they filled an office of ſuch importance, to obtain the king's conſent; and it was alſo generally allowed, that the ſuffragan biſhops had voices in the election. There are, however, times, when the moſt ſacred rights are uſurped by unthinking men, who, in order to promote their own intereſt, make no difficulty of having recourſe to the moſt extraordinary methods. On the death of Hubert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, who paid the debt of nature about the cloſe of the preceding year, the junior monks met clandeſtinely in the night, elected Reginald, their ſub-prior, to the vacant dignity, and placed him on the archiepiſcopal throne. Knowing that this election was not valid, unleſs the pope's conſent could be obtained, they enjoined him ſecrecy, and ſent him immediately to Rome, to be confirmed by the pontiff. Elated with his elevation, Reginald ſuffered his vanity to get the better of his prudence: he endeavoured not to conceal the intention of his journey; ſo that the ſecret was known in England long before he croſſed the Alps. John was highly exaſperated; the monks proteſted againſt the election; and the ſuffragan biſhops aſſerted their privilege. The juniors themſelves, aſhamed of their conduct, and diſguſted at the levity of Reginald, were very deſirous of annulling the election. The chapter was accordingly aſſembled; and John de Gray, biſhop of Norwich, was choſen primate, without one diſſenting voice. Twelve monks were immediately diſpatched to Rome, to ſollicit his confirmation. The opportunity now offered which Innocent had ſo long deſired, and he determined to embrace it. He annulled both elections; and inſiſted, that the monks ſent to his holineſs ſhould elect cardinal Langton into the archiepiſcopal ſee of Canterbury. The monks repreſented, that they had no authority from their convent to make ſuch election; and that it would not only be contrary to all the laws of equity, but alſo to the canons of the church. But Innocent was determined to be obeyed; he liſtened not to the voice of reaſon, and the remonſtrances of the monks were urged in vain. He even threatened them with the terrors of excommunication, if they refuſed to obey his orders, and uſed every menace in his power to terrify them into obedience. One of their number had the courage to perſevere in this oppoſition; the reſt were intimidated, and elected cardinal Langton archbiſhop of Canterbury.

Innocent himſelf, however bigotted to the power of the Roman ſee, could not imagine, but this flagrant uſurpation muſt excite the higheſt reſentment in the court of England; and therefore he wrote a very mollifying letter to John; ſent him a preſent of four golden rings, ſet with precious ſtones, the value of which he endeavoured to enhance, by explaining the many myſteries they implied. He deſired him to obſerve, with the moſt ſerious attention, the form, the matter, and the colour of theſe rings. “The “form,” ſaid the pope, “is round, repreſenting “eternity, which has neither beginning nor end; “and hence you ought to learn your duty of aſpir- “ing from earthly to heavenly objects, from things “temporal to things eternal. The number Four “being a ſquare, denotes ſteadineſs of mind, which “neither proſperity nor adverſity can ſubvert, fixed “for ever on the ſolid baſis of the four cardinal “virtues. The matter, which is gold, the moſt “precious of metals, ſhadows out wiſdom, the moſt “precious of all accompliſhments, and juſtly pre- “ferred by Solomon to riches, power, and all ex- “terior attainments. The blue colour of the eme- “rald repreſents Faith; the verdure of the ſapphire, “Hope; the redneſs of the ruby, Charity; the “ſplendor of the topaz, Good Works.”

This explanation, which, in that age, was greatly admired, though it appears extremely ridiculous in our's, produced not the deſired effect. John was enflamed with the utmoſt rage, and threatened the moſt exemplary vengeance againſt all that had been concerned in the late colluſive election. But when he heard that the monks of Canterbury, dreading the vengeance of the court of Rome, were inclined to ſupport the choice, his paſſion knew no bounds. He immediately diſpatched two reſolute knights, whoſe violent tempers were equal to the ferocity of their manners, to expel the monks from their convent. They performed their orders with the greateſt punctuality; the fathers were obliged to ſeek their ſafety in a precipitate flight. They left the knights in full poſſeſſion of their eſtates, their houſes and effects.

Innocent ſaw this violence with a ſecret ſatisfaction; he was perſuaded that by purſuing ſuch violent meaſures, John would ultimately ſink in the conteſt. He followed not his example; he had recourſe to the ſofter arts of perſuaſion, till he found the thunder of the vatican produce the deſired effect. He wrote a very conciliating letter to John, beſeeching him not to oppoſe the determination of his ſpiritual father, who was continually labouring for his eternal happineſs. He deſired him to reflect on the conſequences that attended a ſimilar oppoſition in his father Henry; and begged him not to reſiſt the church of God, nor perſecute any longer, that cauſe for which the holy martyr St. Thomas ſacrificed his life, and who was now ſo juſtly venerated by the people. But John was firm to his purpoſe; and had his principles of reſiſtance been founded on the ſolid baſis of virtue, his behaviour would have merited the higheſt applauſe. But the vices of John had rendered him contemptible; he could not hope to be ſupported by his ſubjects. The pope knew this, and determined to perſevere. He commanded the biſhops of London, Ely, and Worceſter to expoſtulate with him, and if he perſevered in his diſobedience, to threaten the kingdom with an interdict. John was exaſperated almoſt to madneſs at the inſolent behaviour of the pontiff. He ſwore that if the pope preſumed to pronounce the ſentence, he would put out the eyes, and cut off the noſes of all the Roman clergy he could find in his dominions. In vain were all the perſuaſions of the biſhops to mitigate his fury, he wrote a letter to the pope, telling his holineſs, that he looked upon his proceedings as an inſult upon royalty; that his own kingdom furniſhed a ſufficient number of clergymen, eminent at once for their learning and piety, without ſuffering thoſe of a foreign ſeminary to be intruded upon him; that he was determined to maintain the election of the biſhop of Norwich to the utmoſt extremity; and concluded with telling the pontiff, that if he refuſed to do him juſtice in this particular, he would prohibit all commerce between his ſubjects and the Roman ſee; nor ſuffer any appeals to be made to a foreign tribunal.

Innocent, who knew the animoſity which already ſubſiſted between John and his people, was not to be diverted from his purpoſe. He thundered out the dreadful ſentence of interdiction againſt the kingdom. This cenſure had all the requiſites for exciting a popular commotion. The ruin of his people was involved in the puniſhment of the king. The exterior parts of religion ceaſed immediately. The altars were ſtripped of their ornaments: the images, the croſſes, the ſtatues of ſaints, and all the holy relics were laid upon the ground. The churches were ſhut againſt the laity; and divine ſervice was ſuppreſſed. Even the ſacraments were no longer adminiſtered but to dying perſons; nor the dead ſuffered to be buried in conſecrated ground. The ſevereſt penances were commanded, and every pleaſure, every entertainment, ſtrictly forbidden.

In an age of ſuperſtitious bigotry, when the people were thoroughly perſuaded that the pontiff was the true vicegerent of heaven, and that the divine vengeance and indignation were the inevitable conſequences of his ſentence, it is no wonder that the whole nation ſhould be alarmed; and that every perſon in the kingdom ſhould exert all his power to avert ſuch dreadful calamities from the kingdom. But John was not to be moved with tears and ſupplications. He oppoſed with the moſt obſtinate inflexibility, every attempt to remove the ſcourge, and reſtore tranquillity to his dominions. He puniſhed with the utmoſt rigour, all who ſubmitted to the orders of the pope, whether biſhops, monks or ſecular clergy. Some of the eccleſiaſtics, indeed, diſregarded the cenſure of the Roman pontiff. The Ciſtercian order continued to perform divine ſervice publickly; the biſhops of Wincheſter and Norwich followed their examples, and ſeveral of the moſt eminent divines openly preached againſt theſe proceedings, which they called unjuſt and unwarrantable. An exertion of prudent vigour therefore might have diſſipated the tempeſt: but John liſtened not to the voice of reaſon; he followed the dictates of his headſtrong paſſions, which led him to the brink of a precipice that threatened his deſtruction.

The kingdom laboured ſeveral years under this cenſure: but John was ſo far from being reclaimed, that he became more tyrannical than ever: his cruelties increaſed in the ſame proportion with the danger of his government. The clergy were the particular objects of his fury. He ſeized upon their temporalities; he drove them from their monaſteries, and inflicted on them every kind of indignity: he endeavoured to retaliate on them the ſufferings of himſelf and his people. But his deſpotiſm was not confined to the clergy, the laity alſo felt the weight of his oppreſſion. He not only enforced the foreſt laws, which had always excited troubles and diſtreſs, he likewiſe ordered all the mounds of his foreſts to be levelled, that his deer might range at large, to the inexpreſſible diſtreſs of the huſbandmen. But ſo inconſiſtent were the meaſures of this infatuated prince, that even while he had recourſe to theſe violent oppreſſions, he felt the crown totter on his head, and had recourſe to the moſt extraordinary ſtretch of power to enforce the obedience of his barons. He compelled them to give him hoſtages for their good behaviour and fidelity. The greater number complied with this demand; but when the king's meſſengers came to the caſtle of William de Barouſe, a nobleman of great power in the Marches of Wales, his lady replied, "That ſhe would never truſt her ſon to the care of a prince, who had imbrued his hands in the blood of his own nephew." Barouſe, who knew the cruel temper of John, and that the ſarcaſm of his wife would never be pardoned, fled, with his family, into Ireland. But the place of their retreat was ſoon known, and John gave a looſe to his cruelty. The lady and her ſon were ſhut up in priſon, and ſtarved to death. The nobleman himſelf eſcaped to the continent.

A. D. 1211. John had long feared the ſentence of excommunication; and was very deſirous of averting the dreadful ſhaft. He diſpatched the abbot of Beaulieu on an embaſſy to Rome, to effect, if poſſible, a reconciliation with the pontiff. Cardinal Langton was immediately ordered to repair to England; but the propoſals not being equal to what the pope demanded, he broke off the conference abruptly and returned to the continent. Innocent now prepared to launch the dreadful bolt of excommunication againſt John, and to abſolve his ſubjects from their oaths of allegiance. But notwithſtanding the power of Rome, and the cruelties which John had exerciſed on his ſubjects, a few only of the Engliſh biſhops could be prevailed upon to publiſh the ſentence, which, however, produced the deſired effect. The prelate, who dreaded the power and cruelty of the king, ſtole out of the kingdom, and the barons entered into cabals againſt him. This eccleſiaſtical thunderbolt was really terrible, becauſe the pope gave the kingdom of England to Philip of France, a prince who wanted neither power nor inclination to aſſert his claim. The pontiff did more, he promiſed him the remiſſion of all his ſins, if he ſucceeded in the reduction of England. He even granted the ſame indulgences on account of this expedition, as had been given to thoſe who went into Aſia to recover the Holy Land from the infidels. The facinating luſtre of the Engliſh diadem, wholly changed the opinion of Philip. He did not now tell his holineſs, that the pope had no right to give away crowns. His own kingdom had been interdicted ſome years before, and he himſelf excommunicated by this very pope, for attempting to marry another wife. He then aſſerted the independence of his own crown, and declared theſe papal cenſures inſolent and abuſive. He ſeized the temporalities of every eccleſiaſtic in France who had proved himſelf ſo bad a ſubject as to obey the pope: but he thought quite differently, when he ſaw himſelf commiſſioned with the execution of a bull, which was to put England into his poſſeſſion. He took again to his bed that very princeſs, whoſe divorce had been the cauſe of ſo many excommunications, and devoted himſelf intirely to execute the ſentence of the ſee of Rome. He employed a whole year in building one hundred and ſeventy ſhips, and in raiſing and diſciplining the fineſt army ever ſeen in France. The averſion which the Engliſh bore to John might, in regard to Philip, be conſidered as equivalent to another army. But by the perpetual emulation between the Engliſh and French, by the horror the people had conceived againſt the pope's arbitrary proceedings, and by the aſſiſtance of the extenſive prerogatives of the crown, John was enabled to raiſe and keep together, during ſeveral weeks, an army of ſixty thouſand men, at the head of which he advanced towards Dover, to meet the prince who had tried and condemned him in France, and was now coming to dethrone him in England.

A. D. 1213. While all Europe was in the utmoſt expectation of a battle that was to decide the fate of the Engliſh diadem, the pope was forming ſchemes for turning the whole to his own advantage. Pandolf, the pope's legate, who headed the oppoſition againſt John, procured an interview with him at Dover, under pretence of treating with the barons in favour of Philip. He repreſented to the Engliſh monarch all the dangers of his ſituation. "The "French fleet," ſaid the artful Italian, "is ready to "ſail: your troops will certainly deſert you in the "day of battle; they will never fight againſt the "arm of Omnipotence. One reſource only is left, "which is that of ſubmitting yourſelf abſolutely to "the protection of the Holy See." John was now completely humbled; he feared the power of Philip, and dreaded the deſertion of his barons. The advice of Pandolf only promiſed him ſufficient aſſiſtance, and he determined to embrace it. Accordingly he repaired to the prelate, and, in the preſence of four of his principal barons, he promiſed, that he would receive cardinal Langton as primate, that he would make reparation to the clergy, and that he would inſtantly conſign a conſiderable ſum for that purpoſe.

But this was not ſufficient to free John from his preſent embaraſſed ſituation. Philip only waited the legate's return, to embark his forces, and wreſt the ſceptre from his hand: he, therefore, thought it neceſſary to put himſelf and his kingdom under the protection of the pope. Accordingly he repaired to the houſe of the Knights Templars at Dover, where he reſigned the two kingdoms of England and Ireland to the holy ſee, acknowledged himſelf the vaſſal of the pope, and promiſed to pay him an annual tribute of a thouſand marks. It was alſo ſtipulated, that if either he, or any of his ſucceſſors, ſhould ever infringe upon thoſe engagements, he, or they, ſhould forfeit all right to the two crowns. This diſgraceful treaty was followed by the truly humiliating ceremony of homage. The king, unarmed, and on his knees, appeared before Pandolf, ſeated on a throne. In that degrading poſture he ſwore fealty to the pope.

A ſum of money was then put into the legate's hands, as the firſt payment of this tribute; and John himſelf preſented him with the crown and ſceptre. The imperious prieſt, to ſhew his triumph over the fallen monarch, had the inſolence to trample the money under foot. He, indeed, returned the regalia to the king, but not without declaring, in an audible voice, that he muſt conſider it as a particular favour of the Roman ſee. Nor would Pandolf take off the interdict and excommunication, till the exiled clergy had received full ſatisfaction for their loſſes.

Pandolf having executed his ſecret commiſſion in England, paſſed over to the continent, where Philip was waiting for him, every thing being ready for the armament to put to ſea. The legate immediately repaired to the prince's court, and informed him, that he was no longer permitted to make a deſcent upon England, now become a fief of the Roman church; and that John was under the protection of the holy ſee. Philip, at once ſurpriſed and incenſed at this declaration, treated the legate as an impoſtor. He told him, that he had made theſe preparations at an immenſe expence, at the preſſing inſtances of the pope; and therefore, that no contrary orders, nor even all the threats of the Vatican, ſhould now deter him from proſecuting his deſign. He immediately ſummoned a general council, wherein he painted the pope's inſidious proceedings in the moſt glaring colours, and deſired their advice with regard to proſecuting the deſign againſt England. They all expreſſed their abhorrence of the pope's duplicity, and the greater part declared for making the intended deſcent. The earl of Flanders not only diſſented from the general opinion, but declared ſtrongly againſt it. He boldly told Philip, that his expedition againſt England was inconſiſtent with juſtice, and the laws of nations, as none of his anceſtors ever pretended any claim to that kingdom. Exaſperated at this remonſtrance, Philip ordered the earl to quit his dominions, and immediately turned the armament he had raiſed for an expedition into England, againſt Flanders. But William earl of Saliſbury, at the head of an Engliſh fleet fitted out to guard the channel, fell with ſuch fury on the French tranſports, that one hundred of them were ſunk, and three hundred taken. Philip perceiving that the total deſtruction of his ſhips was inevitable, ſet fire to the reſt, as the only method to prevent their falling into the hands of the Engliſh.

John was deſirous of purſuing this advantage over Philip, but his barons refuſed to join the ſtandard of an excommunicated prince. He therefore wrote a very preſſing letter to Langton, beſeeching him to come with all expedition, and give him abſolution; aſſuring him, that he would, to the utmoſt of his power, love, defend, and maintain the church and clergy againſt all their adverſaries; that he would re-eſtabliſh the wholeſome laws of his predeceſſors, particularly thoſe of king Edward; and that he would annul all oppreſſive edicts, and judge every man according to juſtice and equity. The prelate obeyed; and, on the above conditions, gave him abſolution in the cathedral church of Wincheſter, before the principal nobility and clergy of the kingdom.

A. D. 1214. John being now delivered from this vexatious affair, attempted to carry the war into the dominions of Philip; but he wanted both courage and prudence to lead an army againſt an enemy. He beſieged a caſtle near Angiers; but the approach of an army, under the command of prince Lewis, excited all his natural timidity. He raiſed the ſiege with the utmoſt precipitation, leaving behind him all his tents, machines, and baggage. A few days after, advice arrived, that Philip had defeated, at Bovines, the emperor Otho, who had entered France at the head of one hundred and fifty thouſand Germans. This victory eſtabliſhed for ever the reputation of Philip, and put a final period to all John's hopes of conqueſt. He returned to England, covered with diſgrace.

Nor was peace yet eſtabliſhed in England. Though the feudal government, ſince the Norman conqueſt, had ſet bounds to the ſovereign authority, the prerogatives of the crown had been very greatly extended. The Engliſh nobility were now determined to aſſume the ſame privileges which thoſe of ſimilar rank enjoyed in the other kingdoms of Europe. The charter paſſed by Henry I. renewed by Stephen, and confirmed by Henry II. had flattered the people with liberty, without communicating to them any real advantages: the form appeared lovely, but it was deſtitute of ſubſtance. The articles had never been executed on the part of the crown, and the whole was now nearly forgotten. The barons were rouſed from the couch of indolence by the debauchery, the meanneſs, the violence, and the tyranny of John. Both clergy and laity joined in oppoſing the tyrant of their country. Archbiſhop Langton became the head of a faction. The promiſe the king had made at the time he received abſolution, furniſhed the primate with pretences for a revolt. He aſſembled the barons; he produced a charter of Henry I. which he had fortunately found in the library of a monaſtery, and exhorted them to join firmly in inſiſting on a renewal and ſolemn confirmation of that contract of privileges. Pleaſed with the opportunity of ſetting bounds to the royal authority, and of procuring a poſitive declaration of the rights of Engliſhmen, the barons took an oath to adhere firmly to each other; planned meaſures for forcing the king to grant their requeſt, ſhould he be diſpoſed to refuſe it; and agreed to meet at London ſoon after Chriſtmas, to preſent in a body their common petition.

A. D. 1215. They accordingly aſſembled at the capital on the day appointed, and demanded of the king a renewal of Henry's charter, and a confirmation of the laws of Edward the Confeſſor. The king, alarmed at their number, zeal, and unanimity, promiſed to give them a poſitive anſwer at Eaſter. In the mean time he laboured, with the utmoſt aſſiduity, to gain the clergy over to his intereſt, by making them the moſt laviſh conceſſions. He granted them a charter, by which he granted to them the election to all vacant benefices; reſerving only the right of a congé d'elire, and to ſubjoin a confirmation of the election; but declaring, that if either of theſe were delayed, the choice ſhould nevertheleſs be deemed valid. At the ſame time, he implored the aſſiſtance of the pope, and vowed to lead an army into Paleſtine, not doubting but he ſhould receive from the church that protection which ſhe had granted to every prince engaged in thoſe pious expeditions. It was the intereſt of Innocent to protect his vaſſal, in order to ſecure his ſubmiſſion. But the Engliſh clergy, weary with the deſpotiſm of the Roman court, and who regretted the loſs of thoſe privileges which the pontiff treated with contempt, openly profeſſed their zeal for the liberty of the people. This encouraged the barons to proceed with alacrity; and though they expected to have the pope, as well as the king, to contend with, they did not deſpair of ſucceſs; they determined to procure a charter of liberties, or periſh in the glorious attempt.

When the feaſt of Eaſter approached, the king deſired to have a ſchedule of the different articles of their pretenſions. The barons immediately prepared the writing requeſted; and advanced in a body to Brackley, within fifteen miles of Oxford, where the court then reſided, and ſent the ſchedule by the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the earl of Pembroke. The king read the demands of the barons, and burſt into the moſt furious paſſion, aſking, "Why they "did not alſo demand his crown?" Swearing, that he would never grant them liberties which muſt reduce the king to the ſtation of a ſlave.

The primate immediately communicated this anſwer to the diſcontented barons, who immediately elected Robert Fitz-Walter their general, under the title of "The Mareſchal of the army of God, and "of the Holy Church." They ſtaid not for any farther anſwer from John, but immediately began hoſtilities. They publiſhed a proclamation, inviting the reſt of the nobility to join them in this national cauſe. They advanced towards London, and entered the capital without oppoſition. Almoſt all the nobility now joined the ſtandard of the barons; and John was left at Odiham, in Surry, with the poor retinue of only ſeven knights. He made ſeveral attempts to elude the blow. He offered to refer the whole diſpute to the pope, and ſign any charter that his holineſs ſhould approve. This was refuſed. He then propoſed to empower eight barons to ſettle the conteſt, four of them to be choſen by himſelf, and four by the inſurgents. But this offer was alſo rejected. John now perceived that all oppoſition would be in vain: he ſaw himſelf abandoned by his ſubjects, and was obliged to conſent to the demands of the barons.

Runimede, a place between Windſor and Staines, was appointed for holding a conference between the king and the confederates; where, after a debate of a few days, the king ſigned, on the nineteenth of June, the celebrated charter of Engliſh liberties. This famous deed, which is ſtill conſidered as the foundation of Britiſh freedom, either granted or ſecured very important privileges; and therefore it was thought neceſſary to give a faithful tranſlation of it here, where, it is preſumed, every Engliſhman will expect to find it.

MAGNA CHARTA; or, The Charter of Liberties, granted by King John to his Subjects, in the Year 1215.

"JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, lord of Ireland, duke of Normandy and Aquitaine, and earl of Anjou; to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, juſticiaries of the foreſts, ſheriffs, governors, officers, and to all bailiffs, and other his faithful ſubjects, greeting. Know ye, that we, in the preſence of God, and for the health of our ſoul, and the ſouls of all our anceſtors and heirs, and to the honour of God, and the exaltation of the Holy Church, and amendment of our kingdom, by advice of our venerable fathers, Stephen, archbiſhop of Canterbury, primate of all England, and cardinal of the holy Roman church; Henry, archbiſhop of Dublin; William, biſhop of London; Peter of Wincheſter; Joceline of Bath and Glaſtonbury; Hugh of Lincoln; Walter of Worceſter; William of Coventry; Benedict of Rocheſter, biſhops: and maſter Pandolf, the pope's ſub-deacon and ancient ſervant; brother Aymeric, maſter of the temple in England; and the noble perſons William Mareſchal, earl of Pembroke; William earl of Saliſbury; William earl of Warren; William earl of Arundel; Alan de Galloway, conſtable of Scotland; Warin Fitz-gerald; Peter Fitz-herebert; and Hubert de Burgh, ſeneſchal of Poictou; Hugo de Neville; Mathew Fitz-herebert; Thomas Baſſet; Alan Baſſet; Philip de Albiney; Robert de Ropele; John Mareſchal; John Fitz-Hugh; and others our liege-men, have, in the firſt place, granted to God, and by this our preſent charter, confirmed for us and our heirs for ever.

I. "That the church of England ſhall be free, and enjoy her rights intire, and her liberties inviolable. And we will have them ſo to be obſerved, that it may appear from hence, that the freedom of elections, which was reckoned chief and indiſpenſable to the Engliſh church, and which we granted and confirmed by our charter, and obtained the confirmation of from pope Innocent III. before the diſcord between us and our barons, was granted of mere free will; which charter we ſhall obſerve, and do will it to be faithfully obſerved by our heirs for ever.

II. "We have alſo granted to all freemen of our kingdom, for us and our heirs for ever, all the under written liberties, to have and to hold them and their heirs, of us and our heirs.

III. "If any of our earls, or barons, or others, who hold of us in chief by military ſervice, ſhall die, and at the time of his death, his heir ſhall be of full age, and owe a relief, he ſhall have his inheritance by the ancient relief; that is to ſay, the heir or heirs of an earl, for a whole earl's barony, by an hundred pounds; the heir or heirs of a knight, for a whole knight's fee, by an hundred ſhillings at moſt; and whoever oweth leſs, ſhall give leſs, according to the ancient cuſtom of fees."

IV. "But if the heir of any ſuch ſhall be under age, and ſhall be in ward," (his lord ſhall not have the wardſhip of him, nor his land, before he hath received his homage; and after ſuch heir ſhall be in ward, and attain to the age of one and twenty years) "when he comes of age, he ſhall have his inheritance without relief, or without fine." (Yet ſo that if he be made a knight while he is under age, nevertheleſs the lands ſhall remain in cuſtody of the lord, until the aforeſaid time.)

V. "The warden of the land of ſuch heir, who ſhall be under age, ſhall not take of the land of ſuch heir, other than reaſonable iſſues, reaſonable cuſtoms, and reaſonable ſervices; and that without deſtruction and waſte of the tenants or effects" (upon the eſtate.) "And if we ſhall commit the guardianſhip of thoſe lands to the ſheriff, or any other who is anſwerable to us for the iſſues of the land; and if he ſhall make deſtruction and waſte upon the wood-lands, we will compel him to give ſatisfaction, and the land ſhall be committed to lawful and diſcreet tenants of that fee, who ſhall be anſwerable for the iſſues to us, or to him to whom we ſhall aſſign them. And if we ſhall give or ſell to any one the wardſhip of any ſuch lands, and if he makes deſtruction or waſte upon them, he ſhall loſe the wardſhip itſelf, which ſhall be committed to two lawful and diſcreet tenants of that fee, who ſhall in like manner, be anſwerable to us as aforeſaid."

VI. "But the warden, ſo long as he ſhall have the wardſhip of the land, ſhall keep up the houſes, parks, warrens, ponds, mills and other things pertaining to the land, out of the iſſues of the ſame land; and ſhall reſtore to the heir, when he becomes of age, his whole land, ſtocked with ploughs and carriages, according as the time of wainage ſhall require, and the iſſues of the land can reaſonably bear." (And all theſe things ſhall be obſerved in the cuſtodies of vacant archbiſhoprics, biſhoprics, abbies, priories, churches, and dignities which appertain to us; except that theſe wardſhips are not to be ſold.)

VII. "Heirs ſhall be married without diſparagement, ſo as that before matrimony ſhall be contracted, thoſe who are neareſt in blood to the heir ſhall be acquainted with it."

VIII. "A widow, after the death of her huſband, ſhall forthwith, and without difficulty have her marriage and inheritance; nor ſhall ſhe give any thing for her dower, or her marriage, or her inheritance, which her huſband and ſhe held at the time of his death: and ſhe may remain in the manſion-houſe of her huſband forty days after his death; within which time her dower ſhall be aſſigned." (If it was not aſſigned before, or unleſs the houſe ſhall be a caſtle; and if ſhe departs from the caſtle, there ſhall forthwith be provided for her a complete houſe, in which ſhe may decently dwell, till her dower be to her aſſigned, as hath been ſaid; and ſhe ſhall, in the mean time, have her reaſonable eſtover, that is, competent maintenance, out of the common revenue. And there ſhall be aſſigned to her for her dower, the third part of all her huſband's lands which were in his lifetime, except ſhe were endowed with leſs at the church door.)

IX. "No widow ſhall be diſtrained to marry herſelf, ſo long as ſhe has a mind to live without a huſband. But yet ſhe ſhall give ſecurity that ſhe will not marry without our aſſent, if ſhe holds of us; or without the conſent of the lord of whom ſhe holds, if ſhe holds of another."

X. "Neither we, nor our bailiffs, ſhall ſeize any land or rent for any debt, ſo long as there ſhall be chattels of the debtor's upon the premiſes, ſufficient to pay the debt," (and the debtor be ready to ſatisfy it.) "Nor ſhall the ſureties of the debtor be diſtrained, ſo long as the principal debtor is ſufficient for the payment of the debt."

XI. "And if the principal debtor ſhall fail in the payment of the debt, not having wherewithal to pay it," (or will not diſcharge when he is able,) "then the ſureties ſhall anſwer the debt, and, if they will, they ſhall have the lands and rents of the debtor, until they ſhall be ſatisfied for the debt which they paid for him; unleſs the principal debtor can ſhew himſelf acquitted thereof, againſt the ſaid ſureties."

XII. "If any one have borrowed any thing of the Jews, more or leſs, and dies before the debt be ſatisfied, there ſhall be no intereſt paid for that debt, ſo long as the heir is under age, of whomſoever he may hold; and if the debt falls into our hands, we will take only the chattels mentioned in the charter or inſtrument."

XIII. "And if any one ſhall die indebted to the the Jews, his wife ſhall have her dower, and pay nothing of that debt; and if the deceaſed left children under age, they ſhall have neceſſaries provided for them, according to the tenement, or real eſtate, of the deceaſed, and out of the reſidue the debt ſhall be paid; ſaving, however, the ſervice of the lords. In like manner let it be with the debts due to other perſons than Jews."

XIV. "No ſcutage, or aid, ſhall be impoſed in our kingdom, unleſs by the common council of our kingdom, except for ranſoming our perſon, and making our eldeſt ſon a knight, and once for marrying our eldeſt daughter; and for theſe there ſhall be paid only a reaſonable aid."

XV. "In like manner it ſhall be concerning the aids of the city of London; and the city of London ſhall have all its ancient liberties, and free cuſtoms, as well by land as by water."

XVI. "Furthermore, we will and grant, that all other cities, and boroughs, and towns," (and barons of cinque ports) "and ports, ſhall have all their liberties and free cuſtoms; and for holding the common council of the kingdom concerning the aſſeſſments of their aids, except in the three caſes aforeſaid."

XVII. "And for the aſſeſſing of ſcutages, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, and great barons of the realm, ſingly by our letters."

XVIII. "And furthermore, we ſhall cauſe to be ſummoned in general, by our ſheriffs and bailiffs, all others who hold of us in chief, at a certain day, that is to ſay, forty days before their meeting at leaſt, and to a certain place; and in all letters of ſuch ſummons, we will declare the cauſe of the ſummons."

XIX. And ſummons being thus made, the buſineſs ſhall proceed on the day appointed, according to the advice of ſuch as ſhall be preſent, although all that were ſummoned come not."

XX. "We will not, for the future, grant to any one that he may take aid of his own free tenants, unleſs to ranſom his body, and to make his eldeſt ſon a knight, and once to marry his eldeſt daughter; and for theſe there ſhall only be paid a reaſonable aid."

XXI. "No man ſhall be diſtrained to perform more ſervice for a knight's fee, or other free tenement, than is due from thence."

XXII. "Common pleas ſhall not follow our court, but ſhall be holden in ſome certain place; trials upon the writs of novel diſſeiſin, and of mort d'anceſtor, and of darreine preſentment, ſhall not be taken but in their proper counties, and after this manner. We, or, if we ſhall be out of the realm, our chief juſticiary, ſhall ſend two juſticiaries through every county four times a year, who, with four knights, choſen out of every ſhire by the people, ſhall hold the ſaid aſſizes in the county, on the day, and at the place appointed."

XXIII. "And if any matters cannot be determined on the day appointed for holding the aſſizes in each county, ſo many of the knights and freeholders as have been at the aſſizes aforeſaid, ſhall be appointed to decide them, as is neceſſary, according as their is more or leſs buſineſs. (Aſſizes of darreine preſentment to churches ſhall be always taken before the juſticiaries of the bench.

XXIV. "A freeman ſhall not be amerced for a ſmall fault, but according to the degree of the fault; and for a great crime, in proportion to the heinouſneſs of it, ſaving to him his contenement; and after the ſame manner a merchant, ſaving to him his merchandiſe.

XXV. "And a villain (of any other than our own) ſhall be amerced after the ſame manner, ſaving to him his wainage, if he falls under our amerciament; and none of the aforeſaid amerciaments ſhall be aſſeſſed but by the oath of honeſt men of the neighbourhood. (Of the county.)

XXVI. "Earls and barons ſhall not be amerced but by their peers, and according to the degree of the offence.

XXVII. "No eccleſiaſtical perſon ſhall be amerced for his lay-tenement, but according to the proportion of the others aforeſaid, and not according to the value of his eccleſiaſtical benefice.

XXVIII. "Neither a town, nor any tenement, ſhall be diſtrained to make bridges over rivers, unleſs that anciently and of right they are bound to do it. (No river, for the future, ſhall be embanked, but what was embanked in the time of king Henry, our grandfather.)

XXIX. "No ſheriff, caſtellan, coroner, or other our bailiffs, ſhall hold pleas of the crown.

XXX. "All counties, hundreds, wapentakes, and trethings, ſhall ſtand at the old ferm, without any increaſe, except in our demeſne manors.

XXXI. "If any one holding of us a lay-fee, dies, and the ſheriff, or our bailiff, ſhew our letters-patent of ſummons concerning the debt due to us from the deceaſed, it ſhall be lawful for the ſheriff, or our bailiff, to attach and regiſter the chattels of the deceaſed found upon his lay-fee, to the value of the debt, by the view of lawful men, ſo as nothing be removed until our whole debt be paid; and the reſt ſhall be left to the executors, who are to fulfil the will of the deceaſed. And if there be nothing due from him to us, all the chattels ſhall remain to the deceaſed, ſaving to his wife and children their reaſonable ſhares.

XXXII. "If any freeman ſhall die inteſtate, his chattels ſhall be diſtributed by the hands of his neareſt relations and friends, by view of the church, ſaving to every one his debts, which the deceaſed owed to him.

XXXIII. "No conſtable or bailiff of our's ſhall take corn, or other chattels, of any man, (who is not of the town where the caſtle is) unleſs he preſently gives him money for it, or hath reſpite of payment by the good-will of the ſeller. (But if he be of the ſame town, he ſhall pay him within forty days.

XXXIV. "No conſtable ſhall diſtrain any knight to give money for caſtle-guard, if he himſelf will do it in his own perſon, or by another able man, in caſe he cannot do it through any reaſonable cauſe.

XXXV. "And if we lead him, or ſend him into the army, he ſhall be free from ſuch guard, for the time he ſhall be in the army, by our command. (For the fee for which he did ſervice in the army.)

XXXVI. "No ſheriff or bailiff of our's, or any other, ſhall take horſes or carts of any for carriage, but by the good-will of the ſaid freeman. (Without paying according to the rate anciently appointed; that is to ſay, for a cart and two horſes, ten-pence a day; and for a cart with three horſes, fourteenpence a day.)

XXXVII. "Neither ſhall we, or our bailiffs, take any man's timber for our caſtles, or other uſes, unleſs by the conſent of the owner of the timber. (No demeſne cart of any eccleſiaſtical perſon, or knight, or any lady, ſhall be taken by our officers.)

XXXVIII. "We will retain the lands of thoſe that are convicted of felony only one year and a day, and then they ſhall be delivered to the lord of the fee.

XXXIX. "All wares, for the time to come, ſhall be put down in the rivers of Thames and Medway, and throughout all England, except upon the ſea-coaſt.

XL. "The writ, which is called Præcipe, for the future, ſhall not be made out to any one of any tenement, whereby a freeman may loſe his court.

XLI. "There ſhall be one meaſure of wine, and one of ale, throughout our whole realm, and one meaſure of corn; that is to ſay, the London quarter; and one breadth of dyed cloth, and ruſſets, and haberjects; that is to ſay, two ells within the liſt. As to weights, they ſhall be as the meaſures.

XLII. "From henceforward, nothing ſhall be given or taken for a writ of inquiſition of life or limbs; but it ſhall be granted gratis, and not denied.

XLIII. "If any one holds of us by fee-farm, or ſocage, or burgage, and holds lands of another by military ſervice, we will not have the wardſhip of the heir, or land, which is of another man's fee, by reaſon of what he holds of us by fee-farm, ſocage, or burgage: nor will we have the wardſhip of the fee-farm, ſocage, or burgage, unleſs the fee-farm is bound to perform military ſervice.

XLIV. "We will not have the wardſhip of an heir, nor of any land which he holds of another by military ſervice, by reaſon of any petit-ſerjeanty he holds of us, as by the ſervice of giving us knives, arrows, or the like.

XLV. "No bailiff, for the future, ſhall put any man to his law, (nor to an oath) upon his ſingle word, without credible witneſſes produced to prove it.

XLVI. "No freemen ſhall be taken, or impriſoned, or diſſeiſed, (of his freehold, or liberties, or free-cuſtoms) or outlawed, or baniſhed, or any ways deſtroyed; nor will we paſs ſentence upon him, or commit him to priſon, unleſs by the lawful judgment of his peers, or by the law of the land.

XLVII. "We will ſell to no man, we will deny no man, nor delay right nor juſtice.

XLVIII. "All merchants (unleſs they be publickly prohibited) ſhall have ſafe and ſecure conduct to go out of, and to come into England, and to ſtay there, and to paſs as well by land as by water; for buying and ſelling by the ancient and allowed cuſtoms, without any evil tolls, except in time of war, or when they are of any nation at war with us.

XLIX. "And if there be found any ſuch in our land in the beginning of the war, they ſhall be attached, without damage to their bodies or goods, until it may be known unto us, or our chief juſticiary, how our merchants are treated in the nation at war with us; and, if our's be ſafe there, the others ſhall be ſafe in our dominions.

L. "It ſhall be lawful, for the time to come, for any one to go out of our kingdom, and return ſafely and ſecurely by land or by water, ſaving his allegiance to us, unleſs in time of war, by ſome ſhort ſpace for the benefit of the realm, except priſoners and outlaws, according to the law of the land, and people in war with us, and merchants who ſhall be in ſuch condition as is above mentioned.

LI. "If any man holds of any eſcheat, or of the honour of Wallingford, Nottingham, Bulloign, Lancaſter, or of other eſcheats which are in our hands, and are baronies, and dies, his heir ſhall give no other relief, and perform no other ſervice, to us, than he would to the baron, if the barony were in poſſeſſion of the baron: we will hold it after the ſame manner the baron held it. (Nor will we, by reaſon of ſuch barony or eſcheat, have any eſcheat or wardſhip of any of our men, unleſs he that held the barony or eſcheat held of us in chief elſewhere.)

LII. "Thoſe men who dwell without the foreſt, from henceforth ſhall not come before our juſticiaries of the foreſt upon common ſummons, but ſuch as are impleaded, or are pledges for any that were attached for ſomething concerning the foreſt. (No country-court, for the future, ſhall be holden but from month to month; and where there uſed to be a greater interval, let it be ſo continued. Neither any ſheriff, nor his bailiff, ſhall keep his turn in the hundred oftner than twice in a year, and only in the accuſtomed place, that is once after Eaſter, and once after Michaelmas; and the view of frank-pledge ſhall be held after Michaelmas, without occaſion, and ſo that every one ſhall have his liberties, which he had, and was wont to have, in the time of king Henry, our grandfather, or ſuch as he obtained afterwards. But the view of frank-pledge ſhall be ſo made, that our peace may be kept, and that the tything be full as it was wont to be. And the ſheriffs ſhall not ſeek occaſions, but ſhall be content with what the ſheriff was wont to have for making his view in the time of king Henry our grandfather. For the time to come it ſhall not be lawful for any man to give his land to a religious houſe, ſo as to take it again, and hold it of that houſe. Nor ſhall it be lawful for any religious houſe to receive land, ſo as to grant it to him again of whom they received it, to hold of him. If any man for the future, ſhall ſo give his land to a religious houſe, and be convicted thereof, his gift ſhall be void, and the land ſhall be forfeited to the lord of the fee. Scutage, for the future, ſhall not be taken as it was uſed to be taken in the time of king Henry our grandfather; and that the ſheriff ſhall oppreſs no man, but be content with what he was wont to have. Saving to the archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, priors, templars, hoſpitallers, earls, barons, knights, and all others, as well eccleſiaſtics as ſeculars, the liberties and free-cuſtoms which they had before: theſe being witneſſes, &c.)

LIII. We will not make any juſticiaries, conſtables, ſheriffs or bailiffs, but ſuch as are knowing in the law of the realm, and are diſpoſed duly to obſerve it.".

LIV. "All barons, who are founders of abbies, and have charters of the kings of England for the advowſon, or are entitled to it by ancient tenure, may have the cuſtody of them, when vacant, as they ought to have,"

LV. "All woods that have been taken into the foreſts" (by king Richard our brother) "in our time ſhall forthwith be laid out again," (unleſs they were our demeſne woods,) "and the ſame ſhall be done with the rivers that have been taken or fenced in by us, during our reign."

LVI. "All evil cuſtoms concerning foreſts, warrens, and foreſters, warreners, ſheriffs and their officers, rivers and their keepers, ſhall forthwith be enquired into in each county, by twelve knights ſworn of the ſame ſhire, choſen by creditable perſons in the ſame county, and upon oath; and within forty days after the ſaid inqueſt, be utterly aboliſhed, ſo as never to be reſtored." (No freeman, for the future, ſhall give or ſell any more of his land, but ſo that, out of the reſidue, the ſervice due to the lord of the fee may be ſufficiently performed.)

LVII. "We will immediately give up all hoſtages and writings delivered unto us by our Engliſh ſubjects, as ſecurities for their keeping the peace, and yielding us faithful ſervice."

LVIII. "We will entirely remove from our bailiwics the relations of Gerard de Athyes, ſo as that, for the future, they ſhall have no bailiwic in England. We will alſo remove Engelard de Cygony, Andrew, Peter, and Gyon, from the chancery; Gyon de Cygony, Geoffrey de Martin, and his two brothers, Philip Mark and his two brothers, and his nephew Geoffrey, and their whole following."

LIX. "And as ſoon as peace is reſtored, we will ſend out of the kingdom all foreign ſoldiers, croſsbow men, and ſtipendiaries, who are come with horſes and arms, to the prejudice of our people."

LX. "If any one has been diſpoſſeſſed, or deprived by us, without the legal judgment of his peers, of his lands, caſtles, liberties, or rights, we will forthwith reſtore them to him; and if any diſpute ariſes upon this head, let the matter be done away by the five and twenty barons, hereafter ſpoken of, for the preſervation of the peace.

LXI. "As for all thoſe things, of which any perſon has, without the legal judgment of his peers, been diſpoſſeſſed or deprived, either by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we have in our hands, or are poſſeſſed by others, and we are bound to warrant and make good, we ſhall have a reſpite, till the term uſually allowed the croiſes; excepting thoſe things about which there is a plea depending, or whereof an inqueſt hath been made by our order, before we undertook the cruſade. But when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we do not perform it, we will immediately cauſe full juſtice to be adminiſtered therein."

LXII. "The ſame reſpite we ſhall have for diſafforeſting the foreſts, which Henry our father, or our brother Richard hath afforeſted; and for the wardſhip of the lands which are in another's fee, in the ſame manner as we have hitherto enjoyed thoſe wardſhips, by reaſon of a fee held of us by knight's ſervice; and for the abbies founded in any other fee than our own, in which the lord of the fee ſays he has a right; and when we return from our pilgrimage, or if we ſhould not perform it, we will immediately do full juſtice to all the complainants in this behalf."

LXIII. "No man ſhall be taken, or impriſoned, upon the appeal of a woman, for the death of any other perſon than her huſband."

LXIV. "All unjuſt and illegal fines made with us, and all amerciaments impoſed unjuſtly, and contrary to the law of the land, ſhall be entirely forgiven, or elſe left to the deciſion of the five and twenty barons hereafter mentioned, for the preſervation of the peace, or of the major part of them, together with the foreſaid Stephen, archbiſhop of Canterbury, if he can be preſent, and others whom he ſhall think fit to take along with him: and, if he cannot be preſent, the buſineſs, notwithſtanding, ſhall go on without him. But ſo that, if one or more of the foreſaid five and twenty barons be plaintiffs in the ſame cauſe, they ſhall be ſet aſide, as to what concerns this particular affair, and others be choſen in their room, out of the ſaid five and twenty, and ſworn by the reſt to decide that matter."

LXV. "If we have diſſeiſed or diſpoſſeſſed the Welſh of any lands, liberties, or other things, without the legal judgment of their peers, they ſhall immediately be reſtored to them. And if any diſpute ariſes upon this head, the matter ſhall he determined in the Marche, by the judgment of their peers; for tenements in England, according to the law of England; for tenements in Wales, according to the law of Wales; for the tenements of the Marche, according to the law of the Marche: the ſame ſhall the Welſh do to us and our ſubjects."

LXVI. "As for all thoſe things, of which any Welſhman hath, without the legal judgment of his peers, been diſſeiſed or deprived, by king Henry our father, or our brother king Richard, and which we either have in our hands, or others are poſſeſſed of, and we are obliged to warrant it, we ſhall have reſpite till the time generally allowed the croiſes; excepting things about which a ſuit is depending, or whereof an inqueſt has been made by our order, before we undertook the cruſade. But when we return, or if we ſtay at home without performing our pilgrimage, we will immediately do them full juſtice, according to the laws of the Welſh, and of the parts beforementioned."

LXVII. "We will, without delay, diſmiſs the ſon of Llewellin, and all the Welſh hoſtages, and releaſe them from the engagements they have entered into with us for the preſervation of the peace."

LXVIII. "We ſhall treat with Alexander, king of Scots, concerning the reſtoring his ſiſter and hoſtages, and his right and liberties, in the ſame form and manner as we ſhall do to the reſt of our barons of England; unleſs by the charters which we have from his father, William, late king of Scots, it ought to be otherwiſe; and this ſhall be left to the determination his peers in our court."

LXIX. "All the aforeſaid cuſtoms and liberties which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as it belongs to us towards our people of our kingdom, as well clergy as laity, we ſhall obſerve, as far as they are concerned, towards their dependents."

LXX. "And whereas, for the honour of God, and the amendment of our kingdom, and for quieting the diſcord that has ariſen between us and our barons, we have granted all the things aforeſaid; willing to render them firm and laſting, we do give and grant our ſubjects the under-written ſecurity; namely, that the barons may chuſe five and twenty barons of the kingdom, whom they think convenient, who ſhall take care, with all their might, to hold and obſerve, and cauſe to be obſerved, the peace and liberties we have granted them, and, by this our preſent charter, confirmed. So as that, if we, our juſticiary, our bailiffs, or any of our officers, ſhall in any circumſtance fail in the performance of them towards any perſon, or ſhall break through any of theſe articles of peace and ſecurity, and the offence is notified to four barons, choſen out of the five and twenty fore-mentioned, the ſaid barons ſhall repair to us, or our juſticiary, if we are out of the realm, and laying open the grievance, ſhall petition to have it redreſſed without delay; and, if it is not redreſſed by us, or, if we ſhould chance to be out of the realm, if it is not redreſſed by our juſticiary, within forty days, reckoning from the time it has been notified to us, or to our juſticiary, if we ſhould be out of the realm, the four barons aforeſaid ſhall lay the cauſe before the reſt of the five and twenty barons; and the ſaid five and twenty barons, together with the community of the whole kingdom, ſhall diſtrain and diſtreſs us all the ways poſſible; namely, by ſeizing our caſtles, lands, poſſeſſions, and in any other manner they can, till the grievance is redreſſed according to their pleaſure, ſaving harmleſs our own perſon, and the perſons of our queen and children; and when it is redreſſed, they ſhall obey us as before."

LXXI. "And any perſon whomſoever in the kingdom, may ſwear that he will obey the orders of the five and twenty barons aforeſaid, in the execution of the premiſes, and that he will diſtreſs us jointly with them, to the utmoſt of his power; and we give public and free liberty to any one that ſhall pleaſe to ſwear to them, and never ſhall hinder any perſon from taking the ſame oath."

LXXII. "As for all thoſe of our ſubjects, who will not, of their own accord, ſwear to join the five and twenty barons, in diſtraining and diſtreſſing us, we will iſſue our order to make them take the ſame oath, as is aforeſaid."

LXXIII. "And if any one of the five and twenty barons dies, or goes out of the kingdom, or is hindered any other way, from carrying the things aforeſaid into execution, the reſt of the ſaid five and twenty barons may chuſe another in his room, at their own diſcretion, who ſhall be ſworn in, in like manner as the reſt."

LXIV. "In all things that are committed to the execution of theſe five and twenty barons, if, when they are all aſſembled together, they ſhould happen to diſagree about any matter, or ſome of them, when ſummoned, will not, or cannot come, whatever is agreed upon, or enjoined, by the major part of thoſe who are preſent, ſhall be reputed as firm and valid, as if all the five and twenty had given their conſent; and the foreſaid five and twenty ſhall ſwear, that all the premiſes they ſhall faithfully obſerve, and cauſe with all their power to be obſerved."

LXXV. "And we will not, by ourſelves, or by any other, procure any thing, whereby any of theſe conceſſions and liberties be revoked and leſſened; and if any ſuch thing be obtained, let it be null and void; neither ſhall we ever make uſe of it, either by ourſelves, or any other."

LXXVI. "And all the ill-will, anger, and malice, that hath ariſen between us and our ſubjects, of the clergy and laity, from the firſt breaking out of the diſſenſion between us, we do fully remit, and forgive. Moreover, all treſpaſſes occaſioned by the ſaid diſſenſion, from Eaſter, in the ſixteenth year of our reign, till the reſtoration of peace and tranquillity, we hereby entirely remit to all, both clergy and laity, and, as far as in us lies, do fully forgive."

LXXVII. "We have moreover granted them our letters patent teſtimonial of Stephen, lord archbiſhop of Canterbury, Henry, lord archbiſhop of Dublin, and the biſhops aforeſaid, as alſo of maſter Pandolf, for the ſecurity and conceſſions aforeſaid."

LXXVIII. "Wherefore we will and firmly enjoin, that the church of England be free, and that all men in our kingdom, have and hold all the foreſaid liberties, rights and conceſſions, truly and peaceably, freely and quietly, fully and wholly, to themſelves and their heirs, of us and our heirs, in all things and places for ever, as is aforeſaid."

LXXIX. "It is alſo ſworn as well on our part, as on the part of the barons, that all the things aforeſaid ſhall faithfully and ſincerely be obſerved."

"Given under our hand, in the preſence of the witneſſes above-named, and many others, in the meadow called Runnemede, between Windeleſore and Staines, the fifteenth day of June, in the ſeventeenth year of our reign.

The above tranſlation is made from an original manuſcript now in the Britiſh Muſeum: But the paſſages comprehended between parentheſis, are taken from the copy given by Matthew Paris. This charter is more noble, more expreſs, and more extenſive, than any other inſtrument of its kind in the world. It decides all diſputes, removes all doubts, with regard to the compact between the king and his people: for here that contract is not underſtood only, but expreſſed; not looſely implied, but poſitively ſtipulated: it was obtained not by repreſentation, but by the collected body of the Engliſh nation; and is perhaps the only inſtance on record, when a king talked and treated thus publickly with his free ſubjects.

The foreſt laws had long afforded juſt ſource for complaint; and the Engliſh barons were determined not to omit ſo favourable an opportunity of removing, for the future, the cauſes which gave riſe to an infinite number of vexatious ſuits. Accordingly they inſiſted upon the king's ſigning a charter, by which the rights of the people would be aſcertained. The following tranſlation of this charter is made from an original manuſcript in the Britiſh Muſeum.

The CHARTER of FORESTS, granted by king John to his ſubjects in the year 1215.

"JOHN, by the grace of God, king of England, &c. Know ye that, for the honour of God, and the health of our ſoul and the ſouls of all our anceſtors and ſucceſſors, and for the exaltation of holy church, and for the amendment of our kingdom, we have of our free and good will, given and granted, for us and our heirs, theſe liberties hereafter ſpecified, to be had and obſerved in our kingdom of England for ever."

I. "Imprimis, All the foreſts made by our grandfather, king Henry, ſhall be viewed by honeſt and lawful men; and if he turned any other woods into foreſts, to the damage of him whoſe wood it was, it ſhall forthwith be laid out again and disforeſted. And if he turned his own proper wood into foreſt, they ſhall remain ſo, ſaving the common of paſture and other things in the ſaid foreſt, to ſuch as were formerly wont to have it.

II. "Is the LII. and LV. of the Great Charter put into one chapter.

III. "The archbiſhops, biſhops, abbots, earls, barons, knights, and free tenants who have woods in foreſts, ſhall have their woods as they had them at the time of the firſt coronation of our grandfather king Henry, ſo as they ſhall be diſcharged for ever of all purpreſtures, waſtes, and aſſarts made in thoſe woods, after that time to the beginning of the ſecond year of our coronation; and thoſe who, for the time to come, ſhall make waſte, purpreſture, or aſſarts in thoſe woods, without our licence, ſhall anſwer for them.

IV. "Our inſpectors, or viewers, ſhall go through the foreſt, to make inſpection, as it was wont to be at the time of the firſt coronation of our ſaid grandfather, king Henry, and not otherwiſe.

V. "The inquiſition or view for lawing of dogs which are kept within the foreſt, for the future, ſhall be when the view is made; that is, every three years, and then ſhall be done by the view and teſtimony of lawful men, and not otherwiſe. And he whoſe dog at ſuch time ſhall be found unlawed, ſhall be fined three ſhillings, and for the future no bail ſhall be taken for lawing. But ſuch lawing ſhall be according to the common aſſize, namely, the three claws of the dog's fore foot ſhall be cut off, or the ball of the foot taken out. And from henceforward dogs ſhall not be lawed, unleſs in ſuch places where they were wont to be lawed in the time of king Henry, our grandfather.

VI. "No foreſter, or bedal, for the future, ſhall make any ale-ſhots, or collect any ſheaves of corn, or hay, or any kind of grain, or lambs, or pigs, nor ſhall make any gathering whatſoever, but by the view and oath of twelve inſpectors; and when they make their view, ſo many foreſters ſhall be appointed to keep the foreſts as they ſhall reaſonably think ſufficient.

VII. "No ſwainmote, for the time to come, ſhall be holden in our kingdom oftener than thrice a year; that is to ſay, in the beginning of the fifteen days before Michaelmas, when the agiſters come to agiſt the demeſne woods; and about the feaſt of St. Martin, when our agiſters are to receive their pannage; and in theſe two ſwainmotes the foreſters, verdurers, and agiſters, ſhall meet, and no other by compulſion or diſtreſs: and the third ſwainmote ſhall be holden in the beginning of the fifteen days before the feaſt of St. John Baptiſt, concerning the fawning of our dogs, and at this ſwainmote ſhall meet the foreſters and verdurers, and no other by compulſion.

VIII. "And furthermore, every forty days throughout the year, the verdurers and foreſters ſhall meet to view the attachments of the foreſts, as well of vert as of veniſon, by preſentment of the foreſters themſelves; and they who committed the offences ſhall be forced to appear before them: but the aforeſaid ſwainmotes ſhall be holden but in ſuch counties as they are wont to be holden.

IX. "Every freeman ſhall agiſt his wood in the foreſt at his pleaſure, and ſhall receive his pannage.

X. "We grant alſo, that every freeman may drive his hogs through our demeſne woods, freely and without impediment, and may agiſt them in his own woods, or elſewhere, as he will: and if the hogs of any freeman ſhall remain one night in our foreſts, he ſhall not be troubled ſo as to loſe any thing for it.

XI. "No man, for the time to come, ſhall loſe life or limb for taking our veniſon; but if any one be ſeized and convicted of taking veniſon, he ſhall be grievouſly fined, if he hath wherewithal to pay; and if he hath not, he ſhall lie in our priſon a year and a day; and if, after that time, he can find ſureties, he ſhall be releaſed; if not, he ſhall abjure our realm of England.

XII. "It ſhall be lawful for every archbiſhop, biſhop, earl, or baron, coming to us by our command, and paſſing through our foreſt, to take one or two deer, by view of the foreſter, if preſent; if not, he ſhall cauſe a horn to be ſounded, leſt he ſhould ſeem to do this privately: alſo, in their return, it ſhall be lawful for them to do the ſame thing.

XIII. "Every freeman, for the future, may erect a mill in his own wood, or upon his own land which he hath in the foreſt; or make a warren, or pond, a marle-pit or ditch, or turn it into arable, without the covert in the arable land, ſo as it be not to the detriment of any neighbour.

XIV. "Every freeman may have in his woods ayries of hawks, ſparhawks, falcons, eagles, and herons; and they ſhall have likewiſe the honey which ſhall be found in their woods.

XV. "No foreſter, for the future, who is not a foreſter in fee, paying rent for his office, ſhall take cheminage; that is to ſay, for a cart two-pence during half a year, and for the other half year two-pence; and for a horſe that carries burdens, for half a year a halfpenny, and for the other half year a halfpenny; and then only of thoſe who come as buyers, out of their bailiwick, to buy underwood, timber, bark, or charcoal, to carry it to ſell in other places where they will; and for the time to come, there ſhall be no cheminage taken for any other cart or carriage-horſe, unleſs in thoſe places where anciently it was wont and ought to be taken: but they who carry wood, bark, or coal, upon their backs to ſell, though they get their livelihood by it, ſhall for the future pay no cheminage for paſſage through the woods of other men: no cheminage ſhall be given to our foreſters, but only in our own woods.

XVI. "All perſons outlawed for offences committed in our foreſts, from the time of king Henry, our grandfather, until our firſt coronation, may reverſe their outlawries without impediment; but ſhall find pledges, that, for the future, they will not forfeit to us in our foreſt.

XVII. "No caſtellan or other perſon ſhall hold pleas of the foreſt, whether concerning vert or veniſon; but every foreſter in fee ſhall attach pleas of the foreſt, as well concerning vert as veniſon, and ſhall preſent the pleas, or offences, to the verdurers of the ſeveral counties; and when they ſhall be enrolled and ſealed under the ſeals of the verdurers, they ſhall be preſented to the chief foreſter, when he ſhall come into thoſe parts to hold pleas of the foreſt, and ſhall be determined before him.

XVIII. "And all the cuſtoms and liberties aforeſaid, which we have granted to be holden in our kingdom, as much as belongs to us towards all our vaſſals of our kingdom, as well laics as clerks, ſhall obſerve as much as belongs to them towards their vaſſals."

But the barons well knew that it was not enough to procure theſe charters: they were too well acquainted with the ſanguinary character of John, not to know that every precaution in their power would be neceſſary for their ſupport againſt his anger, and to oblige him to obſerve the articles of theſe two inſtruments of liberty. Twenty-five of their own number were therefore elected, under the title of Conſervators of the liberties of the kingdom, and inveſted with a power almoſt abſolute. Every man in the nation was obliged, under a very ſevere penalty, to take the oath of obedience to them. Even a power of admoniſhing the king, with regard to any violation that might be made in the great charter, was delegated to them; and in caſe he refuſed to redreſs the grievance, they were empowered to take up arms againſt him, in concert with the prelates and nobility, who formed the national council.

John made no objection to this ignominious ſubmiſſion. He ſubmitted, with great tranquillity, to the moſt humiliating indignities. He even ſent writs to his ſheriffs, ordering them to oblige every perſon to ſwear obedience to the conſervators. But notwithſtanding all this ſeeming deſire of acting in conformity to the articles of the great charter, John never intended to obſerve that treaty any longer than the neceſſity of the times obliged him. He only bowed beneath the ſtorm that roared around him; and as ſoon as the threatening blaſt was over, determined to reſume the power he had loſt. He was principally encouraged in this deſign by the foreign mercenaries he kept about his perſon. They inſinuated, that it was ſhameful for a king to make any conceſſions to his ſubjects, and that no compact, extorted by the force of rebellion, could be binding. Theſe inſinuations coincided exactly with the king's opinion, and determined him to make one attempt to ſhake off the yoke of compulſion, ſo galling to his mind. He became ſullen and melancholy, ſeparated himſelf from the company of his courtiers, and at laſt retired privately by night, attended only by ſeven of his friends, into the Iſle of Wight, where he meditated the moſt fatal vengeance againſt his enemies. He ſollicited the pope to abſolve him from all the engagements he had entered into with his barons; and ſent ſeveral emiſſaries into France, Germany, and Flanders, to engage a number of Brabanders in his ſervice.

The pope exerted all his power in favour of his vaſſal. He iſſued a bull, by which the great charter was condemned and annulled, as derogatory to the holy ſee. Both the king and the barons were prohibited from paying any regard to its articles: the oaths which had been adminiſtered were annulled, and the ſentence of excommunication denounced againſt every one that perſevered in maintaining the authority of the charter of liberties. But the thunder of the Vatican, in temporal affairs, had now loſt great part of its force; and Innocent III. had the mortification to ſee even Langton, whom he himſelf had placed on the archiepiſcopal throne of Canterbury, refuſe to promulgate his cenſures. Exaſperated to the higheſt degree at this oppoſition in a prelate he expected would have exerted his utmoſt power to promote the intereſt of the holy ſee, the pope ſuſpended Langton from the exerciſe of his functions. But this act of papal vengeance did not produce the deſired effect; the clergy, with the primate at their head, as well as the nobility and people, diſcovered a noble ardour for their liberty and independence.

John's emiſſaries had been very ſucceſsful on the continent; and engaged a powerful army, wholly compoſed of ſoldiers of fortune, in the ſervice of their maſter. They were all veteran troops, and ready to venture their lives in any cauſe to gain an independent fortune; and John had promiſed them the eſtates of his turbulent barons. As ſoon as advice arrived of the embarkation of theſe forces, John ventured to take off the maſk; he recalled all the liberties he had granted to his ſubjects; declared the great charter null and void, and the barons, who had extorted that inſtrument from him, rebels and traitors. His foreign forces landed at Dover; and John, putting himſelf at their head, ſeemed determined to ſatiate his cruelty. He marched to Northampton, reducing the whole country through which he paſſed to a ſmoaking deſart. The ravenous and barbarous mercenaries, incited by a cruel and enraged prince, were let looſe againſt the eſtates, tenants, manors, houſes, and parks of the barons. Every thing was levelled in the duſt; and cruelties, ſuch as would ſhock even ſavages themſelves, were practiſed on the innocent inhabitants.

A. D. 1216. Many of the northern barons, unable to meet the foreign mercenaries in the open field, fled for protection to Alexander, king of Scotland. John followed them into that kingdom, burnt Haddington, Dunbar, and ſeveral other towns; but receiving advice that Alexander had raiſed a numerous army, and was advancing to give him battle, the puſillanimous monarch thought proper to retreat, well knowing that a defeat muſt be fatal. He had made himſelf maſter of moſt of the caſtles in England, and now determined to beſiege London, the only place of conſequence that held out in ſupport of independence.

The barons, now driven to deſpair, had recourſe to a deſperate method for relief. They applied to the French for aſſiſtance. Saher, earl of Wincheſter, and Robert Fitz-Walter, were ſent to the court of Philip; and offered the ſceptre of England to his ſon Lewis, if he would aſſiſt them with a body of forces againſt their enraged monarch. They aſſerted, and, indeed, with reaſon, that John had depoſed himſelf, by ſubmitting an independent crown to the pope.

The ambitious ſoul of Philip could not reſiſt ſo noble an offer, but he determined to act with caution. The pope's legate exerted all his influence to render the negotiation abortive. He threatened Philip with the thunder of the Vatican, if he attacked the patrimony of St. Peter. But the dread of the papal cenſures was not ſufficient to deter the French monarch from procuring that crown for his ſon, which he himſelf had ſome time ſince accepted from the hands of the pontiff. He, however, exacted twenty-five hoſtages from the barons, as a ſecurity for their fidelity; and, on their being delivered, he ſent over his ſon at the head of a formidable army.

The arrival of Lewis put a final period to John's ſucceſs. The greater part of his foreign troops, who were chiefly natives of France, now deſerted him, declaring that they could not fight againſt the heir of their lawful ſovereign. John was encamped near Dover when Lewis landed in the iſle of Thanet; but inſtead of endeavouring to attack the enemy, before the French forces could be joined by the barons, he retreated to Wincheſter. Conſcious guilt and jealous diſtruſt benumbed all the faculties of his ſoul, and diſarmed him at the very inſtant he ſtood in need of more than common reſolution.

The unmanly fears of John acted more powerfully in favour of Lewis than a numerous army; ſo that he marched to the capital without meeting with any oppoſition. He entered the city amidſt the acclamations of the people; and the barons and citizens immediately ſwore fealty to him; while the prince, in return, ſolemnly promiſed to reſtore all their eſtates, and confirm the ancient privileges of the kingdom.

Though Lewis was maſter of the capital, and at the head of a numerous army, innumerable difficulties ſtill remained to be ſurmounted, before he could make himſelf maſter of England. Moſt of the maritime places were in the intereſt of John, who had favoured the ſea-ports with many valuable privileges, and made many excellent regulations with regard to the marine. This was an alarming circumſtance to Lewis, who conſidered his being maſter of ſome convenient harbour as a matter of the laſt importance. Deſtitute of that advantage, his receiving reinforcements from the continent would be rendered very precarious; nor would even his own retreat, in caſe of a reverſe of fortune, be ſecure. He therefore attempted to make himſelf maſter of Dover; but his enterprize was rendered abortive; the caſtle defied his power. He therefore carried his arms into the inland parts of Kent and Suſſex, which he reduced with great facility. But William de Coldingham, at the head of a thouſand archers, retiring into the wilds and faſtneſſes of that country, ſupported himſelf againſt all the power of the French army.

John was not idle. He fortified and furniſhed with proviſions ſeveral ſea-ports; flattering himſelf that the bolt of papal thunder, which was now ready to be launched againſt Philip and his ſon, would defeat all their ſchemes, and reſtore him to the quiet poſſeſſion of the Engliſh crown. He was miſtaken. Innocent, indeed, fulminated the ſentence of excommunication againſt both, but the effect fell far ſhort of John's ſanguinary expectations. The French biſhops declared the excommunication of Philip void, and Lewis paid little regard to the papal cenſure.

He was more deſirous of procuring a proper ſea-port than of guarding againſt the effects of Innocent's ſentence. He therefore once more led his army to Dover, and inveſted that important fortreſs. But Lewis found the attempt more difficult than he imagined. Hubert de Burgh, the governor, was a brave and vigilant officer, and being at the head of a reſolute garriſon, made ſuch furious ſallies upon the French army, that Lewis was obliged to remove his camp to a conſiderable diſtance, and turn the ſiege into a blockade.

This miſcarriage alarmed Lewis, eſpecially as the barons appeared leſs active in his ſervice: but he was too haughty to conciliate their eſteem by careſſes, and wanted prudence to foreſee the conſequences of his neglect. He did not even endeavour to conceal his diſguſt; he excluded them from his councils and confidence; and inſtead of reſtoring the nobility to their honours and eſtates, he beſtowed all his favours upon his own countrymen. The barons now ſaw their error, in calling in a foreign force to their aſſiſtance; the people complained of the oppreſſions exerciſed by their new maſters; and every thing wore the appearance of freſh diſturbances. About the ſame time it was rumoured, that the viſcount of Melun, one of Lewis's courtiers, fell dangerouſly ill, and perceiving himſelf tottering on the brink of eternity, he ſent for ſome of his friends among the Engliſh barons, to warn them of their danger. He told them that Lewis had formed the deteſtable deſign of exterminating them with all their families, and beſtowing their eſtates and titles on his foreign favourites. This report, whether true or falſe, acted powerfully on the Engliſh barons, and was of infinite prejudice to Lewis. The earl of Saliſbury, and ſeveral others of the principal nobility determined, if poſſible, to elude the force of the ſtorm which threatened their deſtruction. They ſent private information to John of their intention of joining his army, and obtained a promiſe of a free pardon.

Animated with the hopes of being joined by his nobility, John exerted himſelf in collecting an army, and determined to bring on a deciſive battle with the invader of his country. But in marching over the waſhes from Lynn into Lincolnſhire, at an improper time of tide, the ſea ruſhed in upon him with ſuch violence and rapidity, that he loſt the greater part of his forces, together with all his treaſure, baggage and regalia, he himſelf eſcaping with difficulty. He reached Swineſhead-abbey, but the great fatigues he had undergone, and the conſtant hurry and perturbation of his ſpirits, added to the affliction he felt at his late irreparable misfortune, threw him into a violent fever. He was carried in a litter to Newark caſtle, where he paid the debt of nature on the eighteenth of October, in the fifty-firſt year of his age and the eighteenth of his reign.

The character of this prince, when painted by the pencil of truth, will perhaps appear more odious, than when drawn even by the pen of envy. He was deeply practiſed in almoſt every vice, and a ſtranger to almoſt every virtue. The murder of his nephew, the infringement of public property, and the violation of private honour and domeſtic peace, have conſigned his memory to eternal ignominy. Inſolent in proſperity, and raſh in adverſity, puſillanimous in war, and tyrannical in peace, this prince was never beloved by his people; he could hardly boaſt of having made a friend, But his reign, however wicked, gave occaſion to thoſe excellent charters which form the baſis of the Engliſh conſtitution. His tyranny firſt prompted the barons to aſſert, and his ſloth and indolence enabled them to obtain thoſe ineſtimable rights and privileges which are at once the glory and ſecurity of Engliſhmen.

Literature made very little progreſs during this period. No diſcoveries were made in the ſciences; the arts had no patrons among the great. The little learning that ſubſiſted was confined to the cloiſter, which was at once the habitation of the ſtudious, and the repoſitory of their writings. Nor were even the monks remarkable for their learning. A few of them indeed wrote with ſome degree of eloquence, but none equalled William of Malmſbury, who has been already mentioned in a former period. The following are the moſt eminent for their writings, and perhaps the only perſons of learning whoſe names deſerve to be handed down to poſterity.

Earlred, Æthelred, or Aldred, ſurnamed Rievallenſis, was abbot of Rievaulx, or Rieveſbury, in Lincolnſhire; and greatly eſteemed by the moſt reſpectable perſons of his time. He wrote the life of Edward the Confeſſor, the hiſtory of the battle of the ſtandard, and the genealogy of the kings of England. He died in 1166.

William, a monk of Newburgh, generally called Gulielmus Neubrigenſis, was no elegant writer, if the times in which he lived be conſidered. In his hiſtory, which ends with the year 1197, he fully proved that Geoffrey of Monmouth's hiſtory, which had till then been looked upon with a kind of barbarous reverence, is no better than an idle romance. The time of his death is uncertain.

John, prior of Hexham, wrote a continuation of the hiſtory of Simeon of Durham, and brought it down to the year 1154. He appears to have been a much better hiſtorian than Simeon himſelf, and to have wrote from a clearer evidence. He flouriſhed in the reign of Richard I. but the time of his death is not known.

Roger Hoveden, was chaplain to Henry II. He wrote a book of Annals which commenced in 732, and was carried down as low as the reign of king John. Theſe annals are written in a very pleaſing ſtyle, and abound with valuable materials for the civil as well as the eccleſiaſtical hiſtory of thoſe times. We have no account of the time of his death; but it is believed to have happened ſoon after the concluſion of his annals.

Ralph de Diceto, dean of St. Pauls, flouriſhed in the reign of king John. He wrote a chronicle of the Britiſh kings from Bute to Cadwallader, and from Hengiſt to Harold. He was alſo the author of the Chronological Abbreviations. They relate chiefly to eccleſiaſtical affairs, and end at the conqueſt. Beſides theſe he wrote a book entitled Imagines Hiſtoriarum, or Images of Hiſtory. This work conſiſts chiefly of ſhort hiſtorical anecdotes, with a wild unintereſting digreſſion upon the wars that happened between parents and children in all ages, occaſioned by the difference between Henry II. and his ſons. He died about the year 1205.

John Brompton, abbot of Sorewall, in Yorkſhire, wrote a chronicle of the Engliſh tranſactions from the year 588 to 1198. This work is valuable only for containing a large collection of Anglo-Saxon hiſtory, faithfully extracted, and agreeing perfectly with our moſt authentic records. There is, indeed, a mixture of romance and improbability in many of the facts he relates; but this ſhould be attributed rather to the falſe taſte of the age than of the writer. He died in the year 1210.

John Wallingford, ſuppoſed to have been abbot of St. Albans, wrote a ſhort chronicle of the progreſs of the Saxons and Danes in England. This work is ſtill preſerved in the Britiſh Muſeum, but wretchedly mutilated and defaced.

Gervaſe, a monk of Canterbury, flouriſhed in the reign of king John, and is ſaid to have been a very learned antiquarian. He wrote a large hiſtory of the Britons, Saxons, and Normans, from their origin to the reign of king John; together with an account of the diviſions of Old Britain, its monaſteries and epiſcopal ſeats. The greater part of this work is loſt; but the parts that ſtill remain, which include the reigns of Stephen, Henry II. and Richard I. ſufficiently prove the whole to have been a very valuable performance.

Theſe are the principal writers that flouriſhed in the reigns of Henry II. Stephen, Richard I. and John; a period very remarkable, and great part of it devoted to war and tumult. The torch of diſcord was lighted up at the death of Henry II. and continued to diſſeminate its baleful influence till the death of king John. It is no wonder, therefore, that the ſciences were little cultivated during that period. When the peace of a kingdom is deſtroyed, it is in vain to expect the produce of tranquil retirement.

The commerce of England was alſo at a low ebb during this period. It is well known, that the Flemings and Italians were in poſſeſſion of the two moſt important branches. Flanders was the grand market of Europe for all woollen manufactures, and Italy for ſilk; and it is highly probable, that with the habits, manners, cuſtoms, and language of the Normans, we likewiſe imported their manufactures; for the Engliſh were too much engaged in civil wars, and ſo often called off from attending to the arts of peace, by their lords, to whom they owed military ſervice, that nothing but wars and tumults, civil diſcord, and unnatural rebellions, engaged their attention. Coaches were, however, firſt introduced during the reign of Henry II. but not the art of conſtructing them; and the Jews firſt practiſed that grand article of commerce, ſo well known by the appellation of bills of exchange. Neceſſity ſeems to have been the mother of that noble invention. The Jews being, at this period, driven from one ſtate to another, as avarice or enthuſiaſm directed, found out this method of ſecreting their riches, and of tranſporting them with eaſe from one country to another, as ſoon as they found the impoſitions of any prince, under whom they lived, too heavy for them to ſupport; and it was the vice of the times to oppreſs theſe miſerable wanderers, and to ſeize at once their perſons and effects on the moſt frivolous pretences.

The Normans, fluſhed with victory, ſought only how to paſs away their time in mirth and ruſtic feſtivity; and employed almoſt all their intervals of leiſure in hunting, feaſting, and women. Nor is their exceſſive licentiouſneſs in this reſpect at all ſurpriſing, for the very laws tended to promote incontinence. Every violation of chaſtity had its fixed price, which was not beyond the reach of a ſubſtantial yeoman. The lewd lives of the clergy, who cohabited publickly with concubines, tended ſtill farther to debauch the age. Sometimes the archbiſhops, at other times the ſovereigns, endeavoured to reform the clergy, but without effect. It was impoſſible to correct the enormities of eccleſiaſtics, while ſuperſtition blinded the eyes of the people, and induced them to believe, that what conſtituted a crime in a layman, was a virtue in a prieſt.

From the acceſſion of Henry III. to the death of Edward II.

HENRY III. ſurnamed of WINDSOR.

A.D. 1216. ON the death of king John, the crown fell, by lineal ſucceſſion, to his eldeſt ſon Henry, then only nine years of age; and, conſequently, unable to hold the reins of government at a time when the utmoſt ſteadineſs, intrepidity, and precaution, were abſolutely neceſſary. Lewis, from this circumſtance, prognoſticated the ſucceſs of his enterprize. But he was miſtaken: what he conſidered as a misfortune to the royal party, proved the moſt favourable accident that could poſſibly have happened. The fidelity, prudence, and courage of Pembroke, earl-marſhal of England, nobly ſtemmed the current of misfortune, and delivered the kingdom from becoming a province to France. He was inveſted with the military command in conſequence of his poſt, and ſeemed born to ſupport the languiſhing conſtitution of his country. He ſeized the helm of government, and held it with ſuch virtues and abilities, that he weathered the tempeſt, and at laſt reſtored tranquillity to the ſtate. He well knew that no ſucceſs could be expected till a mutual confidence between the king and his barons was reſtored: this was, therefore, his firſt care; and this was greatly facilitated by the tyrannical behaviour of Lewis, who had ſufficiently exaſperated the barons, and they now wanted only a pretence to deſert his ſervice.

This was too favourable an opportunity to be loſt, and Pembroke accordingly ſummoned a council of the barons at Glouceſter. The meeting was very numerous; and the marſhal, as ſoon as the members were ſeated, entered the aſſembly, leading young Henry by the hand. The barons were pleaſed at the ſight of the prince: Pembroke perceived it, and cried out, "Behold your king!" A pauſe ſucceeded; and the earl thus addreſſed the aſſembly:

"My dear friends and countrymen, though we juſtly oppoſed the father of this young prince, on account of his wicked and miſtaken conduct; yet this child is guiltleſs of his father's errors; and as the puniſhment of offences ought only to be inflicted on their authors, it would be unjuſt for us to make the ſon bear the iniquity of his father. It is our duty and intereſt to forget our animoſities, and in compaſſion to his tender years, unite to ſupport him on the throne of his anceſtors. Let us exert our utmoſt efforts to drive Lewis and all his followers out of this oppreſſed country. By this noble, this generous action, we ſhall ſave our kingdom from becoming the reproach of its neighbours, and break the yoke of a debaſing and foreign ſlavery."

This addreſs carried conviction to the hearts of the barons. They had for ſome time bewailed the miſeries of their country, and readily joined in ſupport of their liberty and independence. An univerſal acclamation of joy broke out in the aſſembly; the members cried out with one voice, "Let Henry be made king!"

The ceremony of the coronation was accordingly performed, in preſence of the pope's legate, and Henry ſwore fealty to the pontiff, and renewed that homage, to which his father had already ſubjected the kingdom. The barons were perſuaded that this precaution was then neceſſary; the aſſiſtance of the pope was, was, at that time, of the utmoſt importance, and the ſucceſs of the enterprize depended wholly upon unanimity. The earl of Pembroke was conſtituted guardian to the young king, and protector of the kingdom. The barons could not have made a better choice. Pembroke was adorned with all the virtues and abilities of a conſummate ſtateſman and ſoldier. A general amneſty was immediately promiſed to all who ſhould return to their obedience, and acknowledge Henry III. for their lawful ſovereign.

This prudent meaſure, and the known probity of the regent, had the deſired effect upon many of the barons who ſtill adhered to Lewis. They reflected, that the cauſe which induced them to take up arms no longer exiſted; that oppoſition was now unnatural rebellion; and that the only method they could purſue with propriety, was that of making their peace with their lawful ſovereign. The pope's legate greatly aſſiſted in bringing about this deſireable effect. He cauſed the ſentence of excommunication to be thundered from the pulpit of every church in the kingdom againſt Lewis and his adherents. This cenſure, however deſpiſed in the firſt tranſports of reſentment, many of the barons who ſtill adhered to Lewis, wiſhed, in the moments of cool reflection, to be diſannulled, and they, by that means, re-admitted into the boſom of the church.

Lewis, when he firſt laid ſiege to Dover, vowed not to abandon the undertaking till he was maſter of the place. He knew not the abilities of Hubert de Burg, who commanded in that fortreſs, and rendered all the attempts of the French abortive. No means had been left untried by Lewis to corrupt the fidelity of that gallant officer; he tempted him with all the honours a ſubject could wiſh to enjoy; but all his offers were rejected; and Hubert declared, that he would defend the caſtle as long as one of the garriſon was left alive. At laſt, Lewis, in deſpair, raiſed the ſiege, and led his army back to the capital.

A. D. 1217. The pope continued to exert all his power in favour of the young king; and Lewis found it neceſſary to paſs over to the continent, in order to procure a freſh ſupply of men and money, and avert the thunder of the Vatican; the pontiff having declared, that he propoſed to excommunicate him in full conſiſtory. Pembroke omitted not to take advantage of his abſence, to prevail upon the barons to return to their duty. He laboured not in vain; many of the moſt powerful barons joined the royal ſtandard, and were followed by ſuch numbers, that all the forces he could raiſe in France were not equal to the deſertion from his army.

Pembroke now took the field, and detached a body of forces to inveſt Mount Sorrel, in Leiceſterſhire, the garriſon having committed the moſt dreadful ravages in the neighbourhood of the caſtle. Lewis, who knew the conſequence of that fortreſs, detached an army of ſix hundred knights and twenty thouſand infantry, under the command of the count de la Perche, a marſhal of France, to raiſe the ſiege. Upon his approach, the Engliſh, who were too weak to venture a battle, retired to Nottingham; and the count, confident from the ſuperiority of his numbers, reſolved to attack the caſtle of Lincoln.

Pembroke was alarmed: the caſtle of Lincoln was a place of too much conſequence to loſe, without making one effort for its relief. A ſummons was therefore iſſued by the protector to all the king's tenants, ordering them to join the royal army at Newark upon Trent. The pope's legate not only excommunicated Lewis by name, but alſo declared, that all who embarked in defence of Henry ſhould be intitled to the ſame privileges as thoſe who undertook a cruſade. He himſelf aſſumed the croſs, and the biſhops and barons drew the temporal ſword. This zeal of the clergy was of the utmoſt ſervice to the royal cauſe: the people flocked with the utmoſt alacrity to the protector's ſtandard, inſpired with a kind of enthuſiaſtic ardour which ſeldom fails of ſucceſs; and Pembroke had the ſatisfaction of ſeeing himſelf at the head of a noble and reſolute army, inflamed with a deſire of being led againſt an excommunicated enemy.

The French general was informed of the great increaſe of the Protector's army, and determined to make a deciſive aſſault upon the caſtle, the garriſon of which was by this time reduced to the utmoſt diſtreſs, and to act on the defenſive againſt Pembroke's forces. Theſe meaſures proved the deſtruction of the French army. Fulk de Briant, a famous partizan, found means to enter the caſtle by a poſtern-gate, at the head of a choſen body of archers, and made ſeveral ſallies to amuſe the beſiegers; while the royal army vigorouſly attacked one of the gates of the city, carried it by ſtorm, and entered the place ſword in hand. The French perceived their danger, and made a noble defence; but the freſh troops continuing to pour in through the avenue, a total rout enſued. The count of Perche was killed in the ſtreets, and moſt of his army cut to pieces.

Lewis was aſtoniſhed when he received information of this fatal defeat. He immediately ſhut himſelf up in the capital, and diſpatched a courier to his father for aſſiſtance. Philip, who was deſirous of averting the cenſure of the pope from his own kingdom, refuſed to engage openly in the defence of his ſon; but permitted Blanch, his daughter-in-law, to raiſe a powerful body of troops, and to provide a fleet of ſhips for tranſporting them into England. But they landed not in that kingdom: the French ſhips were met by the Engliſh on the coaſt of Kent, and totally defeated.

The Engliſh now repaired from all parts to the royal ſtandard; and Lewis finding all his hopes abortive, and even his own perſon in danger, he offered to conclude a peace with the Protector, by which he promiſed to evacuate the kingdom, on condition of his adherents being re-eſtabliſhed in their honours and fortunes. The terms were accepted; and Lewis returned to the continent, with the mortification of having ſeized a ſceptre he was unable to keep. Matthew Paris has aſſerted, that Lewis, by the treaty he concluded with Pembroke, became bound to employ all his influence with Philip, that Normandy, and the other tranſmarine provinces which had been wreſted from England, ſhould be reſtored; and that if he could not ſucceed with his father, he himſelf would make the reſtitution when he aſcended the throne of France.

Among all the adherents of Lewis, the clergy were the greateſt, perhaps the only ſufferers. Nothing was ſtipulated for them in the treaty: they were left entirely to the mercy of the pope, whom they had ſo highly offended, and who ſeized with eagerneſs this favourable opportunity to wreak his vengeance on them for this act of diſobedience. Many of them were depoſed, and many ſuſpended; ſome were baniſhed; and all who eſcaped puniſhment were obliged to purchaſe their pardon by paying large ſums of money to the legate. The pope always took care to be a gainer amidſt the moſt univerſal loſs and deſolation. But Innocent lived not long to enjoy the fruits of his interpoſition in favour of young Henry. He paid the debt of nature ſoon after the departure of Lewis from England, and was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Honorius III.

A. D. 1218. The Protector having reſtored peace to the kingdom, applied himſelf to promote the good of his country, and reconcile the minds of the people to the adminiſtration of their young king. He procured a new charter of liberties, but it differed in ſeveral particulars from that of John. The full privilege of elections in the clergy, and the liberty of going out of the kingdom without firſt obtaining the royal conſent, were not confirmed in the charter of Henry, becauſe the ſtate had already experienced the inconveniencies ariſing from them. The obligation by which John had reſtrained himſelf from buying aids and ſcutages, without the conſent of the great council of the nation, was alſo omitted in this inſtrument. The barons perceived that no aids, unleſs they were evidently reaſonable, could be levied upon men who had arms in their hands, and who were able to repel any acts of violence. Nor did he content himſelf with granting anew the privileges that had been enjoyed in the preceding reign; he cauſed writs, in the king's name, to be iſſued to the ſheriffs of the different counties, commanding them to lay open all foreſts, agreeable to the intention of the charter granted for that purpoſe by king John; and ſome time after, he ſent the chief juſticiary of the foreſts on a circuit through the kingdom, to ſee that the orders were fully executed, and the bounds of the foreſts diſtinctly marked. At the ſame time, orders were given to demoliſh all the new caſtles that had been erected ſince the beginning of the diſputes between the late king and his barons.

A. D. 1219. But while the Protector was thus exerting all his abilities to render the nation happy, death put a final period to his labours and his life. The nation ſuffered an irreparable loſs in the death of this great man, whoſe valour, integrity, and prudence, had broke the yoke of foreign ſlavery, and reſtored the liberties of Engliſhmen. He was ſucceeded by William de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter; and Hubert de Burgh, the gallant defender of Dover caſtle, was created chief juſticiary of the kingdom. The counſels of the latter were conformable to his character, that of a great, a prudent, and a virtuous man. They were for ſome time followed; and had he poſſeſſed the authority of Pembroke, the nation would not have ſo greatly regretted the loſs of that eminent patriot. But his power was not ſufficient to repreſs the licentiouſneſs of the barons, who were too ſtrong to be reſtrained by laws under a minority; and whoſe rapacity induced them to uſurp the demeſnes of the crown, as well as the poſſeſſions of their weaker neighbours. Hence revolts were multiplied; and the government was perpetually employed in reducing inſurrections, or executing criminals.

A. D. 1222. A wreſtling match between the citizens of London and Weſtminſter occaſioned a violent riot. It ſeems that the Londoners came off victorious; which ſo exaſperated the ſteward of Weſtminſter, that he determined to revenge the affront; but in order to conceal his intention, propoſed a ſecond trial. The Londoners accepted the offer, and came to the field to decide the conteſt; but inſtead of a fair trial, they were attacked by the ſteward and his followers, armed with clubs and other offenſive weapons, and obliged to retreat into the city. Exaſperated at this treatment, the Londoners, headed by one Conſtantine Fitz Arnulph, a bold, factious citizen, repaired to Weſtminſter, where they committed many dreadful outrages, and demoliſhed ſeveral houſes belonging to the abbot and ſteward. Hubert, in order to put a ſtop to ſuch riotous proceedings, ventured to puniſh the leaders, without bringing them to a trial. This ſtep, which was a direct infringement of the great charter, excited the clamours of the populace, who, with juſtice, conceived themſelves injured, and they demanded a new confirmation of the great charter. A general council was called, and this demand of the people taken into conſideration. During the debates, one of the council of the regency aſſerted, that no regard ought to be paid to the great charter, becauſe it was extorted by violence. But Langton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, ſeverely reprimanded the ſpeaker for his indiſcretion, as his aſſertion had a direct tendency to raiſe a rebellion in the nation; affirming, at the ſame time, that the demand of the people was founded on juſtice; and that the government could not, without the moſt palpable injuſtice, diſpenſe with any article in the charter. His opinion was adopted; and the parliament having granted a ſubſidy, the king iſſued orders for a new charter of confirmation. At length the biſhops, by the terror of eccleſiaſtical cenſures, obliged the barons to deliver up the fortreſſes belonging to the crown, of which they had forcibly taken poſſeſſion.

A. D. 1226. The domeſtic peace of the kingdom was hardly ſettled, before the miniſtry thought it expedient to ſummon a parliament, in order to deliberate on an extraordinary demand made by the court of Rome. The pope had ſent over a legate, under pretence of removing a reproach that had long been thrown upon the court of the Vatican. The pontiff obſerved, that the holy ſee having long been accuſed of ſelling her favours for money, it was the duty of all good Chriſtians to aſſiſt in removing the cauſe of ſuch a ſcandalous imputation, which flowed intirely from the extreme indigence of the Roman church. He therefore demanded, that two prebends in every cathedral, and two cells in every convent in England, ſhould be granted to the church of Rome, by an authentic deed, confirmed by an act of the great council of the nation. Such aſſiſtance, it was added, would enable the popes to diſpenſe indulgences with generoſity and moderation.

This demand was treated with contempt by the Engliſh parliament; no anſwer was returned to Rome. But the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was more immediately intereſted, wrote to the pope, informing him, "That when the Roman ſee had procured the ſame aſſiſtance from other nations, England would follow their example; but would never eſtabliſh the precedent."

The character of Henry now began to unfold itſelf, and ſhewed too many ſymptoms of an adminiſtration feeble and tempeſtuous. He was naturally of a mild and timid diſpoſition, and poſſeſſed neither vigour of mind nor political diſcernment. His reſentments were violent and tranſitory; his attachments ſudden and deſultory: the one excited no apprehenſions; the other was not conſolidated into friendſhip. At the ſame time, his irreſolution was blended with the principles of avarice, tyranny, and oppreſſion. Little expectations of happineſs could therefore be formed from his government. The dreadful ſword of civil diſcord ſeemed ready to be drawn, and ſpread deſolation over this devoted country.

A. D. 1227. The adminiſtration of Henry was, therefore, never popular; and his actions ſoon deprived him of the affections of his ſubjects. On his obtaining the age of majority, he ſummoned a parliament at Oxford, and declared his intention of taking into his own hands the reins of government; adding, that as the great charter, and that of the foreſts, had been obtained by an act of rebellion, and confirmed in his minority, he could not conſider himſelf as legally bound by any acts or promiſes during his infancy. The members were aſtoniſhed at this declaration; and the aſſembly broke up in a manner that ſufficiently indicated, that the ſtorm of reſentment would ſoon exert its baleful power.

Richard, earl of Cornwall, the king's brother, returning from France, where he had for ſome time headed an army in Guienne, found one of his manors poſſeſſed by a German officer, who claimed it as a gift from king John. Richard inſiſted, that his pretended right ſhould be determined by his peers, and immediately diſpoſſeſſed the German. But inſtead of having recourſe to the laws of England, he poſted to court, and complained to the king of the injuſtice done him by the earl of Cornwall. Henry, without giving himſelf any trouble to examine into the truth of his allegations, ordered him a writ under the royal ſign manual, commanding a reſtitution of the eſtate. Exaſperated at ſuch treatment, the earl refuſed obedience, and repaired to court to defend his property. The king, highly offended at Richard's obſtinacy, told him, that he ſhould either reſtore the manor in queſtion within a limited time, or depart the kingdom. So palpable an exertion of arbitrary power in his brother rouſed the paſſions of Richard, who boldly replied, that he would appeal to the laws of his country, repeating, that the judgment of his peers only ſhould oblige him either to part with his property, or to quit the kingdom.

Henry, whoſe anger as well as friendſhip was momentary, ſoon forgot the offence, and fearing the power of Richard, who was greatly beloved by the barons, he ſubmitted to petition a reconciliation, and offered to ſettle upon him the dower of the late queen, and augment his appenage with the lands of Boulogne. The terms were accepted, and both the cauſe and the offence buried in oblivion.

A. D. 1232. The puſillanimous and tyrannical conduct of Henry had ſo highly exaſperated the barons, that they refuſed to grant him the ſubſidies required. The court of Rome had taken advantage of the king's weakneſs, and purſued the moſt unjuſt and unpopular meaſures. Many of the principal benefices in England were poſſeſſed by Italian prieſts, and one of the king's chaplains is ſaid to have held ſeven hundred livings. The prelates and lay patrons were inhibited from preſenting natives, till all the foreign clergy were ſufficiently provided for. It is no wonder, that ſo ſhameful a practice raiſed a general clamour in the kingdom. It was conſidered as a national inſult, and ſeveral aſſociations were formed for delivering the realm from ſuch ſhameful oppreſſions. The principal leader of theſe confederates was Robert de Twenge, a knight in the north of England. He had long beheld the tyrrannical proceedings of the pope with deteſtation, but on being deprived by his holineſs of the patronage of a church, he determined to take ample revenge on the foreign prieſts. He aſſumed the name of William Witham, and encouraged his followers to ſtrip the houſes of the Italian clergy, and diſpoſe of their effects. They continued this practice for ſome time without oppoſition, and the foreign eccleſiaſtics, not daring to appear, took refuge in the convents. Informed of theſe violent proceedings, the pope wrote in a very lofty ſtile to Henry, commanding him, under pain of excommunication, to chaſtiſe the inſolence of his ſubjects, and reſtore the Italian clergy to their benefices. The puſillanimous ſoul of Henry was alarmed at theſe menaces of the holy father; he dreaded the effects of a papal cenſure. He ordered a ſtrict inquiſition to be made in the ſeveral parts of the kingdom, where thoſe riots had prevailed; and had the mortification to find, that they had been ſupported and encouraged by men of all ranks; Hubert de Burgh, the chief juſticiary, did not eſcape ſuſpicion. At laſt Robert de Twenge, who ſcorned to diſown an action, which he thought juſtifiable, or to let any innocent perſon ſuffer on his account, appeared in the royal preſence, attended by five knights, and boldly declared himſelf the leader of the confederates, who had ſtripped the houſes of the foreign prieſts; alledging, that the injuries he had received were the ſole motives for his proceedings. Pleaſed with the ingenuous confeſſion, and intrepid behaviour of this reſolute knight, who diſdained to ſuffer tamely an injury, though inflicted by the holy father himſelf, the king gave him a free pardon, and procured a reſtitution of his right to the patronage in queſtion.

But though Hubert was cleared from all ſuſpicion by the voluntary confeſſion of Twenge, yet the inconſtancy of Henry furniſhed his enemies with an opportunity of procuring his ruin. Excited by the remonſtrances of the biſhop of Wincheſter, who hated Hubert, becauſe he had been active in oppoſing his deſtructive councils, this weak prince, inſenſible to all his ſervices, perſecuted him with ſo much fury, that he was obliged to take ſanctuary in a church; whence he afterwards eſcaped out of the kingdom. He was accuſed, among other crimes, of having had recourſe to magic in order to gain an aſcendancy over Henry, and of having ſtolen from the royal treaſury an enchanted ring, which had the virtue of rendering the wearer invulnerable. Theſe accuſations, however ridiculous and abſurd they may appear at preſent, were entirely conformable to the ſtrange prejudices which then prevailed in every part of Europe.

A. D. 1233. The diſgrace of Hubert, put Peter de Roches, biſhop of Wincheſter, a Poictevin by birth, in poſſeſſion of the ſupreme authority, which he employed to the worſt of purpoſes. His temper was proud and tyrannical, and the prepoſſeſſion he entertained in favour of his own countrymen alarmed the Engliſh. The court was filled with theſe ſtrangers; and he conferred on them every office and every command in the diſpoſal of the crown. Theſe proceedings ſoon produced a general ſpirit of diſcontent, which Henry conſidered only as a confirmation of that rebellious ſpirit which Wincheſter had repreſented to be the characteriſtic of the Engliſh nobility. They were denied all acceſs to the king; and treated by the miniſter with contempt. But theſe prepoſterous methods ſerved only to increaſe the flame: all the arts of the court were inſufficient to eraſe from the minds of the Engliſh, the remembrance of the great charter of liberties.

Their patience was at laſt exhauſted, by the inſults and injuries they received from theſe inſolent ſtrangers. They formed themſelves into a body, and deputed the earl marſhal to lay their grievances before Henry. He accordingly demanded an audience, and, with the noble ſpirit of an Engliſhman, laid the complaints of the nation before the king: he beſought him not to continue laviſhing his favours upon foreigners, to the utter neglect of his natural ſubjects. Adding, that if he continued to treat their remonſtrance with neglect, both himſelf and the other nobility, would think it their duty to withdraw themſelves from his councils, where they had no power to ſupport the welfare of their country.

The biſhop of Wincheſter, who was preſent at this audience, without giving the king time to reply, anſwered the earl with unparalleled effrontery, "That it was the higheſt degree of inſolence in the earl, or any other ſubject, to pretend to dictate to his majeſty, on whom he ought to confer his favours: that both the king and his father had been ſo ill treated by the Engliſh, that the only expedient of procuring his own ſafety was that of truſting to foreigners; and that if their number in the kingdom was not already ſufficient to reduce his rebellious ſubjects to their duty, large reinforcements ſhould be procured."

The earl was aſtoniſhed; he retired without returning an anſwer, and joined in the confederacy for check-the deſpotic power, which the king, by the violent counſels of his worthleſs miniſter, ſeemed deſirous to aſſume. Henry was alarmed, and the biſhop, to gain time, adviſed him to call a parliament at London. The barons refuſed to attend, and even threatened to deprive Henry of his crown, if the Poictevins were not baniſhed the kingdom. Another parliament was called, and the barons preſented themſelves dreſſed in armour, and attended by their followers. Henry now ſaw his danger, and was deſirous of a reconciliation; but the artful prelate found means to remove his fears by ſowing diſſenſions among them, and gaining the earls of Cornwall and Cheſter over to the royal party. The eſtates of ſeveral of the confederates were confiſcated, without any trial by their peers; and, by a very impolitic liberality, beſtowed upon the Poictevins, before ſo odious to the Engliſh. But the time was approaching, when theſe wicked miniſters, who had inſulted the nation, and threatened the people with the moſt dreadful ſlavery, ſhould feel the weight of Engliſh reſentment, and be ſtripped of the authority they had ſo baſely applied.

A. D. 1234. Edmund, archbiſhop of Canterbury, followed by his ſuffragans, repaired to the palace and demanded an audience, which could not be refuſed. At this interview the prelate deſcribed, in the moſt pathetic manner, the dreadful effects of thoſe ruinous meaſures, which he had purſued by the inſtigation of his miniſters. He formally accuſed Peter, biſhop of Wincheſter, as the author of theſe pernicious counſels, which had diffuſed a ſpirit of diſcontent through the whole nation; and after making a long detail of the grievances of the people, inſiſted that the king ſhould remove from his councils, a miniſter ſo odious to all his ſubjects; adding, that if ſo reaſonable a requeſt was refuſed, he would excommunicate both him, and all who oppoſed ſo neceſſary a reformation.

This ſpirited remonſtrance, and the threatening at the cloſe of it, produced the deſired effect. Henry perceived his error. The biſhop of Wincheſter was ſtripped of all his employments, and the inſolent Poictevins baniſhed the kingdom. The religion of thoſe times, notwithſtanding the ſuperſtition with which it was debaſed, was ſometimes of the utmoſt ſervice of the ſtate; it affected offending miniſters, baſking in the ſun-ſhine of royalty, beyond the reach of temporal remonſtrances, and made them feel the weight of national reſentment.

A. D. 1236. Happy had it been for the king and happy for his people, had Henry learned wiſdom from former miſcarriages; but there are men, whom vice or indolence has rendered incorrigible. Henry ſeems to have been of this number. The remonſtrance of the archbiſhop had, in all appearance, convinced him of his error in cheriſhing foreigners in preference to his Engliſh ſubjects. But this conviction was temporary; Henry ſoon forgot both his danger and his intereſt. He married Eleanor the daughter of the count of Provence; and threw himſelf again into the arms of foreigners. William de Savoy, biſhop of Valence, and uncle to the new queen, became his principal favourite. He took every occaſion of giving him a remarkable preference over the greateſt, and moſt faithful of his own ſubjects, and committed to his ſole direction all the affairs of the ſtate.

The Engliſh nobility were immediately alarmed. They dreaded a revival of the late times of miniſterial inſolence and oppreſſion, and determined to exert all their power to put a ſtop to the career of this foreign minion. They began with preſenting dutiful addreſſes to the king, at the ſame time remonſtrating with a becoming ſpirit, againſt thoſe meaſures, which they apprehended to be deſtructive of the public intereſt, and that union which ſhould always ſubſiſt between an Engliſh king and his ſubjects. But they ſucceeded not in their attempts. Valence ſupported his power, and foreign influence grew every day more prevalent at court. The miniſter, who was offended with the Engliſh barons for their late ſpirited remonſtrances, ſpared no pains to render them ſuſpected by the king, and to remove the moſt active among them from his perſon and government. The ſeals were demanded from the biſhop of Chicheſter, who had filled the high office of chancellor with the moſt unblemiſhed integrity; but the prelate, on receiving the king's meſſage, nobly replied, "That having received the ſeals by the order of the parliament, he would reſign them by order of that aſſembly only."

A. D. 1337. Henry was, however, ſo infatuated, that this anſwer of the chancellor had no effect on his conduct. He adhered to his foreign miniſters, and liſtened not to the complaints of his people. But the wants of his needy courtiers, ſoon exhauſted his revenues, and he was obliged to call a parliament to procure a ſupply. The ſeſſion was very full, ſome important buſineſs being expected to be laid before them. But they were told, "That the chief reaſon for their being called together, was to deſire them to grant an aid, which ſhould be collected and diſpoſed of, for the neceſſary uſes of the ſtate, by ſuch perſons as they themſelves ſhould think proper to commiſſion for that purpoſe."

Henry had ſo often broke his promiſes, that the parliament were no longer to be deceived; and returned for anſwer, "That they had often granted the king aids, without receiving any marks of his affection: that ſince his acceſſion to the throne, his dominions were conſiderably leſſened, though he had frequently exacted from his ſubjects very large ſums, which had been wholly laviſhed away upon foreign favourites, to the impoveriſhment of the ſtate, and the diſgrace of his character." To this vigorous reply, Henry pleaded the expences of his own and his ſiſter's marriage, which had entirely exhauſted his treaſury; but if they would grant him a thirtieth part of their moveables, he promiſed upon his honour, never to injure or oppreſs any baron of the realm. In order to facilitate their compliance, he diſavowed the pope's bull, which his miniſtry had lately obtained for the reſumption of grants; declared he would inviolably obſerve the articles of the Great Charter; and ordered a ſentence of excommunication to be ſolemnly denounced againſt all perſons, himſelf not excepted, who ſhould dare to violate that ſacred conſtitution.

Mollified by theſe aſſurances, and pleaſed with the admiſſion of ſeveral Engliſh noblemen into his council, the parliament complied with his demand. But ordered the money ariſing from this tax to be depoſited in certain abbies, churches and caſtles, as a fund ſacred to the neceſſities of the ſtate; and the following expreſs condition annexed to the grant for levying it, "That the king ſhould no longer hearken to the ſuggeſtions of foreigners, who had already oppreſſed and impoveriſhed the nation, but be governed for the future by his own natural born ſubjects."

But Henry was not to be reclaimed. He had no ſooner obtained the ſupply he had requeſted, than he returned to his former meaſures, ſhewed as much fondneſs for foreigners as ever, and to ſecure himſelf a party ſufficient to oppoſe the power of his barons, he, with a meanneſs never to be forgiven, made application to the pope, for a legate to be ſent into England, under whoſe protection he thought he might ſecurely violate his recent engagements, which neceſſity had compelled him to enter into with his people. The Engliſh were alarmed, and the archbiſhop of Canterbury warmly expoſtulated with him on his conduct for ſuffering a legate to come into the kingdom without any apparent neceſſity, and without the knowledge of the parliament and clergy. But Henry regarded not the remonſtrances of the prelate, the cenſures of the church were no longer terrible; he knew the authority of the pope to be ſuperior to that of the archbiſhop. He ſeized the money depoſited in the churches and convents by the parliament for the uſe of the ſtate, and ſquandered it with the utmoſt profuſion upon ſtrangers and favourites. His brother, the earl of Cornwall, ſaw this deſtructive conduct with regret, and putting himſelf at the head of the nobility, demanded an audience, where he openly upbraided Henry with this ſhameful breach of faith and honour.

But though Henry relied entirely on the power of the pope for ſupport againſt the reſentment of his barons and clergy, the inconſiſtence of his conduct was ſo amazing, that he ſent a body of troops to the aſſiſtance of the emperor Frederic II. then at open war with the court of Rome. Gregory IX. who then filled the papal chair, was highly offended at what he termed the inſolence of his vaſſal, and ordered the legate to make the moſt ſevere remonſtrances. The puſillanimous monarch was alarmed, and to avert the cenſure of the vatican, he ſuffered the ſentence of excommunication againſt Frederic to be publiſhed in all the churches of England; though that prince had lately married the princeſs Iſabella, Henry's ſiſter.

A. D. 1242. Henry had now wholly loſt the love of his ſubjects. His ſtrange conduct had rendered him an object of contempt. The barons were juſtly incenſed againſt the rapacious foreigners, who waſted the royal treaſure, governed the kingdom, and treated the laws of England with contempt. The parliament therefore refuſed to grant their exhauſted monarch any ſupplies, and the king had recourſe to the moſt illegal methods and dangerous expedients for ſupplying his neceſſities. He exacted loans; he demanded benevolences; he uſurped a power of diſpenſing with the laws, becauſe the pope ſcrupled not to diſpenſe with the canons of the church, whenever the intereſts of the holy ſee required it. The people complained loudly; the barons formed aſſociations for their defence; and the judges were alarmed at the illegal proceedings of the king. “Alas!” exclaimed one of them upon the bench, “in what a “corrupt age do we live! The civil court is vitiated “in imitation of the eccleſiaſtical; and the river is “poiſoned from that fountain.”

Henry was deſirous of aſſiſting the count de la Marche, who had married his mother Iſabella, againſt Lewis IX of France. The count had given Henry the ſtrongeſt aſſurances of ſucceſs; promiſing, that all the old tenants of his family in France would immediately join his ſtandards, together with the king of Arragon, and the count of Thoulouſe. Charmed with the proſpect of recovering his old dominions on the continent, and wreſting from Lewis the territories which Philip had taken from his father, Henry ſummoned a parliament, in order to procure the ſupplies neceſſary for carrying his arms into France. But he had ſoon the mortification to find his requeſt denied; the parliament abſolutely refuſed to grant him any aſſiſtance for carrying on the war. Henry, however, found means of raiſing the neceſſary ſums at exorbitant intereſt, and paſſed over to the continent at the head of a conſiderable body of troops. But this prince was equally deſtitute of military and civil talents. His army was defeated at Tillebourg; he abandoned the port of Poictou which belonged to him, and returned to England covered with diſgrace.

A. D. 1244. For ſome time paſt the whole kingdom had reſounded with complains againſt the enterprizes of the pope of Rome: but his holineſs was not to be intimidated; he determined to proceed, and even to increaſe his deſtructive exactions. Accordingly he ſent over one Martin as his nuncio, to demand a thouſand marks from the clergy, to aſſiſt him in the war he was carrying on againſt the emperor. This nuncio was inveſted with more ample powers than any of his predeceſſors, and his oppreſſion and inſolence exceeded every thing that had yet been experienced from that proud and venal court. The nation was alarmed; and the barons reſolved to lay before the general council, then aſſembled at Lyons, the intolerable oppreſſions of the holy ſee.

The methods made uſe of by Martin to extort money from the clergy exaſperated the nation; and it was concluded on, in an aſſembly of the barons, to drive him out of the kingdom by force, if perſuaſions could not prevail upon him to depart peaceably. They aſſembled in arms, under pretence of holding a tournament; and choſe Fulk Fitz Warren as their meſſenger, to carry their reſolutions to the nuncio. They could not have made a more proper choice. He had himſelf ſeverely ſuffered by papal exactions, and thoroughly hated every partiſan of Rome.

Fitz Warren ſet out immediately to execute his commiſſion, with determined reſolution to terrify the nuncio, and induce him to abandon the kingdom. On being introduced into Martin's preſence, he told him, with a ſtern and reſolute air, that he muſt inſtantly prepare for his departure from England. The nuncio, little accuſtomed to ſuch diſreſpectful addreſſes, aſked him by whoſe authority he dared to ſpeak to him in ſo inſolent a manner? “By the “authority of a body of Engliſh knights now in “arms,” anſwered Fulk, “who ordered me to tell “you, that if either you yourſelf, or any of your “followers, remain in England more than three “days, every one of you ſhall be cut to pieces. Act “as you pleaſe; but remember it is an Engliſh “knight that delivers you this meſſage.” Martin was ſufficiently intimidated. He was too well acquainted with the character of the Engliſh to contemn a menace ſo peremptorily delivered. He immediately complained to Henry, and deſired his protection. But the king, who had for ſome time beheld the exactions of the pope with concern, told him, that his robberies and oppreſſions had raiſed ſuch a ſpirit of reſentment in every part of the kingdom, that he was hardly able to protect himſelf againſt his own ſubjects, who were thoroughly incenſed againſt him for having countenanced his rapacious proceedings. Martin was now convinced of his dangerous ſituation, and determined to abandon a kingdom where his life was in the utmoſt danger. He accordingly demanded a paſſport, and embarked directly for the continent.

A. D. 1245. The Engliſh ambaſſadors, on their arrival at Lyons, laid their complaints before the council, where the pope himſelf preſided in perſon. They repreſented, that the benefices enjoyed by the Italian clergy in England amounted to ſixty thouſand marks a year, a ſum that exceeded the annual revenue of the crown. They accuſed the pope of frequently cancelling his own acts by clauſes of non obſtante inſerted in his bulls; a clauſe abſolutely deſtructive of all the rights of patrons, and of all the liberties of the Engliſh church. They expatiated on the perpetual extortions of the nuncios and legates, and various other oppreſſions to which the Britiſh clergy had been ſo long expoſed. The pope was confounded, and gave an eluſive anſwer. He feared the power of the council, and was willing to ſoothe the Engliſh agents. He promiſed them redreſs; and cauſed two bulls for that purpoſe to be publiſhed. And the reſignation of the ſuperiority of England by king John to the holy ſee having been mentioned, the earl of Norfolk inſiſted, that neither that prince, nor any other, had the leaſt right, without the conſent of his barons, to ſubject the kingdom to a foreign ſervitude. This noble oppoſition convinced the court of Rome, that it was in vain to urge a pretenſion which was untenable from the diſtance of the Engliſh, and the independent ſpirit of that people.

A. D. 1246. But the promiſes of the pontiff laſted no longer than his fears. The council of Lyons was no ſooner broke up, than he renewed all his exactions. The Engliſh were exaſperated; and a parliament was ſummoned at London for redreſſing this public grievance. A ſtate of the hardſhips ſuffered by the nation from papal tyranny was drawn up; and, after being ſigned by the king, biſhops and temporal lords, ſent to the court of Rome, and ſatisfaction demanded from the pontiff. This inſtrument produced not the deſired effect. The ambaſſadors were treated with contempt, and even threatened to proceed to the ſame extremities againſt Henry, as he had lately done againſt the emperor. The king immediately prohibited any farther payments to the pope. But Henry wanted firmneſs to ſupport a meaſure ſo agreeable to his ſubjects; he relapſed into his former indolence, and ſuffered the pope to proceed in his extortions.

A. D. 1253. Innocent IV. was one of the moſt implacable pontiffs that ever filled the papal chair. The hatred he had conceived againſt the emperor Frederic did not die with that monarch; it devolved on his grandſon, Conrade, the lawful heir of the crown of Sicily, but whoſe ſucceſſion was ſet aſide by the perfidious arts of his uncle Mainfroy. Innocent ſoon perceived that his own force was far from being ſufficient to diſpoſſeſs the latter from the Italian dominions of Frederic; and therefore ſent a nuncio into England, to offer the Sicilian crown to Richard, earl of Cornwall. That nobleman, though extremely fond of power, had prudence ſufficient to perceive, that the ſole deſign of the court of Rome was nothing more than the acquiſition of a large ſum of money, and prudently declined the offer. But Henry had not the ſagacity of his brother; he accepted it for his ſecond ſon, Edmund, and gave the pope unlimited credit for expending the ſums neceſſary for the reduction of Sicily. Edmund was accordingly treated with the honours of royalty; and no means of extortion or oppreſſion were omitted by the pope, in conjunction with Henry, to obtain money from the Engliſh, under pretence of eſtabliſhing prince Edmund in his new kingdom.

A. D. 1255. The papal army began the war with ſome ſucceſs; but Manfroy, determined to riſk his crown on the event of one deciſive action, advanced againſt the Roman forces. A battle enſued; the army of Innocent was totally defeated, and he himſelf threatened with being beſieged in his capital. His haughty ſoul could not bear this reverſe of fortune; the violence of his paſſion threw him into a fever, which, in a ſhort time, put a period to his life. He was ſucceeded in the papal chair by Alexander IV. who purſued the ſame meaſures with his predeceſſor, and undertook to place Edmund on the throne of Sicily.

A. D. 1256. Henry, who, in order to graſp this phantom of ſovereignty for his ſon, had ſubjected himſelf to all the demands of the pontiff, ſoon found himſelf more embaraſſed than ever. The parliament refuſed to grant the neceſſary ſupplies for carrying this ridiculous project into execution; and the whole weight fell upon the clergy. This was not, however, effected, without a noble ſtruggle from the eccleſiaſtics. For when Ruſtan, the pope's nuncio, aſſembled the prelates, and propoſed their ſigning obligatory notes proportioned to the benefices of each individual, the biſhop of London declared, he would ſooner loſe his head than ſubmit to ſo ſhameful an act of tyranny. He was ſeconded by the biſhop of Worceſter; and the whole aſſembly unanimouſly declared, that the clergy of England would not ſubmit to be enſlaved by the pope. The nuncio complained of this refuſal to Henry, who threatened the biſhop of London with his reſentment; but the prelate, far from being intimidated, replied, with a noble intrepidity, “That he knew the king and the “pope were his ſuperiors; but if they deprived him “of his mitre, he would ſupply its place with a “helmet.” This generous ſtand in ſupport of the liberties of the Engliſh church, exaſperated the haughty Ruſtan; who finding it would be impoſſible to prevail on them in a body, determined to wreak his vengeance on each in particular. He accordingly commenced proſecutions againſt individuals for pretended faults, and obliged them to make an atonement, by paying very conſiderable ſums. The prelates appealed to the pope; and Alexander, dreading the conſequences of driving the Engliſh clergy to deſpair, ordered his nuncio to deſiſt from his proſecutions.

During theſe diſputes between the nuncio and the clergy, Henry was determined to make another attempt to procure a ſubſidy from his barons. A parliament was called for that purpoſe; and the archbiſhop of Meſſina was ſent with letters from the pope, preſſing the nobility, in the moſt earneſt manner, to comply with the requeſt of their ſovereign. But all attempts were in vain: the parliament, after mature deliberation, unanimouſly refuſed to grant the ſubſidy.

Ruſtan, finding all their hopes of procuring a ſupply from the parliament abortive, declared, in an aſſembly of the prelates, that the demands of the pope upon Henry amounted to above one hundred and fifty thouſand marks; and that if the clergy ſtill refuſed to comply with his requeſt, he would immediately make a demand of the whole debt, and lay the kingdom under an interdict till it was paid. Could the biſhops have depended on Henry for ſupport, they would, doubtleſs, have treated this menace with the contempt it deſerved; but they knew his weakneſs, and the ſhameful conceſſions he had already made: they knew that an interdict on the kingdom would expoſe both the church and ſtate to the moſt imminent danger. Theſe conſiderations induced them to ſubmit. In the mean time, the conqueſt of Sicily advanced ſo very ſlowly, that Henry, finding it would be impoſſible to raiſe the ſums neceſſary to ſatisfy the avarice of the holy father, renounced all pretenſions to the crown of Sicily.

A. D. 1257. Though Richard, earl of Cornwall, had wiſely refuſed the offers of the pope with regard to the crown of Sicily, he was far from being proof againſt ambition. He had amaſſed immenſe riches by frugality, and was conſidered as the moſt wealthy prince in Europe. The German electors, deſiring to ſhare in the treaſures of this powerful Engliſhman, offered to elect him king of the Romans. Charmed with this addition of dignity and power, he paſſed over into Germany, attended by a great number of the Engliſh nobility, and was crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle. He flattered himſelf with being able to obtain the imperial crown; but he found himſelf deceived. The German electors abandoned his intereſt the moment he had diſſipated his wealth.

A. D. 1258. A parliament being ſummoned to meet at London, Harlat, the new nuncio, produced a bull from the pope, enjoining the biſhops to pay the tenths granted to the king by his holineſs, under pain of excommunication. The king ſeconded the demand of the nuncio, and preſſed the barons to aſſiſt him with a ſupply. Had he really intended to provoke the members, he could hardly have mentioned any thing more likely to produce that effect. The intolerable acts of papal tyranny and oppreſſion, and ſuch complicated ſcenes of royal fraud and deceit, as the nation had for ſome time unhappily experienced, could not fail of rouſing the indignation of a people not wholly loſt to all ſenſe of freedom and independence. Far from granting his requeſt, they reproached him with his acts of rapine and injuſtice, and with his hatred of the Engliſh nation, from whom, they ſaid, he ought to bluſh to require any aid or ſubſidies, while he preferred ſtrangers to them, and made them groan under the moſt dreadful oppreſſions. Four of their brethren were deputed by the biſhops to make warm remonſtrances with regard to his conduct in general, and the uncanonical elections which had been made to vacant dignities in particular. Henry acknowledged that their complaints were well founded; adding, that as each of them had attained his benefice in that irregular manner, it was proper that their dignities ſhould be vacated by reſignation, in order to have them diſpoſed of according to the methods preſcribed by the canons of the church. But the remonſtrances of the barons were not to be anſwered. They inſiſted on a ratification of the great charter, though they themſelves daily violated it, in the articles relative to their own vaſſals. It was in vain for the king to oppoſe the whole power of the kingdom. His brother Richard, whoſe power was very extenſive, was abſent in Germany, and the barons defied all the cenſures of the Vatican. Henry therefore ſubmitted to neceſſity, and the great charter was ratified with the moſt religious oſtentation. Henry ſwore to obſerve inviolably all its articles, as a man, as a chriſtian, as a knight, and as a king.

But Henry did not long obſerve the oaths he had taken; the ſame indolence, the ſame infatuation for foreigners again returned, and the articles of the great charter were forgot; they were violated whenever the intereſt of the court, or the ambition of his minions required it.

A. D. 1259. Enraged at this ſtrange behaviour in the king, whom neither oaths nor promiſes could bind, the barons determined to have recourſe to the ſame expedient that was uſed with regard to his father. They formed an aſſociation; and a parliament being called at Oxford, they came to the aſſembly, attended by their military tenants, well appointed, and properly armed. Simon de Montford, earl of Leiceſter, was at the head of this aſſociation. That nobleman, who was at once both haughty and ambitious, tious, had been greatly careſſed by Henry, who had given him his ſiſter in marriage, and made him governor of Guienne. But the inconſtancy of the monarch, and the unbounded ambition of the earl, ſoon produced an open breach between them; and Leiceſter, who imputed his diſgrace to the inſinuations of the foreign minions, determined to take an ample revenge. He was a perfect maſter of intrigue; and his violent remonſtrances againſt the government, his apparent zeal for the liberties of the nation, and the privileges of the church, obtained him at once the affections of the people, and the friendſhip of the prelates and barons.

Henry was terrified at this military appearance; and, on his entering the aſſembly, aſked, with ſome emotion, whether he was their priſoner? The earl marſhal replied, that he was not their priſoner, but that it was the determined reſolution of the whole aſſembly to baniſh his foreign favourites from the kingdom, and redreſs the grievances of the nation. Adding, that if he would agree to theſe reaſonable demands, and give authority for that purpoſe to perſons of character and capacity, they would grant the ſupplies neceſſary for giving weight and dignity to the ſtate. Henry perceived it would be in vain to oppoſe the power of his barons, and therefore made no objections to the propoſal: he promiſed to ſubmit to any regulations they ſhould think fit to enact. Having thus obtained the king's conſent, they conſtituted a council of twenty-four barons, whom they inveſted with an unlimited authority for reforming the ſtate; and Simon Montfort was elected preſident. Henry himſelf took a ſolemn oath to maintain the ordinances they ſhould iſſue for that ſalutary purpoſe. The plan of government had been digeſted in a previous meeting of the principal barons; ſo that a ſet of regulations ſoon appeared; and theſe, conformable to the practice of all uſurpers, were favourable to the people. They were in ſubſtance as follows:

1. That the king ſhould confirm the great charter, which he had ſo often ſworn to obſerve, and ſo often violated.
2. The important office of chief juſticiary ſhould be beſtowed upon a perſon of talents and integrity, who ſhould adminiſter juſtice to the poor and the rich without favour or partiality.
3. That the chancellor, treaſurer, judges, and other public miniſters, ſhould be annually choſen by the council of twenty-four.
4. That the cuſtody of the king's caſtles ſhould be committed to the care of that council, who ſhould entruſt them to ſuch perſons as were well affected to the ſtate.
5. That any perſon, of what degree or order ſoever, who ſhould oppoſe, directly or indirectly, what ſhould be decreed by the council of twenty-four, ſhould be puniſhable with death.
6. That three ſeſſions of parliament ſhould be regularly held every year, to enact ſuch laws as ſhould from time to time be found neceſſary for the good of the people.

Theſe articles, which, from the place where they were drawn up, were called the Statutes, or Proviſions of Oxford, were approved by the parliament, and confirmed by the aſſent of the king, who ſwore to obſerve, and cauſe them to be obſerved, to the utmoſt of his power.

But Leiceſter never intended to ſubmit his actions to the examination of the parliament; he aſpired to the government, and the king ſoon perceived that he was no more than a cypher in the adminiſtration. He expected that the parliament would grant him a large ſubſidy, purſuant to their promiſe, when he ſigned the Oxford Conſtitutions: he was deceived; the conſideration of the ſupplies was poſtponed; and his two uterine brothers, the ſons of the count de la Marche, and the queen Iſabella, were ſtripped of their wealth, and baniſhed the kingdom, as the principal authors of the public calamities. Nor was the council ſatisfied with baniſhing theſe foreigners; even the officers of the houſhold were removed, and their places filled with perſons in the intereſt of the council. At the ſame time, they obliged every individual in the kingdom to take an oath to obey them; even young Edward, Henry's eldeſt ſon, was not excepted.

Determined to ſupport their power againſt all oppoſition, and fearful that the great credit of the king of the Romans might check their progreſs, they diſpatched the biſhop of Worceſter to the continent, to inform him that he would not be ſuffered to land in England, unleſs he would promiſe to take an oath to obſerve the Statutes of Oxford. At the ſame time, they required to know on what account he was coming to England, and how long he propoſed to continue in that kingdom.

Incenſed at their inſolence, and exaſperated at the degrading treatment of his brother, he ſwore he would never take the oath they wanted to impoſe upon him; and that he would viſit England when, and as often as he pleaſed, without ſubmitting to give them any reaſons for his actions. He was, however, ſoon after informed, that the barons had taken ſuch precautions, by marching troops to the ſea-coaſts, and fitting out a powerful fleet, that it would be impoſſible for him to land in England without their conſent. Richard therefore thought it more prudent to ſubmit to the neceſſity of the times, than engage in a fruitleſs oppoſition. He agreed to take the oath required, and the barons ſuffered him to return to England without oppoſition.

Among ſeveral innovations introduced by the council, the moſt important was the eſtabliſhment of a committee, conſiſting of twelve perſons, who, during the receſs of parliament, were inveſted with its authority, and were to attend the perſon of the king in all his motions. Thus the whole conſtitution of England was overturned, and the kingdom governed by a committee of nobles.

But it was not reaſonable to imagine that a government of this kind could be permanent. It was ſoon perceived, that the good of the people engaged not the attention of the council: the ſtate was oppreſſed by a confederacy of the nobles. The people were no longer deceived; they complained loudly of their tyranny; and the knights of the ſhires not only joined in the complaint, but implored the aſſiſtance of prince Edward to undertake the defence of the rights of the crown, and the liberties of the people. The prince accordingly ſent a meſſage to the barons, inſiſting on their finiſhing, without delay, the reformation they had undertaken; otherwiſe he ſhould think himſelf obliged to exert all his power to procure redreſs for an injured people. This ſpirited remonſtrance alarmed the barons, and a new code of laws was publiſhed: but it ſoon appeared that the whole was nothing more than the common laws of England, with ſome trifling alterations.

So glaring an impoſition exaſperated the people; and the animoſities which now broke out between the barons themſelves, gave them hopes that their tyranny would ſoon have an end. The earls of Leiceſter and Glouceſter, the two moſt powerful barons in the whole confederacy, became profeſſed enemies to each other. Theſe diviſions greatly weakened the ſtrength of the barons; and Leiceſter retired into France, under pretence of abandoning intirely the adminiſtration; but he had very different views. He hoped, by his retreat, to increaſe the power of his party, by gaining the French monarch over to his intereſt.

Fortunately for England, the throne of France was filled by a monarch who delighted not in the diſtreſs of other nations. He was deſirous of healing, not of increaſing, the wounds which the Engliſh conſtitution had lately received. Lewis IX. generally called St. Lewis, was endowed with all the piety of an anchorite, as well as the virtues of a king.

His liberality was not in the leaſt inconſiſtent with the wiſeſt œconomy. He knew how to reconcile a profound policy with an exact juſtice. He was prudent and firm in council, intrepid but cool in war, and as compaſſionate as if he had always been unhappy. From a prince of this character England had nothing to fear; he deſired not to uſurp the territories of his neighbours, and was ſo far from taking advantage of the troubles of England, that he laboured to eſtabliſh peace and harmony among the contending parties, whoſe diviſions threatened the kingdom with deſtruction. He even entertained a doubt with regard to the juſtice of the ſentence paſſed againſt John in the court of peers in France; and had formed a deſign of reſtoring to Henry all the provinces that had been wreſted from his father. The tranquillity of his own country at laſt diverted him from this reſolution; but he made a treaty with Henry which abundantly proved, that a love of juſtice, rather than power, was the ruling paſſion of his ſoul. By this treaty, he yielded to him the Limouſin, Perigord, Querci, and Agenois; and only required in return, that Henry ſhould make a final ceſſion of Normandy and the other provinces.

A. D. 1261. The council of the barons had now been three years abſolute maſters of the kingdom, under pretence of reforming the ſtate. Henry, careleſs and indolent as he was, could not but feel and reſent the mortifications he daily received. The quarrel between Leiceſter and Glouceſter gave him hopes that his misfortunes were drawing to a cloſe; and perceiving that the diſpoſitions of the people had taken a turn in his favour, he determined to make one ſtruggle for recovering his authority. In order to this, he applied to the pope to abſolve him from the oath he had taken with regard to the Oxford proviſions. The pontiff, who was highly exaſperated at the barons for having ſtopped the revenues of foreign beneficed prieſts, readily granted the deſired diſpenſation.

This difficulty being ſurmounted, Henry determined to declare publickly the reſolutions he had formed; and having aſſembled a parliament at London, he told them, "That as they had not on their parts performed their promiſe with regard to paying his debts, and augmenting his revenues, when he ſigned the proviſions of Oxford, he did not think himſelf obliged to keep the oath he had taken on that occaſion; that he was determined no longer to remain in the hands of a faction who had treated him more like a ſlave than their king, but would immediately free himſelf from ſuch inglorious fetters, and aſſert the dignity of his own prerogative." The aſſembly was aſtoniſhed at this unexpected declaration; and the king, without giving them time to reply, retired immediately to the tower; ſeized all the money in the mint; publiſhed a proclamation for removing the ſheriffs and other officers appointed by the council of twenty-four; and acted with ſuch vigour as ſeemed to be the effect of a fixed reſolution to ſupport his own independence. He informed his ſubjects that he had reſumed the reins of government, and that he would inviolably obſerve the two charters, notwithſtanding any falſe reports to the contrary; nominated a chancellor, chief juſticiary, and officers of his houſhold, in the room of thoſe who had been appointed by the council. He found means to repel the attempts of the barons, and obliged them to promiſe obedience for the future. But the gaining any advantage, or even the total defeat of an army, was of very little conſequence in theſe times of national debility and diviſion. New forces ſuddenly ſprung up, and ſuddenly diſperſed; to-day one leader remained maſter of the field, and to-morrow was obliged to take refuge in ſome place of ſafety. Henry was again defeated, and again obliged to confirm the ſtatutes of Oxford.

Prince Edward, who had hitherto ſcrupled to break the oath he had taken to ſubmit to the council, perceiving that the barons, with Leiceſter at their head, were determined to render their tyranny perpetual, undertook the defence of his country. He was ſoon at the head of a powerful army, and joined by ſeveral of the barons, who thought they could not, as true Engliſhmen, continue any longer with Leiceſter and his party. The two armies were in ſight of each other, and a deciſive battle was every moment expected, when ſeveral of the moſt prudent perſons interpoſed their good offices to prevent the effuſion of human blood. But it ſoon appeared that the claims of the contending parties were not to be adjuſted, and it was agreed to refer the deciſion to St. Lewis, in whoſe wiſdom and equity both parties placed an equal confidence. The reference was confirmed by the oaths of the king, the prince and the barons. Lewis accepted the office of arbitrator, and having heard, with the utmoſt attention, the whole cauſe fairly debated, together with the allegations of both parties in an aſſembly of the ſtates at Amiens, delivered the following award.

A. D. 1264. "That the ſtatutes of Oxford, with all the proceedings that followed in conſequence of thoſe acts, ſhould be annulled: That the king ſhould enjoy all the rights and prerogatives, which were inveſted in the crown, before thoſe ſtatutes were enacted: That all the caſtles which the king had ceded to the barons as a ſecurity for the performance of his promiſe, ſhould be reſtored; and that he ſhould enjoy the privilege of appointing his great officers of ſtate and government, equally from foreigners or natives." But, at the ſame time, he declared that his award was not meant to derrogate from the privileges and liberties of the Engliſh, nor from the charters which had been granted them.

The barons were highly exaſperated at a ſentence ſo contrary to what they expected; and it is never difficult for men thus circumſtanced, to find pretences for eluding juſtice, They aſſerted, that the ſaving clauſe was utterly contradictory to the other part of the ſentence. Becauſe the latter ratified Magna Charta, and the former condemned the ſtatutes of Oxford, which were calculated to ſupport that charter. The negotiation was therefore entirely broke off, and each party prepared to decide the conteſt by the ſword.

The royal army headed by the king in perſon, the king of the Romans, and prince Edward, encamped at Lewes in Suſſex. Leiceſter, being reinforced by a body of fifteen thouſand Londoners, marched immediately to Lewes, reſolved to hazard a deciſive engagement. The battle was begun by prince Edward, who charged the van of the rebel army with ſuch impetuoſity, that the troops gave way, and a dreadful carnage enſued. He then fell upon the Londoners, routed them with great ſlaughter, and purſued them near four miles with the utmoſt fury. This temerity loſt the battle. Had he, inſtead of purſuing a body of unexperienced troops, fallen, in conjunction with the reſt of the royal army, upon the remaining forces of the enemy, a complete victory muſt have been obtained. But the abſence of the prince, afforded Leiceſter an opportunity of changing the fortune of the day. He attacked the ſecond body of the king's forces, cut the greateſt part of them in pieces, and took the king of the Romans priſoner. The third body, commanded by Henry in perſon, made ſo noble a ſtand, that it was not broke till the evening; but the king's horſe being killed under him, and he himſelf ſlightly wounded, he retired to the priory of Lewes, with part of his followers, while others took refuge in the caſtle,

The prince returning from the purſuit of the Londoners, was ſurprized to ſee the field of battle covered with dead bodies; and ſeveral of his principal followers were ſo intimidated at the fatal event, that they fled with ſeven hundred of their beſt troops to Pevenſey, and paſſed over to France. The prince himſelf, who was a ſtranger to fear, thought only of retrieving the misfortune. He immediately attacked the barons; but night prevented a general engagement; ment. Uncertain of the conſequence, and ſollicitous for the fate of his father, the prince went round both the town and caſtle, but without effect. At laſt he found him at the priory, which was now attacked by the rebels. The royal party made a noble defence, and Montfort's forces were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

Young Edward now exerted all his abilities to rally and collect his ſcattered forces; and having ſtill the advantage of ſome excellent officers about his perſon, he determined to try the fortune of another battle. Leiceſter had loſt near half his army. The Londoners had been ſo totally broken, that they made no attempt to rejoin his army. He was therefore deſirous of avoiding a freſh engagement with a body of reſolute troops, more experienced than his own. He knew that a defeat muſt be fatal, and that he could expect no mercy if he fell into the hands of the enraged monarch. Under pretence, therefore, of preventing the farther effuſion of human blood, he ſent mediators next morning to the prince, to propoſe a ceſſation of arms, in order to terminate this deſtructive war by an equitable peace; offering to ſubmit his demands to ſuch arbitrators as the king ſhould approve; but, at the ſame time, inſiſted, that prince Edward, and young Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould be delivered as hoſtages for the king's performance of the conditions. This demand was abſolutely rejected by the king as inſolent and unreaſonable; it concealed, under the maſk of a deſire of peace, a treacherous deſign of making himſelf abſolute maſter of the kingdom. Leiceſter, fearful of another engagement, had recourſe to menaces; he threatened to ſtrike off the head of the king of the Romans, together with thoſe of all the priſoners of note in his hands, if the prince made any attack upon his army.

The character of Montfort was too well known, to doubt of his carrying his threat into execution. The prince feared the conſequence; and before he could determine, the earl had rallied his forces. There was now a neceſſity for coming to an accommodation, which was dictated by Leiceſter, on the following conditions:

"That prince Edward, and Henry, ſon to the king of the Romans, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners, as pledges in the place of the two kings: that all other priſoners on both ſides ſhould be releaſed; and that, in order to ſettle fully the terms of agreement, application ſhould be made to the king of France, that he ſhould name ſix Frenchmen, three prelates, and three barons. Theſe ſix to chuſe two others of their own countrymen; and theſe two to chuſe one Engliſhman, who, in conjunction with themſelves, were to be inveſted by both parties with full powers to make what regulations they thought proper for the ſettlement of the kingdom."

Such was the convention generally called the Miſe of Lewes; and which was ſigned by the king, the prince, and all the chiefs of both parties. The king immediately ſent orders for the priſoners taken by his forces to be ſet at liberty. But Leiceſter never intended to perform his part of the agreement: for after ſending the prince and young Henry to Dover-caſtle, he refuſed to ſet his priſoners at liberty; both the king and his brother were retained in cuſtody. He ſent no ambaſſadors to Lewis; the pretended arbitration was forgotten. He diſpoſed of offices, without even conſulting the king; and had recourſe to every method in his power to raiſe money for ſtrengthening his party, and directed all the meaſures of government according to his own pleaſure.

He now proceeded to ſettle a form of government he had projected, by which he became in reality the ſole maſter of the kingdom. He ſummoned a parliament of his own partiſans, in order to rivet the chains of ſlavery he had impoſed upon the nation. In that aſſembly it was enacted, that every act of royal power ſhould be exerciſed by nine perſons, who were to be choſen and removed by the authority of three others; namely, Leiceſter himſelf, the earl of Glouceſter, and the biſhop of Chicheſter. By this eſtabliſhment, Leiceſter obtained, in reality, the ſceptre of England: for as the biſhop of Chicheſter was entirely at his devotion, he directed all the reſolutions taken by the council of three; and they could diſcard every member of the ſupreme council at pleaſure.

But this ill-cemented plan of government could not long continue; the leaſt incident was ſufficient to ſhake its very foundation. The queen, who had been ſome time in France, raiſed a conſiderable army; and Lewis himſelf, who beheld with deteſtation the perjuries of Leiceſter, favoured her enterprize. The ambitious earl was alarmed, and troops were ſent to guard the coaſt; but little could be expected from men who were exaſperated at his behaviour; and Leiceſter owed his ſecurity more to unfavourable winds, which rendered the attempt abortive, than to any defence that could have been made againſt the French, had they landed in England.

The pope, who ſtill favoured Henry, and was highly exaſperated at the behaviour of the barons, diſpatched cardinal Guido, as legate, to excommunicate the earls of Leiceſter, Glouceſter, and Norfolk, by name, and all others in general who joined in the oppreſſion and captivity of their ſovereign. But Leiceſter took an effectual method to prevent the conſequences of the papal cenſures: he threatened the legate with immediate death the moment he landed in the kingdom. Guido was ſo greatly intimidated, that the ſentence was never pronounced. This oppoſition to the holy ſee increaſed the popularity of Leiceſter. The Engliſh had ſo ſeverely felt the tyrannical oppreſſions of the Roman pontiffs, that they wiſhed to be relieved from a yoke which was become ſo heavy to be borne.

A. D. 2165. But Leiceſter ſoon perceived that his ambitious projects rouzed the attention of the barons. Glouceſter himſelf was alarmed, and remonſtrated ſharply with him on his behaviour. The nobles, ſtill in the intereſt of Henry, retired into the marches of Wales, and received protection from the earl of Glouceſter. The people complained loudly of the ſhameful breach of the convention made at Lewes; and demanded that prince Edward, and the other priſoners, ſhould be ſet at liberty, conformable to the articles of that treaty. Leiceſter perceived that it would be impoſſible to divert the gathering ſtorm, without having recourſe to ſome artifice to deceive the Engliſh. He ordered a parliament to meet at London, but fixed that aſſembly on a more republican baſis than any that had ever been ſummoned ſince the foundation of the Engliſh monarchy. Beſides many barons and eccleſiaſtics who were not immediate tenants of the crown, he ordered the ſheriffs to return two knights from every ſhire, and the ſame number of deputies from every borough. The meeting of this parliament, which happened on the twentieth of January, is generally eſteemed the epoch of the Houſe of Commons in England. It is certain that this is the firſt time any mention is made by our ancient hiſtorians of any repreſentatives being ſent by the boroughs to parliament. Indeed they had always, in former ages, been eſteemed of too low a rank to be allowed a place in the great council of the nation.

In this numerous aſſembly the active and intrepid prince Edward, who had languiſhed in priſon ever ſince the fatal battle of Lewes, was declared free and at full liberty, after ſtipulating to deliver up all the caſtles poſſeſſed by the barons in the intereſt of the royal party; and neither to depart the kingdom during three years, nor introduce any foreign troops. But Leiceſter never intended to ſet the prince at liberty; he was ſtrictly guarded by the emiſſaries of that nobleman, and continued only a priſoner at large. The barons now ſaw that there were no hopes of reſtoring tranquillity to the nation: the tyranny of Leiceſter was more dreaded than that of Henry.

The earl of Glouceſter perceived his own danger; for every thing that oppoſed the deſpotiſm of Montfort was ſacrificed at the altar of his ambition. He therefore retired for ſafety to his eſtates on the borders of Wales; and Leiceſter followed him to Hereford at the head of an army, carrying with him both the king and the prince. Glouceſter found means to open a negotiation with young Edward, and a plan was formed for the prince's eſcape. A horſe of extraordinary ſwiftneſs was procured by Glouceſter, and conveyed to Edward by means of a truſty ſervant, and Edward Mortimer, at the head of a ſmall party, waited in a wood not far from Leiceſter's camp, in order to receive the prince, and convey him to a place of ſafety. Every thing being thus prepared, the prince, pretending to take the air with ſome of Leiceſter's retinue, made matches between their horſes, and rode ſeveral of them himſelf. When by this ſtratagem he had ſufficiently tired and blown their horſes, he mounted the ſteed ſent him by Glouceſter, and calling to his attendants, bade them adieu, and effected his eſcape. They purſued him till he was received by Mortimer at the head of his party.

The eſcape of the prince filled the people with joy; they flocked to his ſtandard from all parts of the country, ſo that Edward ſoon found himſelf at the head of a powerful army. He immediately took the field, and in order to prevent Leiceſter from retreating back to the capital, he broke down all the bridges upon the Severn. Leiceſter ſaw his danger, and diſpatched an expreſs to his ſon to haſten from London with an army to his relief. But Edward was too vigilant, and too well informed of young Montfort's motions, to ſuffer him to join his father. As ſoon as he heard that he was advanced to Kenilworth, Edward marched to meet him, ſurpriſed him in his camp, and totally diſſipated his army. The abſence of the prince furniſhed Leiceſter with an opportunity of croſſing the Severne in boats; and being entirely ignorant of his ſon's misfortune, advanced to Eveſham, expecting every hour to be joined by the forces from London.

Edward had divided his army into three bodies, one of which advanced along the road to Kenilworth, carrying before them the banners which had been taken from young Montfort's army; while he himſelf, at the head of the ſecond diviſion, made a circuit, in order to attack Leiceſter's army in another quarter. This ſtratagem for ſome time deceived Montfort; he took the firſt diviſion for his friends; but perceiving his miſtake, and obſerving the excellent diſpoſition of Edward's troops, he exclaimed, "They have learned from me their military order! The Lord have mercy upon our ſouls, for I ſee our bodies are the prince's." The greater part of the army of Leiceſter made but a feeble reſiſtance; the Welſh, who formed the van, unable to ſupport the furious attack of Edward, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, while Glouceſter at the head of another diviſion, charged the main body with equal fury. Leiceſter, however, maintained the battle with amazing intrepidity, till his horſe being killed under him, he demanded quarter, which was refuſed, and he fell among the ſlain, together with his ſon Henry. His troops, deprived of their two principal leaders, threw down their arms, and begged for quarter.

Thus fell the famous Simon Montfort, earl of Leiceſter, an intrepid general, and a conſummate ſtateſman. He was bold, reſolute, enterpriſing, inſinuating, artful and perſuaſive. But hurried away by his ambition, he made himſelf odious by endeavouring to render himſelf deſpotic. He conſtantly covered his dangerous enterprizes under the appearance of piety; and the people, who are eaſily deceived, regarded him as a ſaint. And though excommunicated by the Roman pontiff, the people were ſo prejudiced in his favour, that many miracles were ſaid to be wrought upon his tomb.

The victory of Eveſham was complete; the king of the Romans, his ſon and all the barons of the royal party were immediately ſet at liberty; and Edward eaſily ſubdued the remains of the rebel party; and the far greater part of the caſtles garriſoned by the rebels delayed not to make their ſubmiſſion, and open their gates to the king. Adam Gourdon, a courageous baron, maintained himſelf for ſome time in the foreſt of Hampſhire, and committed depredations in the neighbourhood. Edward led a body of forces againſt him, and attacked the camp of the rebels with the utmoſt fury. The two valiant leaders met, and a ſingle combat enſued between them. The victory was long doubtful; but at laſt ended in favour of Edward. Gourdon was wounded, thrown from his horſe and taken priſoner. But Edward knew how to eſtimate valour, even in an enemy. He procured his pardon, granted him his friendſhip, and Gourdon ſerved him faithfully till his death.

Greater moderation was perhaps never ſhewn upon a ſimilar occaſion. No ſacrifices of national liberty was made on this occaſion, the great charter continued inviolate. No blood ſhed upon the ſcaffold; thoſe who had borne arms againſt the king were puniſhed only by pecuniary compoſitions, and even theſe were exacted with great moderation. The city of London had merited the moſt rigorous chaſtiſement, but this was greatly mitigated; its privileges were indeed taken away, but they were reſtored after a ſhort interval of time.

A. D. 1268. The peace of the kingdom being now reſtored, the king ſummoned a parliament, where the pope's legate aſſiſted, who informed the aſſembly that the pontiff had reſolved to publiſh a cruſade in every ſtate that profeſſed the Chriſtian religion; exhorting the Engliſh to ſupport an enterprize calculated to promote the glory of the church. The Engliſh had not yet learned wiſdom from paſt misfortunes; enthuſiaſm prevailed and the recovery of the Holy Land was conſidered as more meritorious than the ſtricteſt exerciſe of all the chriſtian virtues. Prince Edward, his brother Edmund, and their couſin Henry received the croſs from the hands of the legate; and their example was followed by the earls of Glouceſter, Warrenne, and Pembroke, one hundred and twenty knights, and great numbers of inferior orders.

A. D. 1270. Lewis of France, who had alſo engaged in the cruſade, and made the moſt preſſing ſollicitations to Edward to haſten his departure, ſailed ſome time before the Engliſh forces were ready, and landed near the ruins of Carthage, in order to reduce the city of Tunis. Edward reached his camp, but had the misfortune to find that great prince already dead from the intemperance of the climate, and the great fatigues he had undergone. The devotion of Lewis was deſtructive to France; and is a proof that the exceſs of a good quality may be criminal. He was ſucceeded in the throne by Philip, ſurnamed the Hardy, a prince of conſiderable merit, but much inferior to that of his father. The death of Lewis was not, however, ſufficient to intimidate Edward. He continued his courſe to Paleſtine, where he ſignalized himſelf by the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour. He revived the glory of the Engliſh name in thoſe parts, and ſtruck the Saracens with ſuch terror, that they had recourſe to the infamous method of aſſaſſination. The villain employed to execute this inhuman deſign, was admitted ſeveral times into the prince's preſence, under pretence of negotiating a treaty between Edward and the governor of Joppa. One day, finding the prince alone ſitting on a couch undreſſed, he approached him, and offering him ſome letters, took the opportunity of drawing a concealed dagger, and endeavoured to ſheathe it in the prince's breaſt; but Edward fortunately warded off the blow. He received indeed a conſiderable wound in the arm, but that misfortune did not prevent him from ſeizing the villain, and having wreſted the dagger from his hand he plunged it into his heart. The wound was however dangerous, being made with a poiſoned inſtrument, and the prince's life was in the moſt imminent danger; but by the great ſkill and care of an Engliſh ſurgeon, a cure was effected in little more than a fortnight.

A. D. 1272. While Edward was gathering laurels in the fields of Paleſtine, England again experienced the oppreſſions of the barons and the diſorders of anarchy. The populace of London returned to their uſual licentiouſneſs; and the old king, unable to ſupport the weight of government, called aloud for his gallant ſon to return, and aſſiſt him in ſwaying that ſceptre which was ready to drop from his enfeebled hand. His cares and his fears were greatly increaſed by the death of his brother, the king of the Romans, who paid the debt of nature at Berkhamſtead on the ſecond of April. Henry ſurvived this misfortune only ſeven months: he died at St. Edmondſbury on the ſixteenth of November, in the ſixty-fourth year of his age, and the fifty-ſixth of his reign, holding the ſceptre longer than any other prince in the Engliſh annals.

The capital feature in the character of this prince is his incapacity for government. Though not naturally tyrannical, his extreme weakneſs often produced all the evils of deſpotiſm. Hence his negligences and breach of promiſes; for he ſcrupled not to ſacrifice the laſting advantages ariſing from the truſt and confidence of his people to preſent conveniences. He imitated, inſtead of reducing the dangerous power of his barons; and permitted the arbitrary will of his miniſters to be the rule of his actions. But if he had few public virtues, he had alſo few perſonal vices; he was neither addicted to debauchery, nor prone to cruelty. He was a great friend to religion, and his devotion is highly commended. Being once engaged in a diſpute with Lewis of France, concerning the preference between ſermons and maſſes, he very pertinently replied, in anſwer to what was urged in favour of the former, "I had rather have one hour's converſation with a friend, than hear twenty elaborate diſcourſes pronounced in his praiſe."

Henry left two ſons; Edward, who ſucceeded him in the throne; and Edmund, earl of Lancaſter: and two daughters; Margaret, queen of Scotland; and Beatrix, dutcheſs of Britany.

A very remarkable diſpute happened during this reign, between the prelates and the barons, with regard to baſtardy. According to the common laws of England, all who were born before the marriage of their parents were declared baſtards; but the canon law conſidered them as legitimate. Hence the biſhops and judges never agreed; and the civil courts, whenever they applied to the ſpiritual to enquire into the legitimacy of the perſon in queſtion, propoſed only this ſimple fact, whether he was born before or after marriage. The prelates complained of this practice to the parliament aſſembled at Merton in 1236; and requeſted, that the civil law might be rendered conformable to the eccleſiaſtical; but the barons returned this memorable anſwer, "We will not change the laws of England."

Every ſpecies of oppreſſion was made uſe of, during this reign, to ſupply the profuſe liberality of the king to foreign favourites. The example of the court authoriſed rapine and plunder; ſo that every quarter of the kingdom was full of robbers. In the year 1249, two merchants of Brabant complained to the king that they had been robbed of all their goods by certain banditti whom they knew, becauſe they ſaw them every day in his court. On being queſtioned with regard to their behaviour, they urged in their defence, that they received no wages from the king, and were obliged to rob for a maintenance.

The court of Rome perceiving that the power of the holy ſee began to decline in England, pope Gregory IX. had recourſe to an expedient highly worthy of that ignorant age, for ſupporting the tottering authority of the pontifical chair. He publiſhed a work called the Decretals, containing a pretended collection of the decrees of popes in the firſt centuries, but in reality a heap of the groſſeſt forgeries. In this dark and ignorant age, they paſſed, indeed, for ſome time, as undoubted facts, and were very favourable to that venal court; but ſomething more was wanting to engage the attention of a rude people. This was effected by eſtabliſhing the mendicant orders, particularly the Dominicans and Franciſcans. Theſe, by maintaining a perpetual rivalſhip with each other, in promoting their lucrative trade of ſuperſtition, exerted all their abilities to gain the neceſſary aſcendance over the minds of men, and inſpire them with a firm belief of the infallibility and ſpiritual power of their founder and protector. To ſuch wretched expedients was the Roman ſee reduced, to ſupport the mighty ſtructure of ſuperſtition, which had been reared by the hand of enthuſiaſtic ignorance.

EDWARD I. ſurnamed LONGSHANKS.

A. D. 1272. THOUGH Edward was abroad at the time of his father's death, yet no attempts to wreſt the ſceptre from his hand were made in England. The higheſt opinion was entertained of his merit, and all ranks and orders of men in the kingdom wiſhed earneſtly to ſee him on the throne of his anceſtors. The council of ſtate proclaimed him king immediately on the deceaſe of his father; all the eſtates of the kingdom ſwore fealty to him; and even the earl of Glouceſter himſelf was among the firſt to give proofs of his ſubmiſſion.

Edward, ſome time before the death of his father, was convinced that it would be impoſſible, with his handful of men, to oppoſe, with any hopes of ſucceſs, the numerous armies of the Saracens: he therefore liſtened to the offers of peace tended him by the ſultan of Babylon, and concluded a truce for ten years, ten months, and ten days. After ſigning this treaty, he embarked the remains of his little army, and paſſed over to Sicily, where he received the news of the death of his father, and alſo of that of his eldeſt ſon. Edward appeared more ſenſibly affected with the former than the latter; and the king of Sicily expreſſing a ſurpriſe at ſo ſingular a circumſtance, the prince told him, "That the death of a ſon was a loſs he might hope to repair; but the death of a father was a loſs irreparable."

A. D. 1273. After paying the tribute of grief and duty to the memory of his father, Edward ſet out for England, and paſſing through Chalons, he was invited by the prince of that province to a tournament he was preparing to celebrate. Edward was too ambitious of glory to omit ſo favourable an opportunity of ſignalizing his courage and addreſs in arms; but the glory he acquired excited envy. Foiled in every attempt, the French knights were exaſperated, and made a ſerious attack upon the Engliſh. Fortune, however, ſtill favoured Edward; the French were repulſed, but not without a conſiderable effuſion of blood. Some hiſtorians have called this rencounter the petty battle of Chalons.

Edward having received advice that the peace of England was firmly eſtabliſhed, determined to ſettle ſome affairs on the continent before he viſited his native country. He accordingly repaired to the court of France, in order to do homage to Philip the Hardy, for his territories in France, and was received with every poſſible mark of politeneſs and regard. He afterwards repaired to Guienne, and put an end to the troubles that had for ſome time diſturbed the peace of that province. He, however, continued ſome time longer in France at the earneſt requeſt of pope Gregory IX. who having ſummoned a general council to meet at Lyons, was apprehenſive that Edward's return to England would prevent many of the biſhops of that kingdom from attending.

A. D. 1274. Having ſettled all affairs on the continent he paſſed over into England, where he was received with the moſt joyful acclamations by his ſubjects, and ſolemnly crowned at Weſtminſter on the nineteenth of Auguſt, by Robert, archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the preſence of Alexander III. king of Scotland, the duke of Britany, and all the Engliſh peers. We are told by ſome of our Engliſh hiſtorians, that Edward, to heighten the magnificence of the ceremony, gave orders for letting looſe five hundred beautiful Turkiſh horſes he had brought with him from the continent, and which were to be the property of thoſe that could catch them.

But ceremonies, however magnificent, could not long divert the attention of Edward from the affairs of government; and his ſubjects were ſoon convinced that the happineſs and glory of a ſtate, are the conſequences of the aſſiduity, wiſdom and capacity of the ſovereign. He made the great charter the rule of his conduct; and obliged the barons to obſerve it with regard to their vaſſals. The licentiouſneſs of the nobles had long been the ſource of various calamities, both with reſpect to the crown and people. He therefore took care to curtail their power, and, without invading their real privileges, rendered them obedient to the laws of their country.

A. D. 1275. The nation had long been oppreſſed by numerous bands of robbers, who ſet the power of the magiſtrate at defiance. To remove theſe diſorders, a ſevere execution of juſtice was neceſſary; and Edward applied himſelf to effect it with the utmoſt aſſiduity. He appointed judges who were able to enforce the execution of the laws; and entruſted them with an authority ſufficient to intimidate theſe troops of banditti. But the ordinary miniſters of juſtice not being ſufficient to carry the laws into execution in the weſtern counties, he appointed commiſſioners who were to make regular circuits through different parts of the kingdom, in order to take cognizance of crimes, and puniſh offenders. Theſe itinerant diſpenſers of juſtice executed their commiſſion with the utmoſt ſeverity; they did not ſometimes make the proper diſtinction between innocence and guilt; the ſmalleſt accuſation was ſufficient for a trial, and too often for very heavy puniſhments. By this method of ſuppreſſing delinquents, every quarter of the kingdom was filled with terror. Edward perceived the commiſſioners exceeded the bounds he had ſet to their power, and therefore continued their office no longer than was abſolutely neceſſary to ſuppreſs the various kinds of malefactors, murderers, robbers, incendaries, raviſhers and plunderers, that diſturbed the public tranquillity. This being effected, he prudently annulled their commiſſion.

A. D. 1276. Llewellyn, prince of Wales, who had been cloſely connected with the Montfort family, now refuſed to repair to the court of Edward and pay him homage. This exaſperated the haughty ſpirit of the Engliſh monarch, and he determined to reduce his refractory vaſſal. Llewellyn well knew the power and great abilities of Edward, and endeavoured to ſtrengthen himſelf by a ſtrict alliance with the remains of the Montfort family. He accordingly demanded Eleanor, daughter to the late earl of Leiceſter in marriage. The young lady was then at the court of France, where ſhe had taken refuge on the death of her father. The requeſt of Llewellyn was, however, readily complied with, and Eleanor embarked for Wales, under the care of her brother Aumeri; but the veſſel being taken at ſea, the betrothed princeſs was ſent to the court of Edward, where ſhe was detained as a priſoner of ſtate; but her brother was committed to Corf-caſtle. Deputies ſoon after arrived from Llewellyn, offering to ranſom the princeſs, whom he aſſerted to be detained againſt the law of nations. But Edward refuſed to ſet Eleanor at liberty, unleſs Llewellyn would engage to repair all the devaſtations committed on the borders of England, and reſtore all the caſtles he had taken during the late wars. Llewellyn refuſed the conditions, and hoſtilities immediately commenced between them; but the operations of the firſt campaign were of little conſequence, neither Edward nor Llewellyn heading their troops in perſon.

A. D. 1277. As ſoon as the ſpring was ſufficiently advanced, Edward led his army into Wales; and Llewellyn, perceiving it would be madneſs to meet the Engliſh in the open field, retreated to his woods and inacceſſible mountains, in order to haraſs the Engliſh troops; but Edward was not to be ſurprized. He cut a capacious road for his forces through a tract of woods extending from the marches on the borders of Cheſhire to Caernarvonſhire, by which means his forces penetrated with eaſe into the heart of the country. Llewellyn retreated to Snowden, the uſual place of refuge when attacked by the Engliſh. But their faſtneſſes were now of very little conſequence. Edward ſeized all the paſſes, and prevented any proviſions from being carried to Llewellyn's army. Famine ſoon reduced the Welſh prince to ſue for peace, and a treaty was concluded at Aberconway, on the following conditions; "That Llewellyn ſhould pay fifty thouſand pounds ſterling, as a ſatisfaction for damages; that he ſhould quit for ever a tract of land containing the whole country between Cheſter and the river Conway; and that he ſhould repair to the court of Edward and perform his homage." Edward, however, thought proper to remit the payment of the fifty thouſand pounds, and brought Llewellyn with him to London, where he did homage and ſwore fealty in the preſence of a great number of the prelates and nobility of England. The ceremony being over, Edward delivered Eleanor to him, and cauſed their nuptials to be celebrated with great magnificence.

A. D. 1278. A parliament being ſummoned at Glouceſter, ſeveral excellent ſtatutes were made for ſecuring the rights and liberties of the ſubject, and providing for the better adminiſtration of juſtice. But among the many excellent regulations made by Edward for the advantage and happineſs of his people, he took one ſtep that again threatened the nation with all the miſeries of a civil war. He iſſued commiſſions to enquire into all the encroachments made on the royal demeſnes; and all perſons were ſummoned to produce the titles by which they held their eſtates. The barons were ſufficiently alarmed, and vigorouſly oppoſed the order, as cruel and oppreſſive. Among others, John, earl of Warenne and Surry, was cited before the king's commiſſioners for that purpoſe. He obeyed the ſummons, but on being called upon to produce his titles, drew a family ſword he had brought with him for that purpoſe, and addreſſed the court in the following manner: "It was with this ſword, that my anceſtors, who came in with William the baſtard, acquired their poſſeſſions; and by the ſame I will defend them: it was not for himſelf only that William conquered: it was not for him alone that my anceſtors fought." This noble and ſpirited declaration, which was conſonant to the ſenſe of all the old Engliſh nobility, put an end to the enquiry. Edward ſoon ſaw his error, and immediately revoked the commiſſion.

Among other grievances, the nation had for ſome time ſuffered exceedingly from the adulteration of the coin, which had raiſed the price of the neceſſaries of life to ſuch an exceſſive height, that the foreign commerce of the kingdom was almoſt ruined. The Jews were ſuſpected of being the authors of that deſtructive practice, and little proof was neceſſary to convict them of the offence. The prejudices entertained againſt that deſpiſed people were now ſo violent, that the laws of humanity were thought not to extend to them. No leſs than two hundred and eighty of them were hanged in one day at London, beſides thoſe that ſuffered in different parts of England. Multitudes of them were ruined by the confiſcation of their houſes and property; and though Edward ordered one half of the money which was raiſed in this cruel manner to be ſet apart for thoſe who ſhould embrace chriſtianity, very few of them accepted the offer: they could not think of embracing a religion, which they unjuſtly conſidered as the ſource of the barbarities exerciſed by its profeſſors.

A. D. 1281. Though Llewellyn had ſtrictly obſerved the conditions of the treaty, yet the officers of Edward had committed ſo many acts of violence upon the Welſh, that they implored the protection of their prince againſt their inſolent neighbours. Llewellyn made ſtrong remonſtrances to Edward, but without effect: the grievances ſtill continued. Exaſperated at ſuch unjuſt treatment, the Welſh determined rather to encounter a force which they had already experienced to be ſo much ſuperior to their own, than bear any longer the oppreſſions of the haughty victors. David, brother to Llewellyn, had long ſerved the crown of England with the utmoſt fidelity; but exaſperated at the unjuſt oppreſſions of his countrymen, he joined his brother, and offered to head the army, and venture his life to retrieve the liberties and independence of that ancient people. The generous propoſal was joyfully accepted; the whole nation flew to arms, and joined the ſtandard of David, who led them immediately againſt their oppreſſors. Several caſtles ſoon fell into their hands, and they ſeverely retaliated on the Engliſh, the miſeries they had ſo long ſuffered from their unprovoked cruelty.

Alarmed at the progreſs, and piqued at the ſucceſs of the inſurgents over his Engliſh ſubjects, Edward determined to cruſh for ever a people who had only taken up arms in defence of their liberties, and to procure that redreſs, they had ſo often ſollicited in vain. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, deſirous of preventing the effuſion of human blood, exerted all his intereſt to bring about an accommodation, and made ſeveral equitable propoſals by the requeſt of Llewellyn and his brother, for ſheathing the ſword of deſtruction, and preventing the horrid devaſtation that muſt enſue, if the bloody ſtandard of war ſhould be carried into the country of that diſtreſſed and injured people. But his labours were in vain. Edward was determined to put a final period to the government of Wales, and exterminate all the remains of its ancient independence.

A. D. 1282. This reſolution being taken, Edward led his army into the enemy's country, without meeting any oppoſition, Llewellyn and his brother having retired to their faſtneſſes in Snowden, waiting for an opportunity of falling on the Engliſh when embarraſſed among the woods, with which that part of the country was over-run.

Edward, who had learned experience from his former expedition, inveſted the enemy by ſecuring all the avenues through which it was poſſible for them to eſcape, and threw a bridge of boats over the river Menay, oppoſite to Bangor. Before this work was entirely completed, three hundred men at arms, under the command of lord Latimer and Lucas de Thany, a Gaſcon, paſſed the river to amuſe the enemy, while the main body of the army croſſed the bridge. The Welſh, who were well acquainted with the nature of the river, and knew that the water would ſoon ſwell and cut off their retreat, did not for ſome time moleſt the Engliſh in their paſſage; but when about fifteen hundred of them were landed, they ruſhed down from their mountains with the moſt horrid cries, and fell upon the Engliſh with ſuch fury and reſolution, that they were immediately routed with the moſt dreadful ſlaughter, not a man eſcaping to carry the news of their misfortune, except lord Latimer, whoſe horſe ſwam with him acroſs the river.

This dreadful defeat ſo diſpirited the Engliſh, that for ſome time their operations were ſuſpended: they found it impoſſible to advance, and were aſhamed to retire. The Welſh, on the other hand, fluſhed with their late ſucceſs, and encouraged by the inactivity of the enemy, began to think themſelves invincible; and their bards having perſuaded them that the period was arrived for the accompliſhment of the prophecy of the great Merlin, who had foretold, that one of the race of Llewellyn would ride through the ſtreets of London with a crown on his head. This ridiculous notion, well adapted to the ignorance and ſuperſtition of the times, proved the deſtruction of Welſh army. It was reſolved to commit the care of Snowdon to David, while Llewellyn himſelf led the main body of the forces againſt the enemy.

This fatal reſolution being taken, the prince advanced into Radnorſhire, in order to join the remains of Montfort's party; but his little army was met at Pont Orewyn, a bridge which ſecures the paſſage over the Wye, by a detachment of the Engliſh, and totally defeated; and he himſelf, who had advanced ſome diſtance before his troops, killed by the hand of one Adam de Frampton, who carried his head to Edward, then encamped at Conway. Thus fell the famous Llewellyn, a prince deſcended from one of the moſt ancient royal families in Europe, and with him the ſmall remains of Welſh liberty expired; after having been preſerved in that little corner of the iſland above eighteen hundred years, againſt all the efforts of the Engliſh monarchy, though deſtitute both of foreign alliances, and a naval power.

The death of Llewellyn ſtruck the Welſh with terror; they made no farther efforts to ſupport the falling ſtate of their country: the greater part of them ſubmitted to the Engliſh. David himſelf retired to the woods and faſtneſſes of the mountains, where he continued for ſome time in the greateſt diſtreſs; but was at laſt ſeized by his own countrymen in one of his retreats, and ſent in chains to Edward. The captivity of David put a final period to all oppoſition: the Welſh nobility delivered up their caſtles, and the whole country ſubmitted to the conqueror.

A. D. 1283. A parliament was ſummoned at Shrewſbury, to determine the fate of the unfortunate captive. The trial was, however, ſoon determined, and David, inſtead of being reſpected as the defender of the liberties of his country, was condemned to be hanged as a robber and a traitor. Such was ſtill the ferocity of the greateſt princes of this barbarous age! The bards, or Welſh poets, were alſo devoted to deſtruction. Edward well knew that nothing had a more powerful influence to keep alive the ideas of military valour and of ancient glory, than the traditional poetry of the people, when aſſiſted by the power of muſic, and jollity of feſtivals. He therefore gathered together all the Welſh bards, and by a policy equally cruel and unjuſt, ordered them all to be put to death; ſo greatly did Edward dread the impreſſion they might make on a people, jealous to exceſs of their ancient liberty. The following anecdote, which is very properly adapted to the taſte of monkiſh writers, is related by ſeveral of our hiſtorians. "Edward, ſay they, aſſembling the Welſh, promiſed to give them a prince of unexceptionable manners, born in their own country, and one who could ſpeak no other language. The favour was accepted with the greateſt acclamations of joy, and promiſe of obedience; and he immediately beſtowed the inveſtiture of the principality on his ſon Edward, then an infant, and born at Caernarvon." Since that period, the principality of Wales has given title to the eldeſt ſons of the kings of England.

A.D. 1286. The tranquillity of the whole kingdom was now ſo firmly ſettled, that Edward paſſed over to the continent, in order to mediate a peace between Alphonſo, king of Arragon, and Philip the Fair, who had lately ſucceeded his father, Philip the Hardy, in the crown of France. He continued there near three years; and during the greater part of the time, was employed in this intricate negotiation, which was at laſt happily terminated by the labours of the Engliſh monarch, whoſe power was dreaded, and whoſe virtues were revered in every part of Europe.

A.D. 1290. But during his abſence, great diſorders had happened in the kingdom. The ſtreams of juſtice were poiſoned at their fountains by the corruption of the judges. Edward was determined to examine very ſtrictly into their conduct; and accordingly ſummoned a parliament for that purpoſe, to meet at London, and before that aſſembly the judges were tried. Two only were found innocent: the proofs againſt the reſt were ſo clear, that they made no defence, and were all depoſed, and ſeverely fined. The two judges who were found, on the ſtricteſt examination, to have adminiſtered juſtice with integrity, were John de Martingham, and Elias de Bokingham, both clergymen. In this parliament an act paſſed for baniſhing the Jews; and near fifteen thouſand of that deſpiſed people, after being ſtripped of their property, except ſuch ſums as were neceſſary to pay their paſſage to the continent, were ſent out of the kingdom. But many of them were not ſuffered to eſcape even with ſo ſmall a pittance of their fortune: numbers were murdered by the ſeamen in their paſſage; and others, after being plundered of their little all, were left deſtitute on an inhoſpitable ſhore. Such are the dreadful effects of enthuſiaſtic vengeance, when under no reſtraint from the laws of humanity. Nor did even this ſtretch of the common rights of nature and nations remove the complaint that gave riſe to ſo cruel and imprudent a meaſure. It was thought that uſury would be baniſhed with the Jews; but this was a fatal miſtake. The prohibitions againſt lending money, and the neceſſity in a trading nation for that practice to ſubſiſt, only increaſed the evil. The Engliſh themſelves now became the uſurers; but as both the canon and municipal laws permitted no Chriſtian to receive intereſt, all tranſactions of this kind were clandeſtine, and conſequently, the intereſt was greatly augmented, becauſe none would lend money but on receiving a gratuity proportionable to the riſk and infamy to which he was expoſed for lending it.

While Edward was thus employed in what he thought a religious duty, he loſt his beloved queen Eleanor, the fond partner in all his dangers and diſtreſs in Paleſtine. She died at Hodeſby, in Lincolnſhire, on the twenty-ninth of November, leaving the king overwhelmed with the moſt poignant grief. Her remains were carried to Weſtminſter, and interred in the abbey with great funeral pomp: and at every place where her body reſted, and where dirges were ſung for the repoſe of her ſoul, Edward cauſed ſtone croſſes, on which her arms were engraven, to be erected to her memory. Some of theſe monuments ſtill remain, but greatly defaced.

It had always been lamented by the greateſt ſtateſmen, that England and Scotland were not united; and ſome attempts had been made to produce ſo deſirable an event. Alexander III. king of Scotland, had been unfortunately killed by a fall from his horſe in the year 1286, leaving no male iſſue. Margaret, daughter to Eric King of Norway, and grand-daughter to Alexander, was the only lineal deſcendant from the royal family of Scotland. This princeſs, then an infant, and known by the name of The Maid of Norway, was recognized ſucceſſor by the ſtates of Scotland. Edward, who was great-uncle to the Norwegian princeſs, now flattered himſelf that an opportunity offered for uniting the two kingdoms; and accordingly propoſed a marriage between his ſon, the prince of Wales, and the Maid of Norway. The friendſhip which had for ſome time prevailed between the two nations, greatly facilitated this project, ſo favourable to the grandeur and happineſs of both kingdoms. The eſtates of Scotland were pleaſed with the offers of Edward, and the marriage was agreed to on the following conditions:

1. That the Scots ſhall enjoy all their privileges and immunities, both eccleſiaſtical and civil; ſaving the rights of the king of England, or any other perſon on the marches or elſewhere.

2. That if Edward and Margaret ſhould die without iſſue of the body of Margaret, the kingdom ſhall revert, intire, free, abſolute, and independent, to the next immediate heir.

3. That in caſe of the death of prince Edward without iſſue of the body of Margaret, her majeſty's perſon ſhall be remitted in like manner free, and independent, to Scotland.

4. That no perſon, either of the clergy or laity, ſhall be compelled to go out of the kingdom, to aſk leave either to elect, or preſent thoſe they have elected; nor to do their homage, fealty and ſervices; nor to proſecute law-ſuits; nor, in a word, to perform any thing uſually done in Scotland.

5. That the kingdom of Scotland ſhall have its chancellor, officers of ſtate, courts of judicature, &c. as before; and that a new ſeal ſhall be made and kept by the chancellor; but with the ordinary arms of Scotland, and the name of none but the queen of Scotland engraved upon it.

6. That all the papers, records, privileges, and other documents of the royal dignity of the crown and kingdom of Scotland, ſhall be lodged in ſome ſecure place within the kingdom, at the pleaſure of the nobility, whoſe ſeals ſhould be appended to them, and there kept till either the queen ſhall return to her own kingdom, or ſhall have heirs to ſucceed her.

7. That all parliaments, when called to treat of matters concerning the ſtate or inhabitants of Scotland, ſhall be held within the limits of the kingdom.

8. That no duties, taxes, levies of men, &c. ſhall be exacted in Scotland, but ſuch as, being uſual in former times, ſhall conſiſt with the common intereſt and good of the nation.

9. That the king of England ſhall oblige himſelf and his heirs, in a bond of one hundred thouſand pounds ſterling, payable to the church of Rome, and to be applied to ſupport the cruſades in the Holy Land, to make reſtitution of the kingdom in the caſes aforeſaid; and that he ſhall conſent that the pope reſtrain him and his heirs, by excommunicating them, and interdicting their kingdom to both the above reſtrictions, and payment of the ſaid ſum of money, if he or they do not ſtand to the premiſes.

10. That Edward, at his own expence, ſhall procure the pope to confirm theſe articles, within a year after the conſummation of the marriage; and alſo, that within the ſame time the bull of his holineſs ſhall be delivered to the eſtates of the kingdom of Scotland.

Theſe articles being ratified, the biſhop of Durham was appointed queen's lieutenant in Scotland; and two of the Scottiſh commiſſioners, the earl of Warrenne, and the dean of York, embarked for Norway, to ſettle every thing relative to the marriage; but in their return with the young princeſs, they were unfortunately overtaken by a dreadful ſtorm, and driven into one of the Orkneys, where ſhe died. Thus were all the hopes formed on this coalition ſuddenly deſtroyed, and Scotland involved in all the calamities that attend a diſputed ſucceſſion.

The principal competitors for the Scottiſh crown were Robert Bruce and John Baliol, both deſcended in the female line from the brother of that William who had been taken priſoner by Henry II. Bruce was the ſon of one of the younger daughters of the earl of Huntingdon, William's brother; and Baliol was the ſon of Devergilda, the only daughter of the eldeſt. The former was, therefore, one degree nearer the common ſtock; but the latter had a preferable title according to the law of primogeniture. The Scots, who were at this time a groſs and ignorant people, were little qualified to diſcuſs the claims of theſe competitors. The parliament was divided; and if they had determined the diſpute by a plurality of voices, the competitors were ſo powerful, that there were little hopes of their ſubmitting to their deciſion; the animoſities of the parties would, in all probability, have been heightened, and the nation plunged into all the horrors of a civil war. It was therefore reſolved to refer the conteſt to the king of England, who had already ſhewn himſelf ſo able and impartial an arbitrator in ſeveral contentions between different princes of Europe, and who was ſufficiently powerful to compel the unſucceſsful claimant to ſubmit to his ſentence.

A. D. 1291. Edward readily accepted the office; but they little thought he would abuſe their confidence, in order to impoſe on their independence. He determined to eſtabliſh a right of ſuperiority over Scotland, a project he had ſome time ſince formed, though he had hitherto wiſhed to obtain it rather by compact than claim; by the arts of policy and addreſs, rather than by force of arms. He wiſhed not to plant his ſtandard of power in fields manured with the blood of their inhabitants. He ſought, with the utmoſt diligence, for proofs in ancient hiſtories; but the only circumſtance he inſiſted on, which had the leaſt appearance of plauſibility, was the homage paid by William to Henry II. tho' Richard I. had renounced this homage. Furniſhed, however, with a number of uncertain teſtimonies, he advanced to Norham, a town on the northern banks of the Tweed, at the head of a powerful army, to give weight to the unexpected claim he intended to make. On his arrival, he invited the parliament of Scotland, and the competitors for the crown, to his camp; where the chief juſticiary told the aſſembly, "That the king had taken the greateſt pains to collect proofs from all the ancient records and chronicles, to determine this important truth, namely, That the kings of Scotland had been dependent on the Engliſh monarchs from time immemorial, and had accordingly done them homage, except when they had taken advantage of the inteſtine commotions of the nation, or the reign of a weak prince, to withdraw their allegiance. The king was, therefore, intitled to decide this diſpute, not in virtue of the reference made to him, but in the quality of liege lord of the kingdom."

The aſſembly were aſtoniſhed at ſo unexpected a declaration; but it was in vain to make any reſiſtance. They, however, begged to have ſome time allowed them to give in their anſwer, as many of the prelates and nobility of Scotland were abſent, whoſe advice was neceſſary in a point of ſo much importance. Edward conſented to indulge them with three weeks for that purpoſe; and iſſued ſafe conducts for all the nobility of Scotland to repair to Norham on the day appointed for giving in their anſwer. No objection being made by the barons to Edward's claim, the king addreſſed himſelf to the ſeveral competitors. requiring their acknowledgement of his ſuperiority. Bruce was the firſt to acknowledge it; while Baliol, afraid of giving offence to the Scottiſh nation, conſented with more reluctance. Having gained this important acknowledgement, Edward demanded that the principal caſtles in that kingdom ſhould be put into his hands; adding, that it would be in vain for him to pronounce any ſentence, without having it in his power to enforce it. The demand was complied with; and Edward having named commiſſioners to inquire into the claims of the competitors, and promiſed to pronounce ſentence the enſuing year, returned to England. The moſt celebrated lawyers of Europe were now conſulted on this queſtion; and the idea of a repreſentation was ſo well underſtood, that their anſwers were unanimous in favour of Baliol.

A. D. 1293. After long debates, and ſeveral adjournments, Edward pronounced ſentence in favour of Baliol; and he was immediately put in poſſeſſion of the kingdom. All the Engliſh garriſons were withdrawn, and Baliol did homage, and ſwore fealty to Edward. He was alſo received as king of Scotland by all the nobility, and crowned at Scone with the uſual formalities.

Some of the moſt bloody wars in Europe have aroſe from very trifling cauſes; but, perhaps, none from one of leſs importance than that which now threatened two powerful kingdoms with deſolation. Two ſeamen, one belonging to a Norman, and the other to an Engliſh ſhip, having ſome diſpute at a ſpring near Bayonne, with regard to the preference of filling their caſks with water, the Norman attempted to ſtab the Engliſhman with a dagger he drew from his ſide. The latter perceived his deſign, grappled with him, threw his adverſary on the ground, and the Norman was killed by falling on his own dagger. Exaſperated at the death of their countryman, the Normans determined to take the ſevereſt revenge; and meeting with an Engliſh veſſel, they hanged ſeveral of the crew at the yard-arm, together with ſome dogs; bidding the mariners inform their countrymen, that vengeance was now taken for the blood of the Norman killed at Bayonne. The Engliſh were not formed to bear ſo deliberate an inſult: they made ſevere repriſals: the ſeas were covered with hoſtile fleets, while the kings of France and England ſeemed indifferent ſpectators of the dreadful outrages committed by their ſubjects. Fleets were fitted out for carrying on this new ſpecies of war, which now became truly alarming; and increaſed to ſuch a degree, that in one of thoſe naval engagements, the French loſt near fifteen thouſand men. Philip the Fair now demanded ſatisfaction from Edward; and being diſſatisfied with his anſwer, cited him to appear before the peers of France, as duke of Guienne. Edward ſent his brother Edmund into France, in order to accommodate the quarrel, and prevent, if poſſible, the ravages of a bloody war.

While theſe negotiations were carrying on at the court of France, an event happened which left the Scots no room to doubt of the abſolute ſtate of vaſſalage into which they were fallen. A burgher of Berwick, complaining of an injury he had received from ſome Engliſh commiſſioners ſent into Scotland, Edward ordered the cauſe to be tried in England by his judges. The council of Scotland conſidering this order as a breach of promiſe in Edward, who had aſſured them, that any offences committed in their kingdom ſhould be cognizable only in the Scottiſh courts, ſent a remonſtrance to the Engliſh monarch. But they obtained not redreſs: Edward declared, "That the cauſe ſhould be tried in England; it belonged not to vaſſals to puniſh thoſe that repreſented the perſon of their ſovereign." But if the Scots were mortified at this inſtance of their dependency, they were much more ſo in the treatment of their new king, who was ſoon after obliged to appear perſonally before Edward, in his court at Weſtminſter, to anſwer a complaint exhibited againſt him by the earl of Fife, for ſeizing certain eſtates of which he had been inveſted by Edward's particular order. At this trial Baliol was obliged to relinquiſh the ſeat of honour hitherto filled by the kings of Scotland in the Engliſh courts, and to plead his own cauſe at the bar as a common defendant. This puſillanimous ſubmiſſion rendered Baliol ſo contemptible to the Scottiſh nobility, that they choſe a regency of twelve perſons to direct the management of affairs. The Scottiſh monarch was alarmed; and notwithſtanding the facility of his temper, determined to ſhake off ſo ignominious a dependence. He left the court of London without taking leave, and Edward ſeized all his eſtates in England. Baliol ſaw his danger, and concluded a treaty with Philip. An incident that gave riſe to that ſtrict union which continued ſo many ages between the French and Scottiſh nations.

Edward intended by theſe indignities to engage Baliol in rebellion, that he might have a pretence for making an entire conqueſt of Scotland; but the ſituation of affairs on the continent prevented him from carrying his deſigns into execution. The French monarch refuſed to liſten to any accommodation, unleſs ſome expedient could be found for repairing his honour, which he pretended was wounded on account of his being the liege lord of Edward with regard to his poſſeſſions on the continent. It was therefore propoſed that the Engliſh monarch ſhould put Philip in poſſeſſion of Guienne, as a reparation for the inſult; and that the king of France ſhould immediately reſtore it to Edward. Philip promiſed, on the word of a king, to perform his part of the treaty; and Edmund was commiſſioned to give him the ſatisfaction he deſired. But the French king had no ſooner obtained poſſeſſion of the province, than he refuſed to fulfil his engagement, cited Edward to appear in the court of France, and on his refuſing to obey the ſummons, the province of Guienne, by a formal ſentence, was declared to be forfeited and annexed to the crown. Enraged at the ſhameful duplicity of Philip, Edward determined to take a ſevere revenge; while this infamous breach of faith awakened the higheſt reſentment among the Engliſh, who reſolved to ſupport their monarch to the utmoſt of their power.

But large ſupplies were neceſſary for raiſing armies ſufficient for attacking ſo formidable a power, and alſo keeping in awe the Welſh and Scots, both theſe people having given plain indications of embracing the firſt favourable opportunity of recovering their former independence. Edward had experienced the difficulties of raiſing money on the people without obtaining their conſent, and therefore determined to purſue the method pointed out by Leiceſter during the late reign. He ſummoned two deputies from every every borough, in order to procure their leave to the levying of the neceſſary taxes on the people. "It is an excellent rule," ſaid Edward in the preamble to this writ, "that what concerns all, ſhould be approved by all; and that common dangers ſhould be repelled by united efforts:" A noble principle, and worthy of a more enlightened age! Nor did Edward ſtop here. He ſummoned alſo deputies from the inferior clergy, and theſe formed a lower houſe of convocation. They, however, refuſed to obey the king's writ, leſt it ſhould be conſtrued as an acknowledgement of their having ſubmitted to the authority of the temporal power. It was therefore agreed that the king ſhould iſſue his writ to the archbiſhops, who ſhould, in conſequence, ſummon the clergy. The king intended that theſe deputies ſhould, with the prelates, have formed one eſtate of the kingdom; but this expedient rendered it neceſſary for the eccleſiaſtics to meet in two houſes of convocation, under their reſpective archbiſhops. The Engliſh parliament, for the aſſembly now properly deſerved that name, being met, the barons and knights granted the king an eleventh of their moveables, the burgeſſes a ſeventh, and the clergy a tenth.

A. D. 1296. The war with France had for ſome time been carried on with various ſucceſs; when pope Celeſtine, deſirous of engaging the powers of Europe in another cruſade, offered his mediation, and a truce was made between the belligerent powers. This ceſſation of hoſtilities with Philip enabled Edward to make preparations for repelling the attempts of the Scots, whom he knew were highly exaſperated at the affront their king had lately received. While he was employed in raiſing an army neceſſary for that purpoſe, he received advice of the treaty ſecretly concluded between Baliol and Philip; but he was not intimidated by the cloſe connection between theſe two powers. He ſummoned Baliol to perform the duty of a vaſſal, and cited him to appear before the Engliſh parliament; but he refuſed the citation, and having procured a diſpenſation from his oath of fealty, he renounced his homage and defied the Engliſh monarch. Exaſperated at the conduct of Baliol, Edward marched to the northward at the head of thirty thouſand foot, and four thouſand horſe. The Scots army was more numerous, being compoſed of forty thouſand infantry, and five hundred horſe, but they wanted both diſcipline and experience; and, what was ſtill of more conſequence, diſſentions prevailed among the leaders. From theſe alarming appearances, ſeveral of the Scottiſh nobility, among whom were Robert Bruce, the father and ſon, the earls of March and Angus, prognoſticated the ruin of their country, and made their ſubmiſſion to Edward, who now paſſed the Tweed at Coldſtream, without oppoſition. Berwick was taken by aſſault, and above ſeven thouſand of the garriſon put to the ſword; the governor, Sir William Douglas, was taken priſoner. Earl Warrenne was then diſpatched, at the head of ten thouſand men, to beſiege the caſtle of Dunbar, defended by the flower of the Scottiſh nobility.

Baliol knew the importance of this fortreſs, and determined to venture a battle for its relief: and Warrenne, informed of his intention, marched to meet him, when a dreadful battle enſued. The Scots, bad armed and diſciplined, could not ſupport the furious charge of the Engliſh; they were ſoon broke, and driven with great ſlaughter from the field of battle; above twenty thouſand of them are ſaid to have fallen by the ſwords of the Engliſh. The caſtle ſurrendered the next day to Edward, who then joined his army, and purſued his conqueſts without any farther oppoſition from Baliol's army. The caſtles of Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and Sterling ſubmitted after a feeble reſiſtance; and all the ſouthern parts of the kingdom were immediately ſubdued by the Engliſh. The timid Baliol, inſtead of retreating to the mountainous parts of the country, where he might have ſupported himſelf againſt all the attempts of the Engliſh, haſtened to make his ſubmiſſion. He expreſſed the deepeſt penitence for having diſobeyed his liege lord, and made a ſolemn reſignation of his crown into the hands of Edward, at Brechin, on the tenth of July. He was ſent priſoner to the tower of London, and two years afterwards ſubmitted to a voluntary baniſhment in France, where, without making any farther attempts for the recovery of his throne, he died in a private ſtation.

Scotland being thus ſubdued, Edward ſent to London the regalia, together with the famous fatidical marble ſtone, on which all the preceding kings of Scotland had, for many ages, been ſeated, when they received inauguration. The popular ſuperſtition of the Scots paid the higheſt veneration to this ſtone, which was regarded as the true palladium of their monarchy, and the ultimate reſource in every national misfortune. The chief offices of the kingdom were entruſted to Engliſhmen. All the records and monuments of antiquity were deſtroyed; and the conqueror returned to England, perſuaded that he had fully reduced the kingdom of Scotland to ſubjection.

But this expedition had drained his coffers, and he was obliged to have recourſe to his parliament for a farther ſupply, in order to enable him to wreſt the province of Guienne out of the hands of Philip, the truce with that monarch being now expired. The barons and burgeſſes very readily complied with his requeſt, but he met with an oppoſition from the clergy, which was attended with ſome important conſequences. Robert de Winchelſey, archbiſhop of Canterbury, had procured a bull from pope Boniface VIII. who had lately ſucceeded Celeſtine in the papal chair, prohibiting the princes of Chriſtendom, under the penalty of excommunication, from levying, ing, without his conſent, any tax on the clergy; and reſtraining, under the ſame penalty, all eccleſiaſtics from ſubmitting to ſuch impoſitions. Edward, who knew nothing of this bull, was aſtoniſhed when the clergy refuſed their aſſiſtance, and publiſhed the bull, as a reaſon for their conduct. But Edward was not formed to ſubmit to inſults; he, however, adjourned the parliament till the fourteenth of January, that they might have time to deliberate on his demand, and form their final reſolution.

A. D. 1297. Edward hoped that a little reflection would have rendered the clergy more conformable to his demands; but he was miſtaken; the archbiſhop of Canterbury, in the name of the whole body, anſwered, "That the clergy owed obedience to two ſovereigns, their ſpiritual and temporal; but their duty bound them to a much ſtricter attachment to the former than the latter." Edward, though highly enraged, concealed his reſentment; but told them, that as they refuſed to aſſiſt the civil power, it was unreaſonable for them to expect any protection from the laws. With this anſwer the clergy were diſmiſſed, and orders iſſued to the judges, to receive no cauſe brought before them by any eccleſiaſtic; to hear and decide all cauſes in which they were defendants; to do every man juſtice againſt them; but to do them juſtice againſt nobody; at the ſame time he locked up all their granaries, and barns, and prohibited any rent to be paid them. The clergy were aſtoniſhed; they had never before experienced the proper reſentment of an Engliſh monarch. The archbiſhop of York and his clergy complied with the king's requeſt, and received the royal protection; but Winchelſey grew more obſtinate from perſecution. He ordered the pope's bull to be publiſhed in all the churches of his province, and convened a ſynod of his ſuffragans at St. Paul's in London. But Edward, aware of his intention, iſſued a writ, inhibiting him, under pain of impriſonment, from denouncing any eccleſiaſtical cenſure either againſt the king, his miniſters, or ſubjects. At the ſame time, the archdeacon of Bath appealed, in the king's name, to the pope againſt all proceedings; an expedient which effectually ſuſpended every operation of the ſynod.

The clergy now found themſelves in the moſt dreadful ſituation. Their houſes and convents might indeed have afforded them a ſafe retreat, but they were in want of ſubſiſtence; and whenever they ventured abroad, they were robbed and abuſed by every ruffian. The people, who had hitherto beheld them with a kind of religious awe, now looked upon them with contempt, and laughed at their ſufferings. The archbiſhop himſelf was robbed of his equipage and furniture, and at laſt reduced to board himſelf with a ſingle ſervant, in the houſe of a poor clergyman. This ſituation was not to be endured: experience convinced them, that a deprivation of the advantages of citizens was the greateſt calamity; and they accordingly became ſollicitous to ſatisfy both the king and the ſtate. But in order to avoid an open diſobedience to the poſitive injunctions of Boniface, inſtead of granting the king a fifth of their movenbles, they agreed to depoſit an equivalent ſum of money in ſome church or convent; whence it was taken by the king's officers.

Theſe ſupplies, tho' very conſiderable, were far from being ſufficient to anſwer the deſigns formed by Edward for taking ample vengeance on Philip for his perfidy; ſo that he was obliged to have recourſe to arbitrary meaſures, extremely oppreſſive to the people. He impoſed a tax of forty ſhillings on every ſack of wool exported; he ſeized, without conſent of the owners, the cattle and other commodities neceſſary for the ſupply of his army; and required the attendance of every proprietor of land, poſſeſſed of twenty pounds a year, even though he was not a tenant of the crown, and therefore not obliged by the tenure of his eſtate to perform any ſuch ſervice. It is no wonder that deſpotic meaſures like theſe, occaſioned great uneaſineſs in the kingdom. The nobility were alarmed; they gave countenance and authority to the complaints of the people, and Edward was ſoon convinced that he had purſued imprudent meaſures. An army was aſſembled on the ſea coaſt, which Edward intended to embark for Guienne under the command of Humphrey Bohun, earl of Hereford, the conſtable, and Roger Bigod, earl of Norfolk, the mareſchal of England; while Edward himſelf, at the head of another army, attacked the French on the ſide of Flanders. This incident gave the two barons an opportunity of ſhewing their reſentment at the arbitrary meaſures purſued by the king. They affirmed that their office obliged them only to attend his perſon in the wars, and therefore refuſed to lead the army. A violent altercation enſued; and the king, turning himſelf to the conſtable, exclaimed, "By God, Sir earl, you ſhall either go, or hang." "By God, Sir king," replied the conſtable, "I will neither go nor hang." And immediately left the army, with the mareſchal, and about thirty other barons of very conſiderable power.

Edward, however provoked by the refuſal of the barons, was prudent enough to conceal his reſentment, and laid aſide his expedition into Guienne. He ſaw his error, and endeavoured, by purſuing conciliating methods, to get the better of this oppoſition. He careſſed his nobility; he reconciled himſelf to the clergy; he made an apology for his conduct, which he imputed to the urgent neceſſities of the crown: and promiſed, on his return from his expedition, to redreſs all grievances, and reſtore the execution of the laws.

Theſe political meaſures convinced the two earls, that it would be very imprudent to carry their reſentments farther than they were warranted by the laws of their country. They accordingly contented themſelves with drawing up a remonſtrance, which was preſented to the king at Winchelſea, when he was ready to embark for Flanders. Edward again promiſed them redreſs as ſoon as he returned to England, and added, that he hoped thoſe nobles who had declined leading his army, would do no injury to his crown or kingdom during his abſence. The barons were, however, far from being ſatisfied, and he had hardly landed on the continent, before the conſtable and mareſchal inſiſted on an authentic confirmation both of the great charter, and the charter of the foreſts. Edward was very deſirous of putting it off till his return, but the parliament, which had been aſſembled at London by his order, joining with the two earls, and the charters being ſent over to Flanders, he confirmed them in preſence of all the prelates and nobility in his army.

A. D. 1298. Edward, though he loſt no time by indolence, did not land in Flanders till the ſeaſon was too far advanced for making any attempt of importance. The earl of Flanders, who had joined in a league with Edward, ſoon experienced the power and reſentment of Philip. Liſle, St. Omer, Courtray, and Ypres were already wreſted from him, and many more of the principal places in his dominions were threatened with the ſame fate. The arrival of Edward indeed put a ſtop to the ſucceſs of Philip; but the two kings, inſtead of venturing a deciſive action, agreed to a truce for two years, and engaged to ſubmit their differences to the arbitration of pope Boniface. But as both theſe monarchs were jealous of the claims made on the moſt trivial pretences by the holy ſee, they took care to inſert in their reference, that they did not ſubmit their differences to his deciſion, from any right he might pretend by virtue of his pontifical character, but merely by their own conſent, as a private perſon. The pope ſoon gave his ſentence, which ſeemed to have been dictated by his paſſion rather than his judgment. He commanded not only a reſtitution of Guienne, but alſo the places which had been taken from the earl of Flanders. Philip was deſirous of comprehending John Baliol and the Scots in this treaty; but this was abſolutely refuſed by Edward. At laſt the two monarchs compromiſed their differences, by making mutual ſacrifices to each other. Edward abandoned his ally, the earl of Flanders; and Philip gave up the Scots. This is not the only time the intereſts of allies have been ſacrificed at the altar of ambition. The ſentence of Boniface was, however, regarded, and the treaty cemented by a double marriage; that of Edward himſelf with Margaret, Philip's ſiſter; and that of the prince of Wales with Iſabella, the daughter of that monarch.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, the Scots made a ſucceſsful effort for the recovery of their liberties. Edward had not been fortunate in his choice of perſons to whom he had committed the adminiſtration of affairs in Scotland. Warrenne, earl of Surry, to whom the chief authority had been delegated, was, indeed, a man of prudence, virtue, and abilities; but his ill ſtate of health obliged him to return to England. At his departure, the reins of government were intruſted to William de Ormeſby, chief juſticiary, and Creſſingham, the treaſurer. The former was diſtinguiſhed by the rigour and ſeverity of his temper, and the latter by his avarice. Perſons of ſuch characters were ill adapted to the taſk of reconciling the Scots to a yoke they bore with the utmoſt reluctance. Inſtead of making uſe of moderate and lenient meaſures, they treated them as a conquered people, and made them ſenſible of the ſervitude into which they were fallen. This exaſperated the whole nation, and the Scots reſolved to attempt the recovery of their ancient liberty.

Among thoſe who had ſeverely felt the hand of power, was one William Wallace, a perſon of ſmall fortune, but deſcended from an ancient family. He ſaw the diſtreſſes of the people, and undertook the defence of his country. He was of a gigantic ſtature, prodigious ſtrength, heroic courage, and diſintereſted magnanimity. He had retired to the woods, to avoid the vengeance of the government; and put himſelf at the head of a ſmall body of men, who, like himſelf, had fled from the tyranny of the Engliſh. He planned his enterprizes with ſo much prudence, that he was always ſucceſsful; and the fame of his exploits ſoon increaſed the number of his followers. He now determined to attack the governors, and accordingly advanced to Scone for that purpoſe. But Ormeſby and Creſſingham, apprized of his intention, fled into England, and were followed by all the other officers of that kingdom. Elated at this ſucceſs, the Scots flew to arms; and ſome of the principal barons, among whom was Sir William Douglas, openly countenanced the party of Wallace.

The earl of Surry was now ſufficiently alarmed, and endeavoured to recover by the celerity of his motions what he had loſt by neglect. He entered Annandale, and came up with the Scottiſh army at Irvine before they were ſufficiently formed. The nobility finding it would be in vain to oppoſe the Engliſh, made their ſubmiſſion, and obtained a pardon. Wallace, however, at the head of a choſen body of men, who had all bound themſelves by an oath never to lay down their arms till they had effected the liberty of their country, retired before the capitulation was ſigned, and took poſt on a hill above the monaſtery of Cambuſkenneth, in the neighbourhood of Stirling. Warrenne continued his march, and diſcovered the enemy on the oppoſite bank of Forth; but, at the ſame time, perceived the danger of attacking them in this advantageous ſituation, eſpecially as the bridge over the Forth was ſo narrow, as hardly to admit two men a-breaſt. Sir Richard Lundy, a Scotſman of birth and family, but a firm adherent to the Engliſh, deſired a party of five hundred horſe, and a proportional body of foot, might be put under his command; promiſing to paſs the river at a ford a few miles above, and to fall on the rear of the enemy, in order to divert their attention while the main body of the army paſſed the bridge. This prudent deſign was, however, rendered abortive by the impatience of Creſſingham, who being actuated, both by perſonal and national animoſities, againſt the Scots, urged the general to attack them immediately; exclaiming loudly againſt all delays, as expenſive, and diſhonourable to the king. Surry, who conſidered theſe reflections as cenſures upon his own conduct, ordered the army to paſs the bridge immediately. But he paid dearly for his temerity. Wallace let as many of them paſs as he was confident he could conquer; and then attacked them with ſuch fury, that they were all cut to pieces, or puſhed into the river, where they periſhed. Near five thouſand men fell in the action, and among the reſt Creſſingham himſelf, who being found among the ſlain, the Scots flayed his dead body, and made ſaddles and girths of his ſkin. The remainder of the Engliſh army were ſo diſpirited at the deſtruction of their countrymen, whom they could not aſſiſt, that Warrenne thought it adviſeable to make no farther attempts againſt the enemy; and accordingly returned, with the remains of his army, into England.

The Scots now flocked from every part of the kingdom to join the ſtandard of Wallace, who was immediately declared regent of the kingdom during the captivity of Baliol. His forces were greatly elated with their ſucceſs; and he immediately led them towards the borders of England, where he was ſure of finding ſubſiſtence; the diſorders of war, added to unfavourable ſeaſons, having occaſioned a famine in Scotland. The caſtles of Berwick and Roxburgh made but a feeble reſiſtance, and opened the Scots a free paſſage into Northumberland. Wallace firſt led his victorious troops againſt Carliſle; but not being able to take the city, he ravaged the country as far as Durham, and returned loaded with plunder.

During theſe diſorders in the north, Edward arrived in England, and determined to wipe off this ſtain of national diſgrace, and make the enemy pay dearly for their victory. But before he put himſelf at the head of his army, he prudently endeavoured to appeaſe the murmurs of his people by conceſſions and promiſes. He aſſembled a parliament at York, and ordered the two charters, together with the additional ſtatutes in favour of public liberty, to be read and publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the common people. This was accordingly performed with great formality; and the biſhop of Carliſle ſolemnly denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all violators of theſe charters. The king then ordered a ſtrict account of the quantity of corn, and other commodities, which had been violently ſeized before his departure, to be taken, in order that the owners might receive ſatisfaction; and returned to the citizens of London the privilege of chuſing their own magiſtrates, which had been taken from them in the latter part of his father's reign.

Theſe popular meaſures gained him the hearts of his ſubjects; they flocked to his ſtandard, and he ſoon found himſelf at the head of an hundred thouſand fighting men; a force abundantly ſufficient to reduce the inſurgents to ſubjection. On the other hand, that union, which alone can render an army powerful, was wanting among the Scots. Diviſions and envy took place among that unhappy people. The noblemen deſcended from the royal family of Scotland, inſtead of looking upon the patriotic virtues of Wallace with admiration, and joining in a glorious emulation in the ſervice of their country, threw the moſt ungenerous reflections upon his conduct, and even charged him with having formed a deſign of ſeizing the crown. They choſe rather to behold their country groaning under the yoke of perpetual bondage, than ſee themſelves eclipſed by a perſon of inferior birth. Wallace ſaw the fatal conſequences that muſt attend theſe diviſions, and generouſly reſigned his authority, retaining only the command of a body of men who refuſed to follow any other leader. The liberty of his country, not a deſire of power, had called him from his retreat, and he willingly ſacrificed the latter to preſerve the former. On the reſignation of Wallace, the command of the army devolved upon the ſteward of Scotland, and Cummin of Badenock, both eminent for their birth and fortune.

This conteſt being decided, the Scottiſh army marched to Falkirk, where they determined to wait the attack of the Engliſh. The army was drawn up in three bodies, the fronts of which were compoſed of pike-men, and the intervals filled with archers. But dreading the great ſuperiority of the Engliſh cavalry, they endeavoured to ſecure their front with palliſadoes tied together with ropes.

Pleaſed with the hopes of terminating the war by one deciſive action, Edward divided his army into three bodies, conformable to that of the enemy, and led them to the charge. The attack was begun by the Engliſh archers, who poured a dreadful ſhower of arrows upon the enemy. The Scottiſh bowmen, unable to ſupport the fury of the Engliſh, were driven from the field of battle with great ſlaughter. The archers purſued their advantage; and pouring in their arrows among the pikemen, threw them into diſorder, which was improved by the cavalry, and a general rout enſued, attended with the moſt dreadful carnage. It is impoſſible to fix, with any certainty, the number that fell in this remarkable battle. Some hiſtorians tell us, that no leſs than fifty or ſixty thouſand periſhed, while others have reduced their enormous account to twenty thouſand. This, however, is certain, that the Scots never ſuffered a greater loſs, nor ever experienced a defeat that ſeemed pregnant with more deſtructive conſequences.

Wallace alone kept a conſiderable party of his troops together; and retiring behind the Carron, marched leiſurely along the banks of that ſmall river, which protected him from the enemy. Bruce followed him, appeared on the oppoſite bank, and deſired a ſhort conference. He began with reproaching the Scottiſh leader with madneſs, in taking up arms againſt Edward, one of the moſt powerful princes, and the beſt general of the age: at the ſame time inſinuating, that Wallace himſelf had formed a deſign of ſeizing the crown. Wallace warmly diſclaimed every ambitious intention; declaring, that the miſeries of his country alone rouſed him to arms. Adding, that he had neither any right to expect, nor any inclination to ſeize the ſceptre of Scotland. "To you" added he, "your country owes her afflictions. You left her overwhelmed with miſeries, and I undertook the cauſe you ſo baſely betrayed; a cauſe I mean to ſupport while I have ſtrength to weild a ſword; nor ſhall I envy you a life of eaſe and pleaſure in the court of a foreign tyrant. You, my lord, have, indeed, a juſt title to the crown, and might wear it with honour to yourſelf, and advantage to your country; but you ſeem to prefer the chains of ſervitude to freedom, and the ſmiles of deſpotiſm to the calls of honour."

Struck with the generous ſentiments of Wallace, Bruce repented of his engagements with Edward. He ſaw his own conduct in a very different point of light, and determined to ſeize the firſt opportunity of joining thoſe patriotic chiefs who had ſo nobly ſupported the cauſe of his country. Bruce now returned to the Engliſh army; and Wallace, at the head of the poor remains of the battle of Falkirk, retired into the northern parts of the kingdom, fully determined never to ſubmit to the laws of the conqueror.

Unable to face the armies of the Engliſh, and deſirous, if poſſible, to ſupport the liberties of their country, the Scots implored in vain the protection of Lewis: he had abandoned them to the fury of the conqueror by his late treaty. But they were more ſucceſsful in their application to Boniface; he undertook the defence of Scotland. That pontiff, who ſeemed determined to carry the power of the papal chair to the moſt extravagant height, wrote a letter to Edward; in which, after confuting the pretenſions of that monarch to the ſuperiority of Scotland, advanced claims ſtill more abſurd in their room. He aſſerted, with a ſingular degree of confidence, that the pope was the true liege lord of Scotland; that his right was full, entire, and derived from the moſt remote antiquity. Edward, both aſtoniſhed and offended at this bold aſſertion, was at firſt inclined to treat the pontiff's letter with contempt; but fearing the ſuperſtitious bigotry of the people might occaſion diſorders in the nation, and prevent his maintaining the ſuperiority he had acquired over Scotland, he wrote an anſwer to the pope's epiſtle, and advanced claims to the Scottiſh crown, at leaſt as chimerical as thoſe of his holineſs. He deduced the ſuperiority of England over Scotland from the time of Brutus the Trojan, who, he ſaid, firſt founded the Britiſh monarchy, in the time of Eli and Samuel. He laid it down as a fact, confirmed by the records of antiquity, that the Engliſh monarchs had often made grants of Scotland to their ſubjects, and had dethroned thoſe vaſſal kings when they proved unfaithful to them. He recited, with great oſtentation, the homage which William had done to Henry II. but mentioned not the abolition of that extorted deed by Richard I. Theſe pretenſions, however abſurd, were confirmed by one hundred and four barons aſſembled at Lincoln for that purpoſe. But though they ſigned thoſe pretenſions, and agreed to ſend them to Boniface, they took particular care to prevent this act from affording the leaſt pretenſion for his holineſs to make it the foundation of any claim to a ſuperiority over England. They annexed a poſitive declaration, that though they were willing to ſubmit theſe proofs to him as a man, they did not by any means receive him as a judge. "The crown of England" added they, "is free, nor will we ſuffer even the king himſelf to "relinquiſh its independency."

A. D. 1303. The Scots, though their army had been ſo totally defeated at Falkirk, were not ſubdued: freſh forces had joined the remains of that army in the mountainous parts of the kingdom, and again attacked the diſtricts poſſeſſed by the Engliſh. An army of ten thouſand men was ſoon formed under Cummin, appointed regent on the reſignation of Wallace, and advanced to Biggar, in the neighbourhood of Edinburgh. John de Segrave, whom Edward had left guardian of Scotland, aſſembled all the Engliſh forces in that kingdom to oppoſe the Scots; but perceiving that it would be difficult to procure the neceſſary quantity of proviſions for their ſubſiſtence in a body, he ſeparated them into three diviſions: the firſt was commanded by himſelf in perſon, the ſecond by his brother, and the third by Sir Robert Neville. Cummin determined to take advantage of this ſeparation, and advanced, under covert of the night, to attack Segrave's diviſion, which lay at Roſlin, about ſixteen miles from the Scottiſh camp. As ſoon as the dawn appeared, the Engliſh diſcovered Cummin's army marching to attack them, but it was too late to make the neceſſary preparations; the Scots fell upon them before they could form themſelves in order of battle, and obtained an eaſy victory: a few only eſcaped, by flying to the ſecond diviſion, informing them at once of their misfortune, and the approach of the enemy. The commander immediately drew up his men, and led them on directly to revenge the death of their countrymen. A bloody conteſt enſued. The Scots, elated with ſucceſs, charged with the utmoſt fury; while the Engliſh, animated with vengeance, made a noble reſiſtance. The battle continued for ſome time doubtful, but at laſt terminated in favour of the Scots, and the Engliſh were obliged to retreat with conſiderable loſs. By this time the third diviſion, under the command of Sir Robert Neville, appeared; and the Scots, already exhauſted with fatigue, and their ranks conſiderably thinned by the two former actions, would willingly have declined the engagement. They pleaded the exceſſive labours they had already undergone; they pointed to their wounds, and deſired to retire while it was yet in their power. Cummin, who knew that a retreat was now impoſſible, reminded them of the cauſe for which they were fighting, the tyranny of the Engliſh, the glory of their anceſtors, and the diſgrace of ſlavery. His arguments prevailed, and having furniſhed the followers of their camp with the arms of the vanquiſhed, and mounted the horſes they had taken, ſtood the ſhock of a third engagement, and with the utmoſt difficulty obtained the victory. The event was not, however, wholly inglorious to Neville; he reſcued Segrave, who had been taken priſoner in the firſt engagement, and retreated in excellent order. The Scots ſoon after made themſelves maſters of Stirling caſtle, and gave the command of that fortreſs to Oliphant, an officer celebrated both for his courage and capacity.

But theſe ſucceſſes on the part of the Scots, proved only gleams of ſunſhine before a dreadful ſtorm. Edward determined to revenge the diſgrace of his forces, and appointed Roxburgh for the rendezvous of his army. Every precaution was taken to enſure the ſucceſs of this expedition, and to prevent any want of proviſions, a numerous fleet was fitted out with orders to ſail along the coaſt, and attend the march of the army with proper ſupplies. The forces being aſſembled at Roxburgh, Edward advanced into the heart of Scotland, at the head of an army that would have rendered all oppoſition in the open field, a ſpecies of madneſs: the Scots had no other reſource than to fly for ſafety to the woods and faſtneſſes of their country. The only oppoſition Edward met with was from two or three caſtles; the reſt opened their gates on the firſt ſummons. In this manner he led his army from one extremity of Scotland to the other: his vigilance preſerved his forces from ſurpriſe, and his fleet ſupplied them with plenty of proviſions. Even the intrepid Wallace, though he followed the Engliſh armies, found few opportunities for diſplaying his valour. The conduct of Edward rendered all his attempts abortive.

A. D. 1305. Edward having entirely finiſhed the conqueſt of Scotland, applied himſelf to ſettle the adminiſtration; and in order to render the Scots more ſubmiſſive to his government, he conferred on ſeveral of the nobility particular marks of his favour. Ten perſons, two from each order of biſhops, abbots, earls and barons, and two for the community of the gentry, were choſen as deputies to the parliament ſummoned to meet at London, in order to ſettle the adminiſtration in a manner at once both permanent and advantageous to all parties. The conferences were accordingly opened, and after a conſultation of twenty days, the civil eſtabliſhment of Scotland was fixed in the following manner: "Eight juſtices were to be appointed to regulate the affairs of government; the natives of both kingdoms were rendered equally capable of filling the poſts of power and truſt in Scotland. John, earl of Britany, was appointed guardian of that kingdom, and the offices of chancellor, chamberlain, and judges, were filled partly by Engliſh and partly by Scotſmen."

It was alſo agreed, "That the Scottiſh laws and cuſtoms ſhould be aboliſhed; and that a parliament ſhould be ſummoned, on the guardian's arrival in Scotland, in which the laws of king David ſhould be revived, together with the amendments and additions made to them by ſucceeding kings: that the guardian, with the concurrence of his council, ſhould have full power to make ſuch alterations and amendments, as ſhould ſeem moſt conſiſtent with the good of the kingdom, and the ſafety of the ſubject, without conſulting the king: but if any difficulty ſhould ariſe, which required a more mature deliberation to remove, the whole ſhould be properly ſtated, and ſent by the deputies from the ſtates of Scotland to the Engliſh parliament, where the queſtion ſhould be finally determined."

At the breaking up of the parliament, Edward iſſued a general pardon to all the Scottiſh nobility who had carried arms againſt him. Wallace, however, was excepted; the king inſiſting that he ſhould ſurrender himſelf at diſcretion. That chief ſtill continued in arms, at the head of a few followers, and ſtill cheriſhed the expiring ſparks of Scottiſh liberty. But the publication of Edward's pardon cauſed a very conſiderable deſertion in his little party, and he was obliged to wander from one part of the country to another, in order to keep himſelf concealed from the vigilant eyes of his enemies. He continued this itinerant courſe of life for ſome time; but was at laſt betrayed by Sir John Monteith, his former friend, and ſent priſoner to London. Edward, whoſe natural bravery ſhould have induced him to cheriſh ſimilar qualities in an enemy, was ſo enraged at ſome violences committed by Wallace during the fury of the war, that he ordered him to be tried as a rebel and traitor, and executed on Tower-hill.

A. D. 1306. Exaſperated at this barbarous policy, the Scots, before diſguſted at the many innovations introduced into the laws of their country by the ſword of a conqueror, meditated a ſevere revenge; they wanted only a chief of determined reſolution to lead them againſt the enemy. Nor was it long before a general of the greateſt merit appeared. Robert Bruce, deſcended from the royal family of Scotland, determined to ſeize the ſceptre of his anceſtors. He well knew, that after the ſubmiſſions he had made to Edward, he ſhould never be able to appear with any advantage, while the illuſtrious Wallace, then the idol of the common people, ſurvived; but the death of that chief removed the only obſtacle to his ambition. John Baliol, the competitor with Bruce's father for the Scottiſh crown, died alſo about the ſame time. This incident united the two parties, which had before divided Scotland, and greatly encouraged Bruce to attempt the deliverance of his country from the yoke of ſlavery. He was now at the court of Edward, and opened his mind to Cummin, who approved of his deſign, and promiſed his aſſiſtance; but by reflecting coolly on the enterprize, he changed his opinion, and informed Edward of Bruce's intentions; the king, who ſuſpected that the diſcovery of Cummin proceeded from envy, omitted to ſecure the perſon of Bruce, till he was convinced of the truth from concurring circumſtances.

The doubts of Edward ſaved Bruce from impriſonment; but his friends ſoon perceived the dangers to which he was expoſed; and the earl of Glouceſter, thinking it would be imprudent either to converſe with Bruce, or give him the neceſſary information in a letter, ſent him, by a ſervant, a pair of gilt ſpurs and a purſe of gold, which he pretended he had borrowed from him. Bruce ſoon perceived the meaning of the ænigmatical preſent, and immediately effected his eſcape. Soon after his arrival in his native country, he preſented himſelf at a meeting of the Scottiſh nobles, diſcovered to them his deſigns, and exhorted them to join in the noble attempt to break the chains of ſervitude, and revenge the inſulted rights of their fellow citizens. They liſtened to his remonſtrances, and declared their reſolution of ſeconding his patriotic deſigns and aſſerting the undoubted rights of the nation, againſt their common oppreſſors. Cummin alone oppoſed this general determination, He repreſented the attempt as pregnant with deſtruction; he told them it was madneſs to oppoſe the power of the Engliſh, while that power was in the hands of a prince of ſuch uncommon vigour and abilities. He added, that nothing but the moſt rigorous puniſhments could be expected, if they again broke their oaths of fealty, and ſhook off their allegiance to the victorious Edward. Bruce, who plainly foreſaw the failure of all his ambitious projects from the oppoſition of Cummin, followed him, on the diſſolution of the aſſembly, to the cloyſters of the Grey Friars, and running him through the body, left him for dead. Sir Thomas Kilpatrick, one of Bruce's friends, aſked him if the traitor was ſlain. "I believe ſo," replied Bruce. "And is that a matter," cried Kilpatrick, "to be left to conjecture? I will ſecure him." He immediately ran to Cummin, and drawing his dagger, ſtabbed him to the heart. This act, ſo juſtly condemned condemned in the preſent age, was then conſidered as a noble atchievement of patriotic virtue.

It was now too late to recede: no pardon could be expected from Edward; Bruce and his party had only the alternative to conquer or periſh. No time was to be loſt, and that martial leader improved every moment: he flew into different parts of the kingdom to rouſe his countrymen to arms, and perſuade them to ſhake off the galling yoke of ſlavery. The Scots embraced with ardour the pleaſing hopes of recovering their liberty. Their courage was ſtimulated by oppreſſion. The Engliſh were again driven out of the kingdom, except thoſe who had taken refuge in places of ſtrength; and Bruce received the crown of his anceſtors in the abbey of Scone.

Edward was no ſooner informed of this unexpected event, than he ſent Aymer de Valence, earl of Pembroke, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, into Scotland, to check the progreſs of the inſurgents. Bruce had collected a conſiderable number of forces, but they were raw and undiſciplined, and conſequently unable to withſtand the attacks of veteran troops. They were encamped at Methven near Perth, without ſuſpecting the approach of an enemy. Pembroke profitted by their ignorance; he attacked them in the night, and drove them from the field. Bruce behaved with the greateſt intrepidity; was thrice diſmounted from his horſe and as often recovered himſelf: but all his efforts were in vain; he was obliged to ſubmit to ſuperior fortune, and ſeek his ſafety in a ſpeedy flight. This dreadful diſaſter ſtruck the Scots with terror: the greater part of them deſerted their leader, and Bruce was obliged to fly for ſhelter to the Weſtern Iſles.

A few days after this defeat, Edward himſelf arrived in Scotland, and divided his army into two bodies, one of which he ſent to the northward under the command of the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Lancaſter and Hereford. The prince made himſelf maſter of the caſtle of Kildrommey, and ſoon after took the counteſs of Buchan, and the lady Mary Bruce, ſiſter to the king, priſoners. Theſe two ladies Edward, from a diſingenuous motive of revenge, ordered to be ſhut up in wooden cages, and one of them to be hung over the battlements of Roxburgh, and the other over thoſe of Berwick, as public ſpectacles to the inſulting populace. After performing this ſucceſsful expedition, the prince met his father at Perth: all Scotland was once more ſubdued by the forces of Edward, and that prince returned to Carliſle.

A. D. 1307. Bruce, who had hitherto concealed himſelf ſo effectually that it was generally believed he had periſhed in the wreck of his army, now appeared at the head of a ſmall body of men, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages upon the peaceable inhabitants who were in the intereſt of the Engliſh. Edward, at once alarmed and exaſperated at this ſudden and unexpected interruption of the public tranquillity, diſpatched the earl of Pembroke, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to attack the inſurgent in his retreat; but Bruce, who was well acquainted with the nature of the country, led the earl into an ambuſcade, and totally defeated his forces.

Edward now made preparations for invading Scotland with more fury than ever; he determined to make the rebels feel the weight of his reſentment. But he lived not to execute his deſigns. He had for ſome time been afflicted with a dyſentery, which had weakened him exceedingly; but his eagerneſs to finiſh the reduction of Scotland, ſuffered him not to continue at Carliſle. He ſet out at the head of his forces, but the fatigue of marching increaſed his diſtemper, and he died at Burgh on the Sands, on the ſeventh of July, in the ſixty-eighth year of his age, and the thirty-fifth of his reign.

Edward had many virtues and ſome vices; but the former were more than ſufficient to balance the latter. His ambition, and a deſire of increaſing the power of his kingdom, ſeem to have formed the ruling paſſion of his ſoul. In purſuit of theſe, he ſcrupled not to purſue meaſures inconſiſtent with the liberty of his people. The equity of his enterprize againſt Scotland has been juſtly queſtioned; but when it is remembered, that the union of the two kingdoms muſt have been attended with the moſt ſolid advantages to both, we ſhall, perhaps, be more inclined to praiſe than cenſure his conduct. At the ſame time, it muſt be confeſſed, that if his character ſhould be thought exceptionable in this particular, his country obtained the moſt permanent advantages from his activity, his courage, his policy and his prudence. He reſtored authority to the government, maintained the laws againſt all the efforts of his turbulent barons, and executed juſtice with ſeverity on all who diſturbed the domeſtic peace of the kingdom. His merit as a legiſlator was ſo great, that he is often called "The Engliſh Juſtinian;" becauſe, in his reign, the laws acquired a great perfection, and juſtly deſerved the name of Eſtabliſhments. He ſettled the juriſdiction of the ſeveral courts; and he firſt eſtabliſhed the office of juſtice of peace. His conduct with regard to the clergy was more politic; he ſaw their power, and was deſirous of preventing its increaſe. Their poſſeſſions were unalienable, and perpetually augmenting: he therefore prohibited them from making new acquiſitions, by paſſing the ſtatute of mortmain. But the undertaking that will always render the name of this great legiſlator dear to the Engliſh, was his eſtabliſhing the Houſe of Commons, by ſummoning two deputies from every borough, conformable to the example of the earl of Leiceſter. By this means the boroughs became of importance in the ſtate; and the mechanics and tradeſmen, whom the feudal ſyſtem had placed in a deſpicable point of light, acquired the honour of being one of the branches of the legiſlature; trade was encouraged, and men of property thought it no diſgrace to engage in the commerce of their country. In a word, this great prince laid the foundation for that ſpecies of government which unites all the advantages of monarchy, ariſtocracy, and democracy, and which is ſtill the glory and boaſt of this iſland.

EDWARD II. ſurnamed of CAERNARVON.

A. D. 1307. YOUNG Edward, who was twenty-three years of age on the death of his father, was remarkable for the gracefulneſs of his perſon, the majeſty of his appearance, and the mildneſs of his diſpoſition. But he was not inſpired with the ſpirit of his father. He was born to obey minions and favourites; not to govern a great kingdom, and ſupport the authority of the crown over a proud and turbulent nobility. The Engliſh had formed the moſt pleaſing ideas of enjoying both happineſs and tranquillity under his government; but they ſoon perceived that all their hopes were built on a chimerical foundation, and that the pleaſing proſpect was merely deluſive; it vaniſhed like the cloud of the morning. His father, on his death-bed, had charged him to purſue the war againſt Scotland with the utmoſt vigour. "Carry my aſhes before you," ſaid he to his ſon; "the rebels will never be able to ſupport the ſight of them." But young Edward had no talents for war. He marched, indeed, againſt

Bruce, who now appeared at the head of a reſpectable army, but returned with precipitation; he ſeemed to dread the fatigues of victory.

Piers Gaveſton, a gentleman of Guienne, poſſeſſed of a few talents, frivolous in themſelves, but capable of attracting the regard of weak and inferior minds, engroſſed the friendſhip and favour of Edward. His beauty, and his great addreſs in all the genteel exerciſes, conſtituted his chief merit, while his vices threatened deſtruction to the ſtate. Gaveſton, however, gained ſo entire an aſcendency over the young Edward, that his father had baniſhed this favourite from the kingdom, and made his ſon promiſe him, in his laſt moments, never to recall him. But young Edward paid no regard to his ſolemn aſſeveration: his heart was ſo ſtrongly diſpoſed to friendſhip and confidence, that one of the firſt acts of his reign was to ſend for this unworthy minion, who was already deteſted by the nation. He created him earl of Cornwall, married him to his own niece, and entruſted to him the government of the kingdom.

While Edward was thus laviſhing power, honours, and eſtates, on a worthleſs favourite, the war in Scotland was neglected. Bruce, who had retired to his faſtneſſes on the approach of the former Edward, now appeared boldly in the plain, fell upon the county of Galloway, and reduced it to his obedience. The earl of Britany was ſent, at the head of a powerful army, to ſtop the career of the Scots; and Bruce perceiving that it would be in vain to contend with a force ſo far ſuperior to his own, once more retired to the mountains and moraſſes of that country.

A. D. 1308. Edward, after paſſing over to the continent, and conſummating his marriage with Iſabella, daughter of Philip the Fair, was crowned, with his new queen, at Weſtminſter, on the twenty-fifth of February. But a difficulty aroſe, previous to the performance of the ceremony, which greatly alarmed the monarch. The barons, exaſperated at the inſolence of Gaveſton, who affected to treat them with the moſt mortifying contempt, refuſed to aſſiſt at the coronation, unleſs Gaveſton was baniſhed the kingdom. Edward promiſed to redreſs all their grievances, provided they would not force him to delay the ceremony; and the barons, in return, agreed to ſuſpend their reſentment. But Gaveſton was ſo far from profiting by theſe national marks of diſguſt to his perſon and conduct, that he appeared, with the moſt faſtidious pomp, in the proceſſion, in which he carried the crown of St. Edward before the king. One of the barons was ſo highly provoked at his aſſuming behaviour, that he was, with ſome difficulty, prevented from ſacrificing the inſulting favourite to his reſentment.

A party was now formed againſt the inſolent Gaveſton, at the head of which was Thomas earl of Lancaſter, couſin-german to the king, and once the moſt opulent and powerful ſubject in England. The confederated barons bound themſelves, by a ſolemn oath, never to deſert each other till the deteſted favourite was baniſhed the kingdom. Favoured by the oppoſition of the nobility, the people paid no longer any ſubmiſſion to the laws: robberies, murders, and other alarming diſorders, the conſtant preludes to civil war, were committed in every part of the kingdom. Gaveſton ſtill deſpiſed the threatening ſtorm, and even treated the young queen with contempt.

A parliament was now called to remove theſe diſorders, and reſtore the domeſtic tranquillity of the kingdom. The barons, determined not to miſs ſo favourable an opportunity of effectually humbling the favourite, came to Weſtminſter attended by a numerous armed retinue, required the baniſhment of Gaveſton, and prevailed upon the biſhops to threaten him with excommunication. Edward found it would be madneſs to reſiſt, and therefore complied with their demands; but inſtead of ſending him out of the Engliſh dominions, as the barons expected, he appointed him lord lieutenant of Ireland, and accompanied him as far as Briſtol when he ſet out for his new government.

A. D. 1309. Edward, deprived of the company of Gaveſton, careſſed his nobles, and ſoon removed the bad impreſſion made on their minds by the inſolent behaviour of the favourite: they even conſented to his being recalled, and all reſentment ſeemed to be buried in the grave of forgetfulneſs. But Gaveſton learnt not wiſdom from experience: he forgot his former misfortunes, and reſumed, on his return, the ſame inſolence and oſtentation which had before procured his exile. The barons were now more provoked than ever; they determined to put it out of the power of the king himſelf to protect ſo hated a minion. They again came to parliament, attended by an army of their retainers, and compelled the king to ſurrender his authority into the hands of twelve perſons, whoſe ordinances were to have the force of ſtatutes.

A. D. 1311. This junto governed the kingdom twelve months, and then produced a ſet of ordinances, which the king confirmed with the ſame facility he granted this unlimited commiſſion to the barons. By theſe ordinances it was enacted, that the church ſhould enjoy her privileges; that the peace of the kingdom ſhould be kept; that the two charters ſhould be obſerved; that the cuſtoms ſhould be collected by natives, and paid into the exchequer, whence the money ſhould be iſſued by the treaſurer and chamberlains for the maintenance of the houſehold, that the king might be ſupported by his own revenue, without being obliged to oppreſs the ſubject; that Emery Frenobalde, and his partners, by whom the cuſtoms had hitherto been farmed, ſhould account for their receipts within a fortnight after Michaelmas, on pain of being arreſted, ſtripped of their effects, and treated as public enemies. That no prizes ſhould be taken by the king's officers without the owner's conſent. That the duty of three ſhillings on every tun of wine ſhould be no longer collected. That the juriſdiction of the ſteward and marſhal of the king's court ſhould be limited to cauſes reſpecting the officers of the houſhold, and ſuch as reſided within the verge of the court. That it ſhould be deemed felony for any perſon to take corn, goods, or merchandize, under a falſe pretence of purveyance for the king. That ſheriffs ſhould be appointed by the chancellor, treaſurer, king's council, barons of the exchequer, and juſtices of the king's bench; and that none ſhould be entruſted with the office but ſuch as had lands of ſufficient value to anſwer for their actions. That parliaments ſhould be held once a year. That the coin of the kingdom ſhould not be altered, but for very cogent reaſons, and by conſent of the baronage. That all perſons proſecuted unjuſtly, and acquitted, ſhould be entitled to damages. That none ſhould be appealed maliciouſly, or outlawed in counties where they had no lands or tenements. That they ſhould neither forfeit their eſtates, nor loſe their lives, provided they ſurrendered themſelves to the king's priſon to ſtand trial. That pardons for robbery, and other felonies, ſhould not be granted without good reaſon, but deemed void, unleſs agreeable to the king's oath, the courſe of law, and the cuſtom of the kingdom. That all privy-ſeals for ſtopping law, or common right, on falſe pretences of being in the ſervice of the crown, ſhould be declared void, and the plaintiff recover damages on the diſcovery of the deceit. That the juriſdiction of the court of exchequer ſhould be confined to ſuch pleas as concerned the crown, the officers of the exchequer, and their menial ſervants. That acquittances ſhould be given for debts paid, and accounts paſſed in the exchequer; or, if denied, the plaintiff ſhould have redreſs in parliament. That all grants of lands, caſtles, towns, offices, wards, and eſcheats, in any part of the king's dominions, made ſince the ſixteenth of May in the preceding year, ſhould be reſumed by the crown, and not renewed to the ſame perſons, without the advice of the barons, or conſent of the parliament; and that all grants which ſhould be made before the king's debts were paid, and his revenues improved, ſhould be deemed null and void, and the procurers of ſuch be puniſhed by the award of the baronage. That all evil counſellors ſhould be removed from the king's perſon, particularly Henry de Beaumont, and his ſiſter the lady Veſey, who had obtained grants from the king diſhonourable to the dignity, and prejudicial to the prerogatives of the crown. That whereas Piers Gaveſton had given evil counſel to his majeſty, removed all perſons of integrity and abilities from the public offices, and ſupplied their places with his own weak and worthleſs creatures, embezzled the king's treaſure, impoveriſhed the realm, by obtaining unreaſonable grants, and procuring blank charters, which he filled up according to his own pleaſure, protected robbers, arrogated to himſelf the royal power and dignity, and formed aſſociations inconſiſtent with the laws of the land; he ſhould, for theſe miſdemeanors, abjure the kingdom for ever before the firſt of November; and if found in any part of his majeſty's dominions after that day, ſhould be treated as a public enemy. That the king ſhould not leave the realm, nor declare war againſt any prince or potentate, without the conſent of the barons. That on his quitting the kingdom with their conſent, a guardian of the realm ſhould be appointed by the parliament, who ſhould alſo nominate the chief officers of the ſtate, of the houſhold, of the revenue, and of juſtice, as well as the keepers of foreſts, the eſcheators on both ſides the Trent, and, in a word, all perſons employed under the crown in any part of his majeſty's dominions. That all perſons in office ſhould take an oath to obſerve theſe ordinances; and that one biſhop, two earls, and as many barons, ſhould be choſen in every parliament, to receive complaints againſt the king's miniſters, and others who ſhould violate theſe ordinances, and to puniſh offenders at diſcretion.

Several of the above ordinances were truly laudable, and tended to the regular diſpenſation of juſtice, and the protection of the weak againſt the powerful; but others wholly deprived the king of his prerogative, and rendered him a mere cypher in government. Edward knew this; and therefore, when he ſigned them, he ſecretly determined to obſerve them no longer than he had an opportunity of declaring them void, and of no effect. For as the commiſſion was granted ſolely for the purpoſe of making ſuch ordinances as ſhould be advantageous both to the king and his people, ſuch articles as ſhould be found prejudicial to either, could not be conſidered as ratified and confirmed. The parliament was therefore no ſooner diſſolved, than the king repaired to York, where he publiſhed a proclamation, repealing the article relative to the exile of Piers Gaveſton, "as being unjuſt, and contrary to the oath taken by the king at his coronation."

A. D. 1312. Gaveſton immediately obeyed the royal mandate, and was reinſtated in all his former credit and authority. Exaſperated at this conduct of the king, and dreading the reſentment of the powerful minion, the barons flew to arms, and beſieged Gaveſton in Scarborough caſtle. The king exerted all his power in raiſing an army for the relief of his favourite; but his attempts were in vain; the people refuſed to join his ſtandard. While the king was thus employed in endeavouring to raiſe a body of forces, Gaveſton, ſenſible of the bad condition of his garriſon, and the want of proviſions, was obliged to capitulate; by which it was agreed, that he ſhould ſurrender himſelf a priſoner for two months, during which time means ſhould be uſed for bringing about an accommodation; but if the terms propoſed by the barons ſhould not be accepted, the caſtle ſhould be reſtored to him in the ſame condition as when he ſurrendered it. Pembroke, who had conducted the ſiege of the caſtle, being now maſter of the favourite's perſon, conducted him to the caſtle of Dedington, near Banbury; where he left him, probably by conſent of the others, with a feeble guard, under pretence of preſſing buſineſs. But before he returned Gaveſton was carried off by the earl of Warwick, who, together with the earls of Lancaſter, Arundel, and Hereford, in violation of their engagements, and contrary to all laws human and divine, cauſed him to be beheaded by the hands of an executioner.

Edward was tranſported with rage when he was informed of the death of his favourite. He threatened to take the ſevereſt vengeance, and even to exterminate his whole nobility who were concerned in that deteſtable action. But he ſoon found that his threatenings were in vain. The more reaſonable part of the nation could not indeed behold this bloody tragedy without horror, and dread the conſequence of a reformation begun with murder and perjury; yet they did not think it adviſeable to plunge the nation into all the horrors of a civil war, and depopulate the kingdom to revenge a breach of the laws of humanity. Nor was Edward himſelf inexorable in his reſentments: he ſoon liſtened to the terms of accommodation. It was ſtipulated, that the barons ſhould aſk him pardon publickly on their knees, and he was ſo pleaſed with theſe vain appearances of exterior ſubmiſſion, that he readily forgave them all their paſt offences.

A. D. 1314. The death of Gaveſton having thus reſtored tranquillity between the king and his barons, it was now determined to ſend a powerful force againſt the Scots, who taking advantage of the troubles in England, had made inroads into the northern counties, and committed the moſt dreadful ravages. The whole military force of the kingdom was aſſembled; and Edward put himſelf at the head of a powerful army, which, according to the Scottiſh writers, amounted to an hundred thouſand men. Bruce, whoſe army was inferior in numbers, endeavoured to ſupply by art, what he wanted in ſtrength. Perſuaded that this important conteſt was to decide the fate of his kingdom, he choſe the field of battle with the utmoſt prudence, and made the neceſſary preparations for receiving the Engliſh. He poſted himſelf at Bannock-burn, about two miles from Sterling; having a hill on his right flank, and a moraſs on his left. In the front of his camp ran a ſmall rivulet; the banks of which, as well as the bed of the ſtream, he filled with ſharp ſtakes; and cauſed deep pits to be dug a little beyond the oppoſite bank, into which ſharp ſtakes were alſo planted, and the whole covered over with turf. The van of the Engliſh army reached the neighbourhood of the Scottiſh camp in the evening of the twenty-fourth of June, and a ſmart ſkirmiſh enſued between two parties of cavalry. The Engliſh were led by Henry de Bohun, a younger brother of the earl of Hereford, and the Scots by Bruce in perſon. The conteſt was very bloody; but was at laſt decided in favour of the Scots, by the valour of Bruce, who rode up to Bohun, and cleft his head with a battle-axe, in ſight of both armies. The Engliſh, on the loſs of their leader, retreated to the army; but had not night put a ſtop to the reinforcements which were marching to the relief of each party, the action had then become general.

As ſoon as the morning appeared, the Engliſh troops prepared for the dreadful conflict. The wings, compoſed of cavalry, were commanded by the earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, and the king himſelf led the centre or main body. Bruce drew up his forces, conſiſting chiefly of foot, in three lines, and a body of reſerve. The centre was commanded by himſelf, the right wing by his brother Edward, the left by Randolph, and the body of reſerve by Sir James Douglas.

Juſt as the charge was going to be ſounded, a diſpute happened between the earls of Glouceſter and Hereford, with regard to making the firſt attack upon the enemy. The firſt claimed it by cuſtom, as having always been enjoyed by his anceſtors; and the latter as conſtable of England. The earl of Glouceſter determined not to ſubmit to his opponent, broke the rank, and impelled by all the ardour of youth, ruſhed on to the attack, and fell among the covered pits, by which means his whole ſquadron was thrown into confuſion, and he himſelf periſhed. This imprudent ſally of youth proved fatal to the Engliſh army. Several of the covered pits had been diſcovered during the ſkirmiſh in the evening; and the king, in order to prevent a ſimilar misfortune, gave orders for a body of infantry to take a circuit round the moraſs, and attack the main body of the Scottiſh army in flank; and during the confuſion of that unexpected attack, the cavalry were to have forced the paſſage of the rivulet, and fallen ſword in hand on the embarraſſed enemy.

The fate of Glouceſter was hardly determined, when the body of infantry having made the preſcribed circuit, fell with the utmoſt fury on the wing commanded by Randolph, and galled them ſo ſeverely with repeated ſhowers of arrows, that they were thrown into diſorder. Sir James Douglas perceived the confuſion, and fell ſuddenly upon the rear of the Engliſh with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were routed with great ſlaughter. The main body of the Engliſh, however, marched up with great reſolution to attack the enemy; when they obſerved on the heights towards their left, the appearance of another army marching leiſurely to ſurround them. This formidable appearance was nothing more than a number of waggoners and ſumpter boys, whom Bruce had ſupplied with military ſtandards, which at a diſtance gave them the appearance of a numerous body of forces. The Engliſh were ſtruck with a panic; they fled with the utmoſt precipitation, and Bruce obtained a complete victory. The booty acquired by the Scots was prodigious; beſides which they took ſeveral perſons of diſtinction priſoners, who paid largely for their ranſom. Edward himſelf had ſcarce time to reach Dunbar caſtle, before Sir James Douglas appeared at the head of four hundred horſe, hoping to intercept Edward if he attempted to eſcape to Berwick by land; but the king eluded his vigilance by paſſing to that town in a ſmall veſſel.

By this victory the independence of Scotland was ſecured, and Robert Bruce firmly ſeated on the throne of his anceſtors. That intrepid general diſtinguiſhed himſelf as much after the victory by his humanity and generoſity, as he had done in the battle by his bravery and prudence. He treated all his priſoners with the greateſt tenderneſs; he ſent the bodies of the earl of Glouceſter and lord Clifford to the Engliſh monarch at Berwick; he diſmiſſed lord Monthermer, for whom he had a particular friendſhip, without ranſom; he exchanged the earl of Hereford and other noblemen, for his wife, his daughter and ſiſter, the earl of Mar and the biſhop of Glaſgow, who had remained priſoners in England ever ſince the battle of Methven: and he cauſed the dead bodies left on the field of battle to be decently interred.

A. D. 1315. Notwithſtanding this alarming misfortune, which called for the united force of the whole kingdom to recover the loſs ſuſtained at Bannock-burn, the barons, who ſeemed regardleſs of the honour of their country, were not in the leaſt affected, they even founded the hopes of their own future grandeur on the weakneſs and diſtreſſes of the crown. They no ſooner ſaw the king return with diſgrace, than they inſiſted on a renewal of their ordinances, and Lancaſter was placed at the head of the miniſtry. Edward perceived his danger, and ſenſible of his own incapacity for holding the reins of government, attached himſelf to a new favourite. This was Hugh le Diſpenſer, or Spencer, a young man of high rank, deſcended from a noble family, and an Engliſhman by birth. He poſſeſſed all the exterior accompliſhments of perſon and addreſs, neceſſary to engage the affections of Edward; but wanted that prudence and moderation which alone could have ſupported him in this dangerous pre-eminence, ſurrounded by ſuch numbers of powerful enemies. Had the oppoſition of the barons, however, been founded on virtue, and directed only to ſupport the honour of their country, theſe defects would have been conſidered as abundantly ſupplied by the talents and experience of the father of this new favourite, and who had alſo acquired a conſiderable ſhare in the adminiſtration. He was a nobleman venerable for his age, and during his whole life had been reſpected for his wiſdom, his valour and his intrepidity. But envy now obſcured all his merits; his paſt ſervices were forgotton; and he was, together with his ſon, devoted to deſtruction by the turbulent barons. They firſt indicated their diſpleaſure by abſenting themſelves from parliament; but this not producing the deſired effect, they determined to have recourſe to more powerful methods for completing their deſigns.

It was not long before an opportunity offered which gave them a pretence for attacking the miniſters. Edward, who had ſet no bounds to his bounty with regard to his favourites, had not only married the younger Spencer to his neice, one of the co-heireſſes of the earl of Glouceſter, ſlain at the fatal battle of Bannock-burn, but alſo given him a barony, which it was pretended had reverted to the crown. This tranſaction, which could be conſidered as nothing more than a proper ſubject for a law-ſuit, cauſed an inſurrection in the kingdom. Lancaſter, and ſeveral other barons, flew to arms, and peremptorily demanded the baniſhment of the two Spencers. The king refuſed to comply; upon which they marched to London, and preſented to the parliament an accuſation againſt the favourites. All reſiſtance was in vain: the two Spencers were condemned to baniſhment without a ſingle crime being proved againſt them. They, however, ſubmitted to their ſentence, and all diſturbances ſeemed happily to ſubſide.

A. D. 1321. Poſſibly Edward, in his circumſtances, might have ſubmitted to this encroachment made upon his prerogative, had not a freſh inſult rouſed him from his indolence. The queen, having occaſion to paſs by the caſtle of Leeds in Kent, belonging to lord Badleſmere, one of the confederated barons, diſpatched ſome of her ſervants to deſire a night's lodging in the caſtle; the requeſt was not only denied, but they were even refuſed admittance, and ſome of them killed. This outrageous behaviour to a princeſs who had joined the barons againſt the younger Spencer, was reſented by all parties, and the king, levying an army, made himſelf maſter of the caſtle, and put the governor and ſeveral of the garriſon to death. This ſeaſonable act of juſtice was approved even by the turbulent barons themſelves, and Edward, who ſaw the conſequences of provoking that ferocious body, was determined to attempt the recovery of his prerogative. He ventured to recall the two Spencers, whoſe ſentence he declared to be illegal and unjuſt, as being paſſed without the conſent of the prelates, and extorted by violence from him and the barons aſſembled in parliament. He added, "That he was bound by the great charter to receive "the petitions of the Spencers, becauſe he was obliged not to deny juſtice to any man."

A, D, 1322. But neither reaſon nor the voice of humanity itſelf, had any force with the aſſociated barons; they continued in arms, but their forces were not ſufficient to meet thoſe of the king in the open field. In this diſtreſsful ſituation, they had recourſe to the Scottiſh monarch, with whom they concluded a treaty, promiſing to recognize his title to the crown of Scotland; and that prince in return, ſtipulated to aſſiſt them with a body of forces. Encouraged by the hopes of a powerful aſſiſtance, and joined by the earl of Hereford at the head of his retainers, Lancaſter poſted himſelf at Burton upon Trent, in order to defend the paſſage of the river. But he wanted intrepidity in the day of battle; he was intimidated at the approach of the royal army, and retreated towards Borough bridge, in order, if poſſible, to reach the borders of Scotland. Unfortunately for Lancaſter, Sir Andrew Harcla, governor of Carliſle, ſuſpecting his deſign, poſted himſelf, at the head of a body of troops, to oppoſe his paſſage over the Eure, ſo that Lancaſter found himſelf reduced to the wretched alternative of venturing an engagement, or ſurrender himſelf a priſoner to Harcla. He choſe the former: but the earl of Hereford being ſlain in the firſt attack, the barons troops fled with great precipitation, and Lancaſter was taken priſoner. Harcla conducted the earl to the king at Pomfret, where he was tried by a court martial, and condemned to death. Lancaſter now experienced the ſame indignities which had before been practiſed upon Gaveſton. He was dreſſed in mean apparel, placed upon a lean horſe without a bridle, and a hood put upon his head. In this ignominious manner he was conducted to an eminence in the neighbourhood of Pomfret, amidſt the ſcoffs of the rabble, and there beheaded. Thus fell Thomas earl of Lancaſter, a prince of the blood, and one of the moſt powerful barons ever known in England; but whoſe turbulent temper hurried him into meaſures deſtructive at once of the peace of ſociety, and the honour of his country. He ſacrificed all the rules of juſtice and humanity to his revenge, and fell himſelf a victim at the altar of his own ambition.

But the ſanguinary inquiſition did not end with the death of Lancaſter; about twenty other barons were afterwards tried and executed. Many made their eſcape into France, and others were thrown into priſon. Oppoſition ſeemed to lie gaſping at the feet of Edward. Harcla was rewarded for his ſervices with a large eſtate and the earldom of Carliſle; but he did not long enjoy the royal bounty. He entered into a treaſonable correſpondence with the king of Scotland, and paid the forfeit of his life as an atonement for his folly.

The younger Spencer profitted not by former experience. Elated with ſucceſs, and giddy with power, he inflamed ſtill farther the hatred of the public againſt him, by new acts of violence. Freſh complaints were every day preſented againſt his conduct, and the king, deſpairing of making a ſucceſsful campaign againſt Scotland, while the nation was divided, concluded a truce with Robert for thirteen years; and the Scottiſh monarch, though his title to the crown was not acknowledged in the treaty, was ſatisfied with enſuring himſelf a quiet poſſeſſion of it during ſo conſiderable a period.

A. D. 1325. But Edward did not long enjoy his triumph over the turbulent barons: calamities of a more violent kind now threatened the deſtruction of the Engliſh monarch. Charles the Fair, the third ſon, and the third ſucceſſor of Philip the Fair, ſummoned Edward to do him homage for his province of Guienne. Spencer, who ſaw all the conſequences that might attend his own authority during the king's abſence, would not conſent to his leaving the kingdom. The parliament was conſulted, and it was the unanimous opinion of the whole aſſembly, that it was improper for the king to go abroad in perſon, but that ambaſſadors ſhould be ſent to the court of France, requeſting that the homage might be delayed till a more convenient opportunity. Charles refuſed to poſtpone the ceremony, and ſent a body of forces to attack Guienne. It was now thought proper to ſend the queen Iſabella to her brother's court, in order, if poſſible, to bring about an accommodation; but all her attempts were in vain; Charles inſiſted on the homage being performed immediately by the king in perſon.

In this critical ſituation of affairs, the fertile imagination of Iſabella, furniſhed her with an expedient for removing all difficulties, and putting it in her power to be revenged on the younger Spencer, whom ſhe deteſted. She propoſed that the king ſhould reſign the ſovereignty of Guienne to his ſon, and that the prince ſhould be ſent to Paris to perform the duties of a vaſſal. This propoſal concealed a ſnare which the Engliſh council never expected. Edward and Spencer were charmed with the contrivance, and the young prince ſoon after arrived at Paris. Iſabella had now gained her principal point, and determined to make uſe of her good fortune, by procuring the deſtruction of her enemies.

Edward and his favourite were ſoon convinced of the egregious blunder they had committed, in truſting the perſon of the heir apparent to the crown in the hands of an ambitious woman. The queen, on her arrival in France, had found a great number of fugitives, the remains of the Lancaſtrian party; and their common hatred of Spencer ſoon cemented a a ſecret friendſhip between them. Among the reſt was Roger Mortimer, a powerful baron in the Welſh marches, and one of the leaders of the late rebellion. This young nobleman ſoon inſinuated himſelf into her affections, and ſhe ſacrificed to a vicious paſſion all the ſentiments of honour and fidelity ſhe owed to her huſband. It was in vain that Edward ordered her to return; ſhe declared her reſolution of continuing in France till the Spencers were baniſhed England with infamy and diſgrace.

A. D. 1326. Edward tried every gentle method to bring her to a ſenſe of her duty, but in vain; ſhe remained deaf to the lenient voice of intreaty. Recourſe was therefore had to the pope, who readily engaged in the cauſe of the injured Edward. He wrote a very preſſing letter to the king of France, inſiſting, even on the pain of excommunication, that the queen of England ſhould be ſent back to her huſband. Charles was ſo affected by this menace of the pontiff, and much more by the ſhameful commerce carried on between Mortimer and his ſiſter, that he determined to ſupport her no longer. He accordingly ſhewed her the pope's letter, and deſired that ſhe would quit his dominions immediately.

Iſabella had provided againſt this event, which ſhe had for ſome time expected. She had affianced her ſon, the prince of Wales, to the daughter of William, count of Hainault and Holland; who, in return, promiſed her an aſylum in his dominions, and to aſſiſt her with a body of troops to humble her enemies. She therefore retired directly into Hainault, where ſhe was received with the greateſt marks of kindneſs and reſpect. Every method was now uſed for raiſing an army to attend the queen and the young prince to England; and about three thouſand men at arms were collected for this expedition, under the command of John de Hainault, the count's brother. But Iſabella did not found her hopes of ſucceſs on the number and valour of her troops in the intended invaſion of her huſband's dominions, but in the connections ſhe had formed with the diſcontented nobles. All the old Lancaſtrian faction were ready to join her; and the families of about twenty of the nobility, who had ſuffered with the late earl of Lancaſter, were the more zealous in their attachment, as they hoped, in conſequence of her ſucceſs, to be reſtored to the eſtates which had been forfeited in conſequence of the rebellion of their relation. Beſides theſe, others had joined the queen's party. The king's brothers, the archbiſhop of Canterbury, with other prelates, and ſeveral of the moſt powerful barons, approved her meaſures; ſo that nothing was wanting but the appearance of the queen and the prince, with ſuch a body of foreign forces as was ſufficient to protect them againſt immediate violence, to turn the whole force of the tempeſt againſt the unfortunate Edward.

The queen having collected her forces at Dort, embarked with her ſon, and landed in Suffolk on the twenty-fourth of September. She was immediately joined by the princes of the blood, and other factious nobles. But to give her hoſtile appearance a ſtill more favourable aſpect, ſhe renewed her declaration, that the ſole motive of her enterprize was to deliver the nation from the tyranny of the Spencers, and of chancellor Baldoc, their creature. This proclamation had the deſired effect: the ardour of the Engliſh to join the ſtandard of the queen was amazing; even Robert de Watteville, who had been ſent by the king to oppoſe her progreſs in Suffolk, deſerted to her with all his forces.

Edward now ſaw the conſequences of his folly in parting with the young prince, whoſe preſence ſecured the barons againſt forfeitures. The king was ſtill at London, and applied to the citizens for aſſiſtance againſt the invaders of his kingdom; but he ſoon perceived that no reliance could be placed on their loyalty; they were alſo poiſoned with the leaven of rebellion. Edward therefore ſet out for the weſtern parts of England, hoping that his ſubjects in that corner of the kingdom would commiſerate majeſty in diſtreſs, and ſupport their king againſt the unnatural rebellion of an implacable woman. But he was deceived; they flocked not to his ſtandard; and that unfortunate prince formed a reſolution of paſſing over into Ireland, leaving the elder Spencer to command in the caſtle of Briſtol.

Edward had hardly left London, before the populace committed the moſt dreadful diſorders. They plundered the houſes, and murdered the perſons of all who were obnoxious to them. Even the acknowledged virtues of the biſhop of Exeter could not protect him from their rage. He was dragged, like a felon, to the great croſs in Cheapſide, where his head was ſevered from his body. The other cities followed the example of the capital; and taking advantage of the national confuſion, committed every ſpecies of outrage with wantonneſs and impunity.

The earl of Kent, aſſiſted by John de Hainault, at the head of his foreign mercenaries, purſued the king to Briſtol, and inveſted the caſtle, where the elder Spencer had ſhut himſelf up, and would have defended the fortreſs to the laſt extremity, had not his garriſon been infected with the diſloyalty of the times; but they mutinied againſt their commander, and delivered him up to the enemy. No reſpect was paid to this venerable nobleman, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year. All his former ſervices, as well as his virtues, were forgotten; and though they could alledge nothing againſt him but his loyalty to his maſter, he was condemned to death by the rebellious barons, and hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor. So dreadful is the paſſion of revenge in the breaſts of a ferocious nobility; the common dictates of humanity, as well as the laws, both human and divine, are ſacrificed at its altar!

The king, purſuant to his reſolution, had embarked for Ireland; but being driven back by contrary winds, he endeavoured to conceal himſelf among the mountains of Wales. Iſabella was alarmed when ſhe heard her huſband was ſtill in his own dominions. She feared that the diſtreſs of their ſovereign might turn the tide of popular favour againſt her party; and it was determined to ſeize the royal perſon. The difficulty of diſcovering his retreat was ſoon removed, by bribing the Welſh; and the king was taken at Caerfilly, in Glamorganſhire, with the younger Spencer, Baldoc the chancellor, and a few domeſtics; all the reſt of his courtiers having deſerted him in his misfortunes. The king was committed to the care of the earl of Lancaſter, and confined in Kenelworth caſtle. The younger Spencer, without any form of trial, was executed, with the moſt ſhocking circumſtances of barbarity and inſult. Baldoc, the chancellor, being a prieſt, could not, with ſafety, be ſo ſuddenly and ſo illegally diſpatched. He was conducted to London, where he was aſſaulted by the populace, who uſed him with the utmoſt cruelty, and threw him into Newgate, where he ſoon after expired.

A.D. 1327. But the meaſure of Iſabella's wickedneſs was not yet full. It was not ſufficient to have ſeized the perſon of the king; it was alſo neceſſary that he ſhould reſign his ſceptre, and even that his life ſhould fall a ſacrifice to her ſafety. She made no ſcruple of convoking, in the name of her huſband, a parliament, who were to dethrone him. A charge was accordingly exhibited againſt him; in which, though it was drawn by his moſt inveterate enemies, nothing but his confined genius or his misfortunes were objected to him; malice itſelf not being able to find any particular crime that could be objected againſt him. But this was of little weight in an aſſembly convoked for his deſtruction. The ſpirit of faction had annihilated juſtice. The parliament depoſed the king with the ſame facility they would have baniſhed a ſimple individual. Certain commiſſioners were immediately named for carrying to Edward the reſolution of the parliament with regard to his depoſition. This deputation conſiſted of three biſhops, three earls, two abbots, and two knights for each county, together with Sir William Truſſel, one of the judges, who was nominated the nation's particular procurator. They were inſtructed to uſe every argument in their power to prevail upon Edward to make a voluntary reſignation of that power with which they were determined to truſt him no longer.

The biſhops of Hereford and Lincoln, two of his moſt inveterate enemies, were ſent to converſe with him before the deputies arrived, in order to prepare him for the approaching change of his condition. Edward was ſufficiently convinced that his fate was determined when theſe two prelates appeared; and the manner in which they diſcharged their commiſſion was perfectly ſimilar to the reſt of their conduct. Inſtead of pouring the balm of conſolation into the breaſt of wounded royalty, they aggravated the pungent ſmart by a thouſand malicious inſinuations: and when they perceived Edward made the leaſt ſtruggle to maintain his dignity, by refuſing to confer with the deputies; they told him, "that if he continued obſtinate in refuſing to reſign, the parliament would involve his whole family in his guilt, exclude all his children from the ſucceſſion, and place another perſon on the throne of his anceſtors." This menace awakened all the fondneſs of a father in the ſoul of the unfortunate Edward: he pauſed; he dropped a tear to the remembrance of his fallen ſtate; conſented to admit the deputies to an audience, and retired to his chamber. As ſoon as he had recollected his ſpirits, he entered the chamber of audience dreſſed in a mourning habit; but after the articles of impeachment againſt him were read, and the commiſſioners had demanded his immediate reſignation, he was unable to ſtand the ſhock; his ſpirits forſook him, and he had fallen to the ground, had not the biſhop of Lincoln ſupported him in this dreadful moment of conflicting paſſions. As ſoon as he recovered, he proceeded to the ceremony of reſignation, by delivering, with his own hands, to the commiſſioners, the crown, ſceptre, and other enſigns of royalty, which had been brought thither for that purpoſe. And Sir William Truſſel renounced, in the name of the parliament and people, all future allegiance and fealty.

The melancholy ceremony being finiſhed, the commiſſioners returned to London, and young Edward was placed on his father's throne. But it was impoſſible to prevent theſe attrocious acts of violence from opening the eyes of a deluded people. The cruelty, the perfidy, and the infidelity of the queen, joined to her impudent hypocriſy, in publickly bewailing, with tears, the misfortunes of the king, who owed them all to her execrable conduct, could not fail of exciting the indignation of the Engliſh. Her infamous commerce with Mortimer increaſed the public odium, and ſhe was looked upon with deteſtation by every friend to truth, to virtue, to fidelity. The current of popular favour was now changed; the queen was regarded with horror, while the fate of the unfortunate Edward was deplored. A ſcene of majeſty in diſtreſs attracted the pity, the compaſſion, the tears of the people. The earl of Lancaſter himſelf was touched with theſe generous ſentiments:

ments: he treated his priſoner with the greateſt kindneſs and reſpect; he is even ſaid to have entertained more honourable intentions in his favour.

Iſabella and Mortimer were alarmed: they well knew the conſequence, if Edward ſhould again be placed in the ſeat of power; and determined to add the guilt of murder to their long catalogue of crimes. The king was accordingly taken out of the hands of Lancaſter, and delivered over to lord Berkley, and Mautravers and Gournay. Berkley himſelf behaved with great kindneſs to the royal captive; but the two others treated him with the utmoſt cruelty and inſolence, though the goodneſs of Edward's conſtitution ſupported him under all theſe afflictions, till orders arrived from the queen and Mortimer to finiſh the inhuman tragedy. But even his death was to be attended with cruelty. Theſe deteſted monſters in the human ſhape, threw the impriſoned monarch on his bed, held him down violently with a table, which they threw upon him, and thruſt into his fundament a red-hot iron, inſerting it through a horn, in order to prevent any external marks of violence upon his perſon. But the guards and ſervants were ſufficiently apprized of the horrid deed, by the ſcreams with which the king, in ſuch unutterable agonies, filled the caſtle. Theſe proclaimed to the world the infernal orders of an adulterous woman, and a perfidious nobleman. They cried to heaven for vengeance, nor did they long cry in vain.

Thus periſhed, by the hands of inhuman aſſaſſins, Edward II. a prince of the mildeſt diſpoſition, though he experienced the fate of a tyrant. He was totally incapable of government in thoſe ferocious times. The ſceptre was too weighty for his feeble arm. He might, indeed, have reigned in tranquillity, had he placed his favours on deſerving objects; and if the exorbitant power of the barons, in that age, would have ſubmitted to the authority of a miniſter. But the nobles, whoſe turbulent diſpoſition the great abilities of his father were ſcarce ſufficient to reſtrain, overturned the conſtitution when the reins of government were held by a more feeble hand. They dreaded the valour and firmneſs of the one, and deſpiſed the ſlender abilities of the other. The laws wanted power to reſtrain the violences of the great, and the voice of juſtice was ſtifled amidſt the din of arms. The king was accuſed of crimes committed by his enemies; and all the dreadful ſcenes of devaſtation, the natural conſequences of civil diſcord, though they owed their riſe to the turbulent ambition of his barons, were imputed to him. The people conſidered their monarch as the ſource of thoſe miſfortunes which flowed from the brutal manners of the great. His moſt inveterate enemies have not accuſed him of any crime; and perhaps it will be difficult to find, in the annals of hiſtory, a prince more innocent, or more inoffenſive than Edward II. But the feudal conſtitution required a perſon of ſtrength, of firmneſs, of valour, to hold the reins of government. Edward was deſtitute of theſe abilities; and fell a victim to vice and licentiouſneſs in the forty-third year of his age, and the twentieth of his reign.

The king left four children, two ſons and two daughters. Edward, his eldeſt ſon, who ſucceeded him in the throne; John, afterwards created earl of Cornwall, and died very young at Perth: Jane, afterwards married to Edward Bruce, king of Scotland; and Eleanor, married to Reginald, count of Gueldres.

During this reign, the order of the Knights Templars was diſſolved, by the barbarous injuſtice of Clement V. inſtigated by the cruel and vindictive ſpirit of Philip the Fair. This order owed its riſe to the firſt fervour of the cruſades; and by uniting valour with devotion, the two moſt popular qualities of that age, and employing both in the defence of the Holy Land, they ſoon made rapid advances to credit and authority. Hence they alſo acquired, from the piety of the faithful, very ample poſſeſſions in every country of Europe, eſpecially in France. But time having relaxed the ſeverity of their original virtues, and convinced them of the inefficacy of thoſe expeditions to the Eaſt, which had ſo long depopulated Europe, they choſe rather to enjoy in their native countries thoſe opulent eſtates, than expoſe themſelves to inceſſant dangers againſt the infidels in the Holy Land. By this change of conduct they loſt their popularity, while their riches tempted the avidity of ſeveral of the monarchs of Europe. But though they were no longer beheld with reverence by the people, they ſtill maintained a conſiderable part of their former credit; the vindictive ſpirit of Philip the Fair alone proved the ſource of their deſtruction. They were accuſed, by two profligate and impriſoned knights of their own order, of crimes ſo repugnant to reaſon and policy, that their being mentioned was abundantly ſufficient to deſtroy the credit of the witneſſes. But Philip was implacable. All the Templars in France were ſeized and committed to priſon in one day; above an hundred of them were put to the moſt cruel tortures, and fifty-nine burnt together near the abbey of St. Antoine, in Paris. Even the grand maſter of the order, John de Molay, and Guy, brother to the ſovereign of Dauphine, two of the principal noblemen in Europe, the one by his dignity, and the other by his birth, were committed alive to the flames before the church of Notredame. Clement V. one of Philip's creatures, and who then reſided at Poictiers, aboliſhed the whole order, by the plenitude of his apoſtolic power. Their conduct underwent the ſtricteſt ſcrutiny in ſeveral parts of Europe, but not the leaſt trace of the crimes imputed to them by Philip was even pretended to be diſcovered. A very ample teſtimony of their piety and morals was ſent to the pope by the Engliſh.

The Arts and Sciences made but a ſmall progreſs in England during this period. But it often happens, that in the darkeſt nights of ignorance and error, ſome bright ſtar of uncommon luſtre darts the beams of genius amidſt the dreadful gloom, and illuminates, for a ſeaſon, ſome parts of the dun obſcurity. Roger Bacon was a genius of this kind, and born for the inſtruction of the human ſpecies; but the age in which he lived knew not his merit. He was a Franciſcan friar at Oxford, and ſtiled Doctor Mirabilis for his great learning, but much more for his inventions, the genuine characteriſtic of genius. He diſcovered the teleſcope, burning-glaſs, camera obſcura, gun-powder, the tranſmutation of metals, and ſeveral other particulars known only to himſelf. Future times, and future artiſts, have claimed the diſcoveries made by Bacon. A greater genius in mechanics had not then aroſe ſince the days of Archimedes. But all his merit could not protect him againſt the barbarous opinions of the age in which he lived. He was perſecuted by an enthuſiaſtic clergy, at a time when philoſophy had made a leſs progreſs than any other branch of learning, and geometry and aſtronomy were branded with the odious name of necromancy. He died on the eleventh of June, 1292.

In the year 1237, water was firſt conveyed into the city of London, by means of leaden pipes from ſprings in the manor of Tyburn; but the infant artiſts of that age were forty-eight years in completing that uſeful work; the great conduit in Cheapſide, built of ſtone, and furniſhed with ciſterns lined with lead, not being finiſhed till the year 1285.

The noble diſcovery of the mariner's compaſs was made about the year 1302; but the perſon to whom we owe that invaluable acquiſition is not certainly known; though one Flavio de Givia, a native of Amalfa, in the kingdom of Naples, is ſaid, by ſeveral, to have been the fortunate perſon. But though the Engliſh lay no claim to the diſcovery, they were the inventors of the box in which the magnetical needle is ſuſpended, a contrivance by which it is always kept in an horizontal poſition.

When it is conſidered that all Europe was now involved in a night of ſuperſtitious ignorance, we ſhall not be ſurprized that ſo few diſcoveries were made during this period. The ſciences were abſorbed in myſteries of theology, and learning chiefly confined to the clergy, who generally employed their talents in uſeleſs, and often in ridiculous ſpeculations. Some indeed ſtudied phyſic, but in ſo ſtrange and imperfect a manner, that every epidemical diſtemper which reſiſted their injudicious method of practice became a real plague, and ſwept away multitudes of people. The phyſicians were too ignorant and too poſitive to admit of any innovations in the practice of the healing art; they knew not the art of adapting medicines to the nature of the diſeaſe, and the conſtitution of the patient.

Among other wild and ridiculous notions, which prevailed in this age of bigotry and ſuperſtitution, it was imagined, that the perſons afflicted with the leproſy, a diſeaſe then very common, had conſpired with the Saracens to poiſon all the ſprings and fountains in ſeveral countries. This chimerical notion, which evidently ſprung from the ſource of ignorance, drew on thoſe unhappy perſons the utmoſt ſeverity of juſtice. The phyſicians were too ignorant to convince the people of the injuſtice of ſo ridiculous an accuſation.

From the depoſition of Edward II. to the death of Henry IV.

EDWARD III. ſurnamed of WINDSOR.

A. D. 1327. EDWARD, though placed in the ſeat of power on the reſignation of his father, was too young to hold the reins of government; a council of regency was appointed by the parliament for directing the adminiſtration of affairs during his minority. This council conſiſted of twelve perſons; five prelates, the archbiſhops of Canterbury and York, the biſhops of Wincheſter, Worceſter, and Hereford; and ſeven lay peers, the earls of Norfolk, Kent, and Surry, and the lords Wake, Ingham, Piercy, and Roſs. The earl of Lancaſter was appointed guardian and protector of the king's perſon. But it could not be expected that the dreadful diſorders which had ſo long deſolated the kingdom, would ſubſide during the minority of young Edward; eſpecially as the reins of government were held by a faithleſs, paſſionate, headſtrong woman, totally governed by an ambitious and unexperienced miniſter, who, though he poſſeſſed even more power than the younger Spencer, had neither his abilities nor his intereſt.

Bruce, who conſidered the truce as terminated by the reſignation of the elder Edward, took advantage of the unſettled ſtate of the kingdom, and made an attempt upon the caſtle of Norham, but the governor, Sir Robert Manners, having received intelligence of the deſign, made ſo furious a ſally on the Scottiſh forces, that they were put to flight with great ſlaughter, and obliged to retire with precipitation into their own country. Bruce was not, however, intimidated, he collected an army on the frontiers, conſiſting of twenty-five thouſand men, under the command of the earl of Murray and lord Douglas, and threatened to invade the northern counties. The Scots had been long trained to the deſultory practices of war. The noble equipage of their troops conſiſted of a bag of oatmeal, which, as a ſupply in caſes of neceſſity, each ſoldier carried behind him, together with a light plate of iron, on which he inſtantly baked the oatmeal into a cake in the open fields. But his chief ſubſiſtence was the cattle he ſeized; and his cookery was as expeditious as his other operations. After flaying the animal, he placed the ſkin hanging looſe in the form of a bag, on ſome ſtakes driven into the ground for that purpoſe; he poured a ſufficient quantity of water into this bag, kindled a fire below, and thus made it ſerve as a cauldron to boil his victuals. Soldiers like theſe, wholly unincumbered, and who diſlodged themſelves in a moment, could ravage provinces with impunity; and to this particular they chiefly owed the ſucceſs they met with in their invaſions of the northern counties.

The Engliſh miniſtry were averſe to a war with Scotland, but it would have been fatal to their power had they ſuffered ſuch inſults to eſcape with impunity. Young Edward earneſtly deſired to lead his troops againſt the enemy, and chaſtiſe their inſolence. No objection was made to his making the campaign in perſon, and he marched to the northward at the head of ſixty thouſand men. After the utmoſt difficulty he found the enemy encamped on the declivity of a hill, at the foot of which was the river Were. But however deſirous Edward was of coming to an engagement, he ſoon perceived that he could not attack the enemy in their preſent ſituation, without expoſing his army to the utmoſt danger. Incenſed at being ſo near the enemy without being able to bring them to an engagement, Edward ſent them a defiance, and challenged them to meet him in the open field, and terminate their quarrel by a deciſive battle. Douglas was highly exaſperated at this defiance, and adviſed to accept the challenge ſent by the king of England; but the motion was over-ruled by Murray, who told Edward, that he never liſtened to the counſel of an enemy in any of his operations. But Douglas, tho' he could not prevail on Murray to bring on a general engagement with the Engliſh, determined not to continue idle in his camp. He put himſelf at the head of two hundred horſe, paſſed the river in the night, and entering the Engliſh camp unperceived, advanced as far as the royal tent, with a deſign to ſurprize and carry off the king. But the attempt was rendered abortive by ſome of Edward's ſervants, who awaking in the critical moment, made a noble reſiſtance, and ſacrificed their lives in his defence. The king himſelf cut his way through the Scots, who had entered his tent, and eſcaped. The Engliſh were now alarmed, the greater part of the Scots were ſlain; but Douglas himſelf, with a few followers, found means to retreat to his own army. Soon after the Scots decamped during the night, and marched with ſuch expedition, that it would be in vain for Edward to hope he ſhould be able to overtake them.

A. D. 1328. The bad ſucceſs of this expedition fell violently upon the infamous Mortimer, who had uſurped the whole authority of the government. The king himſelf was highly incenſed, and was determined to free himſelf from the power of a miniſter who ſeemed regardleſs of national honour. Mortimer ſaw his danger, and thought it neceſſary, on any terms, to make a peace with the Scots. Accordingly he he entered into a negotiation with Bruce, whom he acknowledged as king of Scotland, renounced the Engliſh claim of ſuperiority, and was contented in return with ſtipulating the payment of thirty thouſand marks. Though the queen and Mortimer had ſufficient intereſt to procure a confirmation of this treaty by the parliament, yet it was no ſooner made public, than it excited an univerſal clamour throughout the kingdom; the people expreſſed their reſentment in the moſt poignant terms. They declared openly, that this peace was neither honourable nor neceſſary; that thoſe who concluded it had baſely ſacrificed both the blood and treaſure of the nation to private views; that the queen, who under pretence of her huſband's incapacity, had uſurped his authority, had now ſufficiently diſcovered how unable ſhe herſelf was to hold the reins of government; and that all the errors committed by the elder Edward during the whole courſe of his reign, were nothing in compariſon to what ſhe had done in the very beginning of her adminiſtration.

Mortimer perceived that his treaty with Bruce had rendered him very unpopular, and he began to dread the conſequences, eſpecially when he was informed, that the earls of Kent, Norfolk, and Lancaſter, the archbiſhops of Canterbury, the biſhops of London and Wincheſter, and ſeveral powerful barons, had determined to impeach him before the parliament. He knew the conſequence if a majority in that aſſembly ſhould favour the complainants, and exerted all his power to bring about a reconciliation. He ſucceeded; and it was agreed that all grievances ſhould be redreſſed in the enſuing parliament. In the mean time a general pardon paſſed the great ſeal, for all who had joined in the late confederacy.

A. D. 1329. But though Mortimer had been obliged to temporize, he was determined to have his revenge, and to ſingle out an object that might ſtrike his enemies with terror. The weakneſs of the earl of Kent promoted his criminal intentions. He cauſed a report to be ſpread, that Edward the ſecond was yet alive and confined in Corfe caſtle. The earl, who had always retained a ſincere affection for that unfortunate brother, though he had joined the queen's party to drive the two Spencer's from the kingdom, immediately formed a deſign of replacing him on the throne. But the treacherous Mortimer had no ſooner procured ſufficient proofs of his deſign, than he cauſed him to be ſeized, and committed to priſon.

A. D. 1330. The parliament was immediately aſſembled, and the ſlaviſh though turbulent barons, condemned him to loſe his life and fortune. The queen and Mortimer, apprehenſive of young Edward's lenity towards his uncle, hurried on the execution, and he was beheaded the day after his ſentence was pronounced. But though the barons wanted virtue and fortitude to oppoſe the deſigns of an inſolent miniſter, the earl was ſo beloved by the people, that when he was brought upon the ſcaffold, the common executioner refuſed to perform his office; nor could any one be found to ſupply his place, till the evening, when the ſentence was executed by a felon from the Marſhalſea, who, as a reward for his ſervice, received a free pardon for all the robberies he had committed. But crimes like theſe could not long remain unpuniſhed by a prince who knew how to reign.

This inhuman action filled up the meaſure of Mortimer's crimes, and rendered him univerſally odious. All parties, forgetting their former animoſities, conſpired the deſtruction of this inſolent and perfidious miniſter. Edward himſelf, now in his eighteenth year, was deſirous of taking into his own hands the reins of government, and bringing to exemplary puniſhment, a man who made no ſcruple of ſacrificing the honour of his country, and the lives of the nobility to his inſatiable thirſt of power. But it was abſolutely neceſſary to uſe the utmoſt precaution. Mortimer had ſo entirely engroſſed the adminiſtration of affairs, that the whole power of the kingdom was at his devotion; he was always upon his guard, was continually attended by one hundred and eighty armed knights and their followers, and had even ſurrounded the throne itſelf with his emiſſaries, who acted as ſpies on the behaviour of the king and his friends. A prince of leſs fortitude than Edward would have been deterred by ſo many difficulties; but Edward was a ſtranger to fear. He imparted his deſign to William lord Montacute, and ſeveral other noblemen, who all promiſed their aſſiſtance, and it was determined to ſeize Mortimer during the ſeſſion of parliament which was ſummoned to meet at Nottingham.

In order to this it was propoſed that the king ſhould occupy the caſtle of Nottingham, which would enable them to carry on their deſigns with more ſafety and ſucceſs; but on their arrival they found the caſtle already filled with the attendants of Iſabella and Mortimer, one or two apartments only being left for the king and a few of his attendants. It was now ſufficiently evident, that it would be impoſſible to execute their deſign without the aſſiſtance of Sir William Eland, the governor of the caſtle. Lord Montacute was therefore ſent to gain him over to their party, which was affected with great facility, that gentleman joyfully embracing an opportunity of ſhewing at once his affection for the perſon of his ſovereign, and his deteſtation of thoſe, who by their infamous conduct, had brought their country to the brink of deſtruction. But at the ſame time, he informed Montacute that it would be impracticable for him to admit any aſſiſtance by the common entry, the caſtle being ſtrictly guarded, the gates locked every evening, and the keys carried to the queen. He, however, recollected, that there was a ſubterraneous paſſage formerly contrived as a ſecret outlet to the fortreſs, but at preſent concealed by a heap of rubbiſh. Through this cavern therefore he undertook to conduct the confederates to Mortimer's apartment. The attempt ſucceeded; Mortimer was ſeized in an apartment adjoining to that of the queen, without the leaſt reſiſtance, and ſent directly under a ſtrong guard to the tower of London.

A parliament was immediately ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter for the trial of this tyrannical miniſter, and a proclamation was iſſued for all perſons who had any complaints to prefer againſt him, to appear before that aſſembly, in order to obtain redreſs for all their juſt grievances. Nor was juſtice long deferred. The firſt buſineſs that engaged the attention of the national aſſembly was the impeachment of the tyrannical Mortimer. The accuſation was immediately drawn up, and conſiſted of nine articles, which contained many high crimes and miſdemeanours. Among others, he was accuſed of having uſurped the regal power from the council of regency appointed by the parliament; of having procured the death of the late king; of having deceived the earl of Kent into a conſpiracy to reſtore that prince; of having ſollicited and obtained exhorbitant grants of the royal demeſnes; of having diſſipated the public treaſure; of ſecreting for his own uſe twenty thouſand marks of the money paid by the king of Scotland; and of having repaired to the parliament with an armed force, diſturbed their deliberations, and threatened ſeveral of the members with death. Theſe facts were all notorious. It was thought unneceſſary to call witneſſes: and Mortimer was condemned to ſuffer as a traitor, without being ſuffered to make his defence. The ſentence was executed on the twenty-ninth of November, at the Elms, about a mile from London, where this once powerful nobleman was hanged on a gibbet like a common malefactor. The queen was confined to her houſe at Riſings in the neighbourhood of London, and her revenue reduced to four thouſand pounds a year. The king conſtantly viſited her once or twice a year, during the remainder of her life; but ſhe never recovered the leaſt degree of power or authority in the ſtate.

A. D. 1331. Edward now publiſhed a proclamation, informing his ſubjects, that he had taken into his own hands the reins of government. He could not have diſſeminated a more pleaſing article of intelligence. The people were rejoiced at ſeeing on the throne a prince, of whoſe abilities for government they had already formed the moſt pleaſing idea; and the firſt acts of his public adminiſtration tended to convince them that their hopes were not founded on a chimerical baſis. He reſumed all the grants that had been made of the royal demeſnes during his minority, and rewarded thoſe who had aſſiſted him in ſeizing the ambitious Mortimer. He remitted the fines and confiſcations that had been awarded againſt the barons who had oppoſed the deſtructive meaſures of that miniſter. He reverſed the ſentence of attainder againſt the earl of Kent, reſtored his ſon to the family eſtate and honours, and his widow to the enjoyment of her jointure. All the ſheriffs that had been appointed by Mortimer, he diſplaced; diſpatched orders to all the judges to adminiſter ſtrict juſtice to all perſons without delay, notwithſtanding any letters that might have been procured from the crown to the contrary; and purſued every meaſure that appeared conducive to eſtabliſh the public peace, and introduce a frugal management of the national treaſure.

Beſides the diſorders that had crept into the adminiſtration of public affairs, there were others that equally required the abilities and firmneſs of Edward to remove. The kingdom was infeſted with numerous bands of robbers, who, taking advantage of the late commotions, had ſet the power of the magiſtrates at defiance, and exerciſed, with impunity, their lawleſs depredations. They were even openly protected by the great barons, who employed them againſt their enemies. It was therefore previouſly neceſſary to deſtroy this alarming connection before the evil could be removed. Accordingly Edward exacted a ſolemn promiſe from his barons, aſſembled in parliament, to break off all connections with ſuch malefactors, as a diſgrace to nobility. He iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all juſts and tournaments, which ſerved as a plauſible pretence for aſſembling great numbers of armed men, to the diſturbance of the public tranquillity, and the terror of the peaceable inhabitants. After taking theſe neceſſary meaſures, he marched in perſon againſt the robbers; and by his courage and activity, the more powerful troops were broken and diſperſed; many were taken and executed, and great numbers flew to the continent for ſafety. The miniſters of juſtice followed the royal example; they were indefatigable in diſcovering and purſuing, and ſtrict in puniſhing criminals. By theſe ſalutary methods, the diſeaſe was removed, and travellers paſſed from one part of the kingdom to the other in ſafety.

A. D. 1332. While Edward was thus employed in promoting the happineſs of his people, an accident happened which excited his ambition. Robert Bruce, who had recovered by arms the independency of his country, and ſhewn himſelf ſo worthy of a throne, died ſoon after the concluſion of the laſt peace, and left his ſon David, a minor, under the guardianſhip of the earl of Murray. Among other particulars in the late treaty, it was ſtipulated, that both the Scottiſh nobility, who enjoyed lands in England before the commencement of the war; and the Engliſh, who enjoyed eſtates in Scotland, ſhould be reſtored to their reſpective poſſeſſions. Edward had ſcrupulouſly performed his part of the treaty; but Robert had refuſed to follow the example of the Engliſh monarch. It would have been in vain to attempt any other method for redreſs but that of petition, while Robert ſwayed the Scottiſh ſceptre; but the feeble ſtate of the kingdom under a minority induced them to enter into an aſſociation for recovering their rights. Lord Beaumont was at the head of this confederacy. He claimed the earldom of Buchan in Scotland; and propoſed, as the moſt effectual method of obtaining juſtice, to invite Edward Baliol, ſon to John Baliol, to make an attempt for recovering his father's crown.

Baliol, who, ever ſince the death of his father, had lived on his patrimonial eſtate in Normandy, little thought of reviving the claims of his family to the crown of Scotland; but the propoſal was too flattering to be refuſed. Young Baliol engaged in the enterprize, and joined the diſcontented barons in England. Edward was now applied to for aſſiſtance; but the Engliſh monarch was too prudent to engage openly in the attempt, though he ſecretly encouraged the undertaking of Baliol, and blew the ſparks of civil diſcord into a flame. Scotland was at this time in a very feeble condition. Murray, who had ſo often led the Scots to victory, had lately paid the debt of nature; and lord Douglas, diſdaining a life of indolence and eaſe, had paſſed over into Spain, and periſhed in a battle againſt the Moors.

Baliol and the diſcontented nobles did not meet with any great ſucceſs in raiſing forces, but determined to try the fortune of a battle. They embarked at Ravenſpur, in Yorkſhire, and in a few days reached the coaſt of Fife. On their approaching the ſhore, they perceived a body of the militia, commanded by Sir Alexander Seaton, drawn up on the beach to oppoſe their landing; but the Engliſh charged the Scottiſh general with ſuch reſolution, that he was totally defeated; and himſelf, with near a thouſand of his ſoldiers, ſlain on the ſpot. No further oppoſition was made to their landing; and they advanced to Dunfermling, where they ſeized a magazine of arms and proviſions. Here Baliol, in reviewing his little army, found they fell ſhort of three thouſand men.

Donald, earl of Marre, who had ſucceeded Murray in the regency, was greatly inferior to his predeceſſor; he wanted his prudence, his intrepidity, his reſources. He, however, ſoon collected an army of near forty thouſand men, and advanced to meet the enemy; but all his motions were deſultory; and he obſerved no order in the encampment of his army.

Baliol, who wanted neither valour nor activity, advanced into the heart of the country, hoping to be joined by the old partiſans of his family; but he was deceived. He came at the head of an Engliſh army, and that circumſtance alone was ſufficient to render him obnoxious to the Scots. In the midſt of this diſappointment, he was informed, that the earl of Marre was encamped at Gladſmuir, on the oppoſite ſide of the river Erne. Baliol was not intimidated: he paſſed the ſtream at Duplin; and falling unexpectedly on the Scottiſh forces during the night, threw them into confuſion, and drove them from their camp with great ſlaughter.

The Engliſh flattered themſelves that they had obtained a complete victory; but ſome of the chiefs aſcending an eminence to ſurvey the country, perceived the Scottiſh army, now recovered from their panic, advancing towards them in three diviſions. The Engliſh flew to arms; and poſting themſelves in a narrow defile, reſolutely waited the approach of the enemy. The Scots, exaſperated at their late defeat by a handful of men, advanced to the attack with the utmoſt precipitation, without regarding ſome broken ground which lay between them and the Engliſh. But they were ſoon convinced of their folly; their ranks were diſordered; and the ſecond diviſion preſſing upon the firſt, threw the whole into confuſion, ſo that they became an eaſy prey to the Engliſh. Above twelve thouſand of the Scots fell in the engagement: and among them the flower of their nobility, particularly the regent himſelf, Robert Bruce, a natural ſon of the late king: the earls of Athole and Montieth; and the lords Hay, Keith, and Lindſey. Not above thirty men fell on the ſide of the Engliſh.

Animated by theſe repeated ſucceſſes, Baliol advanced to Perth, which he entered without oppoſition, and immediately repaired the fortifications.

This neceſſary work was hardly finiſhed, before the earl of Marche, and Sir Archibald Douglas, at the head of an army of forty thouſand men, appeared, and inveſted the place by land, determined to reduce the Engliſh by famine. They alſo collected a few veſſels, under the command of one John Crabbe, a Flemiſh ſailor, in order to block up the place by water. But the Engliſh ſquadron, which were lying at the mouth of the Tay to ſupply Baliol's army with proviſions, ſoon drove Crabbe from his ſtation, and took the greater part of his ſhips. The Scottiſh generals now perceived that it would be in vain to continue the blockade of Perth; they abandoned the enterprize; the army diſperſed; and the kingdom was, in effect, ſubdued by an handful of men.

The uſual conſequences attended the good fortune of Baliol: the nobility and gentry flocked to make their ſubmiſſion. The young king, and his queen, ſiſter to the king of England, were ſent into France; and Baliol was crowned king of Scotland at Scone, on the twenty-ſeventh of September.

A. D. 1333. He did not, however, long enjoy the crown he had ſo eaſily obtained; for having imprudently diſmiſſed the greater part of his Engliſh followers, he was driven out of the kingdom, and obliged to ſeek protection in England. Before this revolution happened, Baliol had perceived, that it would be impoſſible for him to keep poſſeſſion of the throne without the aſſiſtance of the Engliſh monarch. Accordingly he ſent a meſſage to Edward, offering to renew the homage for his crown, acknowledge his ſuperiority, and to marry his ſiſter, if a diſpenſation from the pope could be obtained, as her nuptials with David Bruce had never been conſummated. Ambitious of gaining what he had loſt by the treachery of Mortimer, Edward entered into a treaty with Baliol; but that prince being now driven from his throne, there was a neceſſity for replacing him in the ſeat of power.

If any excuſe was wanting for the Engliſh monarch to break the peace lately concluded with Robert Bruce, the Scots themſelves furniſhed one ſufficient to rouze a leſs ambitious prince than Edward. Elated with their late ſucceſs againſt Baliol, and allured by the hopes of plunder, the Scots broke into Cumberland, and laid great part of the country waſte with fire and ſword. Edward immediately ſent orders to Sir Anthony Lacy to begin hoſtilities againſt the enemy. His commands were obeyed with the utmoſt alacrity; the invaders were defeated, and obliged to return into their own country with great precipitation.

Douglas, the regent, was alarmed at this breach of the treaty, and ſpared neither intreaties, excuſes, nor ſubmiſſions, to divert the gathering ſtorm, that threatened the deſtruction of his country. But all his efforts were in vain; Edward liſtened only to the voice of ambition. The campaign was opened with the ſiege of Berwick, where Edward commanded in perſon. That place was conſidered by the Scots as the key of their country; and the regent had accordingly furniſhed it with a ſtrong garriſon, under the command of Sir William Keith; while he himſelf formed a numerous army on the frontiers, in order to penetrate into England, as ſoon as that fortreſs was inveſted by Edward.

The ſiege continued near two months; when great part of the fortifications being demoliſhed, the garriſon agreed to capitulate, if not relieved in five days. The terms were accepted; and a meſſenger diſpatched to Sir Archibald Douglas, the regent, informing him of the conditions, and preſſing him to march immediately to their relief. The great importance of Berwick, and the impatience of his forces to be led againſt the Engliſh, determined him to comply with the requeſt of the garriſon. He marched immediately to their relief, and drew up his forces at the foot of Halidown-hill, a little to the north of Berwick, in ſight of the Engliſh camp. His army was divided into four bodies, and headed by the principal nobility of Scotland.

The Engliſh were alſo drawn up in four ſeparate bodies, and both wings flanked with archers; and in this diſpoſition Edward waited the attack of the enemy; who began to aſcend the hill, with great impetuoſity, about five in the afternoon; but the ſteepneſs of the aſcent, the weight of their armour, the inceſſant ſhowers of arrows diſcharged from the bows of the Engliſh, and the large ſtones rolled down upon them, ſoon checked their career. They halted; and their general being that moment transfixed with an arrow, fell lifeleſs to the ground. The utmoſt conſternation now ſeized the Scottiſh army. Edward perceived their diſorder, and commanded lord D'Arcy, at the head of a body of light-armed infantry, to charge them in flank; while he himſelf attacked their front with a detachment of veterans. The Scottiſh knights, in order to render the action more ſteady and deſperate, had diſmounted from their horſes, but could not ſtand the ſhock of the Engliſh. The whole army fled with the utmoſt precipitation. Near thirty thouſand of the Scots fell in the action, and all the chief nobility were either ſlain or taken priſoners. The Engliſh loſt only one knight, one eſquire, and thirteen private ſoldiers. The town and caſtle of Berwick immediately ſurrendered; and no farther aſſiſtance being apprehended, Edward, after leaving a conſiderable part of his army with Baliol, returned into England.

It was now impoſſible for the Scots to oppoſe the power of Baliol: the principal part of their nobility were loſt, their army was diſſipated, their king in France, and their regent ſlain. Submiſſion was their only reſource. Baliol accordingly marched through the whole country; and all the caſtles, except thoſe of Dumbarton, Urquhart, and two or three others, which were deemed impregnable, opened their gates at the firſt ſummons.

A. D. 1334. A parliament was now ſummoned to meet at Edinburgh on the tenth of February, where Baliol was acknowledged king, the ſuperiority of England was again recognized; many of the Scottiſh nobility ſwore fealty to him; and Berwick, Dunbar, Roxburgh, Edinburgh, and all the ſouth-eaſt counties of Scotland, were declared to be for ever annexed to the crown of England. Such ſhameful conditions could not fail of exaſperating the Scots. They ſubmitted to them indeed, but determined to obſerve the treaty no longer than they were not in a condition to break it.

An opportunity ſoon offered: the Engliſh troops returned to their own country, and the Scots immediately flew to arms. They renounced the fealty they had ſworn to Baliol, and returned to their former allegiance under Bruce. At the ſame time they elected Sir Andrew Murray regent, and defeated Baliol in ſeveral ſmall, but deciſive actions. Edward now ſaw, that it was neceſſary for him to ſubdue that ſtubborn people a ſecond time; and he accordingly made preparations for invading Scotland at the head of an army impoſſible for them to withſtand.

A. D. 1335. The Engliſh monarch reached Berwick early in the ſpring, and purſued his march, without oppoſition, into the very heart of Scotland; the enemy having abandoned all the plains at his approach, and retired to the mountains and faſtneſſes of their country. Edward perceiving it would be in vain to traverſe a wild, deſerted, and barren country, returned to Perth. Several ſmall ſkirmiſhes, however, happened between the Scots and the ſtraggling parties of the Engliſh; in one of which Sir Andrew Murray, the regent, was taken priſoner.

While Edward continued at Perth, he detached a body of forces, under the command of his brother, John of Eltham, and Sir Anthony Lacy, to ravage the weſtern counties, which were principally inhabited by the Brucean party. The Scots, who imagined themſelves able to face a part of the Engliſh army, left their faſtneſſes, and preſented themſelves in order of battle. A bloody engagement enſued; and the victory was, for ſome time, doubtful, but at laſt declared in favour of the Engliſh. A great number of the Scots periſhed on the field of battle. The adherents of Bruce were ſo intimidated by this defeat, that they determined to ſubmit to the terms Edward ſhould think proper to impoſe; and a treaty was accordingly concluded, on the following terms: "That the Scottiſh noblemen ſhould receive a free pardon for all former offences; that they ſhould enjoy their lands, honours, and offices in Scotland, and be reſtored to their Engliſh poſſeſſions which had been forfeited: That all the privileges and franchiſes of the church and boroughs of Scotland ſhould continue unaltered and inviolable: That none but natives ſhould be put into the offices of that crown and kingdom, excepting in ſome particular caſes, where their king, Edward Baliol, ſhould make uſe of his prerogative in favour of perſons of another nation." It was alſo ſoon after agreed by the reſt of Bruce's party, who at firſt refuſed to ſign the above treaty, "That Edward Baliol ſhould enjoy the crown of Scotland during his natural life; and that at his death it ſhould deſcend to David Bruce, who, in the mean time, ſhould be honourably maintained at London."

Hoſtilities being thus terminated, Edward ordered the fortifications of Perth to be repaired, and the caſtles of Edinburgh and Stirling to be rebuilt. He alſo appointed the earl of Athol guardian of the northern parts of the kingdom; and returned to England, at the head of the greater part of his army.

But though the Scots had again ſubmitted to Edward, they were far from being reconciled to their condition, and only watched for a favourable opportunity of ſhaking off a yoke to which neceſſity alone had compelled them to ſubmit. They did not wait long. The earl of Athol was not at all adapted to govern ſuch turbulent people. Inſtead of ſoothing the Scots, and applying lenients to heal the wounds of their country, he treated them with rigour; and the caſtle of Kildrummy, in which the regent's wife had ſhut herſelf up, having ſtill refuſed to open its gates to the Engliſh, the guardian imprudently beſieged the fortreſs. This action awakened all the pride and anger of the Scots: the earl of Marche and Sir William Douglas haſtened immediately to the relief of the fortreſs, attacked the beſiegers with the utmoſt impetuoſity, and routed them with great ſlaughter. The earl of Athol himſelf was among the ſlain. Animated with this ſucceſs, they inveſted the caſtles of Coupar and Lochendoris. The ſtandard of war was again diſplayed, and forces were collected in every part of the kingdom. But before any farther hoſtilities were commenced, the pope and the king of France interpoſed their good offices; and a truce till the ninth of May, in the enſuing year, was agreed to, in order to give time for concluding a general treaty of peace.

A. D. 1336. The conferences were accordingly opened at Newcaſtle early in the ſpring; but Philip de Valois, who now filled the throne of France, and found his intereſt in the diſſentions between the Scots and Engliſh, gave ſuch inſtructions to his envoys, that though they aſſumed the characters of mediators between the contending parties, they omitted no opportunity of embarraſſing the negotiation, and rendering the intended treaty abortive. Philip had already afforded conſiderable aſſiſtance to the Scots; and his envoys now aſſured them, that their maſter would never abandon the cauſe of the unfortunate and injured David Bruce, but ſupport him to the utmoſt of his power. Elated with theſe promiſes, and exaſperated againſt the invaders of their country, the Scottiſh deputies inſiſted on ſuch high terms, that Edward broke off the treaty in a tranſport of reſentment, and both parties made preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword.

Edward had always been very careful to conciliate the affections of his ſubjects by the moſt popular acts; and being now determined to reduce the refractory Scots to an abſolute ſubmiſſion, which could not be executed without large ſupplies, he wiſely paſſed ſeveral ſalutary laws for the preſervation of the public tranquillity, and the more effectually ſecuring the property and perſons of individuals from the deſigns of ſecret or open enemies. Among others, were ſeveral acts for the freedom and extenſion of commerce, and the preſervation of the weight and quality of the coin; for the more effectually bringing to juſtice the perpetrators of murders, robberies, and other ſpecies of felony; and for reſtraining his officers from committing exceſſes in the caſe of purveyance. By theſe, and other ſimilar methods, he ſo endeared himſelf to his ſubjects, both clergy and laity, that they very readily granted him large ſubſidies for ſupporting the conqueſts he had made in Scotland, and finally reducing that nation under the Engliſh government.

Strengthened by theſe ſupplies, and fired with reſentment againſt the Scots, Edward marched a fourth time into Scotland, and laid thoſe countries waſte which had declared againſt him. The lord Beaumont, who commanded a ſeparate detachment, laid the town and caſtle of Aberdeen in aſhes, to revenge the death of Sir Thomas Roſſelin, whom the inhabitants had attacked and killed on his landing at Dunotter. Edward met with no oppoſition in his march; but ſtill the nation itſelf was as far as ever from being broken and ſubdued. The Scots had retreated to their faſtneſſes; experience taught them prudence: they knew they were not able to meet the Engliſh in the open field, and wiſely abandoned the low countries to the ravages of the enemy. The hopes of a war, which now ſeemed inevitable, between England and France, encouraged them to perſevere in their oppoſition to Edward; they ſtill flattered themſelves with being able to recover their national liberty.

A. D. 1337. We have now reached that period of hiſtory, which produced a tranſaction that gave occaſion to the moſt memorable events; and therefore it will be neceſſary to give ſome account of its ſprings and cauſes. After the death of Lewis X. of France, the public attention of that kingdom was engroſſed by a queſtion of the Salic law. That prince left only one daughter; and they had never examined in France, Whether females were capable of inheriting the crown? Laws had been enacted only to ſerve the preſent occaſion. They had no knowledge of the Salian code, the law of an ancient tribe among the Franks; the want of which had been ſupplied by the eſtabliſhed cuſtoms, and theſe cuſtoms were continually changing in France. The parliament under Philip the Fair had adjudged the province of Artois to a female, in prejudice to the next male heir; and the ſucceſſion of Champagne had, at ſome times, been ſettled upon the females, and at other times taken from them. Charles the Fair took poſſeſſion of Champagne in right of his wife, to the excluſion of the princes. Right therefore varied with power: it was not a fundamental law of the ſtate to exclude a daughter from her father's throne. Beſides the article in the ancient Salian code, which deprives the females of the right of inheriting in the Salic country, ſeems to have been founded only on this particular, that every Salic lord was obliged to appear in arms at the public aſſemblies of the nation. But the queen is not obliged to bear arms; the nation does it for her. It may, therefore, be affirmed, that the Salic law, a regulation in other reſpects ſo little known, was relative to the other fiefs, and not to the crown. Theſe arguments were, for ſome time, maintained by the duke of Burgundy, uncle to the princeſs, daughter of Lewis X. and by ſeveral princes of the blood. Lewis X. had two brothers, who, in a ſhort ſpace of time, ſucceeded him, one after the other. The elder was Philip the Long, and the younger Charles the Fair. Charles, at that time, not thinking himſelf ſo near the crown, attacked the Salic law, out of jealouſy of his brother. Philip the Long took care to have it determined at a meeting of ſome barons, prelates, and burghers of Paris, that females ought to be excluded from the crown of France. Had the other party prevailed, the contrary would have been declared a fundamental law. Philip died after a very ſhort reign, and left no male iſſue. The Salic law was then confirmed a ſecond time; and Charles the Fair, who had oppoſed it, ſucceeded to the crown, without any formal diſpute, and excluded his brother's daughters. At the death of Charles the Fair, the ſame cauſe was again decided; his queen was pregnant at the time of his deceaſe, and a regent was wanting for the kingdom.

Edward, as the ſon of Iſabella, ſiſter to Charles the Fair, claimed the regency; but it was conferred on Philip de Valois, as the firſt prince of the blood; and on the queen's being delivered of a daughter, aſcended the throne with the conſent of the nation. Edward, however, determined to maintain his right to the ſucceſſion; a claim the more inſupportable, as the three ſons of Philip the Fair had left daughters who were ſtill living, and whoſe rights were therefore preferable to that of Edward. The king of Navarre's claim was alſo better founded than that of Edward, as being deſcended from a daughter of Lewis Hutin, the immediate ſucceſſor of Philip the Fair.

But notwithſtanding theſe diſadvantages, Edward determined to attack France, and wreſt from the hand of Philip de Valois that ſceptre which he imagined to belong to him, as the next in blood to the deceaſed king. He was greatly encouraged in this reſolution by Robert d'Artois, a prince of the blood of France, who having been condemned in conſequence of a forgery he had committed, took refuge in England. Inſpired with the moſt implacable revenge againſt Philip, Robert omitted no arguments to induce the king to declare war againſt France, in favour of his title to that crown. Edward was the more inclined to liſten to the arguments of Robert, becauſe Philip had given protection to David Bruce, the exiled king of Scotland. Philip was no ſooner informed of the counſel given by Robert d'Artois, than he iſſued a ſentence of felony and forfeiture againſt him; and declared, that every vaſſal of the crown, whether within or without the kingdom, who gave countenance to that traitor, was involved in the ſame ſentence. This menace was eaſily apprehended; it wanted no comment; and Edward made preparations for carrying the war into the heart of France, in order to prevent his provinces on the continent from falling into the hands of Philip.

In order to divert the arms of the French monarch from Guienne, and at the ſame time to make an effectual attack upon Philip's dominions, Edward endeavoured to form alliances in the Low Countries, and on the frontiers of Germany. The earl of Hainault, the duke of Brabant, the archbiſhop of Cologne, the duke of Gueldres, the marquis of Juliers, the count of Namur, the lords of Fauquemont and Banquet, were engaged to join the Engliſh. This confederacy was not, however, thought ſufficiently formidable, without the acceſſion of Flanders; but this required ſome addreſs to accompliſh. The Flemings, who, by their arts and manufactures, had acquired riches and ſome ſhare of independence, had riſen in tumults, inſulted the nobility, and driven their earl into France; determined to free themſelves from every ſpecies of tyranny. The leader of theſe popular inſurrections was one Jacob Van Ardevelt, a rich brewer of Ghent, who governed the people in a more arbitrary manner than any of their lawful ſovereigns. He never appeared in the ſtreets without a guard of fourſcore perſons, who, from the leaſt ſignal given by this demagogue, murdered any perſon who happened to fall under his diſpleaſure. Whatever he thought proper to propoſe in the aſſembly of the ſtates, was never contradicted, becauſe every member feared his power. Edward courted the aſſiſtance of this ferocious leader, who refuſed to join in the alliance, unleſs Edward would aſſume the title of king of France, in order to remove the ſcruples of the Flemings, who heſitated on the right of invading the territories of their liege lord. Edward agreed to the condition, and Ardevelt invited him into Flanders. About the ſame time, Edward received from the emperor Lewis of Bavaria the title of "Vicar of the Empire," that he might appear to have a right to command the princes of Germany.

Every thing now portended an immediate rupture between the crowns of France and England. Philip invaded Guienne; and Edward ordered the duke of Brabant to demand, in his name, the crown of France, conſtituted him his lieutenant general of that kingdom; and iſſued a proclamation, commanding the French, whom he called his ſubjects, to pay him obedience. Provoked at Edward's aſſuming his crown, Philip aſſembled a conſiderable army to chaſtiſe the Flemings, and reinſtate the earl of Flanders in the poſſeſſion of that country. But Edward ſent a large body of forces to join his new allies, under the command of the earls of Derby and Suffolk, in order to render the deſigns of Philip abortive. The Engliſh, on their arrival on the coaſt, were informed that Guy de Rickenbourgh, natural brother to the earl of Flanders, had taken poſſeſſion of the iſle of Cadſant, in order to cut off all communication by ſea to Bruges and Ghent. It was therefore reſolved to drive him from that advantageous poſt. Guy, who was prepared for the attack, gave them a very warm reception; but the Engliſh, after an obſtinate diſpute, made good their landing, when a bloody battle enſued, in which the earl of Derby was thrown from his horſe, and would, in all probability, have been killed or taken priſoner, had he not been reſcued by Sir Walter Manny, a valiant knight of Hainault, who, at the head of a body of horſe, charged the enemy with the utmoſt fury, and took Guy de Rickenbourgh priſoner with his own hand. The loſs of their leader ſtruck the French with conſternation; they immediately fell into confuſion, and were routed with prodigious ſlaughter. This victory filled Ardevelt and his party with joy; and the Flemings ſent a meſſage to Edward, preſſing him to come over without delay, and head the allied army in perſon. But the immenſe preparations for the enſuing campaign produced nothing deciſive. The allies of Edward were weak in themſelves; and having no other object than his money, which began to be exhauſted, they were at once very ſlow in their motions, and very irreſolute in their meaſures.

A. D. 1339. Edward at laſt took the field, at the head of an army of near fifty thouſand men, and encamped between Marchiennes and Douay; but being informed that Philip was advancing with an army of near double his force, he left his camp, and croſſed the Schelde to meet him, and terminate, by one deciſive action, a war attended with ſo ruinous an expence. But both ſeemed to decline an engagement; and after facing each other for ſome days, Edward retired back into Flanders, and diſperſed his army.

Though the Engliſh monarch had entered into engagements with the duke of Brabant to ſtay in the Low Countries till the war was finiſhed, he found it impoſſible to keep his promiſe. His abſence had already occaſioned many diſorders in England, where bands of robbers diſturbed the peace of the nation; and the Brucean party had not only recovered what they had loſt in Scotland, but alſo invaded the northern counties of England. Theſe circumſtances were conſidered as a ſufficient reaſon for Edward's paſſing over into England; and the king having promiſed, on his word of honour, to return in perſon, the duke gave his conſent to his departure.

A. D. 1340. As ſoon as Edward landed in England, he iſſued writs for aſſembling a parliament at Weſtminſter. The aſſembly ſhewed an uncommon alacrity in aſſiſting the monarch, and providing for the ſecurity of the realm againſt all invaders. They granted the king a large ſupply; and orders were iſſued for fortifying Southampton and the Iſle of Wight; for fitting out a fleet of one hundred and fifty ſail, to protect the coaſts; for ſending ſupplies of proviſions to the caſtles of Edmburgh and Stirling; and for raiſing a body of ſeven hundred and eighty-two men at arms, two thouſand light-horſe, and two thouſand and ten archers, for defending the marches of Scotland. Theſe tokens of affection deſerved a grateful return, and accordingly Edward granted a full remiſſion of all debts due to the crown, and of all proſecutions on foreſt-treſpaſſes ſince his acceſſion to the throne. To theſe he added a confirmation of the two charters, and of the franchiſes of the boroughs. But notwithſtanding the remarkable harmony that prevailed among the branches of the legiſlature, the parliament declared, that they owed Edward no obedience as king of France, and that the two kingdoms ſhould for ever remain diſtinct and independent. It was foreſeen, that France, if ſubdued, would become the ſeat of government, and England be regarded only as a province of the monarchy.

While Edward was making preparations for returning into the Low Countries, advice arrived from the duke of Gueldres, that the French had aſſembled a powerful fleet to intercept him in his paſſage. Orders were therefore given for fitting out a ſufficient number of ſhips for carrying the king, and a conſiderable body of forces, to the continent. The utmoſt expedition was uſed on this occaſion; and Edward embarked at Orwell on the thirteenth of June, attended by the principal nobility of England. His fleet conſiſted of two hundred and fifty ſail of ſhips, having on board a powerful body of men at arms, and archers. A few days after their departure, Edward diſcovered the French fleet in the harbour of Sluiſe, and immediately made preparations for fighting the enemy. Early the next morning, the French, who had left the harbour, appeared in three diviſions; and about eleven the engagement began with the utmoſt fury. The Engliſh had taken care to get to windward of the enemy, and grappled their ſhips ſo firmly with thoſe of the French, that they formed a firm compact body, and the men fought with the ſame firmneſs as on dry land. The French, whoſe number of veſſels was much greater than that of the Engliſh, obſerving a ſhip carrying the royal ſtandard of England, advanced to attack her with the utmoſt intrepidity; but all their efforts were in vain. The examples of the king and his gallant nobles animated to ſuch a degree both the ſeamen and ſoldiers, that they every where maintained a ſuperiority over the enemy. The French could not ſtand the ſhock of the Engliſh; many hundreds of them leaped overboard, and periſhed in the ſea. In this critical moment, a reinforcement of Flemiſh ſhips joined the Engliſh, and determined the fortune of the day. Two hundred and thirty of the enemy's ſhips were taken; and thirty-two thouſand Frenchmen were ſlain, with two of their admirals. The loſs of the Engliſh was inconſiderable. Philip's courtiers were ſo aſtoniſhed at this dreadful misfortune, that none dared to be the meſſenger of ſuch alarming intelligence. His jeſter at laſt gave him a hint, by which the monarch diſcovered the loſs he had ſuſtained, and the triumph of the Engliſh.

This victory added a luſtre to Edward's authority among his allies; and he ſoon marched at the head of an army of one hundred and fifty thouſand men, compoſed of Engliſh, Germans, Flemings and Gaſcons. The firſt attempt was the ſiege of Tournay; but the city was no ſooner inveſted, than Edward detached fifty thouſand men, under the command of Robert d'Artois, who poſted himſelf near St. Omer's to favour the ſiege. Robert's troops were chiefly compoſed of tradeſmen, who had never faced an enemy, and were wholly ſtrangers to military diſcipline. From ſuch troops very little could be expected; and accordingly they were totally routed by a ſally from the garriſon, notwithſtanding the great abilities of their leader.

This defeat did not, however, intimidate Edward. He puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour, and met every where with a noble reſiſtance. Tournay was, at that time, one of the nobleſt cities in Flanders, and contained above ſixty thouſand inhabitants. It was defended by a garriſon of fifteen thouſand men, commanded by Robert Butraud and Matthew de la Trie, marſhals of France; aſſiſted by the counts of Eu, Guiſnes, Foix, Narbonne, and other gallant noblemen, who were reſolved to periſh under the ruins of the city, rather than open their gates to the enemy.

At the end of ten weeks, the city was reduced to great diſtreſs; and Philip having collected a prodigious army, advanced within a few leagues of the Engliſh camp; not with a deſign to bring on a general engagement, but of being ready to aſſiſt the garriſon whenever an opportunity offered. Edward, exaſperated at the length of the ſiege, ſent an herald to Philip, challenging him to decide their claims to the crown of France by ſingle combat, or by an action of a hundred againſt a hundred, or by a general engagement. Philip replied, that a vaſſal was not entitled to challenge his liege lord; and that the duel was, beſides, propoſed on very unequal terms; but if Edward would increaſe the ſtake, and put alſo the kingdom of England on the iſſue of the combat, he would willingly accept the challenge. Theſe bravadoes were in the true ſpirit of the times; but both theſe kings were too wiſe to think ſeriouſly of putting them in execution.

While the two armies continued in the neighbourhood of each other, and a battle was every day expected, the counteſs dowager of Hainault, mother-in-law to Edward, and ſiſter to Philip, though ſhe had retired to the convent of Fonteville after the death of her huſband, left her retreat on this intereſting occaſion, to employ her good offices for bringing about a peace between perſons ſo nearly related to her. Her zeal produced a ſhort ceſſation of hoſtilities, and which the pope in vain endeavoured to convert into a peace; but the demands of Edward were too exorbitant to be admitted. He required that Philip ſhould free Guienne from all claims of ſuperiority, and entirely abandon the protection of Scotland. Theſe conditions were accordingly rejected by Philip; a prolongation of the truce only was agreed to. The ſucceſs of Edward certainly entitled him not to make ſuch demands. His allies were never firmly attached to his intereſt: they were, indeed, deſirous of his money, but never intended to weaken the power of France. Accordingly, when they found that his treaſure was nearly exhauſted, they abandoned the confederacy; and Edward being preſſed by his impatient creditors, he was obliged to paſs privately into England.

His embaraſſment had chiefly aroſe from the nature of the ſubſidy granted by parliament. It conſiſted of corn and wool, on account of the ſcarcity of money; and theſe commodities could not be collected and diſpoſed of ſoon enough to anſwer his exigencies. But though this was nothing more than might have been expected, Edward was determined to puniſh the ſheriffs and officers of his revenue; for he conſidered them as guilty of negligence, which had, in ſome meaſure, occaſioned the bad ſucceſs of his expedition. The biſhop of Chicheſter, chancellor; the biſhop of Litchfield, treaſurer; and the archbiſhop, prime miniſter, now felt the weight of his diſpleaſure. The two former were impriſoned; but the primate, fearing the effects of Edward's anger, retired immediately to Canterbury, and determined to defend himſelf by the weapons of the prelacy. He accordingly convened a meeting of the clergy in that cathedral, and pronounced a general ſentence of excommunication againſt all who had violated the immunities of the church.

A. D. 1341. A parliament being aſſembled, the primate, who had received no ſummons to attend, preſented himſelf at the gate in his pontifical ornaments, and demanded admittance to his ſeat as the firſt and higheſt peer of the realm. He was, however, denied admittance for two days ſucceſſively; but Edward, ſenſible of the dangerous conſequences that might attend his quarrel with the clergy, prudently accepted of the conceſſions made by the churchman, and the primate was again received into favour.

This diſpute with the archbiſhop, the immenſe debt Edward had contracted on the continent, and the arbitrary meaſures he had purſued with regard to the officers of his revenue, alarmed the parliament, and it was determined to ſet proper bounds to the royal prerogative. They required a new confirmation of the great charter; they paſſed a bill, whereby it was enacted, that no nobleman ſhould be proceeded againſt or puniſhed, but by the judgment of his peers aſſembled in parliament; that the more important offices of ſtate ſhould be filled by the king, with the conſent of the council and barons; that every ſeſſion theſe offices ſhould be reſumed by him, and the miniſters who diſcharged them reduced to private perſons; that they ſhould, in that condition, anſwer, before the parliament, to any accuſations brought againſt them; and that if they were any ways found guilty, they ſhould finally be diſpoſſeſſed of their dignities, and more ſufficient perſons be ſubſtituted in their place. Edward ratified theſe acts in full parliament, but never intended to make them the rule of his conduct.

By making theſe important conceſſions, the king obtained large ſupplies from the parliament, particularly a grant of twenty thouſand ſacks of wool, to be tranſported to Flanders before Michaelmas, with a prohibition to all other perſons from ſending thither any wool, till that period was elapſed. But though Edward had, by ſacrificing ſome parts of the royal authority, extricated himſelf from his preſent difficulties, he did not ſeem deſirous of continuing the war on the ſide of Flanders, in ſupport of his title to the crown of France. An unforeſeen accident renewed the hoſtilities between the two kingdoms. John III. duke of Britany was deſirous of leaving his dutchy to a daughter of his brother the count de Ponthievre; but in order to prevent the calamities that always attend a diſputed ſucceſſion, he determined to marry her to ſome prince capable of repelling any attempts that might be made to diſturb the tranquillity of his country. Charles de Blois, nephew to the king of France, appeared to him the moſt proper for this purpoſe. He conſulted the ſtates of Britany, who approved of his choice: the marriage was concluded; and all the vaſſals ſwore fealty to Charles and his ſpouſe, as their future ſovereigns. The count de Montfort himſelf, one of John's brothers by a ſecond marriage, acknowledged the rights of his neice, and made no difficulty of taking an oath of fealty to Charles. But he forgot both his conceſſion and his oath on the death of John, and exerted himſelf in taking poſſeſſion of the country. He engaged many of the moſt conſiderable barons to acknowledge his authority, and made himſelf maſter of Rennes, Nantes, Breſt, Hennebonne, and moſt of the important fortreſſes of the dutchy. He met with very little oppoſition in his attempts, Charles de Blois being engaged in ſolliciting, at the court of France, the inveſtiture of the dutchy.

But though Montfort had made theſe acquiſitions, he was ſenſible he ſhould not be able to ſupport himſelf againſt the attempts of Charles de Blois, unleſs aſſiſted by ſome powerful ally. He therefore determined to apply to the Engliſh monarch. Accordingly, under pretence of ſolliciting his claim to the earldom of Richmond, which had fallen to him by the death of his brother, he viſited Edward; made that prince an offer of doing him homage, and of acknowledging his title to the crown of France, provided he would engage to aſſiſt him againſt Charles de Blois. Edward ſaw immediately all the advantages that might attend an alliance with Montfort; and being at the ſame time incited by the perſuaſions of Robert d'Artois, he agreed to the conditions, and a formal alliance was concluded between them.

Thinking his treaty with Edward was a profound ſecret, Montfort made no difficulty of repairing to Paris, in order to ſupport his claim to the dutchy of Britany. But he was ſoon convinced both of his error and the imprudent ſtep he had taken. Philip, at his firſt audience, told him plainly, that he had no right to Britany, and at the ſame time reproached him with having done homage to Edward, and entered into an alliance with a prince, who was the profeſſed enemy of France. Montfort acknowledged his having paſſed over to England, but denied the charge of having done homage to Edward; adding, that he was ſatisfied of the goodneſs of his claim, and was ready to ſubmit to the judgment of his peers, with regard to Britany. Philip immediately appointed a day for diſcuſſing his claim, but forbid him to ſtir out of Paris till after the ſentence was pronounced.

Montford was now ſufficiently convinced that he had every thing to fear, and took a reſolution to make his eſcape. He accordingly withdrew from Paris during the night in the diſguiſe of a merchant, and reached Britany in ſafety. Philip was no ſooner informed of his eſcape, than, in a tranſport of rage and indignation, he inſtantly confiſcated the earldom of Montfort, commanded the parliament of Paris, by his ſole authority, even without ſummoning the peers of France, or exhibiting any formal proceſs, to adjudge Britany to Charles de Blois; and the more effectually to carry the ſentence into execution, he ſupplied his nephew with a numerous army, under the command of his eldeſt ſon John, duke of Normandy. Montfort, who was unable to face the French army in the field, ſhut himſelf up in Nantes, which was ſoon beſieged by the duke of Normandy. The city was ſtrongly fortified, and capable of holding out a conſiderable time againſt the enemy; but by the treachery of the inhabitants the city was delivered up to the enemy, Monfort himſelf was taken priſoner, and committed to the caſtle of the Louvre.

A. D. 1342. The captivity of Montfort ſeemed to have determined the fate of Britany. But the heroic virtues and conjugal fidelity of his wife ſupported the falling fortunes of his family. Jane of Flanders, counteſs of Montfort, one of the moſt extraordinary women of that age, no ſooner heard of the impriſonment of her huſband, than aſſembling the inhabitants of Rennes, where ſhe then reſided. She preſented herſelf in the midſt of the aſſembly with her infant ſon in her arms, and conjured them to preſerve from deſtruction, the only remaining heir of that illuſtrious family, who had ſo long held the ſceptre of Britany. Deeply affected by her politic addreſs, they promiſed to ſupport her with their lives and fortunes. All the other fortified towns in the dutchy embraced the ſame reſolution; and the utmoſt expedition was uſed to furniſh them with every thing neceſſary for making a noble defence againſt the enemy. The counteſs herſelf repaired to Hennebonne, the ſtrongeſt fortreſs in Britany, determined there to wait for the expected ſuccours from Edward, and in the mean time ſent her infant ſon to England, that he might not be expoſed to the ſame unhappy fate with his father.

Perſuaded that the reduction of Hennebonne, together with the captivity of the counteſs, would put a final period to all oppoſition, Charles de Blois inveſted the place with a numerous army, compoſed of French, Spaniards, Genoeſe, and ſome Britons. The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour, and the place defended with a bravery that would have done honour to the beſt general of the age. The French were repulſed in every attack, and perpetually harraſſed with ſoldiers from the garriſon. The counteſs was foremoſt in every danger, and led her troops with the utmoſt prudence and intrepidity. Perceiving that the beſiegers in making an aſſault upon one part of the town had neglected to ſecure a diſtant quarter of their camp, ſhe ſallied out at the head of two hundred horſe, made a dreadful ſlaughter, and ſet fire to their tents, baggage and magazines. A detachment was immediately ſent from the main body of the army, and Jane ſoon perceived that her retreat was cut off. A moment was ſufficient to form her reſolution; ſhe ordered her men to diſperſe, and fly to Breſt, where ſhe would ſoon meet them. Her commands were obeyed, and Jane, having increaſed her eſcort to five hundred men, cut her way through part of the enemy's camp, and entered the town amidſt the ſhouts and acclamations of the garriſon.

But notwithſtanding the noble defence made by the counteſs, the town was at laſt reduced to the laſt extremity. Several breeches were made in the walls, and the enemy was preparing for a general aſſault. It was now thought neceſſary to offer terms of capitulation, and the biſhop of Leon was actually ſent for that purpoſe to the camp of Charles de Blois; but the counteſs, who had mounted one of the towers of the fortreſs, diſcovering the Engliſh fleet coming to her aſſiſtance, immediately communicated the joyful tidings to the garriſon, and the biſhop of Leon was recalled. The French were confounded when they ſaw the Engliſh enter the harbour, and laid aſide their deſign of making a general aſſault. This reinforcement conſiſted of a body of men at arms, and ſix thouſand archers, commanded by Sir Walter Manny, one of the beſt captains of the age. The courage of the garriſon was now revived; they readily joined the Engliſh in a ſally, drove the beſiegers from their poſts, and obliged them to retire with precipitation.

This reinforcement was not, however, ſufficient to enable the counteſs to take the field againſt the enemy, and ſhe therefore determined to paſs over into England to ſollicit in perſon more effectual ſuccours from Edward. Her requeſt was granted; a more numerous reinforcement was immediately embarked under the command of Robert d'Artois, and the earl of Northampton. The counteſs herſelf returned in this fleet, which was attacked in the paſſage, by a French ſquadron commanded by prince Lewis of Spain. The counteſs behaved with her uſual intrepidity, and the action continued with great obſtinacy till night put an end to the conteſt; and before the morning appeared a dreadful ſtorm ſeparated the two fleets; but the Engliſh reached the harbour of Hennebonne in ſafety.

The firſt attempt made by Robert was againſt Vannes, which he carried by aſſault, but was dangerouſly wounded, and during his confinement a party of the Britons, in the intereſt of Charles, attacked and took the place by ſurpriſe. Robert had the good fortune to eſcape; but died ſoon after in his paſſage to England. Edward was greatly affected at the loſs of this nobleman, and ſwore he would revenge his death; an oath which he punctually obſerved. He aſſembled his army, embarked at Sandwich on the fifth of October, and after a paſſage of two days, landed at Breſt. He formed three important ſieges at the ſame time, and by attempting too much, miſcarried in all. The duke of Normandy, at the head of forty thouſand men, encamped in the neighbourhood of the Engliſh, and cut off their proviſions. In this dangerous ſituation Edward liſtened to the mediation of the pope's legate, and a truce for three years was concluded on the following conditions:

I. That Vannes ſhould be ſequeſtered, till the expiration of the truce, in the hands of two cardinals, to be diſpoſed of by them in ſuch a manner as they ſhould think proper.

II. That the Flemings ſhould be abſolved from the cenſures which the pope, at the inſtigation of the king of France, had denounced againſt them.

III. That the places taken on both ſides ſhould remain in the hands of the preſent poſſeſſors, and the priſoners ſet at liberty, on paying their ranſoms.

IV. That the allies both of France and England ſhould be included in this treaty, and that the two kings ſhould exert their utmoſt endeavours to prevent hoſtilities in Guienne, France and Britany.

A. D. 1343. Soon after the ratification of theſe articles Edward returned to England; but neither of the monarchs ſeemed deſirous of obſerving the truce; Philip was deſirous of procuring the departure of Edward, and the motive of Edward was that of extricating himſelf from a very dangerous ſituation. It is therefore no wonder, that the leaſt incident was laid hold of to break the truce, and recommence hoſtilities. Edward complained loudly of the execution of ſome Briton lords, whom Philip had put to death, under pretence of their being guilty of treaſon. He was even ſo incenſed, when he firſt heard of the fate of theſe noblemen, that he gave orders for beheading all the priſoners of Philip's party, but was prevailed upon to recall the bloody ſentence, by the remonſtrances of Henry, earl of Lancaſter. He, however, ſent for one of the principal captives, and told him, with great emotion, that though the death of his countrymen beheaded at Paris, was a ſufficient reaſon for retaliating the ſame puniſhment on him and his fellow priſoners, yet he would not ſtain his reputation by imitating ſo bad an example; he would not ſatiate his vengeance in the blood of the innocent; but, by the aſſiſtance of the Almighty, he would ſeverely puniſh the author of ſuch unparalleled treachery and barbarity. Nor were his threats in vain.

A. D. 1344. He diſpatched Henry, earl of Derby, at the head of a conſiderable body of forces, to begin hoſtilities in Guienne. Derby was the ſon of Henry, earl of Lancaſter, and one of the moſt accompliſhed noblemen of the Engliſh court. He was at once intrepid and humane, beloved by his friends, and dreaded by his enemies. For ſome time he was very ſucceſsful in his invaſions of the enemy's territories. He attacked the count de Laille, the French general encamped at Bergerac, drove him from his intrenchments, and made himſelf maſter of the place. This ſucceſs animated the Engliſh; they proceeded in their conqueſts with great rapidity, till they had reduced the greater part of Perigord.

A. D. 1345. But while the earl of Derby was reducing the French towns, the count de Laille, having collected an army of twelve thouſand men, inveſted Auberauche, which had lately fallen into the hands of the Engliſh. Derby haſtened to relieve the place, and arriving near the camp of the enemy in the night, Sir Walter Manny propoſed to attack the French immediately. His advice was followed with ſuch ſecrecy and ſucceſs, that the Engliſh entered one quarter of the French camp without reſiſtance, and fell upon the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity, that the counts de Laille, Perigord, and Valentinois, were taken priſoners in their tents, before they had time to recover from their ſurprize; and their troops ſeized with ſuch a panic, that they fled with the utmoſt precipitation. The confuſion was not, however, general. While one quarter was filled with diſorder, the other, where the count de Cominges commanded, fled to arms and advanced againſt the enemy. Elated with ſucceſs the Engliſh attacked them with incredible fury, and the engagement became very bloody; when the garriſon, alarmed by hearing the trumpets ſound a general charge, and diſcovering by the light of the dawn the Engliſh enſigns, ſallied out, attacked the French in flank, and put them to flight. Above ſeven thouſand fell in the action, and twelve hundred were taken priſoners; among whom were nine counts, and above three hundred knights and gentlemen of diſtinction. Derby, having thus defeated and diſperſed the the French army, made a very rapid progreſs in reducing the adjacent provinces. Monſegar, Monpeſat, Villa Franche, Miremont, Tonnius, Damaſſen, Aiguillon, a fortreſs deemed impregnable, Angouleme, and Reole, fell ſucceſſively into the hands of the Engliſh. He would have extended his conqueſts ſtill farther, but the advanced ſeaſon of the year obliged him to put his army into winter quarters.

A. D. 1346. Alarmed at the progreſs of the Engliſh, Philip collected a numerous army, under the command of his ſon, the duke of Normandy, aſſiſted by the duke of Burgundy. It would have been madneſs for Derby to have met the French in the open field: he was therefore reduced to the neceſſity of acting on the defenſive. He therefore furniſhed all the fortified places with good garriſons, large quantities of proviſions and military ſtores; and then paſſed over to England, to inform Edward of the ſtate of the provinces, and the danger to which they were now expoſed. The duke of Normandy opened the campaign with the ſiege of Angouleme, the garriſon of which made a noble defence; but were at laſt reduced to extremities. John lord Norwich, the governor, ſaw the impoſſibility of defending the place much longer; but being unwilling to ſurrender at diſcretion, had recourſe to a ſtratagem, to ſave at once his own honour, and his ſoldiers from being made priſoners of war. He aſcended the ramparts, and deſired to ſpeak with the duke of Normandy. His requeſt was granted. The duke approached the walls; and Norwich begged a ceſſation of arms for the morrow, which was the feaſt of the Virgin, to whom the duke, as well as himſelf, paid great devotion. The duke very readily agreed to the propoſal; and Norwich having ordered his forces to prepare their baggage, marched out of the town as ſoon as the morning appeared. Perſuaded they were going to be attacked, the French flew to arms; but Norwich diſpatched a meſſenger to the duke, reminding him of his engagement. "I ſee," exclaimed that prince, "the governor has outwitted me; but let us be contented with taking the place."

The report of Derby, with regard to the dangerous ſtate of Guienne, quickened the motions of Edward, who had determined to head his army in perſon. He therefore ſummoned all his allies on the ſide of Flanders to furniſh their contingents of troops, but they refuſed to fulfil their engagements. Edward had, indeed, lately loſt his friend, Jacob Ardevelt, the demagogue of Ghent. That popular leader, deſirous of transferring the government from the earl of Flanders to the prince of Wales, had propoſed, in a meeting of the ſtates, to inſiſt that their count ſhould renounce his alliance with Philip de Valois; and in caſe he perſiſted in maintaining that connection, that they ſhould transfer their allegiance to young Edward: adding, that they had nothing to fear from the reſentment of either their own ſovereign or the king of France, as the Engliſh monarch was both able and willing to ſupport them effectually. The ſtates, aſtoniſhed at this unexpected propoſal, and afraid of contradicting that popular leader, deſired time to conſult their conſtituents, as they had no authority to determine a queſtion of ſuch importance without their conſent. The requeſt was too reaſonable to be denied, and the aſſembly broke up in great confuſion. His enemies laid hold of this attempt to ruin him: they charged him with having embezzled vaſt ſums of the public money; and of having made large remittances to England, whither he intended to retire, in order to enjoy in tranquillity the riches he had procured by deceiving the people. The giddy multitude immediately changed their opinion. The idol they had ſo long worſhipped was now devoted to deſtruction: they thirſted for the blood of a perſon, for whoſe preſervation, but a few weeks before, they would willingly have ſhed their own. Ardevelt ſoon felt the effects of this fatal change in the ſentiments of the people. They ſurrounded his houſe, forced the door, and dragged him into the ſtreet, where he was ſacrificed to the reſentment of an enraged and ferocious people.

Edward finding it would now be in vain to make any attempt on the ſide of Flanders, he embarked, with his forces, for Guienne; but contrary winds ſtill prevented him from ſailing. In this diſtreſsful ſituation, Geoffrey D'Harcourt, a Norman baron, prevailed upon Edward to change the deſtination of his enterprize. D'Harcourt was a nobleman highly eſteemed both for his perſonal merit and valour; but having been perſecuted by Philip, fled into England for protection. He diſplayed the advantages that muſt attend an expedition into Normandy, a province well cultivated, full of rich and flouriſhing cities, deſtitute of troops, and at a great diſtance from the French armies. Hence he very juſtly obſerved, that it would be much more advantageous for the Engliſh to land in Normandy than in Guienne. Edward was convinced of the juſtice of his remarks; and, as ſoon as the wind permitted, put to ſea; and, after a paſſage of two days only, landed at La Hogue without oppoſition. Here Edward knighted his eldeſt ſon, the prince of Wales, a youth then only ſixteen years of age. His army conſiſted of four thouſand men at arms, ten thouſand archers, ten thouſand Welſh infantry, and ſix thouſand Iriſh; a number in appearance not at all adapted to the purpoſe of invading France; though the ſucceſs of the campaign far exceeded the moſt ſanguine expectations. An univerſal conſternation was immediately ſpread through the whole province of Normandy, where not the leaſt apprehenſions were entertained of an invaſion. The ſhips were deſtroyed at La Hogue, Barfleur, and Cherbourgh. The towns of Valougnes, Carentam, and St. Lo, ſurrendered at diſcretion; and the Engliſh marched to Caen, the capital of Lower Normandy. This city was both rich and populous, but without fortifications. Perſuaded that that the wealth of Caen would induce the Engliſh to plunder the city, Philip diſpatched the count d'Eu, conſtable of France, and the count de Tankerville, at the head of a conſiderable body of troops, for its defence. The Engliſh approached the ſuburbs; and the inhabitants, elated with the reinforcements they had received, ſallied out upon the enemy, contrary to the advice of the conſtable. The conſequence was what might naturally be expected when undiſciplined multitudes attack a regular army; they were totally defeated, and the counts d'Eu and Tankerville taken priſoners. The Engliſh entered the city with the fugitives, and a dreadful maſſacre began: neither age, nor ſex, nor condition, were ſpared; all fell a ſacrifice to the ſword of the Engliſh. Edward at laſt put a ſtop to the ſlaughter; the inhabitants laid down their arms, and the city was plundered with more deliberation. The booty was prodigious; and the whole was embarked, together with three hundred of the richeſt burghers, and all the priſoners of diſtinction, and ſent to England.

The caſtle of Caen, however, ſtill held out; and Edward, who thought the reduction of it would be of little conſequence, marched through the biſhoprics of Liſieux and Evreux towards Rouen, the capital of Normandy. In his route he took the towns of Louvere and Liſieux; but on advancing to the banks of the Seine, he found the bridge already broken down, and the French monarch poſted on the oppoſite ſide of the river, at the head of a prodigious army. Edward did every thing in his power to provoke Philip to a battle. He laid the whole country waſte, burnt the ſuburbs of Pont l'Arche, Vernon, and Mullien. The ſame fate attended the noble palace of St. Germain; and ſome of the light troops carried their ravages to the very gates of Paris. Edward made another attempt to paſs the Seine at Poiſſy, but met with the ſame diſappointment; the bridge was broken down, and Philip's army appeared on the oppoſite bank of the river. Some ſtratagem was therefore neceſſary to elude the vigilance of Philip. Accordingly the Engliſh monarch marched, with great rapidity, farther up the Seine; but by a ſudden countermarch during the night, returned to Poiſſy, repaired the bridge, routed the militia left to guard the paſſage, croſſed the river, and advanced, with quick marches, towards Flanders. In his route he burnt the ſuburbs of Beauvais; and defeated, with great ſlaughter, the inhabitants of Amiens, who were marching to reinforce their king's army. But he ſoon found himſelf in the ſame dangerous ſituation as before: all the bridges on the Somme were either broken down, or ſtrongly guarded. The country was ruined. Philip was advancing againſt him at the head of an hundred thouſand men; and Godemar de Faye ſtationed on the oppoſite ſide of the Somme, with a numerous army, to obſerve his motions. In this alarming criſis, he offered a reward to any perſon who could lead his army to a place where he might paſs the Somme; and a peaſant of Normandy, preferring riches to the ſafety of his country, pointed out a ford below Blanchetague, where the ſtream was not above a foot in depth at low water. This diſcovery revived the courage of the Engliſh; they decamped at midnight, and reached the ford about ſun-riſing the next morning, a little before the tide of flood made up the river. The place exactly anſwered the deſcription given of it by the peaſant; but the oppoſite bank was guarded by Godemar de Faye, at the head of twelve thouſand men. This oppoſition was not, however, ſufficient to intimidate Edward, who was always maſter of his paſſions, and maintained a remarkable coolneſs and preſence of mind in the midſt of the moſt furious battle. He plunged himſelf into the ſtream, calling out, "Let all who love me follow my example." Animated by the preſence and example of their ſovereign, the ſoldiers threw themſelves into the river with the moſt amazing intrepidity. The French made a noble oppoſition; but nothing was capable of ſtopping the career of the Engliſh: they were not intimidated by any oppoſition; and after a bloody diſpute, put the enemy to flight, and gained the oppoſite bank, juſt as the van of Philip's army, under the command of the king of Bohemia and John de Hainault, appeared. It is impoſſible to expreſs the vexation of Philip, in being thus diſappointed of his revenge. He had traced the Engliſh above fifty leagues by the ſmoaking ruins left behind them, and now thought himſelf ſure of overtaking the invaders. But it was in vain to repine; the tide of flood was made up the river, and rendered a paſſage impoſſible, while the Engliſh purſued their march with great tranquillity.

Though Edward had thus eſcaped the danger of being attacked in his late alarming ſituation, he was convinced it would be impoſſible for him to purſue his march over the extenſive plains of Picardy, without expoſing his van to inevitable deſtruction by the perpetual attacks of a numerous cavalry: he therefore determined to wait for the enemy, and venture a general engagement. He accordingly choſe an advantageous ſpot of ground near the village of Crecy; and to ſecure his flank from the furious attacks of the French horſe, he threw up a large entrenchment, and extended it round a ſmall wood, where he depoſited his baggage. Having taken theſe neceſſary precautions, he drew up his army on a ſmall eminence, and divided it into three lines. The firſt was commanded by the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by the earls of Warwick and Oxford, Geoffrey Harcourt of Normandy, the lords Stafford, Chandois, Delawar, Holland and Cobham, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction. This line conſiſted of eight hundred men at arms, four thouſand archers, and ſix thouſand Welſhmen. The ſecond line was commanded by the earls of Arundel and Northampton, aſſiſted by the lords Willoughby, Roſs, Baſſet of Sapcote, and Malton; and conſiſted of eight hundred men at arms, two thouſand four hundred archers, and four thouſand bill-men. He himſelf commanded the third line, which conſiſted of ſeven hundred men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and five thouſand three hundred bill-men. In this poſition Edward waited, with great tranquillity, the approach of the enemy.

Philip, after paſſing the Somme at Abeville, purſued his march at the head of one hundred and twenty thouſand men, determined to take the ſevereſt revenge on the Engliſh, who had laid his country waſte, and inſulted the ſtandard of France. On his arrival in the neighbourhood of Crecy, he detached ſeveral of his officers to reconnoitre the poſition of the Engliſh. They readily obeyed, and faithfully deſcribed, at their return, the admirable order of Edward's forces. The count de Balche, one of the beſt ſoldiers in Philip's army, added, that there was not the leaſt danger of Edward's declining a battle; and therefore he adviſed, that inſtead of attacking the Engliſh immediately, the engagement ſhould be deferred till the next morning, that the troops might reſt themſelves after their fatiguing march. But this was over-ruled. The force of numbers was thought ſufficient to balance every inconvenience, and it was determined to begin the action immediately.

The French were now in ſight of the Engliſh; and Edward, that he might ſtill farther animate his men, rode through the ranks, and urged every motive that had a tendency to raiſe their natural valour, and inſpire them with the noble reſolution of remaining conquerors, or falling in the glorious attempt. He told them, that the number of the enemy ſhould be ſo far from intimidating, that it ſhould inſpire them with courage; that confuſion would be the inevitable conſequence of ſuch multitudes of undiſciplined forces; and that the order in which he had placed them, added to their own reſolution, would be abundantly ſufficient to repel all the attacks of the French army. Adding, "I requeſt nothing from you, but that you imitate my example, and that of the prince of Wales." The troops caught the courage and noble intrepidity of their ſovereign; they wiſhed to be led againſt the enemy.

While Edward was employed in raiſing the ardour of his troops, Philip endeavoured to marſhal his army; but this was impoſſible. He ſent orders, indeed, for the lines to halt till they received farther inſtructions; but his commands were but imperfectly obeyed. His army being compoſed of a great number of princes and noblemen, jealous of each other's honour, and moſt of them ſtrangers to military ſubordination, preſſed forward to begin the attack; ſo that when the van halted, purſuant to the orders of Philip, the ſucceeding ranks continued to move forward with great impetuoſity, till the whole became one enormous body moving towards Crecy in great confuſion; nor was it in the power of Philip to remove the diſorder till they came near the Engliſh army, when they ſtopped of themſelves, and gave Philip an opportunity of drawing them up in ſome order. He divided his army into three lines, conformable to that of the Engliſh. The firſt was led by John de Luxembourg, king of Bohemia, and compoſed of three thouſand men at arms, twenty-nine thouſand infantry, and fifteen thouſand Genoeſe croſs-bowmen, under the command of Antonio Doria and Carolo Grimaldi. Theſe were placed oppoſite to the Engliſh archers. Charles, count of Alençon, brother to Philip, led the ſecond diviſion, conſiſting of four thouſand men at arms, and twenty thouſand infantry. The third diviſion was headed by Philip in perſon; and formed a body of reſerve, amounting to twelve thouſand men at arms, and fifty thouſand foot.

The battle was begun by the Genoeſe croſs-bowmen; but a ſudden ſhower having fallen a little before the engagement, their bow-ſtrings were relaxed, and their arrows fell ſhort of the enemy. The ſame misfortune had not, however, attended the bows of the Engliſh archers: they were preſerved in caſes, whence they now drew them, and poured in ſuch a dreadful ſhower of arrows, that the Genoeſe, unable to ſupport the ſhock, were thrown into diſorder, and fell back upon the duke d'Alençon's cavalry. Another diſcharge doubly increaſed the confuſion; the whole vaſt body ſeemed to be compoſed of hurry, terror, and diſmay.

At laſt the duke of Alençon diſengaged himſelf from the flying Genoeſe, made a circuit with his cavalry, and fell upon the flank of the firſt battalion of Engliſh archers. The battle now became deſperate and bloody. The French opened themſelves a paſſage through the archers, and advanced againſt the prince of Wales, who received them with ſuch firmneſs and reſolution, that numbers of them were ſlain; but the prince himſelf was ſtill in the greateſt danger of being ſurrounded by the ſuperior numbers of the enemy. The earls of Arundel and Northampton perceived his ſituation, and detached a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. Philip took advantage of this motion, and ſent three ſquadrons of French and German knights to the aid of his brother. The prince was now attacked both in front and rear; and a meſſenger was diſpatched by the earl of Warwick to the king, to inform him of the danger of his ſon, and deſire him to order a body of troops to his aſſiſtance. “Is he dead or wounded?” ſaid the king with great tranquillity. He was anſwered in the negative. “Return,” added he, “and tell my ſon, that I reſerve the honour of the day to him, and that I am confident he will ſhew himſelf worthy of the honour of knighthood.” This anſwer being delivered to the prince in the hearing of his followers, they ſeemed to be inſpired with freſh courage: they were more than a match for the increaſing numbers of the enemy, who exerted all their efforts to break again the compacted phalanx of the Engliſh, who, in their turn, attacked the French with ſuch impetuoſity, that they were unable to ſtand the ſhock. The duke of Alençon was ſlain. A dreadful carnage enſued, princes, peers, generals, knights, and common ſoldiers, fell promiſcuouſly, and formed a frightful heap of ſlain.

Enraged to ſee the two firſt lines of his army totally defeated, Philip advanced at the head of the body of reſerve, which the confuſion that reigned in the French army had hitherto prevented from engaging; but there was now no longer any equality in the action. Confounded at the ſight of ſeeing ſuch numbers of their countrymen ſlain, and the whole plain filled with fugitives, the troops anſwered not the courage of their leader, who gave ſignal proofs of his valour and capacity as a general, but it was too late. The French refuſed any longer to face the Engliſh, and a general flight enſued. Philip himſelf was wounded, and carried off the field of battle by John de Hainault. The ſtandard of France was thrown down, and the whole army diſperſed; but the ſlaughter did not ceaſe till darkneſs put an end to the diſpute. The victory being complete, the king flew into the arms of the prince of Wales and exclaimed, “My gallant ſon, heaven grant you may perſevere “in the glorious courſe you have begun! The heroic manner in which you have acquitted yourſelf “to-day, ſufficiently proves you deſerve the crown “you are born to wear.”

Such was the iſſue of the famous battle of Crecy, fought on the twenty-fifth of Auguſt; when, by a moderate computation, there fell by the ſwords of the Engliſh twenty-four baronets, twelve hundred knights, fifteen hundred gentlemen, four thouſand men at arms, and thirty thouſand infantry; together with the principal nobility of France, among whom were the dukes of Lorrain and Bourbon, the earls of Alençon, Flanders, Blois, Reaudemont, Harcourt, Auxerre, St. Pol, and Sancerre; with the kings of Bohemia and Majorca. The former had been long famous as a general, but age had now deprived him of his ſight. He could not, however, be perſuaded from engaging in the hotteſt part of the battle. He cauſed the reins of his bridle to be interlaced with thoſe of two valiant knights, and ruſhed between thoſe to the ſpot where young Edward fought in perſon, and with whom he exchanged two or three random ſtrokes. But he was ſoon after parted from him, and, together with his valiant companions, fell among the ſlain. His creſt was compoſed of three oſtrich feathers, with this motto, ICH DIEN, I ſerve; and in memory of this celebrated victory it was aſſumed by the prince of Wales, and has been ever ſince reſumed by his ſucceſſors.

No quarter was given by the Engliſh at the battle of Crecy; probably owing to their peculiar ſituation; though others ſay it was in conſequence of ſimilar orders iſſued by Philip. But though mercy was refuſed to the living, the dead were treated with the greateſt marks of humanity. Edward ſent the body of the king of Bohemia to his family; cauſed the field of battle to be conſecrated, attended in perſon the funerals of the noblemen who fell in the action, and ordered the common ſoldiers to be interred with the greateſt decency.

This battle was almoſt as remarkable for the ſmall loſs of the Engliſh as for the prodigious ſlaughter of the French. Only one eſquire, three knights, and a few private men fell in this remarkable action. So great is ſuperiority of prudence and conduct over numbers and temerity. It is ſaid that the Engliſh derived great advantages from ſome pieces of artillery in their army; an invention which had ſome years been known, and of which it is ſurprizing that Philip neglected the advantage. But notwithſtanding ſeveral authors of credit mention this particular, there is reaſon to believe that the whole is founded on miſtake. It is not natural to think that Edward in ſo long, ſo laborious, and ſo dangerous a march and retreat, could carry about with him an unweildly train of artillery, eſpecially when it is conſidered that the cannon of that age were prodigiouſly clumſey, and conſequently of much greater weight than ours. Beſides, none of the hiſtorians who lived at that time, though they were very minute in deſcribing his paſſage over the Somme, mention any thing of artillery, though it would have been of much greater uſe than his archers, who lined the banks of that river to cover his paſſage.

Edward drew the moſt ſolid advantages from the battle of Crecy. He had obſerved and regretted the great length of the voyage to Guienne, the only method by which he could ſend troops to defend his provinces, or attack the monarch of France. His great object was, therefore, to ſecure an eaſy paſſage into that kingdom; the death of Ardevelt having deſtroyed his authority in the Low Countries. He had now an opportunity of making himſelf maſter of ſome part on the French coaſt oppoſite to England, and Calais ſeemed the beſt adapted to anſwer his deſigns. Accordingly he led his victorious army thither, and inveſted the place on the third of September.

Few years are recorded in the annals of hiſtory more glorious to England than that at preſent under conſideration: the armies of Edward were every where victorious. The duke of Normandy was recalled from Guienne, on the landing of Edward in Normandy; no army was left to oppoſe the progreſs of the earl of Derby; nor did that able general fail to improve ſo favourable an opportunity. He took Maribeau and Luſignan, by aſſault; Taillebourg, St. Jean d'Angeli, and Poictiers, opened their gates at the firſt ſummons. Theſe acquiſitions opened him a free paſſage into the adjacent provinces, and Derby extended his incurſions to the banks of the Loire; ſpreading terror and deſolation through all that part of the French dominions.

The war was ſtill carried on in Britany, and the counteſs of Montford continued to diſplay her heroic virtues. Charles de Blois, at the head of a numerous army inveſted the fortreſs of Roche de Réen, and puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt vigour. The place was of too much importance for the counteſs to ſuffer it to fall into the hands of the enemy, without making one attempt for its relief. She put herſelf at the head of her little army, and having received a reinforcement of Engliſh troops under the command of Sir Thomas Dagworth, attacked the French during the night, routed their whole army, and took Charles de Blois priſoner. This miſfortune called another heroine from obſcurity. The counteſs of Blois, in whoſe right her huſband claimed the dutchy of Britany, ſeized the reins of government, and became a powerful rival to the counteſs of Montfort. She was her equal both in the field and the cabinet; the war was carried on with the ſame vigour as before the captivity of her huſband.

The Scots had ſome time ſince recalled their king, David Bruce, from France; and at the inſtigation of Philip, took the opportunity of invading England during the abſence of Edward, at the head of an army of fifty thouſand men. David, whoſe ſole intention was to ravage the country, levied the moſt oppreſſive contributions, and committed the moſt dreadful diſorders in his march, which he extended to the gates of Durham. The diſtreſs of the people animated queen Philippa to march in perſon to their defence; and having collected an army of twelve thouſand, led them againſt the Scottiſh invaders. Her army was divided into four bodies, the firſt was commanded by lord Piercy; the ſecond by the archbiſhop of York and lord Neville; the third by the biſhop of Lincoln and lord Mowbray; and the fourth by Baliol in perſon. In this order the Engliſh approached the army of Bruce encamped at Neville's-Croſs, near the city of Durham. Bruce drew up his army in three lines; the firſt, conſiſting of French auxiliaries and the flower of the Scottiſh nobility, was commanded by the king in perſon; the ſecond by Robert, high-ſteward of Scotland and the earl of Marche; and the third by the earls of Murray and Douglas.

While both armies ſtood ready to engage, queen Philippa rode through the ranks of the Engliſh, exhorting every man to do his duty, and to take ample revenge on the barbarous ravagers of their country. The battle was begun by a troop of Genoeſe croſsbowmen, who ſerved in the diviſion under Robert; but they were ſoon routed by the more experienced Engliſh archers. Robert perceived the ſuperiority of the latter, and preſſed on furiouſly with his men at arms, to begin a cloſe fight with the detachment under lord Piercy. The Engliſh archers opened immediately to the right and left, to let the enemy paſs, but cloſed again immediately, and galled them dreadfully with their arrows in flank, while they were engaged in front with the Engliſh infantry. Robert, however, maintained the fight with the greateſt intrepidity; and it was for ſome time doubtful to which ſide Fortune would give the victory. Baliol ſaw the danger, and led up his diviſion to the aſſiſtance of lord Piercy. The Scots were now ſtruck with a panic, and immediately betook themſelves to flight. Baliol, who was not deficient in military abilities, inſtead of purſuing the fugitives, wheeled ſuddenly about, and fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity on the flank of the diviſion commanded by the king. David fought with great intrepidity, and, aſſiſted by his barons, made a noble ſtand againſt the attacks of the Engliſh; but the conteſt was unequal; the whole diviſion was broken and put to flight, and the king himſelf taken priſoner. The third diviſion, under the earls of Murray and Douglas, ſtill ſtood firm, but were ſoon broken when attacked by the whole force of the Engliſh. Murray was ſlain in endeavouring to rally his men, and Douglas taken priſoner. The Engliſh now remained maſters of the field of battle; and this victory would, in all probability, have determined the fate of Scotland, had not Robert rallied his men after he had given way to the attacks of the Engliſh, and retreated in ſuch excellent order, by which the other fugitives had time to join him, and form a body, which the victors did not think proper to purſue.

The Scots had been often unfortunate in their pitched battles with the Engliſh, but never did they receive a more fatal blow than the preſent. Fifteen, ſome ſay twenty thouſand Scots, fell in the action. And from a liſt of the ſlain, and thoſe who were taken priſoners, it appeared, that there was ſcarcely a noble family in Scotland that did not ſhare in this public calamity.

David, and about thirty-ſix noble priſoners, were ſecured in the tower of London; and Philippa embarking at Dover, paſſed over to the Engliſh camp before Calais, where ſhe was received with all the honours that were due to her rank, to her merit, and ſucceſs.

Edward had yet made but little progreſs in the ſiege of Calais. John de Vienne, a knight of Burgundy, who commanded there, was a perſon of approved courage and fidelity; ſo that the Engliſh monarch, ſenſible of the difficulty of taking the place by force, had, from the very beginning of the ſiege, determined to reduce it by famine. He accordingly blocked up the place both by land and ſea; ſo that, after a ſiege of ſome months, the place was in want of proviſions; and the governor was obliged to put out all the uſeleſs mouths, that the garriſon might ſubſiſt the longer: and Edward, with a generoſity not common in theſe times, not only ſuffered theſe diſtreſſed people to paſs unmoleſted through his camp, but alſo ſupplied them with money for their journey.

A. D. 1347. Philip, ſenſible of the importance of Calais, and deſirous of ſuccouring a garriſon that had ſo nobly exerted themſelves in defending that fortreſs, determined to attempt their relief, and approached the place at the head of an army of two hundred thouſand men. But he ſoon perceived that it would be madneſs to attack the Engliſh camp, and therefore had recourſe to negotiation. He offered to cede Guienne, together with the earldom of Ponthieu, and propoſed a match between their children. Theſe offers were, however, rejected. On which Philip diſpatched a herald to Edward, offering to decide their quarrel in the open field; but the Engliſh monarch was too prudent to riſk the whole upon the uncertain iſſue of a ſingle combat; and Philip was obliged to decamp, and diſperſe his numerous army.

Deſpairing of relief, and almoſt wholly deſtitute of proviſions, the garriſon deſired to capitulate. John de Vienne accordingly appeared upon the walls, and made a ſignal for a conference; and Edward ſent Sir Walter Manny to hear what he had to propoſe. The governor told him, that having now no farther hopes of relief, he was willing to ſurrender the place, and deſired no other conditions than that the lives and liberties of the garriſon ſhould be ſecured. Manny anſwered, that Edward was ſo exaſperated againſt the inhabitants of Calais for their pertinacious reſiſtance, that he was ſure he would receive the town on no conditions that ſhould confine him with regard to their puniſhment. "Is this" replied Vienne, "the treatment to which brave men are entitled? Would not your king have expected the ſame conduct from any Engliſh knight in my condition, which I have performed for my ſovereign? The noble defence made by the inhabitants of Calais certainly merits the eſteem of every prince, much more of ſo gallant a prince as Edward. But I inform you, that if we muſt periſh, we ſhall not periſh unrevenged; and that we are not yet ſo reduced, but we can ſell our lives at a high price to the victors. It is, doubtleſs, the intereſt of both ſides to prevent theſe deſperate extremities; and I expect that you yourſelf, brave knight, will interpoſe your good offices with your prince in our behalf."

Struck with the juſtice of theſe ſentiments, and being a friend to valour wherever it was found, Manny exerted all his intereſt with Edward in behalf of the brave garriſon of Calais. He repreſented the dreadful conſequences that might reſult from ſo dangerous a precedent, which could not fail of increaſing the miſeries of war, already ſufficiently ſevere. Edward felt the whole force of his obſervations, and thought proper to mitigate the ſeverity of the conditions he had demanded. He only inſiſted, that ſix of the principal citizens ſhould repair to his camp with the keys of the fortreſs, bare-headed and bare-footed, with ropes about their necks, to be diſpoſed of as he thought proper. Theſe conditions being complied with, he promiſed to ſpare the lives of the reſt of the inhabitants.

It is impoſſible to deſcribe the horror and confuſion which theſe ſevere conditions excited in the breaſts of the inhabitants of Calais. They endeavoured to deprecate the wrath of the victor by the moſt humble ſubmiſſions and affecting remonſtrances. But Edward was inflexible; and it was reſolved by the garriſon to ſubmit to the maſſacre that muſt follow from their refuſal, rather than devote ſix of their brethren to an ignominious death, for no other reaſon than that of having done their duty to their king and country. But before the council broke up, Euſtace de St. Pierre, one of the principal inhabitants, ſtept forth, and offered to lay down his life for the ſafety of his friends and companions. Affected with this uncommon inſtance of magnanimity, three of his own relations declared themſelves ready to ſhare in the glorious ſacrifice; and two others were quickly found who followed their example. Theſe willing victims to the ſafety of their countrymen appeared before Edward, laid the keys of their city at his feet, and were ordered to be executed immediately. Pierced with the afflictions of virtue in diſtreſs, the queen fell on her knees before Edward, and beſought him with tears to ſpare the lives of thoſe brave men, whoſe only crime was their attachment to their ſovereign. Edward could not withſtand the force of conjugal affection; he relented, and the heroic burghers were pardoned. But the compaſſion of Philippa did not terminate here: ſhe carried the almoſt famiſhed victims to her tent, ordered them a noble repaſt, made them a preſent of money and clothes, and ſent them back to their friends in ſafety.

Edward being now maſter of Calais, took every precaution in his power to ſecure his conqueſt. He knew that it would be impoſſible for him ever to make the inhabitants real friends to his government, and therefore obliged them all to leave the town, and re-peopled it from England. This policy preſerved the place ſeveral centuries from falling again into the hands of a French monarch.

A. D. 1348. Satiſfied with this important conqueſt, Edward liſtened to the mediation of the pope, and concluded a truce with Philip; but the terms of it were very ill obſerved; and an attempt was made to recover Calais, by corrupting the governor. One Aimery de Pavia, an Italian knight, brave and intrepid in war, but a ſtranger to every principle of honour and fidelity, was entruſted by the Engliſh monarch with the command of this important fortreſs. Geoffrey de Charny, governor of St. Omer's, found means to open a negotiation with Aimery; who, in conſideration of twenty thouſand golden crowns, promiſed to admit a certain number of Frenchmen into the fortreſs; and the moſt proper methods were accordingly taken to inſure ſucceſs. Edward, informed of the deſign by Aimery's ſecretary, prepared to turn the contrivance to the deſtruction of the enemy. He ſent for the governor to London, and reproached him with his crime; but promiſed to ſpare his life, if he would aſſiſt him in taking vengeance for the perfidious attempt. The Italian heſitated not a moment to promiſe his utmoſt aſſiſtance in executing the intended deſign. A day had been appointed for the admiſſion of the French; and Edward having prepared a detachment of a thouſand men, under the command of Sir Walter Manny, departed ſecretly from London with the prince of Wales, and reached Calais the evening before the treacherous deſign was intended to be carried into execution. Charny arrived; and a choſen band of ſoldiers was admitted at one of the poſtern gates by the governor, who received the ſtipulated ſum. All the French who entered were immediately taken priſoners, while Charny was waiting with impatience for the ſignal to enter the town in triumph. At laſt the great gate was opened, but not for him. The Engliſh ruſhed out under the banner of Sir Walter Manny, both Edward and the prince of Wales ſerving as volunteers. Charny was aſtoniſhed, but determined to diſpute the victory with the enemy. He drew up his men in a ſquare battalion, and maintained the fight till break of day with the greateſt intrepidity. During this conteſt, a valiant knight, called Euſtace de Ribaumont, had the glory of fighting a ſingle combat with Edward, whom he beat twice to the ground, and who as often recovered himſelf with ſurpriſing agility. The victory was long doubtful; but at laſt Ribaumont owned himſelf conquered, and delivered his ſword to the king. Charny, in the mean time, maintained the fight with great obſtinacy; but perceiving his retreat cut off by another detachment from the town, he ſurrendered at diſcretion. All the officers were conducted to Calais, where they were treated with great courteſy: they ſupped with the prince of Wales and the Engliſh nobility. No reflections were made on their conduct; even Charny himſelf was not reproached for his treachery. Ribaumont was loaded with praiſes by Edward, who alſo preſented him with a ſtring of pearls he wore about his own head; ſaying to him, "I know you, Sir Euſtace, to be gay and amorous, and that you take delight in the company of ladies and damſels. Let them all know from whom you received this preſent. You are no longer a priſoner. I acquit you of your ranſom, and you are at liberty to-morrow to diſpoſe of yourſelf as you think proper." This age was the reign of chivalry and gallantry; and in a famous combat of thirty knights againſt thirty, fought about this time, Beaumanoir called out, as they were going to engage, that it would be ſeen that day, "who had the faireſt miſtreſſes."

A. D. 1349. The order of the garter, which was now inſtituted, probably owed its origin to the love which Edward bore to the counteſs of Saliſbury. That celebrated lady, at a court ball, dropped her garter, which the king took up; and obſerving that ſome of his courtiers ſmiled, as if he had not obtained that favour merely by accident, he called out, "Honi ſoit qui maly penſe." Evil to him who evil thinks. Theſe words became the motto of the order. It conſiſted at firſt of no more than twenty-four perſons beſides the ſovereign; though it ſoon became a capital object of ambition to courtiers.

But theſe rejoicings and feſtivities were terminated by a dreadful peſtilence, which at this time invaded all the kingdoms of Europe. It firſt appeared in the northern parts of Aſia; and after ſpreading over all that country, continued its deſtructive progreſs from one end of Europe to the other. The weſtern parts of England firſt felt this fearful ſcourge, which ſoon after reached the capital, and raged, with unremitting fury, near two years; ſo that hardly one tenth part of the inhabitants ſurvived. Above fifty thouſand ſouls periſhed in London only. This dreadful viſitation rendered a prolongation of the truce neceſſary, neither the French nor Engliſh being in a condition to renew hoſtilities. The Scots, indeed, took advantage of this misfortune to renew their ravages in the northern parts of England, but paid dearly for their temerity. Above five thouſand of them were ſwept away by the plague, and the reſt returned to their own kingdom, to diſſeminate the peſtiferous ſeeds of this dreadful diſeaſe among their countrymen.

A. D. 1350. Before this ſcourge of heaven was removed, Philip paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded in the throne by his ſon John, duke of Normandy, a prince poſſeſſed of many virtues, but rather of a private than a public nature. With a heart full of the juſteſt ſentiments of honour and ſincerity, he was, of all others, the moſt improper perſon to ſway the ſceptre of France in theſe turbulent times; he wanted that maſterly prudence and foreſight, that penetration and ſagacity, which the ſituation of his affairs required. His kingdom was filled with domeſtic commotions, which greatly favoured the views of the Engliſh. His relation, Charles, king of Navarre, ſurnamed the Bad, threw the kingdom of France into combuſtion by aſſaſſinations and perfidies. He entered into a private treaty with the Engliſh, and even ſeduced the dauphin to engage in his intrigues; but that prince being at laſt convinced of the folly of ſuch deſtructive connections, invited the king of Navarre, and the noblemen of his party, to an entertainment at Rouen, where they were all betrayed into the hands of king John: though this ſtroke proved not deciſive in maintaining the royal authority.

A. D. 1356. Man ſeldom depreciates the humiliating hand of heaven longer than he feels the weight of his chaſtiſement; the ſanguinary ſpirit of ambition which ſeemed to have crouched beneath the late tremendous ſcourge of Providence, once more reared its head on the removal of that calamity. The ſeizing of the king of Navarre was reſented by Edward; and the prince of Wales, generally known by the name of the Black prince, from the colour of his armour, having the preceding year made a ſucceſsful expedition into Guienne, now advanced into Quercy, at the head of two thouſand men at arms, ſix thouſand archers, and four thouſand foot. The ſucceſs of this young warrior was aſtoniſhing: he waſted Quercy, the Limoſin, and Auvergne, advanced to Berry, and after ſome unſucceſsful attempts upon Bourges and Iſſodun, took Vierzon by ſtorm. Here he refreſhed his army, and here he received the firſt intelligence that the king of France was poſted at Chartres, on the other ſide of the Loire, all the fords of which were ſtrongly guarded. Young Edward now perceived it was impracticable to advance, and therefore reſolved to retreat to Bourdeaux. John perceived his intention, croſſed the Loire, and marched with ſuch expedition, that he overtook him in the neighbourhood of Poictiers. Edward perceiving that a retreat was now impracticable, prepared for battle with all the courage of a young hero, and all the prudence of the oldeſt, and moſt experienced commander. He poſted his handful of men in a place of difficult acceſs, full of hedges, buſhes and vineyards, where neither the enemy's cavalry could attempt to pierce, nor their infantry attack him without great diſadvantage: at the end of a narrow lane, the only avenue by which the French could advance to attack his main body, he placed a ſquare battalion of the flower of his Engliſh archers; nor could the enemy avail themſelves of their vaſt ſuperiority of numbers, till this corps was broken.

The French army, which conſiſted of above ſixty thouſand men, was encamped between Beauvoir and Maupertuis, and had John known how to have made a proper uſe of his numerous forces, his ſucceſs had been infallible without hazarding a battle. Prince Edward was already ſo diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, that a few days would have been ſufficient to have forced him to ſurrender at diſcretion. But the imprudent ardour of the French nobility would admit of no reſtraint; they imagined themſelves ſure of victory, and advanced immediately to attack the Engliſh. Juſt before the charge was ſounded, the cardinal of Perigord reached the French army; and at his entreaty the battle was deferred till he had viſited the Engliſh prince, and endeavoured to ſave the farther effuſion of human blood, by an advantageous peace. Edward, conſcious of his own dangerous ſituation, told the cardinal that he would agree to any terms conſiſtent with his own honour, and that of his country. He offered to purchaſe a retreat to Bourdeaux, by reſigning all the conqueſts he had made, during this and the former campaign, and by ſtipulating not to ſerve againſt France during ſeven years. Theſe offers were haughtily rejected by John, who peremptorily inſiſted, that the prince himſelf, together with a hundred of the chief nobility in his army, ſhould ſurrender themſelves priſoners; and on theſe conditions he offered a ſafe retreat to the Engliſh army. The anſwer of the prince was that of an hero, who fears death much leſs than diſhonour. He declared that neither himſelf nor his knights ſhould be taken but in battle; and that he would rather ſacrifice his life than conſent to ſuch infamous terms.

The ſword was now to determine the important conteſt. The next morning was to be the period of the lives of thouſands. No advantage was omitted by Edward: he employed the night in ſtrengthening the poſt he had ſo judiciouſly choſen, with new intrenchments; and detached a body of choſen men under the command of de Greilly, capital of Buche, with orders to make a compaſs round the hill, and keep himſelf concealed under covert of the hedges and ditches with which it was ſurrounded, till the battle ſhould begin, and then to fall with the utmoſt fury on the French rear. He now divided his troops into three diſtinct bodies, but ranged in ſo cloſe compact a manner, that they ſeemed to form only a ſquare battalion: the front was defended by a number of ditches and hedges; and the flanks were ſecured on one ſide by a ſteep hill, and on the other by a moraſs. The earl of Warwick was ſtationed on the ſide of the hill, with the troops which compoſed the van; the rear, commanded by the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, was poſted behind a hedge about a ſtone's caſt from the lane through which the French muſt march to the attack. At the end of this lane was a pretty large gap, where Edward took his poſt at the head of the main body, which extended itſelf among the vines and buſhes; the weaker part of the field being incloſed by the carriages and baggage waggons.

The French army was alſo divided into three bodies; the firſt was commanded by the duke of Orleans, the king's brother; the ſecond by the dauphin of France, aſſiſted by his two brothers the dukes of Anjou and Berry; and the third, which conſiſted of forty thouſand of the beſt troops in France, was led by the king in perſon.

The battle was begun about nine o'clock in the morning by three hundred choſen Frenchmen, who marched up the lane towards the main body of the Engliſh; but were ſo galled by the archers, who lined the hedges, that more than one half of them were ſlain before they reached the front of Edward's diviſion, where the reſt were cut to pieces by an advanced party commanded by lord Audley. The marſhals Clermont and Andrehen, who with a body of choſen cavalry had advanced cloſe behind the men at arms to ſupport them, met with ſo warm a reception from the earl of Warwick, and at the ſame time ſo impetuous an attack from the earls of Suffolk and Saliſbury, at the head of a detachment from the rear, that Clermont was killed on the ſpot, and Andrehen obliged to ſurrender himſelf priſoner: moſt of the corps ſhared the fate of the former. The firſt attack of the French being thus rendered abortive, the dauphin advanced to the charge, but not without great difficulty; his men, diſpirited at the fate of their companions, were not ready to follow their leader. In this critical moment the capital de Buche fell with the utmoſt impetuoſity upon their rear, and threw them into terrible diſorder: the Engliſh archers plied them with inceſſant ſhowers of arrows from every quarter; while the other infantry with ſwords and battle-axes ruſhed upon them and made the moſt dreadful ſlaughter. The French threw down their arms and betook themſelves to flight, while Landas, Bodenai, and St. Venant, to whom the care of the dauphin and his two brothers had been particularly committed, carried them off the field of battle, and the whole diviſion followed their example. The duke of Orleans, ſtruck with the ſame panic, fled with the utmoſt precipitation, though the greater part had never charged the enemy.

But ſtill the grand diviſion compoſed of the houſehold troops, and headed by their king in perſon, aſſiſted by his principal nobility, ſtood firm, and ſeemed determined to diſpute the victory with the Engliſh, who were far inferior in number. They were, however, greatly diſmayed at the precipitate flight of their companions. The lord Chandois called out to the prince that the battle was won, and Edward immediately mounted his horſe, and advanced at the head of his army to attack the main body of the French. The dreadful ſtruggle for victory now began; all that had paſſed before ſeemed only an exerciſe of arms, in compariſon of the violent ſhock which now enſued. John exerted his utmoſt efforts to retrieve by his valour what he had loſt by his imprudence. The prince of Wales fell with the moſt amazing impetuoſity on a body of German cavalry placed in the front, and a ſtubborn conteſt enſued. Nor did the Germans give ground till their three leaders, together with the duke of Athenes, conſtable of France, were ſlain; but being left without a commander, they quitted the field of battle, leaving the king himſelf and his young ſon Philip, expoſed to all the fury of the enemy. John now ſaw himſelf reduced to a ſmall battalion of faithful friends, who were continually leſſening by the ſwords of the Engliſh. At laſt, wearied out with fatigue and overwhelmed with numbers, he weilded the ſword but faintly, and he might eaſily have been ſlain, but every one was emulous of ſo noble a prize, and therefore as they approached called out to him to ſurrender, and offered him quarter; but unwilling to yield himſelf a priſoner to any perſon of inferior rank, he cried out, “Where is my couſin the prince of Wales; “to him only I will yield.” Being informed that Edward was in another part of the field, he ſtill perſiſted obſtinately to defend himſelf, till Sir Dennis de Morbec, a knight of Artois, made his way through the croud of aſſailants, and requeſted John to yield himſelf his priſoner; and John, after being aſſured that he was a knight, threw him his gauntlet as a ſignal of ſurrender: his ſon Philip was alſo taken with him.

Wearied with the toil of battle, the prince of Wales, who had been carried to a conſiderable diſtance in purſuit of the flying enemy, was repoſing himſelf under a tent he had ordered to be pitched for that purpoſe, when advice was brought him that the king of France and his ſon were ſurrounded, and either ſlain or taken priſoners. Edward immediately diſpatched the earl of Warwick and the lord Cobham, at the head of a ſmall detachment to enquire into the fate of the French monarch, and, if poſſible, to reſcue him from the hands of the ſoldiers. Warwick happily arrived ſoon enough to ſave his life. The Engliſh had taken the royal priſoners from Morbec: the Gaſcons claimed the honour of detaining them; and ſome of the brutal ſoldiers, rather than yeild the prize to their rivals, threatened to put both the illuſtrious captives to death. Both parties were over-awed by the preſence of Warwick, who approaching the monarch with the greateſt marks of reſpect, offered to conduct him to Edward's tent.

The behaviour of the prince was even, if poſſible, ſuperior to the ability and valour he had diſcovered in the battle. Inſtead of indulging a ſupercilious pride too commonly the attendant on youthful warriors, he came from his tent to meet the captive king with all the marks of a ſincere regard. He ſympathized with his misfortunes; he comforted him in his afflictions; he paid him the tribute of praiſe due to his valour; and aſcribed his own victory to capricious fortune, or to the ſuperior power of an over-ruling providence. He ordered a magnificent repaſt to be prepared in his tent for the royal priſoner, and he himſelf waited on him at table, as if he had been one of his retinue; and when preſſed by the king to ſit down, he declared with the greateſt modeſty, “That it was not for a ſubject, like him, to ſit in “the preſence of ſo great a monarch.” This moderation added new luſtre to his glory.

The generous example of Edward was imitated by the whole army; the priſoners were every where treated with the greateſt tenderneſs and humanity. The ſpoils taken in the French camp was ſo great, that the meaneſt individual in the Engliſh army found himſelf placed beyond the reach of want during the remainder of his life. Indeed the ranſom of the noble priſoners alone were more than ſufficient for that purpoſe; though theſe were very moderate. The extent of the fortunes of all were conſidered, and no more was exacted of them than they could eaſily ſpare; no man was that day impoveriſhed for his misfortunes; they had ſtill ſufficient to perform their military ſervice for the future in a manner ſuitable to their rank and quality. And after a ſolemn thankſgiving was performed in the Engliſh camp for their late victory, Edward marched at the head of his army to Bourdeaux.

A. D. 1357. This fatal event was no ſooner known to pope Innocent VI. than he ſent the cardinals of Perigord and St. Vital to Bourdeaux, with orders to uſe their utmoſt endeavours to bring about a peace; but failing in their negotiation, they confined their requeſts to the obtaining a truce for two years. The prince of Wales, who was ſincerely diſpoſed to heal the wounds both nations had received in this dreadful conteſt, readily joined his endeavours to thoſe of the legates, and wrote over to the king, in ſuch preſſing terms, that his father ſent him full powers to act as he thought moſt conducive to the honour of his country. The prince heſitated not a moment: he ſigned the truce at Bourdeaux on the twenty-third of March.

After ſettling the affairs of Guienne the prince embarked with his royal captives, and landed at Sandwich in Kent on the twenty-fifth of May. He was received in every place through which he paſſed with the greateſt expreſſions of joy; but he conſtantly refuſed theſe honours which were offered him, deſiring that the reſpect intended for him might be transferred with every mark of attention and civility to the French monarch. He was met in Southwark by a thouſand of the principal citizens of London on horſeback, and the mayor diſplayed, on this occaſion, all the pomp of the city. The entry was truly magnificent. John was dreſſed in his royal robes, and mounted on a ſtately white courſer, remarkable for its ſize and beauty, as well as for the richneſs of its furniture. Young Edward rode on the left-hand of his priſoner, on a little black palfry, and in a meaner dreſs, as if ſtudious to avoid every mark of diſtinction. The ſtreets through which they paſſed were ſuperbly adorned with plate, tapeſtry, and armour. The proceſſion reached Weſtminſter-hall about noon, where king Edward, ſurrounded by a ſplendid circle of the nobles, and other great men, received his royal priſoner, in all the pomp of ſtate, but at the ſame time with all the courteſy as if he had been a neighbouring prince, who had come voluntarily to pay him a friendly viſit. All the pretenſions of Edward to the crown of France ſeemed to be forgotten, and John in captivity received the honours of a king, which were refuſed him when ſeated on the throne. The French monarch behaved with ſo much propriety on this occaſion, as to ſhew himſelf truly deſerving ſo generous a treatment: though conquered and a priſoner, he ſtill preſerved the dignity of a king. The French noblemen and knights met with the ſame generous and humane treatment.

The two moſt powerful enemies of Edward, the kings of France and Scotland, were now his priſoners. The latter, indeed, would have received his liberty long before, had not his ſubjects refuſed to pay his ranſom. At this juncture he ſeemed to have little cauſe to expect any favour from a victorious enemy, who had reduced his country to the greateſt diſtreſs, and whom, from the late amazing ſucceſs of his arms in other parts, might, according to the uſual frame of the human mind, be ſuppoſed not very ready to liſten to the dictates of humanity. But he was deceived. Edward, moved by the intreaties of his ſiſter, the queen conſort of Scotland, agreed to a negotiation for ſetting her huſband at liberty. The conferences were opened at Berwick, where it was agreed, "That David ſhould be ſet at liberty, and acknowledged king of Scotland, and an independent monarch, on his giving hoſtages for the payment of one hundred thouſand marks ſterling in ten years, by equal portions; and that a truce ſhould ſubſiſt, and be inviolably obſerved by both nations, till the whole ſhould be liquidated."

A.D. 1357. This treaty being ratified, David returned to his kingdom, after a captivity of eleven years. The affairs of Scotland were hardly finiſhed, before the two cardinal legates, who had negotiated the truce with prince Edward, arrived in London, with propoſals for a peace: but of ſo ſtrange a nature, that Edward refuſed to return them any anſwer. Baffled in this attempt, they demanded, in the name of his holineſs, the arrears of the tribute formerly paid to the ſee of Rome, amounting to a thouſand marks. Edward treated this demand as an obſolete and ridiculous claim; and bid them tell the pontiff, "That he held his kingdom of God alone, and acknowledged no other ſuperior, nor would he pay tribute to any mortal upon earth."

The impriſonment of the French monarch was the ſignal of a civil war in Paris; every ambitious perſon became the head of a party. Under a pretence of reformation, factions are generally eſtabliſhed. Charles, dauphin of France, was declared regent, and had the mortification of ſeeing almoſt the whole kingdom revolt againſt him. Paris, at that time, began to be a formidable city, for it contained fifty thouſand men capable of bearing arms. Charles found himſelf obliged to releaſe the king of Navarre, whom his father had confined. This was, in fact, letting looſe an enemy upon himſelf. The king of Navarre no ſooner obtained his liberty, than he came to Paris to blow the coals of ſedition, already ſufficiently kindled. Marcel, provoſt of the merchants of Paris, entered the Louvre at the head of the malecontents, where he cauſed Robert de Clermont, marſhal of France, together with the marſhal of Champagne, to be maſſacred in preſence of the dauphin. In the mean time, the peaſants tumultuouſly aſſembled from all parts, and, in the general confuſion, attacked every gentleman they met with, treating them as revolted ſlaves behave towards thoſe ſevere maſters who happen to fall into their hands. They revenged themſelves, by a thouſand cruel puniſhments, for the meanneſs of their condition. In the midſt of theſe convulſions of ſtate, Charles of Navarre aſpired to the crown; and a war was carried on by him againſt the dauphin, till the latter was obliged to diſſemble his reſentment, by agreeing to a ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities, and pardoning this too powerful and rebellious vaſſal. The other cities of the kingdom followed the example of the capital: they ſhook off the dauphin's authority, took the government into their own hands, and ſpread diſorder into every province. The nobles, whoſe inclinations led them to adhere to the crown, and were naturally diſpoſed to check theſe tumults, had loſt their influence; and being reproached with cowardice, on account of their baſe deſertion of their ſovereign in the battle of Poictiers, were treated with univerſal contempt by the inferior orders. The diſbanded ſoldiers, and the peaſants, who had learned ſomething of the art of war, formed themſelves into parties in the different provinces, eſpecially beyond the Loire. One of their chiefs took the name of "The Friend of God, and enemy to all the world." A fellow called John of Gouge, a burgher of Sens, was declared king by theſe banditti, and did almoſt as much miſchief by his depredations as the lawful king had done by his misfortunes.

A.D. 1358. During theſe dreadful ſcenes of deſolation in France, a treaty was concluded between the kings of France and England; by which it was agreed, that, in conſideration of Edward's quitting all claim to the dutchy of Normandy, the counties of Anjou and Maine, and the crown of France, he and his heirs ſhould enjoy Guienne, the Angoumois, Xaintonge, Perigord, Quercy, the Limouſin, Poictou, Touraine, Calais, Guiſnes, the Boulonnois, and the county of Ponthieu, free and independent of the crown of France: and that John and the French nobles, who had been taken priſoners with him, ſhould pay, for their ranſom, four millions of golden crowns, upwards of a million and a half ſterling money. Theſe articles were ſent over to the regent of France, who laid them before a meeting of the ſtates, by whom they were rejected with diſdain, as deſtructive at once of the honour and ſafety of the nation. Edward was highly exaſperated at this refuſal, and determined to renew the war as ſoon as the truce was expired; flattering himſelf that he ſhould ſucceed better by arms than by negotiations.

A.D. 1359. The reſolution of Edward, with regard to an invaſion of France, was no ſooner known, than the ſplendor of his former victories induced a prodigious number of adventurers to flock to his ſtandard; and he croſſed the ſea to Calais at the head of an army of an hundred thouſand men. This force was irreſiſtible, and the dauphin was too prudent to hazard a deciſive action. He allowed the enemy to ſpend their fury in the open country, while he employed himſelf to put all the conſiderable towns in a poſture of defence. It had been determined in a council of war called by Edward near Calais, to penetrate immediately into the heart of France, without loſing time in taking places: a wiſe reſolution, had it been punctually obſerved. But after waſting the province of Picardy, and entering Champagne, Edward was deſirous of being inveſted with the royal diadem of France in the city of Rheims. He accordingly inveſted the city, where three months were ſpent without effect, while his army daily diminiſhed by ſickneſs, and he was obliged at laſt to raiſe the ſiege.

A.D. 1360. Early in the ſpring he entered Burgundy, which, together with the Nivernois, were preſerved from his ravages, by paying the contributions he demanded. The Brie and the Gatinois he plundered with the utmoſt cruelty. He advanced to the gates of Paris, burnt the ſuburbs of that city, and challenged the dauphin to give him battle; but not being able to make that prudent prince change his plan of operations, he ſpread his army into the provinces of Maine, Beauſſe, and the Chartraine. Here he was overtaken by ſo dreadful a hurricane, as ſeemed to threaten the diſſolution of the univerſe. The ſhock of the elements, in thunder, lightening, and hail-ſtones of a prodigious ſize, ſtruck the boldeſt with terror. No leſs than ſix thouſand horſe, and a thouſand foot, were killed on the ſpot. Edward, with all his courage, was not proof againſt this dreadful ſcene: he conſidered it as a warning from heaven to him, to ſheathe the deſtructive ſword of war upon equitable terms. Penetrated with theſe ſentiments, he leaped from his horſe, and proſtrating himſelf on the ground, with his arms extended towards the church of Chartres, dedicated to the Virgin, he vowed to agree inſtantly to a peace with France, if it could be obtained upon juſt and honourable terms. Several hiſtorians have conſidered this ſtorm as the cauſe which inſpired Edward with pacific diſpoſitions: but perhaps the repreſentations of the duke of Lancaſter had more effect on the mind of Edward than this deſtructive hurricane. He inſiſted, that the acquiſition of the crown of France was not advanced by his ſucceſſes: that in one day he might loſe the advantages he had been ſeveral years in obtaining; and that a peace, in his preſent circumſtances, might be concluded, which would annex ſeveral provinces to England.

But whatever gave riſe to theſe pacific ſentiments, a negotiation was opened at Bretigni, where a treaty was concluded; by which it was agreed, that France ſhould pay, at three different times, three millions of crowns of gold (about a million and a half ſterling) for the ranſom of king John: That the king of England ſhould renounce his pretenſions to the crown of France, and to the provinces of Normandy, Maine, Tourain, and Anjou; and ſhould receive in exchange the provinces of Poictou, Xaintongue, Perigord, the Limoſin, Agenois, Quercy, Bigore, Gauze, Angoumois, and Rovergne; and enjoy theſe territories in the fulleſt manner, and without any feudal ſubjection or homage. That the diſpute between Charles de Blois, and John de Montfort, with regard to the dutchy of Britany, ſhould be candidly diſcuſſed, and referred to arbitration, under the ſanction of both kings; but if their good offices proved ineffectual, neither ſhould take any part in the quarrel, though the ſovereignty of Britany ſhould remain to the king of France, and John de Montfort be reſtored to the poſſeſſion of all his eſtates in that kingdom: That the king of France ſhould renounce alliance with the Scots, and Edward his connections with the Flemings. Forty hoſtages, among whom were two ſons of the French king, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, and many of the chief nobility of France, were ſent to England, as a ſecurity for the performance of theſe conditions. John made no difficulty to ratify the treaty, and was reſtored to his ſubjects.

A. D. 1362. This peace between the two kingdoms being concluded in France, occaſioned dreadful diſorders in that kingdom. Vaſt numbers of adventurers, who had inliſted in Edward's army, joined the bands of robbers that had for ſome time deſolated the provinces. Habituated to pillage, and ſtrangers to fear, they committed the moſt dreadful ravages, and were known by the name of "The Companies." At length John, marquis of Montferrat, being at war with the Viſcontis, lords of Milan, took the Companies into his pay, and freed France from theſe formidable bands of ruffians.

Peace being now reſtored, young Edward married his couſin, Joan of Kent, the young and beautiful relict of the late earl of Holland. This princeſs was daughter of Edmund earl of Kent, who had been beheaded in the beginning of the preſent reign by the intrigues of queen Iſabella and the infamous Mortimer; and for her exquiſite beauty, ſhe was generally known by the appellation of "The Fair Maid of Kent." The young hero, who had raiſed the honour of the Engliſh to ſo exalted a pitch, was now created prince of Aquitaine, and inveſted with the property of many of the noble poſſeſſions ceded to the Engliſh by the treaty of Bretigni. He ſoon after croſſed the ſea, and fixed his reſidence at Bourdeaux, where he kept a royal court, beloved and reſpected by all his ſubjects, who thought themſelves peculiarly happy in being governed by ſo great and generous a prince.

A. D. 1363. The firſt payment of the ranſom for John having been deferred, the princes, who were ſtill hoſtages at London, began to grow weary of their confinement, and the duke of Anjou broke his parole, and eſcaped to Paris. This act, ſo contrary to the principles of honour and juſtice, filled John with the utmoſt concern; and he determined, at all events, to execute the conditions of the treaty. His council in vain endeavoured to diſſuade him from his deſign: his purpoſe was fixed, and every argument loſt its force. "If juſtice and good faith" ſaid he, "were baniſhed from the reſt of the earth, they ought yet to retain their habitation in the breaſts of princes." This noble way of thinking, incompatible with the maxims of policy, induced him to return to England, in order to ſubſtitute himſelf in the place of his ſon, the duke of Anjou. But he did not long ſurvive this action, which he thought abſolutely neceſſary. He died ſoon after, in the palace of the Savoy, where he had been royally entertained at the king's expence, and the ranſom was never paid.

The kingdom of Caſtile was almoſt in as miſerable a condition as France. The throne was filled by Peter, ſurnamed The Cruel, from his ſanguinary and revengeful diſpoſition. He was placed in the ſeat of power while a minor, and in very unfavourable circumſtances. His father, Alphonſo XI. had ſeven natural children by his miſtreſs, Eleanor of Guſman; and ſettled ſuch conſiderable fortunes on them, that they defied the royal authority; while their mother, who enjoyed ſtill more power, inſulted the queen dowager. Caſtile was therefore divided into two parties, one of whom joined the queen-mother, and the other Eleanor. When Peter came of age, and took the reins of government into his own hands, he was obliged to maintain a war againſt the faction of his natural brothers. He was victorious in a deciſive battle, took Eleanor priſoner; and, to ſatisfy his mother's revenge, put her to death. Soon after, he married Blanche of Bourbon; who falling in love with the grand maſter of St. Jago, one of thoſe very baſtards who was then at war with her huſband, ſhe joined the faction, and Peter ſhut her up in a caſtle. This greatly augmented the fury of the faction, and Peter was obliged to fight againſt the king of Arragon and his natural brothers at the ſame time; but victory ſtill followed his ſtandards, and he made a cruel uſe of it. He ſeldom forgave a crime; ſo that all his relations who had appeared in arms againſt him, were ſacrificed to his reſentment, and among the reſt the grand maſter of St. Jago. During theſe troubles, Blanche of Bourbon died in confinement; and it was univerſally reported, that ſhe fell by the deteſted arts of poiſon. Henry of Tranſtamare, one of thoſe baſtards, animated with a deſire of revenging at once both the death of his mother, and that of the grand maſter of St. Jago, entered into a treaty with Charles V. king of France, and a powerful army was ſoon raiſed, under the command of John de Bourbon. Bertrand du Gueſclin, a native of Britany, famous for his military abilities, was appointed general in this expedition; and had the addreſs to engage the Companies, now returned from Italy, to follow him into Caſtile. They had been excommunicated by the pope, and were deeply affected by that ſentence, to which they paid a much greater regard than to any maxims of juſtice and humanity; though it was not ſufficient to make them abandon a life of rapine and extortion.

Gueſclin, in his paſſage to Caſtile, paſſed by Avignon, where the pope reſided, and demanded, ſword in hand, both an abſolution for his ſoldiers, and the ſum of two hundred thouſand livres. It was in vain for the pontiff to plead his inability to perform the latter; no excuſes were admitted, and the army left Avignon, hallowed by the bleſſing, and enriched with the ſpoils of the holy father.

Tranſtamare, ſupported by Arragon, and aſſiſted by thoſe troops which had increaſed in their march, was proclaimed king in the town of Burgos. It was in vain for Peter to oppoſe ſo powerful an army with ſucceſs, eſpecially as the greater part of his ſubjects had joined the enemy againſt him; and thought himſelf fortunate to eſcape with his life. He firſt repaired to the frontiers of Portugal; but being denied entrance into that kingdom, he repaired to Bourdeaux, to implore the aid and protection of the Black Prince.

A. D. 1367. Edward eſpouſed his cauſe, and undertook to replace him on the throne of Caſtile. His army paſſed the Pyrenees in three diviſions, each conſiſting of ten thouſand horſe. At his approach, all the Companies left Du Gueſclin's army, declaring they would never draw their ſwords againſt their native prince. But notwithſtanding the deſertion of the Companies, Henry de Tranſtamere and du Gueſclin were ſtill at the head of an hundred thouſand men. Both armies were now in ſight of each other, and ſoon after was fought, on the banks of the Ebro near the village of Navarette, the famous battle of that name, between Peter and the Black Prince on one ſide, and Henry de Tranſtamare and du Gueſclin, on the other. Edward acquired more honour in this battle than Crecy and Poictiers, becauſe the conteſt was much longer diſputed. The victory was complete; above twenty thouſand of the enemy fell on the field of battle, and Bertrand du Gueſclin and the marſhall of Ardrehen were taken priſoners. Not above four knights and forty private men fell on the ſide of the Engliſh. Peter was reeſtabliſhed on the throne of Caſtile, and Henry de Tranſtamare obliged to fly to Arragon.

But gratitude was not one of Peter's virtues: he deceived his benefactor when he had no longer any need of his aſſiſtance. He refuſed the ſtipulated pay to the Engliſh forces; and Edward, perceiving that his men daily periſhed by ſickneſs, found himſelf under a neceſſity of leading them back to Guienne. Peter, however, enjoyed not long the good fortune he owed to the perſon he had ſo ungenerouſly treated. The Black Prince had no ſooner croſſed the Pyrenees, and Bertrand du Gueſclin paid his ranſom, than the baſtard of Tranſtamare revived the party of the malecontents, and du Gueſclin began to raiſe a new army. The forces of Arragon, the rebels of Caſtile, and the French auxiliaries appeared on the ſide of Tranſtamare: while Peter's army conſiſted of the greater part of the Caſtalians, the troops of Portugal, and the Moors of Spain; but his new allies rendered him ſtill more odious, and were of very little ſervice in the day of battle. Tranſtamare and du Gueſclin having no longer the genius and fortune of young Edward to contend with, obtained a complete victory in the neighbourhood of Toledo. Peter was taken priſoner by du Gueſclin, and his brother Tranſtamare put him to death with his own hand.

A. D. 1369. Edward had contracted beſides a very dangerous diſorder during his campaign in Caſtile, an enormous debt, which Peter had ungenerouſly refuſed to pay. This obliged him to have recourſe to methods which tranſgreſs the bounds of prudent policy. He totally alienated from him the affections of the French, by impoſing upon them an unuſual and heavy tax. The nobility of Guienne made ſtrong remonſtrances againſt this impoſition, and even carried their complaints to the king of France as their lord paramount. The principal article in the treaty of Bretigni, regarded the renunciation of the ſovereignty, and were to have been made reſpectively by John and Edward, but had remained unexecuted, though the failure in exchanging theſe renunciations was wholly owing to the chicanery of France. Charles, who directed all his affairs by the principles of policy rather than thoſe of juſtice, admitted the appeal of the nobility of Guienne, and ſummoned the prince of Wales to appear perſonally in his court at Paris. The prince, exaſperated at ſo inſolent and unjuſt a meſſage, anſwered, with all the ſpirit of a young warrior, that it ſhould be at the head of ſixty thouſand men. Charles was not, however, intimidated; he knew the declining years of Edward, the languiſhing ſtate of the prince of Wales's health, and the extreme animoſity which the inhabitants of the conquered provinces had expreſſed againſt the Engliſh, would act very powerfully in his favour.

A. D. 1370. The firſt operations of war were commenced in Ponthieu, where the French met with very little oppoſition. The dukes of Berry and Anjou, brothers to Charles, aſſiſted by du Gueſclin, invaded the ſouthern provinces, and ſoon produced an important revolution. The ſtate of the prince's health would not permit him to mount on horſeback, or exert his uſual activity. The brave Chandois, conſtable of Guienne, was ſlain in one action, and the capital du Buche, who ſucceeded him, taken priſoner in another. Young Edward ſaw the progreſs of the French with the utmoſt regret; but his diſtemper increaſed ſo faſt upon him, that he was obliged to throw up his command, and return to his native country.

Incenſed at the injuries he had received from Charles, Edward meditated a ſevere revenge, but the infirmities of age ſuffered him not to head his armies in perſon, with that vigour and activity which attended him in the field of Crecy. Sir Edward Knowles was for ſome time very fortunate. He marched from Calais at the head of thirty thouſand men, and extended his ravages to the very gates of Paris, but without being able to bring the enemy to a general engagement. He entered the provinces of Maine and Anjou, and laid them both waiſte: but part of his army being there defeated by the admirable conduct of du Gueſclin, now created conſtable of France, the reſt were ſcattered and diſperſed, ſo that inſtead of reaching Guienne, they took ſhelter in Britany, whoſe ſovereign had entered into an alliance with England. The duke of Lancaſter, at the head of twenty-five thouſand men, made, ſoon after, the ſame attempt, and marched the whole length of France, from Calais to Bourdeaux; but his rear was ſo dreadfully haraſſed by flying parties of the enemy, and his foraging parties ſo frequently cut off, that hardly half his army reached the place of their deſtination. One province after another fell into the hands of the enemy, till Bourdeaux, Bayonne, and Calais only remained in the hands of the Engliſh, when the neceſſities of Edward obliged him to conclude a truce with the enemy.

A. D. 1376. But the loſs of his foreign dominions was not the only mortifications, the great Edward met with in the decline of life. The paſſion for military glory, that fired his breaſt during the vigour of his age was now extinguiſhed. His glory was buried in the grave of voluptuouſneſs. After the death of his virtuous queen Philippa, Edward attached himſelf to an inſolent miſtreſs, called Alice Pierce, who now engroſſed the whole regal authority. The parliament on this occaſion preſented a ſpirited remonſtrance, and the imperious lady was baniſhed from the court. Edward alſo ſatisfied his parliament in another requeſt. The nation had entertained a jealouſy of the great power of John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, and apprehended leſt he ſhould himſelf ſeize the crown on the death of his father. Edward, therefore, to remove their fears, declared, in full parliament, Richard, ſon to the prince of Wales, his heir and ſucceſſor. Soon after this declaration, the prince paid the debt of nature; an event that plunged the whole nation in the deepeſt ſorrow. He died at Windſor on the eighth of June, in the forty-ſixth year of his age.

The character of this prince is truly amiable. His valour and military talents, which procured him the admiration of all Europe, form only a ſubordinate part of his merit. His humanity, generoſity, affability, and moderation, gained him the eſteem of all the world; even the moſt ſhining period of ancient or modern hiſtory would have received a luſtre from his virtues; they were celebrated by his greateſt enemies. Charles of France, though his kingdom had ſuffered ſo ſeverely from his valour, gave a noble mark of his high eſteem for this celebrated hero. He cauſed a ſolemn ſervice to be performed for the repoſe of his ſoul, in the church of Notre Dame, and aſſiſted himſelf in perſon, with the principal part of the nobility of France.

A. D. 1377. The king himſelf ſurvived the death of his favourite ſon but little more than a year. He paid the debt of nature at Shene, near Richmond, in Surry, on the twenty-firſt of June, in the ſixty-fifth year of his age, and the fifty-firſt of his reign Edward, whether we conſider him as a warrior, a legiſlator, or a monarch, appears to be one of the greateſt princes that ever ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre. The love of glory was, indeed, his predominant paſſion; and it muſt be confeſſed, that he ſcrupled not to indulge it at the expence of humanity, the lives of his ſubjects, and the intereſt of his country. But it ſhould, at the ſame time, be remembered, that he was a man, and therefore ſubject to errors; and that the diſtracted ſtate of affairs on the continent, and the jarring intereſts of its princes, concurred in flattering his ambition, and inſpired him with ideas, which, otherwiſe, perhaps, he might never have conceived.

But his domeſtic character is much greater than his military, which has thrown ſo bright a luſtre on the annals of England. He was gracious and obliging to the virtuous and deſerving; ſtern and inexorable to the diſſolute and the faithleſs. He gained the affections of the great, though he curbed their licentiouſneſs: he made them feel his power, though they were not inclined to murmur at his ſeverity. He directed their turbulent ſpirits againſt a foreign enemy; and, by his valour and conduct, rendered moſt of their attempts ſucceſsful. In converſation he was at once both affable and communicative; nor did he ever diſdain to receive inſtruction from his inferiors, when either their ſtation or learning enabled them to give it. At the ſame time, he poſſeſſed ſo juſt a diſcernment, that few princes ever made a more happy choice of ſervants, either in the domeſtic, the civil, or the military departments. He was a friend to the poor, the afflicted, the fatherleſs, and the widow. He frequently relieved their wants; and his bounty was that of a king; he placed them beyond the reach of their miſeries for the future. In the diſtribution of rewards, he ſhewed a diſtinguiſhed judgment; merit was always ſure of being rewarded.

Edward was a friend to the conſtitution of his country, though his paſſion for glory often obliged him to break through the rules which ought to reſtrain the royal prerogative. He always conſulted his parliament, by which means that aſſembly acquired a conſiderable acceſſion of authority during his reign; and the Commons were no longer regarded with that indifference with which they had formerly been treated. They often complained, and not always without effect, of the arbitrary exertions of the royal prerogative; a ſufficient proof that the principles of the Engliſh conſtitution, as it is now eſtabliſhed, were then well known. In one of Edward's ſtatutes there is this remarkable clauſe, "That no man, of what eſtate or condition ſoever, ſhall be put out of his land or tenement, nor taken, nor impriſoned, nor diſinherited, nor put to death, without being brought in anſwer by due courſe of law." But the moſt popular law paſſed during Edward's reign, was the ſtate which limited the caſes of high treaſon, before vague and uncertain, to three principal heads; namely, the conſpiring the death of the king, the levying war againſt him, and the adhering to his enemies. The bounds of treaſon were, indeed, ſo much limited by this ſtatute; which is ſtill in force without any alteration, that the lawyers were obliged to enlarge them, by explaining a conſpiracy for levying war againſt the king, to be equivalent to a conſpiracy againſt his life; and this interpretation has, from the neceſſity of the caſe, been tacitly received.

Edward had a numerous iſſue by his queen Philippa of Hainault.

1. His eldeſt ſon, the heroic Edward, generally called the Black Prince, from the colour of his armour.

2. William of Hatfield, who died in his infancy.

3. Lionel of Antwerp, duke of Clarence; who was firſt married to Elizabeth de Burgh, heireſs of William de Burgh, earl of Ulſter. After her death, he married Violante, daughter to the duke of Milan; and died in Italy ſoon after the conſummation of his nuptials, without leaving any poſterity by that princeſs.

4. John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, from whom ſprung that branch which afterwards poſſeſſed the crown. He firſt married Blanche, daughter and co-heireſs of Henry duke of Lancaſter, to whoſe title he ſucceeded. His ſecond wife was Conſtance, eldeſt daughter of Peter the Cruel, king of Caſtile, in whoſe right he aſſumed the arms and title of that kingdom. After her death, he married Catharine Swinford, who had already bore him ſeveral illegitimate children.

5. Edmund de Langley, earl of Cambridge, conſtable of Dover-caſtle, and afterwards duke of York.

6. William of Windſor, who died an infant.

7. Thomas of Woodſtock, who received the title of earl of Buckingham from his father, and duke of Glouceſter from his nephew.

The daughters were,

1. Iſabella, married to Ingelram de Coucy, earl of Bedford.

2. Joan, who died of the plague at Bourdeaux.

3. Blanche, who died in her infancy.

4. Mary, married to John de Montfort, earl of Britany.

5. Margaret, married to John de Haſtings, earl of Pembroke.

RICHARD II. ſurnamed of BOURDEAUX.

A. D. 1377. THIS prince, who was only in the eleventh year of his age when he aſcended the throne, was remarkable for the beauty of his perſon; a circumſtance which, joined with the enthuſiaſtic fondneſs of the people for his illuſtrious father, the Black Prince, occaſioned an univerſal joy in the kingdom when he was placed on the throne of his anceſtors. His three uncles, the dukes of Lancaſter, York, and Glouceſter, oppoſed not his acceſſion. Indeed, their oppoſite tempers and diſpoſitions formed an unſurmountable obſtacle to any attempt of that kind. The coronation of the young monarch was celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence, and the honour of knighthood was conferred upon ſeveral of the young nobility. At this coronation we meet with the firſt mention in hiſtory of a champion, who appeared, completely armed, in Weſtminſter-hall, where his majeſty dined. He was attended by the high conſtable and marſhal of England, and preceded by the heralds. When the champion reached the middle of the hall, he threw his gauntlet on the ground, and challenged all perſons whatſoever, who ſhould dare to diſpute his majeſty's title to the crown. The origin of this cuſtom, which is ſtill preſerved, is, however, utterly unknown: for though this is the firſt time we find it mentioned by hiſtorians, it is, doubtleſs, of a much earlier date; ſince Sir John Dimmock, who performed the office at the coronation of Richard II. was admitted to it by virtue of a right annexed to the manor of Scrivelſby, in Lincolnſhire, held by him in right of his wife, the daughter of Sir John Marmion.

The parliament, which met ſoon after the coronation, eſtabliſhed a council of regency; and the Commons proceeded to increaſe their influence, and to confirm their privileges. But the great power of the king's uncles directed, for ſome years, the meaſures of government. Lancaſter in particular, though very unpopular, and of a genius not at all adapted to any bold enterprize, yet having been accuſtomed to govern during the latter part of the late reign, took upon himſelf the chief direction of affairs, though neither himſelf nor his two brothers were named in the council of regency.

It was ſufficiently evident that a war was, in this ſituation of affairs, inevitable. The truce concluded with France was now expired, and hoſtilities had been already commenced by that formidable power, but no action of importance happened between the two kingdoms. Great preparations were, indeed, made, and events of the greateſt conſequence were expected, when Charles, king of France, paid the debt of nature, and left his crown to his ſon, Charles VI. a youth only twelve years of age.

A. D. 1381. But though no actions of importance had been performed in the war againſt France, the great expence attending the ſeveral expeditions had exhauſted the treaſury; and the parliament, in order to raiſe the neceſſary ſupplies, impoſed a new and extraordinary tax of three groats on every perſon, male and female, above fifteen years of age; but they ordained, that in levying this tax, the rich ſhould relieve the poor by an equable compenſation. As the money was immediately wanted, and the common method of gathering it would require ſome conſiderable time, the court farmed out the grant to a ſet of rapacious collectors, who extorted it with the utmoſt rigour from the people. This impoſition, added to the cruelty and preſumptuous behaviour of the tax gatherers, occaſioned one of the moſt ſingular mutinies recorded in the annals of hiſtory. The people had already acquired ſome idea of independence, and given ſeveral indications of their deſire of breaking thoſe chains which had ſo long been impoſed upon them by a haughty nobility. Enthuſiaſm alſo aſſiſted to augment this deſire, and make the populace acquainted with their own importance. One John Ball, a turbulent but popular preacher, viſited various parts of the kingdom, and every where inculcated on his audience the maxims of equal right and liberty to all the goods of nature; and the tyranny of artificial diſtinctions introduced by a few inſolent rulers, in order to aggrandize themſelves, and degrade the more conſiderable part of the ſpecies. Doctrines like theſe, ſo agreeable to the populace, were embraced with avidity, and kindled in the minds of the vulgar thoſe ſparks of rebellion which the inſolence of the tax-gatherers blew into a flame.

The inſurrection began at Deptford, in Kent; where one of the collectors came to the houſe of Walter, a tyler by profeſſion, afterwards better known by the name of Wat Tyler, and demanded three groats for one of his daughters. The peaſant refuſed to comply with the demand, urging, that ſhe was under the age preſcribed by act of parliament. The inſolent tax-gatherer not only refuſed to acquieſce in this deciſion, but offered to produce a very indecent proof to the contrary; and, at the ſame time, laid hold of the girl. Enraged at this inſolence, Tyler beat out the fellow's brains with his hammer. The action was highly approved by the populace of the neighbourhood, who inſtantly flew to arms. Their example was followed by the peaſants of Eſſex, Surry, Suſſex, Hertfordſhire, Suffolk, Norfolk, Cambridge, and Lincoln; ſo that even before the government had any warning of the danger, the diſorder was become too great for oppoſition.

Blackheath was appointed the place of a general rendezvous; and they accordingly aſſembled there, to the number of an hundred thouſand men, under their principal leaders, Wat Tyler, and Jack Straw. The duke of Lancaſter was now on the borders of Scotland, and the number of regular troops in the kingdom very inconſiderable; ſo that the government was thrown into the utmoſt confuſion, as having every thing to fear from this lawleſs aſſembly. A council was called in the Tower, where a reſolution was taken to ſend a meſſage to the inſurgents, to enquire the cauſe of this tumultuous meeting. The mutinous rabble received the meſſengers with the moſt haughty inſolence; and returned for anſwer, "That they were come to ſpeak to the king about certain important affairs; and deſired he would repair to their camp in perſon, and hear what they had to propoſe." Many of the council, particularly the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and Sir Robert Hales, the treaſurer, oppoſed the king's going in perſon to treat with the rebels; thinking it at once both derogatory to his dignity, and dangerous to his life. But it being repreſented to the council, that the inſurgents were in full march for London, and that it would be impoſſible to prevent their gaining admittance into the city, the king went down the river in a barge, as far as Rotherhithe; but on approaching the ſhore, he perceived ſuch ſymptoms of tumult and inſolence, that he put back, and returned to the Tower.

Exaſperated at this diſappointment, the peaſants, who were by this time joined by the city rabble, advanced to the bridge, and threatened to burn the ſuburbs firſt, and then the capital itſelf, if the gates were not immediately opened. Intimidated by this threat, which they were able to carry into execution, their demand was complied with. They entered the city, and immediately gave a looſe to every ſpecies of exceſs. They plundered the houſes of the moſt wealthy citizens, and abuſed their perſons, together with thoſe of their wives and daughters. A party of them ran immediately to the duke of Lancaſter's palace in the Savoy, and ſoon reduced that magnificent ſtructure, together with all its ſplendid furniture, to aſhes. Another party ſet fire to the Temple; while a third repaired to the elegant monaſtery of St. John of Jeruſalem, at Clerkenwell, near Smithfield, and burnt the whole ſtructure, together with all the books, records and papers. They beheaded all the gentlemen that fell into their hands, and expreſſed a particular animoſity againſt the lawyers and attornies.

The next morning they divided themſelves into three bodies. The firſt diviſion, under Jack Straw, the ſecond leader in command, marched to Highbury manor, about two miles to the northward of London. The ſecond retired to Mile-End. And the third, under the command of Wat Tyler himſelf, took up their ſtation in St. Katharine's, and round the Tower, to prevent the eſcape of the miniſters and noblemen who had taken ſhelter in that fortreſs, and whom the rabble had devoted to deſtruction. The king, who had alſo retired thither for ſafety, finding the fortreſs, which was but weakly garriſoned, and almoſt deſtitute of proviſions, incapable of making any long defence, found means to eſcape during the night; and hearing that the rebels at Mile-End were the moſt tractable, and had expreſſed a deſire of treating with the government, he repaired thither, and demanded to know the reaſon for this tumultuous aſſembly; telling them, that he was their king, that he was come to hear and redreſs their grievances. They inſiſted upon a general amneſty; the abolition of all ſlavery; liberty of trade in all market-towns, without paying either toll or impoſt; and that a ſtated rent ſhould be laid upon lands, inſtead of the ſervice impoſed upon villanage. Theſe requeſts the king granted very readily, but inſiſted on their laying down their arms immediately. They made no difficulty of obeying; and returned very quietly to their own houſes, leaving a few of each pariſh to carry down with them the general pardon, and charters of their freedom.

But the rebels under Wat Tyler were of a more ferocious diſpoſition. They were determined to revenge the evils they had ſuffered on the heads of the nation, and, if poſſible, carry the romantic ſcheme of government they had formed into execution. Accordingly, while the king was treating with one diviſion of the inſurgents, Wat Tyler demanded admittance into the Tower; and the garriſon were ſo intimidated by the multitude of rebels, that they refuſed to defend the place, and the gates were accordingly thrown open. This puſillanimous conduct raiſed the inſolence of the rabble to the higheſt pitch; and their behaviour was at once both brutiſh and barbarous. They ſeized Simon Sudbury, archbiſhop of Canterbury, then chancellor, dragged him to Tower-hill, and beheaded him with the utmoſt inſolence. Sir Robert Hales, lord treaſurer, and Legg, the Flemiſh farmer of the land-tax, ſuffered the ſame fate.

This ſucceſs, inſtead of ſatiating the vengeance, increaſed the ſanguinary diſpoſition of the rebels; every perſon of any note that fell into their hands, was ſacrificed as a victim to their lawleſs barbarity. The citizens now ſaw their error in admitting ſuch a turbulent multitude into the city. Their ſavage practices rouzed them to revenge, and recovered them from their conſternation. Walworth, the lord-mayor, and Philpot, one of the aldermen, promiſed the king, that they would ſupport him againſt the rebels, provided ſome method could be found to amuſe them with propoſals. Sir John Newton was therefore ſent to acquaint them, that the Eſſex men had accepted certain conditions from the government, in conſequence of which they had retired peaceably to their habitations; and that he was empowered to offer them the ſame terms, on their making the ſame ſubmiſſion. But the ſavage plebeians, fluſhed with their late ſucceſs, had now formed the moſt chimerical deſigns; they propoſed to murder the king, together with all the whole nobility, and bury all government in a general anarchy, in order to deſtroy every ſpecies of ſubordination, and render all men equal. Tyler, therefore, made no other anſwer to the king's meſſage, than that he would conſent to a peace if he liked the terms. Three different charters were ſent ſucceſſively by Richard, in the ſpace of a few hours, but were all rejected with the moſt provoking inſolence.

The miniſtry and principal men of the city were now thoroughly exaſperated, and Richard, attended by the lord mayor, and chief officers of London, rode to Smithfield. Sir John Newton was again ſent to the demagogue, inviting him to a conference with the king, in order that his majeſty might know his demands, and, if poſſible, give his conſent to their being granted. Tyler now ſeemed to be alarmed, and moved towards Smithfield, at the head of the rabble, with a very ſlow and deſultory pace. Newton told him the king was waiting for him, and deſired he would quicken his march. “Make what “haſte you pleaſe yourſelf,” replied the inſolent rebel, “I ſhall take my own time.” The true reaſon for this delay in the demagogue, aroſe from his expecting a large reinforcement from Hertfordſhire and the adjacent counties, and therefore he would willingly have deferred the conference till their arrival. But the government was now in a capacity to defeat their ſchemes, and therefore unwilling to ſuffer them to exerciſe their ſavage barbarity any longer. The magiſtrates of London had aſſembled a large body of well-armed and well-affected citizens, and Sir Robert Knowles was juſt arrived at the head of a thouſand veterans. When Tyler came into Smithfield, where the king waited for him, Sir John Newton told him that both decency and duty required that he ſhould be uncovered in the preſence of his ſovereign; but the traitor, inſtead of complying, was ſo highly offended, that he would have ſheathed his dagger in his breaſt, had not the king ſuddenly advanced, and drew off his attention, by aſking what he had to requeſt? Tyler was greatly diſconcerted; and made ſuch extravagant propoſals, and delivered himſelf in ſo incoherent a manner, that the king could make no reply. He demanded that all the ancient laws ſhould be aboliſhed; that all bondmen ſhould be free; that all warrens, parks and chaſes ſhould be laid open, and every perſon, the poor as well as the rich, ſhould have free liberty to fiſh, fowl, and hunt in every part of the kingdom. He added ſeveral other particulars relative to the levelling ſcheme he had formed, but in ſo confuſed a manner that they were not underſtood. The king not being able to comprehend the meaning of what this illiterate leader had advanced, returned no anſwer, which Tyler conſidering as a contemptuous refuſal, raiſed his dagger, and at the ſame time laid hold of the bridle of the king's horſe. Walworth, the mayor, who had with difficulty curbed his reſentment at the behaviour of this audacious rebel, was now ſo exaſperated that he drew his ſword, and ſtruck him ſo violent a blow, that he fell to the ground, where he was inſtantly diſpatched by Philpot.

The rabble, ſeeing their leader fall, prepared to take a ſevere revenge, and a dreadful ſlaughter would doubtleſs have enſued, had not Richard prevented it by an amazing preſence of mind. He ordered his company to ſtop; advanced alone towards the enraged multitude, and with an affable and intrepid countenance aſked them, “What is the meaning of this diſorder, my good people? Are you angry becauſe you have loſt your leader? I am your king; I will be your leader.” Over-awed by the preſence of the king, the inſurgents followed him implicitly; and he led them into the fields near Iſlington to prevent the conſequences of any diſorder that might ariſe from an attempt to reduce them to obedience. They had no ſooner left the city, than they perceived a large body of forces marching towards them under the command of Sir Robert Knowles. A panic immediately ſeized the whole multitude: they threw down their arms and begged for quarter. Knowles propoſed that all the ringleaders ſhould be put to death, but the king would not permit any ſanguinary methods to be taken; and they were accordingly diſmiſſed with the ſame charters their companions had received. Theſe charters were, however, ſoon after revoked by the parliament, and the leaders of this extraordinary rebellion ſeverely puniſhed. Such was the end of a faction, which threatened the deſtruction of the kingdom; but as the deluded populace had no diſtinguiſhed leader, they could not have long contended with the royal authority. Such tempeſts, which were then common in Europe, ſerved, however, to ſhew what ſort of government then prevailed.

This remarkable inſtance of intrepidity and preſence of mind in Richard, who was now only ſixteen years of age, inſpired the people with the higheſt expectations of his future behaviour. But the preſages of early youth are often deceitful. As Richard advanced in years, his conduct abundantly demonſtrated that their hopes were built on a deluſive foundation; it was ſoon evident, that he wanted both judgment and capacity. What rendered this want of ability the more alarming to the Engliſh was the unſettled ſtate of affairs on the continent, and which threatened to involve all Europe in confuſion. On the death of Gregory X. Brigano, biſhop of Barri, was elected pontiff, and took the name of Urban VI. But his paſſionate and turbulent diſpoſition rendered him a very improper perſon to be placed at the head of the church. He had not long been ſeated in St. Peter's chair, before he declared, in full conſiſtory, that he was determined to puniſh the kings of France and England, as the diſturbers of the peace of Chriſtendom. Cardinal de la Grange, a Frenchman, and equally paſſionate with the pope himſelf, roſe from his ſeat, and ſhaking his fiſt at the pontiff, told him that “he lied.” This raſh word involved all Europe in confuſion.

Moſt of the cardinals, ſhocked at the brutal diſpoſition of Urban, withdrew to Fondi, in the kingdom of Naples, where they declared the late election void, and proceeded unanimouſly to the election of a new pontiff; and Robert, ſon to Amadeus III. count of Geneva, was elected, and took the name of Clement VII. The new pontiff was a perſon of great parts, eloquent, polite, liberal, and allied to moſt of the princes of Europe. The emperor, England, Flanders and Hungary, declared for Urban; France, Scotland, Savoy, and Lorraine, for Clement. All the religious orders were divided: the doctors and univerſities joined alſo in the conteſt. The two popes beſtowed on each other the appellations of Antichriſt and Uſurper, and proceeded to mutual excommunications. A civil and religious war was kindled in Europe, and the moſt horrid cruelties committed by both parties.

A. D. 1382. Clement preached up a cruſade againſt Richard and his ſubjects; while Urban not only fulminated his excommunications againſt all the adherents of Clement, but alſo ſent over a commiſſion to Henry Spencer, biſhop of Norwich, nominating him the leader of a cruſade againſt his rival. With this commiſſion the pope ſent him plenary powers, as his legate, to grant the ſame indulgences to all who engaged in this expedition, as to thoſe who carried arms againſt the infidels. The publication of this cruſade in England anſwered the moſt ſanguinary wiſhes of the pontiff. The nobility, gentry, clergy, and almoſt all ranks of people, engaged in it with the ſame ardour and alacrity as if they had been going to fight againſt an enemy that threatened to put a period to the Chriſtian name.

A. D. 1383. The utmoſt diſpatch was uſed in embarking the forces; and the biſhop landed at Calais on the fourth of May, at the head of fifty thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe. His firſt attempt was upon Gravelines, which he carried by aſſault. Intimidated by this ſucceſs, the inhabitants of Dunkirk opened their gates to the victor. Bourbourg, Caſſel, Berg, Furnes, Nieuport, Oſtend, Blankenberg, and all the towns on the ſea-coaſt as far as Sluiſe, followed the example of Dunkirk. Alarmed at this progreſs of the Engliſh, the count of Flanders determined to give them battle. Norwich, depending on the enthuſiaſtic diſpoſition of his followers, marched to meet the enemy, and a bloody battle enſued, in which the count was totally defeated. The king of France, at the head of an army of an hundred thouſand men, now advanced to check the progreſs of the cruſaders. The prelate, on a general muſter of his forces, found that they amounted to ninety thouſand men, occaſioned by the continual arrival of freſh reinforcements from England. But many of theſe were the very dregs of the people, and at once ignorant of diſcipline and impatient of command. It was, however, reſolved in a council of war, to fight the French army; but this was oppoſed by a large party of the troops, who inſiſted on their beſieging Ypres, where they expected to acquire an immenſe booty. It was in vain to oppoſe this ſtrange determination; and the biſhop, in order to prevent a mutiny in his army, was obliged to undertake the reduction of that place; a ſtep which ultimately proved fatal to his enterprize. The approaches were carried on with great intrepidity; but he was at laſt obliged to raiſe the ſiege, and ſend to England for a reinforcement. But ſo many difficulties occurred, that the ſeaſon was loſt before any thing could be effected; and the biſhop returned to England with the poor remains of his army.

This miſcarriage of the prelate did not, however, put an end to the ſchiſm in the church: it laſted forty years; during which ſpace of time, religion was made a pretence for the greateſt enormities. It was during this period of papal confuſion, that John Wickliff, a ſecular prieſt educated at Oxford, and diſtinguiſhed for the auſterity of his life and manners, ventured to inculcate tenets nearly the ſame with thoſe propagated by the reformers in the ſixteenth century. He denied the doctrine of the real preſence, the merit of confeſſion and monaſtic vows, and the ſupremacy of the pope. He maintained, that the numerous ceremonies of the church were deſtructive of true piety; that the ſcripture was the ſole rule of faith; that the church was dependent on the ſtate, and ought to poſſeſs no temporal wealth; and that no taxes ought to be levied upon the people till the riches of the eccleſiaſtics had been expended in the ſervice of the kingdom. Theſe opinions, which had their riſe from the uſurpations and abuſes of the clergy, being well calculated to flatter the people, excited them to rebellion. Wickliff was, however, protected againſt the attempts of the eccleſiaſtics by many of the greateſt men in the kingdom; particularly the duke of Lancaſter, who greatly favoured the doctrines of this firſt reformer. Wickliff being ſummoned to appear in a ſynod held by the biſhop of London in St. Paul's cathedral, the duke accompanied him; and in the courſe of his examination, inſulted the biſhop, and even proceeded to threats; upon which the ſynod broke up in great confuſion. The proſelytes of this reformer were called Wickliffites, and Lollards; but as the principal leaders ſoftened or retracted thoſe tenets which were moſt obnoxious to the church, this innovation produced no revolution. The reſpect, however, for the holy ſee, was every day diminiſhing; and the violent ſchiſm already mentioned contributed greatly to open the eyes of the people, and rouſe them from that ſuperſtitious lethargy which had ſo long affected the inhabitants of Europe.

A. D. 1385. The Scots had taken advantage of the minority of Richard to diſturb the peace of the northern counties, and a large army was raiſed to chaſtiſe their inſolence. Richard headed his army in perſon. He entered Scotland by Berwick; while the Scots, who dreaded a pitched battle with the Engliſh, abandoned the low country, croſſed the Engliſh borders on the weſt, and plundered the counties of Weſtmoreland, Cumberland, and Lancaſhire. Richard, in the mean time, advanced to Edinburgh, and deſtroyed all the towns and villages that lay in his rout. He reduced that city to aſhes. He treated in the ſame manner Perth, Dundee, and other places in the low country. But when he was deſired to march towards the weſtern coaſt, in order there to wait the return of the enemy, and take a ſevere revenge on them for the devaſtations they had committed, his impatience to be in England, and enjoy his uſual pleaſures and amuſements, were more prevalent; and he carried back his army, without effecting any thing by theſe mighty preparations.

The French court had long been deſirous of wreſting their ſea-ports out of the hands of the Engliſh; and they were perſuaded that an opportunity now offered for that purpoſe; the duke of Lancaſter having carried into Spain all the flower of the Engliſh military force, in order to proſecute his empty claim to the crown of Caſtile. Great preparations were therefore made in France for an invaſion of England, as the moſt proper method of ſucceeding in their deſign. They collected an immenſe fleet and army at Sluiſe. All the nobility of France were engaged in this enterprize, and the Engliſh were kept for ſome time in perpetual alarms. The French army, when reviewed at Arras, conſiſted of eighty thouſand men at arms, with their followers on horſeback, beſides a prodigious number on foot. Twelve hundred and eighty-ſeven ſhips of all ſorts were ready at Sluiſe to carry over this numerous army; and ſeveral warlike engines of a new conſtruction were put on board the fleet. This amazing armament engaged the attention of all Europe. The Engliſh were intimidated, particularly the city of London. The militia of the kingdom were ordered to the ſea-coaſt; the ports and harbours were put in a poſture of defence; and all the beacons on the coaſt prepared for giving the alarm, whenever the enemy ſhould appear. A fleet was alſo fitted out to guard the channel, and every prudent meaſure which reaſon could ſuggeſt was purſued with the utmoſt care and alacrity.

But the ſafety of England was principally owing to other cauſes. Ambition and envy, ſo often the deſtruction of public undertakings, had poiſoned the French councils. The duke of Berry, a prince of a covetous and aſpiring diſpoſition, was no friend to this undertaking, in which he thought neither his dignity nor intereſt had been ſufficiently conſulted, and therefore determined to render the whole abortive. In order to this, he proceeded ſo ſlow in aſſembling the troops, that it was the middle of September before he joined the army at the head of his diviſion. The forces were, however, embarked, and the fleet ſailed out of the harbour with a fair wind. But they had not left their own coaſt above two hours before the wind changed to the oppoſite quarter, and a dreadful ſtorm ſucceeded, which, in a few hours, ſcattered the whole navy. Some of the ſhips were driven back into the harbour of Sluiſe; ſome were daſhed on the rocks, others foundered at ſea, and many of the ſtragglers were taken by the Engliſh. Such was the end of thoſe mighty preparations which had held all Europe in ſuſpence.

Richard had for ſome time conſidered the ſubjection in which he was held by his uncles with great regret, and determined to break theſe ignoble chains. Accordingly he threw himſelf into the arms of Robert de Vere, earl of Oxford, a young nobleman of an agreeable figure, but of very diſſolute manners, more calculated to corrupt the prince than to govern the kingdom. This favourite engroſſed the affection of Richard, who knew not how to ſet bounds to his liberality. He created him duke of Ireland, and conferred on him for life the ſovereignty of that iſland; even the whole authority of the government was by degrees lodged in his hands. Michael de la Pole, the chancellor, and lately created earl of Suffolk, was another of his favourites. He was poſſeſſed of great military talents, and had ſerved in the army with applauſe. He had alſo been employed in ſeveral embaſſies and treaties of peace, in all which he had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his prudence, integrity, capacity and judgment; but his particular friendſhip for the duke of Ireland rendered him obnoxious to the people.

The princes of the blood, and the chief nobility, who now ſaw themſelves ſtripped of their power, determined to attack the favourites, and recover their former influence. An impeachment was accordingly drawn up againſt the chancellor, and Glouceſter undertook to carry it to the houſe of lords. It was, however, thought proper to obſerve the appearance of decency at leaſt, and accordingly the commons ſent a meſſage by their ſpeaker to the king, importing, that unleſs the chancellor was removed, they could not proceed in the diſpatch of public buſineſs. Richard, who little expected a motion of this nature, received the addreſs with an indignation he could not conceal. He told the ſpeaker very ſharply, "That it would better become the parliament to attend to the buſineſs for which they were ſummoned, than to concern themſelves with his ſervants." Nor did he give them leave to renew their addreſs: he ſet out immediately for Eltham in Kent, leſt his preſence ſhould be conſtrued as a ſanction to the proceedings of the parliament.

The king having thus withdrawn himſelf from the national council, a meſſage was ſent him by the duke of Glouceſter and the biſhop of Ely, deſiring him, in the name of the parliament, to return: declaring, in caſe of refuſal, that they would immediately diſſolve themſelves. Richard finding himſelf unable to reſiſt, was obliged to be contented with ſtipulating, that except finiſhing the preſent impeachment againſt Suffolk, no attack ſhould be made againſt any other of his miniſters. The accuſation was at once both frivolous and unjuſt; but innocence was but a poor defence againſt the turbulent envy of the barons; Suffolk was condemned and depoſed from his office.

This ſtep was an introduction to greater exceſſes. Glouceſter and his aſſociates, indeed, obſerved their ſtipulation with the king, they attacked no more of his miniſters; but they proceeded much farther; they attacked the regal power. The king was deprived of his authority; and the exerciſe of the ſovereign power entruſted to fourteen commiſſioners, whoſe juriſdiction was limited to a twelvemonth, though it was ſufficiently evident, that the party of Glouceſter never meant to re-inſtate their monarch in his prerogatives. They obliged him not only to ſign this commiſſion, but to take an oath never to infringe it. Richard, however, entered a proteſt againſt this violence at the end of the ſeſſion, declaring, that the prerogatives of his crown, notwithſtanding his late conceſſion, ſhould ſtill be deemed entire and unimpaired.

A. D. 1387. This proteſt had no effect on the commiſſioners: they proceeded directly to the exerciſe of their office; and Richard found himſelf deſtitute of all authority. The king was, however, determined to make one attempt for the recovery of his power. He aſſembled the judges and lawyers, who made no ſcruple of declaring, that the commiſſion was derogatory to the royal authority; that thoſe who procured it, or adviſed the king to conſent to it, were puniſhable with death; that thoſe who compelled him were guilty of treaſon; that thoſe were equally criminal who ſhould perſevere in maintaining it; that the king has the right of diſſolving parliaments when he pleaſes; that the parliament while they ſit, muſt proceed firſt upon the king's buſineſs; and that they cannot, without the king's conſent, impeach any of his miniſters and judges.

It was not long before the duke of Glouceſter and his party were informed of this ſecret conſultation, and immediately had recourſe to arms, and demanded that the perſons who had ſeduced the king by their pernicious counſel, ſhould be delivered up as traitors to the ſtate. A few days after they appeared in his preſence armed, and attended by their followers; where they accuſed the archbiſhop of York, the duke of Ireland, the earl of Suffolk, Sir Robert Treſilian, and Sir Nicholas Bramble, as public and dangerous enemies to the kingdom. The duke of Ireland ſaved himſelf by flight; but the others were condemned and executed. Force became the only rule of law in thoſe unfortunate times, when the paſſions of the great ſeemed to have annihilated every idea of juſtice.

A. D. 1388. During the ſcenes of anarchy in the Engliſh government, the Scots purſued their deſultory war with great advantage; but nothing worthy a place in hiſtory happened till the beginning of Auguſt, when they entered Northumberland with a ſmall army, conſiſting of three hundred horſe and two thouſand foot, all veterans, and commanded by the two Douglaſes, the earls of Fife, Murray, and Dunbar, the moſt celebrated commanders in the Scottiſh army. They ravaged the whole country through which they paſſed, and advanced as far as the gates of Newcaſtle, where the lord Henry Piercy, ſurnamed Hotſpur, ſon to the earl of Northumberland, firſt oppoſed them. But his troops were defeated, and himſelf was unhorſed in ſingle combat by the younger Douglas, who having ſeized his lance, vowed to carry it to Scotland as a trophy of his victory. Inflamed with rage at his late miſfortune, Hotſpur vowed that Douglas ſhould never carry his lance to Scotland in triumph. He accordingly collected a body of ſix hundred horſe and eight thouſand foot, and putting himſelf at their head marched in purſuit of the enemy, without waiting for a reinforcement of troops that were haſtening to join him under the command of the biſhop of Durham.

Elated with their late ſucceſs the Scots had undertaken the ſiege of the caſtle of Otterborn, and were lying before that fortreſs when Piercy, by forced marches, marches, reached their camp. Rage had ſtifled prudence in the breaſt of Piercy: he would not delay the engagement for a moment, though his troops were ſo greatly fatigued with their long marches, and though night was approaching when he came up with the enemy. He attacked the Scots with all the fury of a diſappointed warrior, but the darkneſs rendered it impoſſible to continue the conteſt, and they ſeparated without either obtaining the victory. The moon riſing at midnight, however, occaſioned the battle to be renewed with great fury, and at laſt victory declared for the Scots, Douglas was ſlain, and Piercy taken priſoner.

A. D. 1389. The king's authority ſeemed now totally annihilated: the combination of the princes of the blood and chief nobility had ſo far engroſſed the royal power, that a revolution was apparently inevitable. But the event proved otherwiſe. Richard, who was now in his twenty-third year, declared, in a full council held at Eaſter, his intention of directing the affairs of his kingdom and houſhold by his ſole authority, and taking into his own hands the reins of government. No oppoſition being made to ſo reaſonable a deſign, Richard immediately demanded the great ſeal from the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and gave it to William of Wickham, biſhop of Wincheſter. He removed the duke of Glouceſter and the earl of Warwick from the council-board, and ſupplied their places with others whom he thought more worthy of his confidence. The biſhop of Hereford was deprived of his office of treaſurer, and the earl of Arundel of that of admiral. Theſe changes were made without the leaſt oppoſition; the dukes of Glouceſter and York affected to return to their duty; and Richard, by paſſing a general amneſty, and remitting ſome ſubſidies which had been granted him by parliament, acquired the affections of the people, who eaſily paſs from one extreme to another. The kingdom from this period enjoyed tranquillity for a conſiderable time. A truce of twenty-five years was concluded with France, which was followed with the reſtitution of Breſt and Cherbourgh; and Richard, who was now a widower, was affianced to the daughter of Charles VI. though ſhe was then only ſeven years of age. This alliance was thought neceſſary in order to ſupport the king againſt the enterprizes of his uncles, who envied the power of his miniſters.

A. D. 1397. But this confederacy with France gave offence to the Engliſh, who had contracted a violent antipathy againſt that nation; and the conduct of Richard was not calculated to procure the reſpect of his ſubjects. A ſlave to pleaſure, and incapable of applying himſelf to buſineſs; under the dominion of favourites, on whom he profuſely laviſhed the revenues of the crown, and the grants of the people; and ſullying the dignity of his rank, by admitting perſons of very mean condition to his familiarity; he was conſidered as totally unworthy of wearing the Engliſh crown.

Glouceſter took advantage of the king's weakneſs to renew his intrigues. He abſented himſelf from the court; hardly ever appeared in council but to oppoſe the meaſures of the adminiſtration; and exerted all his abilities to cultivate and increaſe his popularity with the nation. The invectives he employed againſt the government, againſt the long truce concluded with Charles, and againſt the marriage of Richard, joined to his addreſs in fomenting the hatred againſt France, and in reviving the deſire of ravaging again that hoſtile kingdom, made the deepeſt impreſſions on the minds of a people diſpoſed at all times to revolt, and ever impatient under imaginary diſtreſs.

The miniſtry ſaw their danger, and the king, whoſe precipitate temper admitted of no deliberation, ordered Glouceſter to be unexpectedly arreſted. The attempt ſucceeded; the duke was hurried on board a ſhip lying in the river ready to receive, and carry him over to Calais, where alone it was thought he could be ſafely detained in cuſtody. The earls of Arundel and Warwick were ſeized at the ſame time: the malecontents were aſtoniſhed and over-awed by being ſo ſuddenly deprived of their leaders; and the dukes of Lancaſter and York, with the earls of Derby and Rutland, having joined the miniſtry, they were bereaved of all poſſibility of reſiſtance.

To put a final period to this oppoſition, a parliament was immediately ſummoned at Weſtminſter, and the members entered with violence into all the meaſures of the court. They annulled the act of amneſty which Richard had voluntarily confirmed: they proſecuted the archbiſhop of Canterbury, the earls of Arundel, Warwick, and other noblemen, ſeveral of whom were condemned and executed, for having been engaged in former attempts againſt the crown, notwithſtanding the pardon they had received. The proſecution againſt Glouceſter was juſt going to be commenced, when intelligence of his death arrived. It was pretended that he died ſuddenly of an apoplexy; but it was the general opinion that he had been murdered in conſequence of orders from his nephew; and in the ſucceeding reign, undoubted evidence was produced in parliament of his having been ſuffocated with pillows by thoſe who had the care of his perſon. Thus fell Thomas of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, the victim of his enemies treachery, and of his own imprudent conduct. With many great and good qualities, he joined an inordinate thirſt after popularity, in the purſuit of which he too often loſt ſight of that reſpect which ſhould always be preſerved to majeſty; and whatever advantages he might intend to procure to his country, the meaſures he took for that purpoſe were ſuch as no court, that had the leaſt regard to its own honour or conſequence, could ſuffer implicitly.

The death of Glouceſter was no ſooner known, than his brothers, the dukes of Lancaſter and York, haſtened to London at the head of a numerous body of forces, threatening to take the moſt ſevere revenge on the authors of this execrable tragedy, not excepting even the king himſelf. Richard had, however, taken all the precautions neceſſary to divert the force of the expected ſtorm. He had not only gained over the parliament to his devotion; but alſo collected an army of twenty thouſand veterans, and ſtationed them in the neighbourhood of London. Nor did he depend on the forces he had raiſed; he had recourſe alſo to the milder methods of negotiation, and the two brothers, finding that all reſiſtance would be in vain, liſtened to an accommodation.

A. D. 1398. But the party of the duke of Glouceſter was hardly ſuppreſſed before another aroſe which proved fatal to Richard. The principles of honour were at this time ſo little known among the nobility, that Henry duke of Hereford, ſon to the duke of Lancaſter, accuſed, before the council, the duke of Norſolk, of having ſpoken in private many ſlanderous words againſt the king. Norfolk gave him the lie, and offered to prove his innocence by ſingle combat, a method of trial then authorized by the laws of the kingdom. The challenge was accepted, and the diſpute ordered to be decided according to the laws of chivalry, in preſence of the king and his whole court.

Both the noblemen appeared on the day appointed, the trumpets ſounded, and they were preparing to ruſh againſt each other, when the king interpoſed, to prevent the effuſion of noble blood, and commanded them to depart the kingdom; but their ſentences were unequal; the exile of Norfolk was for life; but Hereford only for ten years. Both, however, obeyed the royal mandate. Norfolk, who knew he had nothing to expect from Richard, retired into Germany, and afterwards to Venice, where he ſoon after paid the debt of nature: he did not live to ſee the revolution which ſoon happened in his country. The duke of Hereford was more reſigned to his fate; he waited on the king to take his leave before he quitted the kingdom, and this ſubmiſſive and reſpectful behaviour had ſuch an effect upon Richard, that he remitted four years of the time aſſigned for his baniſhment; and alſo empowered him, by letters patent, to enter into immediate poſſeſſion of any eſtates that might fall to him during his exile, and to poſtpone the homage till his return.

A. D. 1399. Hereford had left the kingdom only a few months, when his father, John of Ghent, duke of Lancaſter, paid the debt of nature; and his ſon, in conſequence of his rights, and the letters patent he had received, deſired to be put in poſſeſſion of the eſtate and juriſdiction of his father. But Richard, to the eternal ſtain of his memory, denied this requeſt, revoked the letters patent he had given to Hereford, decreed his baniſhment ſhould be perpetual, and confiſcated all his paternal eſtate.

Hereford was highly exaſperated at this ſcene of complicated iniquities. He was of a bold and enterprizing ſpirit: he had ſignalized his courage and intrepidity both at home and abroad: he was beloved by the people, and adored by the ſoldiers. He was always cool, ſedate, and prudent; and was conſidered as the only Engliſh prince that deſerved the public confidence and eſteem. His misfortunes were lamented, and the injuries he had received complained of by all ranks of people. He was ſecretly invited to return to England, and aſſured of being ſufficiently ſupported in the recovery of his lawful inheritance. Hereford, now duke of Lancaſter, determined to embrace the generous offer; and an event ſoon happened which gave him all the advantage he could deſire.

Roger Mortimer, earl of Marche, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, had been lately killed in a rencounter with a ſmall party of the Iriſh; and Richard, in order to reduce the rebels to ſubjection, and revenge the death of the preſumptive heir to his crown, reſolved to paſs over into that iſland, and head his army in perſon. He accordingly embarked at Briſtol; and, after a ſhort paſſage, landed at Waterford, at the head of two thouſand men at arms, and ten thouſand archers. Struck with conſternation at ſeeing the king of England at the head of ſo powerful an army, the moſt conſiderable part of the rebels ſubmitted, and the reſt were ſoon reduced to obedience.

Lancaſter embraced this opportunity of returning to England. He embarked at Nantz with a retinue of ſixty perſons, and landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire, where he was immediately joined by the lords Willoughby, Roſs, D'Arcy, and Beaumont, and ſeveral gentlemen of diſtinction, attended by a numerous body of vaſſals and adherents. A few days after, his party was increaſed by the arrival of the earl of Northumberland, with his ſon Hotſpur Piercy, and his brother the earl of Weſtmoreland, at the head of ſuch a numerous body of forces, that Henry's ſmall retinue was increaſed to an army of ſixty thouſand men. Lancaſter now took a ſolemn oath, that his ſole deſign in this invaſion was that of recovering the dutchy of Lancaſter, unjuſtly detained from him. At the ſame time, he invited all his friends in England, and all lovers of equity and their country, to ſecond him in this reaſonable and moderate pretenſion. The duke of York, who was left guardian of the realm during the king's abſence, aſſembled an army of forty thouſand men, and marched at their head to St. Albans; but upon reviewing his forces, the ſoldiers declared to a man, that they would not draw a ſword againſt Henry of Lancaſter. The guardian himſelf did not, indeed, ſeem to be well affected to the cauſe he had undertaken to defend: he made no difficulty of declaring, that he would ſecond his nephew in recovering his juſt rights. It is, therefore, no wonder that he liſtened to a meſſage ſent him by Henry, who intreated him not to oppoſe a loyal and humble ſupplicant in the recovery of his legal patrimony. The guardian was ſo far from oppoſing, that he joined the party of Henry; and his ſoldiers followed the example of their leader with the utmoſt acclamations of joy.

Lancaſter was now maſter of the kingdom; and marched directly to Briſtol, where ſome of Richard's miniſters had ſhut themſelves up, in order to defend the fortreſs againſt the attempts of an enemy whoſe favour they had no hopes of obtaining. The garriſon, however, made but a poor defence; they ſoon ſurrendered; and Henry, yielding to the requeſt of the people, ordered the earl of Wiltſhire, Sir John Buſſy, and Sir John Green, who were taken priſoners, to be executed immediately, without even the form of a trial. An act of barbarity which at once ſufficiently diſplays the ferocious manners of the times, and the injuſtice of Henry's proceedings.

Richard no ſooner received intelligence of this invaſion, than he haſtened over from Ireland, and landed in Milford-haven with a body of twenty thouſand men. But his ſoldiers, like the reſt of their brethren, were ſo ſtrongly attached to the fortunes of Henry of Lancaſter, that his army melted away like ſnow before the ſun; and Richard ſoon perceived that he was in no condition of meeting the enemy. Diſtracted with a variety of thoughts, he knew not what courſe to purſue. Wavering and irreſolute, he knew not whom to truſt, or whom to fear. At length he determined to deſert his forces, and take refuge in Wales. Accordingly he retired, with the dukes of Exeter and Surry, the biſhop of Carliſle, and a few other attendants, to Conway-caſtle; propoſing to take the firſt opportunity of embarking for Ireland or France, and there wait for ſome favourable criſis of recovering his crown, which he was now incapable of defending.

Senſible of his danger, ſhould Richard find means to execute his deſign, Henry diſpatched the earl of Northumberland, with the ſtrongeſt profeſſions of loyalty and ſubmiſſion; and that nobleman, by the moſt infamous treachery and falſe oaths, made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon, and carried him to his enemy at Flint caſtle. Lancaſter loſt no time in conveying his royal captive to London, where he was received with the moſt barbarous inſults, and committed to the Tower. But though Lancaſter had acquired poſſeſſion of the perſon of his ſovereign, he was very uneaſy with regard to the beſt method of diſpoſing of that unfortunate monarch, and ſeveral councils were held on that ſubject. At laſt it was reſolved to perſuade Richard to make a formal reſignation of his power, and to procure an authentic confirmation of the deed by the parliament. For ſome time Richard refuſed to ſubmit to ſo humiliating a circumſtance; but at laſt, finding himſelf abandoned by all his friends, and ſenſible of his incapacity to reſiſt the torrent of popular hatred, or, perhaps, deſirous of gaining time to ſave his life, and procure aſſiſtance from France, Richard ſubmitted; and, in the preſence of a great number of lords aſſembled on the occaſion, the king ſurrendered up the crown, ſceptre, and other enſigns of royalty; and then taking the ſignet-ring from his finger, he preſented it to the duke of Lancaſter. At the ſame time, he deſired the archbiſhop of York, and the biſhop of Hereford, to notify to the parliament his reſignation of the crown; and to acquaint them, that he wiſhed his couſin, the duke of Lancaſter, might be choſen his ſucceſſor.

But Henry, well knowing that this reſignation would plainly appear the reſult of force, he propoſed, notwithſtanding the danger of the precedent to himſelf and his poſterity, to have the king ſolemnly depoſed in parliament, for his pretended tyranny and miſconduct. Accordingly a charge, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, was drawn up againſt him, and preſented to that aſſembly; who, without examining one of the articles, though many of them were falſe in fact, and though all of them turned chiefly on arbitrary acts, of which the late reign furniſhed many ſtronger examples; the barons, though guilty themſelves of ſo many illegal violences, unanimouſly, and with the conſent of the Commons, depoſed their ſovereign. Nor was there found more than one man who had courage and virtue ſufficient to ſtand up, and plead in defence of his unhappy maſter. This was the biſhop of Carliſle, who nobly ſuſtained the cauſe of fallen majeſty, amidſt this univerſal diſloyalty and violence. But his eloquence was exerted in vain; and Lancaſter, exaſperated at the bold truths he uttered, ſent him priſoner to the Tower.

The crown was now declared vacant: upon which the duke of Lancaſter aroſe from his ſeat; and after croſſing himſelf on his forehead and breaſt, and calling upon the name of Chriſt, he declared, "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit," that the vacant throne belonged to him, as the deſcendant of Henry III. and "through the right which God had ſent him, with the aſſiſtance of his friends, to recover a kingdom which was on the point of being ruined by miſconduct and oppreſſion."

In order the better to conceive the meaning of theſe perplexed and obſcure expreſſions, it muſt be obſerved, that Henry of Lancaſter, ſuppoſing the throne really vacant, was not the immediate heir. The duke of Clarence, the elder brother of the late duke of Lancaſter, had left a grandſon, whoſe title was therefore preferable to that of Henry. He therefore went back as far as Henry III. in order to avail himſelf of an abſurd but popular tradition, which ſuppoſed that Edmund, earl of Lancaſter, ſon to Henry III. was really the elder brother of Edward I. but that, by reaſon of ſome deformities in his perſon, he had been poſtponed in the ſucceſſion, and his younger brother impoſed upon the nation in his ſtead. This pretence was, however, deſtitute of the leaſt foundation; but the parliament made no inquiry; the moſt palpable abſurdities would have paſſed for truths; and Henry was placed on the throne of England.

The unfortunate Richard did not long ſurvive the loſs of his crown; he ſoon fell a victim to the lawleſs ambition of his enemies; but the manner of his death is uncertain. Fabian tells us, that Sir Piers Exton, and others of his guards, fell upon him in the caſtle of Pontefract, where he was confined; and that Richard, wreſting a pole-axe out of the hand of one of the aſſaſſins, defended himſelf ſo nobly, that he put four of them to death before they could finiſh their bloody purpoſe. But it is more probable, that he was ſtarved to death in priſon; becauſe his body was expoſed in public, and no marks of violence were obſerved upon it. He died in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign.

Richard was a very weak prince, and entirely incapable of holding the reins of government in theſe ferocious times, when the utmoſt diſorder and licentiouſneſs had ſpread themſelves through the whole kingdom. In more peaceable ages, he might have ſwayed the ſceptre without incurring the hatred, perhaps with the applauſe of his people. But every thing was hoſtile during this period; and the genius and abilities of his father were ſcarce ſufficient to curb the licentiouſneſs of his ferocious nobility. Richard ſunk in the unequal conteſt. But all the evils which have been imputed to his government, ſeem to have proceeded leſs from a ſettled deſign of eſtabliſhing arbitrary power, than from the inſolence of victory, and the neceſſities of the king's ſituation. Richard left no poſterity, either legitimate or illegitimate.

HENRY IV. ſurnamed of BOLINGBROKE.

The firſt of the LANCASTER LINE that filled the Engliſh throne.

A. D. 1399. THE uſurpation of Henry was ſo palpable, and the right of Edmund Mortimer, earl of Marche, ſo clear and evident, that all the courage, capacity, and diſcernment of the new monarch, were neceſſary to prevent the diſorders that attended the commencement of his reign. The ſeſſion of parliament, which met on the ſixth of October, had hardly finiſhed the buſineſs of ſettling the kingdom, before a conſpiracy was formed to deprive Henry of a crown to which he had no legal claim. Several of the principal nobility of the kingdom were engaged in this deſign; and in order to render their undertaking ſucceſsful, they prevailed on one Maudlin, a prieſt, who greatly reſembled Richard both in ſhape and features, to perſonate that unfortunate prince, when their ſcheme was ripe for execution.

The conſpirators were perſuaded, that it would not be difficult to ſurprize Henry, who was then in a bad ſtate of health at Windſor, attended by a few of his nobility. It was therefore agreed, in order to aſſemble a ſufficient number of perſons without ſuſpicion, to propoſe a tilting-match of twenty on a ſide, to be held at Oxford. Henry was to be invited to be a ſpectator of this manly exerciſe. If he accepted the invitation, they imagined it would be very eaſy to ſeize his perſon: if he refuſed it, they were to march ſecretly to Windſor-caſtle, where they flattered themſelves with obtaining an eaſy admittance.

A. D. 1400. Every particular was conducted with the utmoſt precaution, and on the point of being carried into execution, when Henry diſcovered the whole deſign by the treachery of the earl of Rutland. The king perceived his danger, and ſuddenly withdrew to London; and the conſpirators, who came to Windſor with a body of five hundred horſe, found that they were betrayed. The inſurgents were ſeized, and executed without any trial, conformable to the practices of theſe ferocious times, and which will always be the cuſtom when violence ſtifles the voice of law and equity. The earl of Rutland now exhibited the moſt ſhocking ſpectacle to every one who was not totally deſtitute of the common feelings of humanity. He preſented to Henry, as a teſtimony of his return to loyalty, the head of lord Spencer, his brother-in-law. The infamous Rutland, who thus diſhonoured his birth by ſo baſe an action, had been inſtrumental in the death of his uncle, the duke of Glouceſter; and had deſerted Richard, by whom he had been truſted, and from whom he had received the greateſt marks of friendſhip and eſteem. The moſt deteſtable perfidies are conſtantly committed by thoſe who have no other rule of conduct than their own intereſt.

Henry ſaw all the danger of his ſituation, and well knew, that the late executions muſt give riſe to animoſities that are always dangerous to the royal authority; and therefore determined, if poſſible, to gain the clergy over to his party. It was ſuſpected that he had imbibed all the principles of his father in favour of the Lollards; but he now made no difficulty of ſacrificing his principles to his intereſt. He cauſed a law to be paſſed by the parliament, whereby it was enacted, that when any heretic, who relapſed, or refuſed to abjure his opinions, was delivered over to the ſecular arm by the biſhop or his commiſſaries, he ſhould be committed to the flames by the civil magiſtrate, before the whole people. This ſanguinary ſtatute was the ſource of additional diſtreſs to the people, who were already ſufficiently acquainted with misfortunes. Nor was it long before ſo execrable a law was carried into execution. William Soutre, rector of St. Oſithes, in London, having embraced the doctrines of Wickliff, was condemned by the ſynod of Canterbury, and the unhappy man periſhed in the flames for his opinions.

The unſettled ſtate of the Engliſh government encouraged Glendour, a deſcendant of the ancient princes of Wales, to make incurſions into the Engliſh territories. A troubleſome and tedious war was kindled, which the Welſh prince long ſuſtained by his valour and activity, aſſiſted by the natural ſtrength of that country, and the untamed ſpirit of the inhabitants. In one of theſe encounters, the earl of Marche, who had armed his followers in defence of Henry, was taken priſoner. But notwithſtanding his loyalty, Henry ſuffered him to remain in captivity; nor would he permit the earl of Northumberland to ranſom him, though he owed his crown to the aſſiſtance of that powerful family.

A. D. 1401. The Scots alſo took advantage of the diſorders of England, and committed dreadful ravages in the northern counties. The largeſt diviſion of the enemy, conſiſting of twelve thouſand men, was headed by Archibald, earl of Douglas. Hotſpur Piercy attacked the invaders at Homeldon, or Halydown-hill; and after a furious engagement, obtained a complete victory. Above ſeven thouſand Scots were killed on the field of battle; and the earls of Douglas, Fife, Angus, Athol, and Montieth, with a great number of other officers of diſtinction, were taken priſoners. Henry no ſooner received intelligence of this victory, than he wrote a letter, full of the warmeſt expreſſions of gratitude, to the earl and his ſon; but at the ſame time, ſtrictly enjoined them not to ranſom any of their priſoners. This was regarded as an arbitrary uſurpation of power; all priſoners being, by the laws of war, which then prevailed, the ſole property of the victors.

A. D. 1403. The family of Northumberland were highly exaſperated at this command of Henry, who owed his crown chiefly to their power. Thomas Piercy, earl of Worceſter, brother to the earl of Northumberland, had other cauſes to excite his reſentment. He had been made vice-chamberlain and admiral by Richard: he loved the perſon of his old maſter and benefactor while living, retained a grateful ſenſe of his benefits after his death, and could not but deteſt Henry, as the author of his murder, and the uſurper of his crown. He therefore joined his brother, to drive from the throne a perſon who had no title to fill it, and whoſe power was founded on the blood of his maſter. Preparations were accordingly made by the powerful family of the Piercies for wreſting the ſceptre from the hands of Henry. An alliance was concluded with Glendour; and Hotſpur offered earl Douglas his liberty without ranſom, if he would join the Northumberland army; a propoſal which that martial nobleman very readily accepted, as he had long borne an inveterate hatred to the whole houſe of Lancaſter.

An army was ſoon aſſembled; but before the troops were ready to take the field, the earl of Northumberland was ſeized with a ſudden illneſs at Berwick, and the chief command devolved upon Hotſpur Piercy, who led his forces to Shrewſbury, in order to join the troops of Glendour. Piercy now ſent a manifeſto to Henry; in which he renounced his allegiance, and ſet that prince at defiance. He likewiſe enumerated all the grievances of which the nation ſo loudly complained, and which he was now determined to redreſs. He accuſed Henry of perjury: for ſoon after his landing at Ravenſpur, he had ſworn upon the goſpels, in preſence of the earl of Northumberland, that his ſole intention was that of recovering poſſeſſion of the dutchy of Lancaſter, and that he would ever remain a faithful ſubject to king Richard. He aggravated his guilt in firſt dethroning, and then murdering that prince; and in uſurping upon the title of the houſe of Mortimer, to whom the crown juſtly belonged, both by lineal deſcent, and the declaration of parliament. He complained loudly of the cruelty exerciſed againſt the earl of Marche, who was ſuffered to remain a captive in the hands of the enemy, nor were any of his friends permitted to treat for his ranſom. He charged him with perjury in loading the nation with heavy taxes; after having ſworn, that, without the utmoſt neceſſity, he would never levy any impoſitions upon his people.

Henry anſwered this manifeſto, in order to exculpate himſelf from the crimes with which he was charged; and accuſed the Piercies, in his turn, of having excited an unnatural rebellion againſt the eſtabliſhed government; and againſt him, who had, on all occaſions, diſtinguiſhed them from the reſt of his ſubjects by every act of munificence and friendſhip that a ſovereign could beſtow upon his moſt favourite counſellors. He offered to lay aſide every privilege of prerogative, to grant the Piercies a ſafe conduct, and ſuffer them to lay all their complaints before their peers, where they ſhould be candidly heard, and, if well founded, both theirs and the public grievances redreſſed.

But Henry was not to learn, that remonſtrances were of very little uſe among his ferocious nobility; and fortunately for him, he had, at that time, an army, which had been aſſembled againſt the Scots, ready to take the field. Piercy, who did not ſo ſoon expect to be oppoſed by a royal army, was obliged to abandon the ſiege of Shrewſbury, which he had juſt inveſted, and prepare for an engagement. He encamped at Hartlefield, where he reſolved to hazard a battle, though he had not yet been joined by Glendour's forces. The great bravery of the two leaders promiſed an obſtinate conteſt for the palm of victory; and the equality of the two armies, each being about twelve thouſand men, a number which rendered them not unmanageable by the commanders, gave ſufficient reaſon to expect, that the field of battle would be deluged with the blood of the contending parties.

The ſhock was at once both dreadful and conſtant. Henry's infantry at firſt gave ground, and the whole army would have been thrown into confuſion, had not the impetuous valour of Piercy and Douglas given the royaliſts an opportunity of rallying. Theſe two chiefs fought ſide by ſide, and opened themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where the royal ſtandard was erected, and where they knew Henry fought in perſon, both contending who ſhould have the honour of encountering the royal warrior. Piercy ſupported that renown which he had acquired in ſo many bloody combats; and Douglas, his ancient enemy, and now his friend, ſtill appeared his rival amidſt the horrors and confuſion of the battle. Their ardour, however, proved fatal to their cauſe: they charged with ſuch deſperate fury, and pierced with ſuch rapidity the ranks of the enemy, that few of their men could follow them. They were ſoon ſurrounded by heaps of dead bodies, and the royal ſtandard was thrown to the ground. Nor did Henry flinch from the ſtorm of battle; he expoſed his perſon in the thickeſt of the fight. His gallant ſon, whoſe military atchievements afterwards became ſo famous, and who here performed his apprenticeſhip in arms, followed the example of his father; and even a wound, which he received in the face with an arrow, could not oblige him to quit the field. Henry, however, in order either to elude the attacks of the enemy upon his perſon, or to encourage his own men by the belief that he was preſent every where, had dreſſed ſeveral perſons in the royal garb; and the ſword of Douglas, who ſeemed determined that the king of England ſhould fall by his arm, rendered that honour fatal to many. But while both armies were contending in this furious manner, Piercy fell by an unknown hand. This accident decided the victory in favour of the royaliſts. Above two thouſand five hundred gentlemen are ſaid to have periſhed in that ſanguinary conteſt; but the perſons of the moſt diſtinction in the royal army were the earl of Stafford, Sir Hugh Shirley, Sir Nicholas Ganſel, Sir Hugh Mortimer, Sir John Maſſey, and Sir John Caverly. About ſix thouſand private men periſhed, of whom two thirds belonged to Piercy's army. The earls of Worceſter and Douglas were taken priſoners; the former was beheaded at Shrewſbury, but the latter diſmiſſed without ranſom, on account of his valour.

During theſe tranſactions the earl of Northumberland, being recovered from his illneſs, was advancing at the head of a very conſiderable body of troops to reinforce his ſon's army; but hearing of the total defeat of Piercy's forces, and that the king was advancing againſt him at the head of his victorious troops, he ſhut himſelf up in Warkworth caſtle. He afterwards diſmiſſed his army, and came to the king at York. Northumberland pretended that his ſole intention of raiſing an army was to mediate a peace between the two parties, and Henry, unwilling to drive ſo powerful a nobleman to deſpair, admitted his apology, and granted him a pardon. At the ſame time he publiſhed a proclamation, requiring all his ſubjects to deſiſt from plundering the eſtates and houſes of the rebels, and even to reſtore what they had forcibly carried away.

A. D. 1405. Notwithſtanding the defeat of the army of the Piercies, and the death of the earl of Worceſter and Henry Hotſpur, that family were ſtill in great credit with the public, their ſufferings acquired them an additional eſteem. Thomas Mowbray, earl of Nottingham, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, whom Henry, while only duke of Hereford, had accuſed of high-treaſon, and by that means procured his perpetual baniſhment, and Richard Scroope, archbiſhop of York, ſtill continued to harbour an implacable rancour againſt Henry. The duke of Northumberland alſo, who well knew that he ſhould never be cordially forgiven, was ſtill determined to procure redreſs for the wrongs his family had received. Accordingly he joined theſe malecontents, and a plan was concerted for taking the field againſt Henry. The conſpiracy ſoon after received an additional ſtrength by the junction of the lords Bardolf, Haſtings, and Fauconbridge, and a great number of gentlemen of figure and fortune in their reſpective counties. The earl of Northumberland viſited the courts of France and Scotland, in order to prevail upon thoſe powers to ſupport the confederates and wreſt from the hand of Henry the ſceptre of England. He was received with the utmoſt reſpect, and met with great encouragement in his negotiation. The hopes of foreign aſſiſtance gave new life to the conſpiracy, and a plan was formed for making an inſurrection in the north, while the French, not only made a deſcent in Wales, but alſo laid ſiege to the moſt important places belonging to the Engliſh on the continent. Glendour alſo joined the confederacy, which now became truly alarming.

Henry was not idle in endeavouring to break the force of the gathering ſtorm. He ſent an army into Wales, under the command of his ſon, who attacked one of Glendour's detachments, and obtained a complete victory. The conſpirators now perceived that Henry was no ſtranger to their intentions, and precipitately took the field, before the earl of Northumberland was ready to join their army. A manifeſto was alſo publiſhed by the archbiſhop of York againſt Henry, in which he reproached that prince with his uſurpation of the crown, and the murder of the late king; requiring that the right line ſhould be reſtored, and all the public grievances redreſſed.

The earl of Weſtmoreland, aſſiſted by ſeveral noblemen of conſiderable power in the north, having been appointed to watch the Scottiſh marches, no ſooner heard of this inſurrection, than he advanced at the head of his forces, hoping to ſurpriſe the rebels before they were prepared for defence. He was deceived; for on his reaching Shipton-Moor, he perceived the inſurgents, amounting to ſeventeen thouſand men, drawn up in excellent order, and ready to engage. Weſtmorland, not being able to give the enemy battle, had recourſe to negotiation, and prevailed upon the archbiſhop and the earl of Nottingham to lay down their arms, and ſubmit themſelves to the government. The inſurgents, who had juſt received advice that Henry himſelf was within three days march, at the head of a powerful army, and that it would be impoſſible for the earl of Northumberland to join them before the royal body of forces arrived, agreed to the propoſals, and diſbanded their troops.

But Henry refuſed to confirm the terms offered by Weſtmorland; he determined to make thoſe mutinous leaders feel the weight of his reſentment. But knowing that the trial of the archbiſhop, if conducted in the uſual form, would prove both troubleſome and tedious, and that the celerity of the execution alone could render it ſafe and prudent, he determined to follow the ferocious cuſtoms of the age, and put the prelate to death, without the form of a trial. He accordingly applied to Sir William Gaſcoigne, the chief juſtice, to paſs the ſentence of high-treaſon on the archbiſhop. But Gaſcoigne refuſed to act contrary to the laws of his country. Sir William Fulthorpe was therefore appointed a judge on this occaſion; who, without any indictment, trial or defence, condemned the prelate to ſuffer death. Nor was the execution of the ſentence delayed; the archbiſhop immediately ſuffered in a very ignominious manner. This was the firſt inſtance in England of a capital ſentence being inflicted on a dignitary of the church. The earl of Nottingham, Sir John Lamplugh, and Sir Robert Plumpton, ſuffered at the ſame time. The pope was ſo highly incenſed at this alarming attack on the privileges of the church, that he pronounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all who were concerned in the death of the archbiſhop; and it was with great difficulty that Henry, by the prevailing eloquence of large ſums of money, procured abſolution.

The news of this defeat no ſooner reached the ears of the earl of Northumberland, than he fled into Scotland, together with lord Bardolf; and Henry ſoon reduced all the caſtles belonging to theſe noblemen. But the unfortunate earl did not long enjoy the benefit of this aſylum; an event ſoon after happened which obliged him to ſeek his ſafety on the continent. Robert III. king of Scotland, was by no means qualified to hold the ſceptre in theſe ferocious times. He was a prince of a ſlender capacity, but extremely innocent and inoffenſive; virtues which were then ſo far from being admired, that they rendered him contemptible. His brother, the duke of Albany, a prince of a more violent and boiſterous diſpoſition, aſſumed the reins of government; and deſirous of rendering his power perpetual, he threw David, the eldeſt ſon of Robert, into priſon, where he was inhumanly ſtarved to death. James, a younger brother of David, was now the only obſtacle that oppoſed the tyrant from mounting the throne on the death of his brother. Senſible of his ſon's danger, Robert embarked him on board a ſhip, in order to ſend him into France, not doubting but he would there find ſufficient protection from that friendly power. But Robert was deſtined to misfortunes: the ſhip was taken by the Engliſh, and Henry, notwithſtanding the truce which ſubſiſted between the two crowns, refuſed to reſtore the young prince to liberty. Worn out with grief and infirmities Robert was unable to ſupport this laſt misfortune. He ſunk under the weight of his diſtreſs, and left the government in the hands of his brother. Henry now ſaw all the importance of his acquiſition: the duke of Albany was entirely dependent on the Engliſh monarchy; becauſe a ſingle attempt to prejudice the intereſt of Henry would be ſufficient to pull him from throne. James was about nine years of age when he was firſt brought to London; and if any thing could atone for this breach of faith; it was the excellent education which Henry beſtowed upon him, and which afterwards fitted him for filling the throne of his anceſtors with great applauſe. It is not natural to think, that the duke of Albany would, in theſe circumſtances, venture to protect a nobleman ſo obnoxious to Henry as the earl of Northumberland; and he accordingly retired to France.

A. D. 1407. But that nobleman, impatient of exile, landed in the north of England with lord Bardolf, hoping his preſence would be ſufficient to rouſe the Engliſh to arms. He was not wholly miſtaken; he was joined by a party of Scottiſh free-booters; and as he advanced his little army conſiderably increaſed. Pleaſed to find the inhabitants had not yet loſt their affections for his family, he continued his march; made himſelf maſter of ſeveral caſtles which had been reduced after the fatal battle of Shrewſbury; and appointed Thirſk in Yorkſhire, the general rendezvous of his army. The government was alarmed at the great ſucceſs which had attended the beginning of Northumberland's inſurrection; but there was now no royal army ready to march againſt the rebels. Sir Thomas Rokeſby, ſheriff of Yorkſhire, thought it his duty to ſtop the progreſs of the inſurgents, and accordingly raiſed a conſiderable body of forces, and advanced to meet them. The earl of Northumberland was equally deſirous of coming to an action with the ſheriff, perſuaded that if he could defeat Rokeſby's forces, he ſhould not only diſappoint Henry of ſo eſſential a reinforcement, but alſo, by this ſucceſs, engage the city and county of York to declare in his favour. Accordingly he put his army in motion, and met Rokeſby on Beaham-Moor, where a bloody engagement enſued, in which the rebels, after an obſtinate reſiſtance, were totally routed, and both the earl of Northumberland and lord Bardolf fell in the conteſt. This fortunate event, together with the death of Glendour, which happened ſoon after, freed Henry from all his domeſtic enemies. No more attempts were made to tear the laurel from his brow; he enjoyed the crown he had uſurped without any farther oppoſition from the friends of the late unfortunate Richard.

But though Henry had no domeſtic enemy to contend with, his days were embittered as a parent by the irregular courſes of the prince of Wales. He was now in the full vigour of youth, and of an active, ſprightly ſpirit. While he was employed in the field, no actions of an immoral tendency ſtained his character. But a life of indolence was not at all agreeable to his nature. The diſtruſt and jealouſy of his father having removed him from all ſhare in the public buſineſs, he plunged himſelf, with the utmoſt violence, into all the extravagances of debauchery, and bluſhed not for a conduct the moſt diſorderly and licentious. But his outrages proceeded leſs from a depraved diſpoſition, than the violence of his temper, which being not directed to uſeful objects, induced him to give full ſcope to his paſſions. But many gleams of ſpirit and magnanimity were obſerved to break through the cloud which a wild conduct had thrown over his character.

A. D. 1412. One of young Henry's favourites having been indicted for ſome miſdemeanor, was condemned, notwithſtanding all the intereſt the prince, who was preſent at the trial, could make in his favour. Young Henry was ſo incenſed at the iſſue, that he ſtruck Sir William Gaſcoigne, the judge, as he ſat upon the bench. But the magiſtrate was not to be intimidated; he acted with a ſpirit ſuitable to his character, and inſtantly ordered the prince into cuſtody. This ſally of paſſion in the prince was immediately ſucceeded by a noble return of reaſon; he ſuffered himſelf, with the utmoſt reſignation, to be conducted to priſon by the officers of juſtice. When the king was informed of this tranſaction, he ſaid, "I thank God I have a judge poſſeſſed of ſo much courage to execute the laws, and of a ſon endowed with ſo much obedience, as to ſubmit to ſuch chaſtiſement."

During the reign of Henry the parliamentary proceedings deſerve more attention than thoſe relating either to military or foreign tranſactions. The commons had now attained a very conſiderable ſhare of importance, and it became an object of policy to direct their election. This circumſtance had been complained of during the preceding reign, and was made one of the articles of the charge againſt Richard; but it continued ſtill unredreſſed. Henry purſued the ſame meaſures he had ſo ſeverely cenſured in his predeceſſor. He was, however, obliged to court popularity, and this gave the commons an opportunity of aſſuming powers they had not hitherto ventured to exerciſe. They required the king to diſmiſs from his houſhold four officers who had diſpleaſed them, among whom was his own confeſſor. Henry complied with their requeſt, but declared he knew no crime theſe officers had committed. They appointed treaſurers to attend to the diſburſement of a ſubſidy which they had granted to the king, and ordered them to deliver in their accounts to the houſe. They propoſed regulations for the government; and obliged the judges, and all the officers of the council, to ſwear to the obſervance of them. But their attempts with regard to the church were ſtill more important. They adviſed the king to ſeize all the temporalities of the clergy, and apply the money to the exigences of the ſtate. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, who attended the king when this addreſs was preſented, remonſtrated againſt it in the ſtrongeſt manner. He aſſerted that the clergy were the principal ſupport of the ſtate; that though they went not in perſon to the wars, they ſent their vaſſals and tenants in all caſes of neceſſity; while, at the ſame time, they themſelves who ſtaid at home, were employed night and day, in offering up their prayers for the happineſs and proſperity of the ſtate. The ſpeaker ſmiled, and replied without reſerve, that he thought the prayers of the church but a ſlender ſupply. The king, however, unwilling to offend ſo powerful a body of men as the clergy, refuſed the petition. According to a calculation made by the commons, the clergy poſſeſſed a third of the lands in England, and their yearly revenue amounted to no leſs than four hundred eighty-five thouſand marks a year. This addreſs, though refuſed, alarmed both the king and the clergy. It was ſufficiently evident that the doctrines of Wickliffe had ſpread prodigiouſly among the people, and it was therefore thought neceſſary to put the laws in execution againſt the Lollards. Accordingly ſeveral of them were ſent to priſon, and one committed to the flames even while the parliament were ſitting. But theſe rigorous meaſures anſwered not the intention of the clergy. Perſecution always tends to increaſe the numbers of any religious ſect; and the ſufferings of the Lollards augmented their diſciples: the aſhes of one victim, ſcattered by the breath of reformation, became the ſeeds of thouſands.

A. D. 1413. Henry had for ſome time employed himſelf in fomenting the diviſions which prevailed between the families of Burgundy and Orleans, by which the government of France was then ſo much diſtracted. He even meditated important deſigns againſt that kingdom; but he lived not to carry his deſigns into execution. His health had, for ſome months, been viſibly declining: he was ſubject to fits, which for a time bereaved him of his ſenſes: and though he was yet in the flower of his age, his end was viſibly approaching. He was naturally of a peeviſh and jealous diſpoſition, which was now greatly increaſed, and he too readily liſtened to the vile ſuggeſtions of his courtiers, who inſinuated that his eldeſt ſon had formed unnatural deſigns upon his life and crown. The breaſt of Henry was now filled with the moſt anxious fears and apprehenſions; he even removed the prince from his poſt of preſident of the council. Young Henry was greatly alarmed, and, fond as he was of pleaſure and diſſipation, he was ſtill very ſuſceptible of the nobler paſſions; and could not, without the moſt piercing anguiſh, reflect, that his own conduct had given too much reaſon for his enemies to aſperſe his character. But ſtill he knew himſelf innocent with regard to his having formed even a wiſh to the prejudice of his father's authority; and determined to purſue every method in his power to convince the king of his duty and loyalty.

He firſt received the euchariſt, dreſſed himſelf in a mourning habit, and repaired to court, in order to requeſt a private audience of the king. He was immediately admitted; and falling at his father's feet, expreſſed himſelf in the following manner;

"Moſt dread ſovereign, and honoured father, it gives me the moſt ſincere concern to find that I am ſuſpected by your highneſs of an unnatural deſign againſt your crown and perſon; which I, more than any other ſubject of your majeſty, am bound to reverence and defend. I confeſs, indeed, with ſhame and contrition, that my irregularities and exceſſes have given ſufficient cauſe for your diſpleaſure. But I call the Almighty, who knows the inmoſt ſecrets of the heart, and never fails to puniſh thoſe who dare to invoke him to ſanctify a falſhood, to witneſs, that I never harboured a ſingle thought inconſiſtent with that duty I owe your majeſty as my ſovereign and my father. Thoſe who charge me with contrary intentions, ſeek only to diſturb your tranquillity, and to alienate your affections from your ſon and ſucceſſor. I would willingly remove theſe anxieties from your mind; I came for no other purpoſe. Let me beſeech you, therefore, to let my actions be tried by the utmoſt rigour, with the ſame ſeverity as if I was the meaneſt of your ſubjects; and if I am found guilty, in any reſpect, of the atrocious crime laid to my charge; if I have ever uſed an expreſſion that indicated diſloyalty or want of affection, let me be puniſhed as the vileſt miſcreant that ever diſgraced the name of ſon or ſubject. I will readily ſubmit to any puniſhment you may think proper to inflict. I again, therefore, beſeech you, with the utmoſt humility, both for the eaſe of your own mind, and the vindication of your injured ſon, to iſſue the neceſſary orders for making the rigorous ſcrutiny I now demand."

The king was greatly affected with this free, ingenuous, and pathetic addreſs. He took the prince in his arms, embraced him with tears, aſſured him, that all his ſuſpicions were entirely removed, and that he would never, for the future, harbour a thought prejudicial to his loyalty and honour. He even promiſed, that in order to remove every ſuſpicion from the minds of all ingenuous perſons, he would give him the names of his accuſers, that they might be brought to juſtice in the enſuing parliament. But the return of his diſorder put a final period to the enquiry.

The dreadful fits by which he was ſo often attacked, ſoon impaired his ſenſes; and he had been ſo frequently in danger of loſing his crown, that his imagination ſeems to have been ſtrongly impreſſed with that idea, which increaſed as his ſtrength and reaſoning faculties decayed, even to a degree of childiſh anxiety. He would not ſleep unleſs the royal diadem was laid on his pillow. One day he remained ſo long in a ſwoon, that his ſervants thought him actually dead; and the prince took the crown from his pillow, and carried it into his own apartment. The king recovering the uſe of his ſenſes, and obſerving the diadem was removed, aſked who had dared to take it from his pillow? and being told that the prince had carried it away, he ordered him to be brought into his preſence. When young Henry appeared, the king, with an angry countenance, ſaid, "What! would you deprive me of my crown before my death?" "No," replied the prince, "I took it, thinking your majeſty was really dead, as my lawful inheritance; but now happily perceiving my miſtake, I return the diadem with far greater pleaſure than I took it." He accordingly re-placed the crown on the king's pillow; and having received his father's bleſſing, retired. A ſhort interval between the attacks of this dreadful diſeaſe inſpired Henry with the pleaſing hopes of recovery; and, agreeable to the cuſtom of that age of bigotry, he aſſumed the croſs, and made a ſolemn vow to heaven, to ſpend the remainder of his days in a war againſt the infidels, in order, if poſſible, to recover the Holy City from the enemies of the Chriſtian name. But he lived not to put his deſign in execution. He was ſeized with his laſt fit as he was paying his devotions before the ſhrine of St. Edward; and being carried into the Jeruſalem Chamber, belonging to the abbot of Weſtminſter, he expired, on the twentieth of March, in the forty-ſixth year of his age, and the thirteenth of his reign.

The crimes committed by Henry, in order to uſurp the ſeat of power, muſt be conſidered as perpetual ſtains on his memory by every man who makes the leaſt pretenſions to follow the dictates of conſcience, or the eternal precepts of the moral law. It may, indeed, be ſaid, that the injuſtice with which he had been treated by Richard, gave occaſion to his crimes: for, in all probability, he never would have uſurped the crown, if that monarch had not deprived him of his patrimony. But one crime cannot juſtify another. The murder of a king, his near relation, and the excluſion of the true heir from the throne, will always render the name of Henry of Lancaſter obnoxious to the virtuous and the good. He ſeemed, indeed, himſelf, to be ſufficiently conſcious of the turpitude of his crimes; and the uneaſineſs with which he poſſeſſed his envied greatneſs, and the ſtings of conſcience which he perpetually felt, cannot fail of rendering him an object of our pity, even when ſeated upon the throne. At the ſame time, it muſt be confeſſed, that he was endowed with many great and amiable qualities, which would have rendered him one of the greateſt monarchs that ever wore the diadem of England, had he not waded to the throne through the blood of his ſovereign. His prudence, his vigilance, and his foreſight, were admirable; his command of temper and preſence of mind remarkable; his courage, both military and political, free from fault. In a word, it was the flame of ambition that rendered Henry a tyrant, and the commiſſion of one crime made way for that of another.

Henry was twice married; firſt, while earl of Derby, to Mary, daughter of the earl of Hereford, by whom he had four ſons and two daughters.

1. Henry, ſurnamed of Monmouth, from the place of his birth, who ſucceeded his father in the throne.

2. Thomas, duke of Clarence.

3. John, duke of Bedford, afterwards regent of France.

4. Humphry, duke of Glouceſter, afterwards protector of England.

His daughters were,

1. Blanche, who married firſt the elector Palatine; ſecondly, the king of Arragon; and thirdly, the duke of Barr.

2. Philippa, married to Eric, king of Denmark and Norway.

Henry's ſecond wife was Joan, daughter to Charles I. king of Navarre, and widow of John Montfort, duke of Britany. By this princeſs he had no iſſue.

This period, like all the preceding, that of the great Alfred only excepted, furniſhes us with very few particulars relative to learning, and the arts adapted to excite either our curioſity or our admiration. It is, indeed, no wonder, that a proud, warlike, and ignorant nobility, encouraged only thoſe arts which proclaimed their dignity, diſplayed their wealth, or contributed to their ſecurity. They were magnificent without luxury, and pompous without elegance. Rich plate, even to the enamelling on gold, rich ſtuffs, and curious armour, were carried to exceſs; while their chairs were mere pedeſtals, their clothes incumbrances; and they knew no uſe of ſteel, but as it ſerved for ſafety or deſtruction. Their houſes (for there was no medium between caſtles and houſes) implied the dangers, not the ſweets of ſociety; and whenever peace left them at leiſure to think of modes, they ſeemed to imagine, that faſhion conſiſted in diſfiguring the human body, inſtead of augmenting its graces. While the men wore ſhoes ſo long and pecked, that they were forced to ſupport the points by chains from their middle; the ladies erected ſuch pyramids on their heads, that the face became the center of the body. It is, therefore, more amazing, that the arts exiſted at all in theſe times of Gothic barbarity, than that they attained no greater degree of perfection.

Some diſcoveries were, however, made during this period. We have, at the concluſion of the preceding book, mentioned the diſcovery of gunpowder by our learned countryman, friar Bacon. It was, however, applied to no farther uſe than that of exhibiting an uncommon natural phœnomenon, till about the year 1330, when Schwartz, a German monk of Cologne, either revived the invention of Bacon, or made this ſame diſcovery himſelf by accident; and imparted it immediately to the Venetians, who are ſaid to have firſt made uſe of it in a ſea-fight againſt the Genoeſe, in the year 1376. But if what many hiſtorians have aſſerted be true, namely, that Edward III. had a few pieces of cannon in his army at the battle of Crecy, in the year 1346, it will follow, that the Engliſh knew the uſe of gunpowder before the Genoeſe. But however that be, the making of gunpowder may be conſidered as one of the moſt ſingular diſcoveries that has ever been made in any age or country. It changed, by degrees, the whole art of war; and, in conſequence, many circumſtances in the political government of Europe. But the ignorance of that age in the mechanic arts greatly impeded the progreſs of this new invention. The artillery firſt framed were ſo clumſy, and of ſuch difficult management, that men were not immediately ſenſible of their uſe and efficacy; and even to the preſent times improvements have been continually making on this furious engine; which, though it ſeemed contrived for the deſtruction of mankind, and the overthrow of empires, has, in the iſſue, rendered war much leſs bloody, and, at the ſame time, given greater ſtability to civil ſocieties. Nations, by this means, have been brought more on a level; conqueſt has become leſs frequent and rapid; ſucceſs in war has been reduced nearly to be a matter of calculation; and any nation overmatched by its enemy, either yields to their demands, or ſecures itſelf by alliances againſt their violence and invaſion.

The art of weaving received very conſiderable improvements during this period, by the great encouragement given to our woollen and linen manufactures by Edward III. and the two ſucceeding kings. The art of painting alſo began to be eſteemed; it was chiefly performed on board or glaſs.

In the year 1344, the firſt regular gold coins were ſtruck in England, and were of three different kinds; one of ſix ſhillings value; a ſecond of three ſhillings; and a third of eighteen pence. About the ſame time alſo, the art of gauging, or the method of finding the contents of all kinds of veſſels, was invented. The firſt mention of clocks in England was in the year 1368, though they had been invented in the ninth century by Pacificus, archdeacon of Verona.

Few perſons remarkable for their learning flouriſhed during this period. The moſt remarkable, beſides the few hiſtorians, were John Wickliffe and William of Wickham.

Wickliffe may be juſtly regarded as the father of the reformation, as he was the firſt in Europe who ventured to bring religion to the teſt of ſcripture and eccleſiaſtical antiquity. The auſterity of his life, and the ſanctity of his manners, added great weight to his doctrine. He was indefatigable in his labours, and generally went about bare-footed, in the habit of a pilgrim. He tranſlated the New Teſtament from the vulgate. Calmet ſays he tranſlated the whole Bible; and that there were ſeveral manuſcripts of this tranſlation, but that it was never printed. He died at his rectory of Lutterworth, in Leiceſterſhire, in 1385.

William of Wickham was conſidered as one of the moſt learned perſons of his age; and it appears, that his great and uſeful talents, eſpecially his ſkill in architecture, recommended him to the favour of Edward III. He perſuaded that prince to pull down a great part of Windſor-caſtle, and rebuild it from his plan, in that plain magnificence in which it appears at preſent. He alſo drew the plan, and ſuperintended the building of Queenborough caſtle. He was afterwards made ſecretary of ſtate, and lord privy-ſeal, and enjoyed other accumulated preferments before he was promoted to the ſee of Wincheſter. He died on the twenty-ſeventh of September, 1404.

The moſt noted hiſtorians of this period were,

Thomas Wikes. His hiſtory begins at the Conqueſt, and ends with the death of Edward I. He was a canon regular of Oſney, near Oxford; and the part of his work which relates to the barons wars is clear and explicit. His hiſtory was publiſhed by Dr. Gale, in his Hiſt. Angl. vol. 2.

John Brompton, abbot of Joreval, in Yorkſhire, wrote a chronicle of the principal tranſactions of England. It was publiſhed among the Decem Scriptores. It begins with the coming of Auguſtine the monk, and ends with the death of Richard I.

Matthew, a Benedictine monk of Weſtminſter, finiſhed his hiſtory with the year 1307, and died ſoon after. But the work has been continued by ſeveral hands, eſpecially by Adam Merimath, a canon regular of St. Paul's, who devoted the latter part of his life to the ſtudy of Engliſh hiſtory.

From the acceſſion of Henry V. to the death of Henry VII.

HENRY V. ſurnamed of MONMOUTH.

A.D. 1413. THOUGH this prince, during the laſt years of his father's reign, had given a looſe to his paſſions, the people formed great expectations of happineſs under his adminiſtration. They had perceived many indications of a generous and noble ſpirit often darting with uncommon luſtre through the miſt of diſſipation. They were not deceived. He was hardly ſeated on the throne before his vices were changed into virtues. He called together his former aſſociates, and after exhorting them to imitate his example, and inhibiting them from appearing any more in his preſence if they continued their licentious conduct, he diſmiſſed them with liberal preſents. He publiſhed a general amneſty for all crimes already committed, except rape and murder. His new council was compoſed of the wiſeſt and moſt virtuous perſons in the kingdom: he made no diſtinction between thoſe who had adhered to Richard, and thoſe who had joined his father; he was deſirous of extinguiſhing all parties. He ſhewed a noble reſolution of reſtoring purity to the courts of juſtice, by diſplacing all thoſe who had not filled their poſts with integrity. Gaſcoigne, the chief juſtice, who trembled to approach the royal preſence, was received with the utmoſt marks of eſteem; his ſtrict and impartial execution of the laws was applauded, and inſtead of reproaches he was loaded with favours. "Perſevere," ſaid Henry, "in the ſame noble conduct, and ſupport the dignity of the laws of your country againſt all oppoſition." He treated the earl of Marche with ſo much attention and reſpect, that he forgot his right to the ſceptre of England, to which he had, by birth, an undoubted title. He reſtored the noble family of Piercy to their former honours and eſtates, and laboured ſincerely to bury all animoſities in the grave of oblivion.

But the party diſtinction with regard to religion continued to increaſe; all the abilities of Henry to reſtore the tranquillity of the church were exerted in vain. The ſect of the Lollards were every day increaſing in the kingdom, and ſeemed extremely dangerous to the church, and even formidable to the civil power. Sir John Oldcaſtle, ſtiled, in right of his wife, lord Cobham, was conſidered as the head of the Lollards. He was a perſon of great parts, invincible courage, and eminently diſtinguiſhed for his experience in military affairs; virtues which had greatly recommended him to the favour of Henry. The archbiſhop of Canterbury, who was highly incenſed againſt the Lollards, was deſirous of indicting lord Cobham, perſuaded that the leader of the party was the moſt proper victim of eccleſiaſtical ſeverity. But Cobham was too great a favourite with the king for the archbiſhop to proceed without his leave. He therefore waited upon Henry, and requeſted permiſſion to proceed againſt Sir John Oldcaſtle. The king, who was no friend to eccleſiaſtical ſeverity, repreſented to the primate, that reaſon and perſuaſion were the beſt means of ſupporting truth, and correcting error; that every gentle method ſhould be uſed in order to bring back theſe deluded people to the boſom of the church; and that he himſelf would endeavour to reconcile Cobham to the catholic faith. But Henry found that all his arguments were in vain; Cobham, though greatly attached to Henry, refuſed to ſacrifice truths of the utmoſt importance to conciliate the favour of majeſty; and the king gave the primate leave to proceed againſt him to the utmoſt extremity of the laws. The violence of eccleſiaſtical authority was now exerted, and the primate, aſſiſted by his three ſuffragans, the biſhops of London, Wincheſter, and St. David's, condemned Cobham to the flames; but he made his eſcape from the Tower, before the day appointed for his execution arrived.

A. D. 1414. Provoked by perſecution, and ſtimulated by zeal, Cobham formed a deſign for taking a ſevere revenge. He aſſembled his partizans, and began an open rebellion againſt the government. But the vigilance of Henry prevented the conſequences. Great numbers of the Lollards were ſeized, ſeveral of them executed, and the whole conſpiracy rendered abortive. Sir John Oldcaſtle himſelf made his eſcape, and was not brought to juſtice till four years after, when he was hanged as a traitor, and his body burnt on the gibbet, conformable to the ſentence pronounced againſt him as a heretic. This revolt diſcredited the party, and checked their progreſs. The parliament increaſed the rigours of the penal laws; but, at the ſame time, petitioned the king to ſeize the revenues of the clergy for the uſe of the crown. So great an effect had the principles of Wickliffe made on the minds of perſons, who were far from being friends to the enthuſiaſm of the Lollards. The clergy were ſufficiently alarmed; they offered the king all the revenues of the alien priories; but this, in all probability, would not have been ſufficient to divert the ſtorm, if the primate had not fortunately directed the attention of Henry to a very different object. He perſuaded him to undertake a war againſt France, in order to recover the provinces that had been wreſted from his anceſtors.

That kingdom was indeed now reduced to the moſt deplorable condition. Charles VI. had been ſeized with a fit of frenzy, which rendered him incapable of exerciſing his authority; and though he recovered from this diſorder, he was ſo ſubject to relapſes, that his ſenſes were gradually but inſenſibly impaired; ſo that he was incapable of purſuing any ſettled plan of government. This misfortune gave a full career to the rage of parties. The duke of Orleans, the king's brother, and the duke of Burgundy, his couſin-german, after ſuſtaining the moſt violent quarrels, by which the country had been deluged with the blood of its inhabitants, agreed to enter into a ſtrict friendſhip, and ſwore at the altar to the ſincerity of their intentions. But notwithſtanding they had invoked heaven as a witneſs between them, very little regard was paid to the ſacredneſs of their promiſe; the duke of Orleans was ſoon after aſſaſſinated in the ſtreets of Paris by order of the duke of Burgundy, who had the inſolence to avow openly and defend the juſtice of the action, which he termed tyrannicide. The dreadful conſequences of ſo vile a tenet were ſoon diſplayed. A reconciliation between the two parties was now impoſſible; the whole kingdom in general, and the capital pital in particular, became a moſt dreaful ſcene of blood and violence. The Burgundians and the Armagnaes, adherents to the young duke of Orleans, ſacrificed the intereſt of the ſtate to their ſanguinary revenge.

A. D. 1415. Henry took advantage of theſe confuſions; the inſtigations of the primate determined him on hoſtilities. In order, however, to conceal his real intentions, he ſent over a ſplendid embaſſy to France with the offer of a perpetual peace and alliance between the two crowns, but demanded in return, the French king's daughter in marriage, with two millions of crowns for her portion; the payment of one million ſix hundred thouſand, as the arrears of the late king John's ranſom; the immediate poſſeſſion, and full ſovereignty of Normandy, and the other provinces, which Philip Auguſtus had wreſted from the crown of England, together with the ſuperiority of Britany and Flanders.

The exorbitant nature of theſe demands, ſufficiently indicates, that Henry, notwithſtanding the diſtreſs of the French monarchy, never expected they could be granted. And the terms offered by that court, though greatly inferior, abundantly demonſtrate the conſciouſneſs of their melancholy condition. They agreed to give him the princeſs in marriage, with a portion of eight hundred thouſand crowns; to inveſt him with the entire ſovereignty of Guienne, and to annex to that province the counties of Perigord, Rovergne, Xaintonge, Angoumois, and other territories.

Theſe terms, however advantageous, were rejected by Henry, and he determined to erect his ſtandards in the fields of France, and attempt a conqueſt from which the example of his predeceſſors ought to have deterred him. The ardour of the nation to follow their ſovereign, exceeded his moſt ſanguine expectations, and freed him from any apprehenſions of his finances being inſufficient for the payment of his forces. The earl of Northumberland levied forty men at arms, and one hundred and twenty archers; the earl of Weſtmorland the ſame number; the earl of Warwick twenty men at arms and forty archers; the earl of Suffolk, the lords Zouch, Berkley, d'Arcy, Seymour, Roſs, and Willoughby, contributed four ſhips, one hundred and forty men at arms, and two hundred and eighty archers; and the reſt of the nobility in the ſame proportion.

But while the neceſſary preparations were making for this expedition, the earl of Cambridge, ſecond ſon to the late duke of York, conſpired to place the earl of Marche on the Engliſh throne; but the deſign was diſcovered, and Cambridge, together with the reſt of the conſpirators, condemned and executed. The earl of Marche, who was accuſed of having given encouragement to this enterprize, received a free pardon from the king, and was again admitted to his friendſhip.

The conſpiracy being thus terminated, Henry embarked his forces at Southampton, on board a fleet of fifteen hundred tranſports. His army conſiſted of ſix thouſand men at arms, with their followers, and twenty-four thouſand archers; the whole forming an army of about fifty thouſand men; among whom were the earls of Dorſet, Kent, Cornwall, Saliſbury, Huntingdon, and ſeveral others of the principal nobility. After a pleaſant paſſage, Henry landed at Caux in Normandy, a ſmall port in the mouth of the Seine, about three leagues from Harfleur, which he immediately beſieged. The place was commanded by the lord of Ercouteville, at the head of a numerous garriſon of veterans, who made a noble defence. But the artillery of the Engliſh forces made large breaches in the walls, and the governor agreed to ſurrender the place if not relieved by a certain time. The conditions were accepted, and all hoſtilities ceaſed; but the governor delaying, under various pretences, to open the gates, agreeable to the articles of capitulation, Henry ordered a general attack, and the place was taken by ſtorm, and all the garriſon, except a few gentlemen, whom the troops thought proper to ſpare, in order to profit by their ranſom, were put to the ſword.

The appearance of an Engliſh army, and the reduction of the ſtrong port of Harfleur, alarmed the whole French monarchy; private animoſities were for a time forgotten, and both parties joined in reſiſting an army whoſe progreſs threatened the deſtruction of the ſtate. The whole French nobility flew to arms, and a numerous army was immediately raiſed to check the progreſs of the invaders. The dauphin himſelf took the field in perſon, at the head of an army of fourteen thouſand men at arms, and was ſoon joined by the dukes of Berry, Orleans, Bourbon, and Brabant, the conſtable d'Albret, the counts of Nevers, Vendome, and Richemont, the flower of the French nobility, and above forty thouſand men, eager to ſignalize their loyalty to their king, and their valour againſt the invaders of their country.

The ſituation of the Engliſh army was very different. They had ſuffered greatly during the ſiege of Harfleur, by ſickneſs; two thouſand common ſoldiers, beſides a great number of perſons of diſtinction, had been carried off by a bloody flux, and many had been obliged to return to England, in order to recover their health by the aſſiſtance of the air of their natural climate. The diſtreſs of his people afflicted the heart of Henry; his fleet had been diſperſed by ſtorms; proviſions began to grow ſcarce in his camp, and the only reſource in his preſent condition, was to march his army by land to Calais, over a prodigious extent of land, in an enemy's country, and in the face of an army vaſtly ſuperior in numbers to his own. Henry ſaw all the dangers of his ſituation; but was determined to proceed. Accordingly he marched by ſlow and deliberate marches, that his own army might not be diſcouraged by the appearance of a precipitate flight, nor ſo frequently expoſed to the attacks of the light ſquadrons of the enemy. In this manner he continued his rout to the banks of the Somme, which he intended to paſs at the ford where Edward the third croſſed that ſtream, when reduced to a ſimilar ſituation by Philip de Valois. But he found the ford was now rendered impaſſable by a great number of ſharp ſtakes drove into the bed of the river, and the oppoſite bank ſtrongly guarded by numerous detachments of the enemy. He was therefore obliged to change his courſe, and was fortunate enough to ſeize by ſurprize a paſſage near St. Quintin, where his whole army paſſed with ſafety.

He, however, ſoon perceived that the paſſage of the Somme was not the only difficulty that oppoſed his intended march to Calais. He perceived, from the heights of Blangi, the whole French army, conſiſting of above an hundred thouſand men, drawn up on the plains of Agincourt, to oppoſe his paſſage. Henry's army was reduced to almoſt half the number that landed near Harfleur, and even theſe diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, and debilitated by ſickneſs and continual duty. In this alarming ſituation, Henry offered to ſacrifice his conqueſt of Harfleur for a ſafe paſſage to Calais; but the French generals were deaf to every propoſal for an accommodation; nothing leſs than the captivity of the whole Engliſh army would ſatisfy their ambition.

An engagement was now inevitable, and Henry employed every means that human prudence could ſuggeſt to inſpire the troops with courage for the approaching conteſt. He recalled to their remembrance the glorious actions of their predeceſſors in the fields of Crecy and Poictiers, againſt an amazing ſuperiority of the enemy. The ſoldiers caught the heroic ſentiments of their leader: the advantage of numbers was no longer regarded; they wiſhed only to be led againſt the French. Henry drew up his little army between two woods, which guarded each flank; and in that poſition waited for the attack of the enemy.

The French army was divided into three lines.

The firſt, beſides a great number of other troops, was compoſed of eight thouſand gentlemen, commanded by the conſtable d'Albret, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome, and Richemont, the famous marſhal Boucicaut, David Rambure, grand-maſter of the croſs-bow-men, and ſeveral other officers of diſtinction. The ſecond line was led by the duke of Alençon, aſſiſted by the duke of Barre, the counts of Vaudemont, Nevers, Salines, and Grand Pré. The third body was under the command of the counts of Marle, Dampmartin, Fauquenberg, and the ſieur de Lannoy.

Henry, while the French officers were employed in drawing up their troops, detached four hundred lances, to take poſt in a wood on the right; and alſo a party of two hundred and fifty archers to lay in ambuſh on the left, in a low meadow covered with buſhes. The right wing of Henry's army was commanded by the duke of York, aſſiſted by the lords Beaumont, Willoughby, and Fanhope. The center was commanded by Henry in perſon, attended by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, the earl-marſhal, the earl of Oxford, and the young earl of Suffolk. The rear, which conſiſted wholly of archers, and ſuch as were armed with ſpears, halberts, and bills, was led by the earl of Dorſet. The chief ſtrength of the Engliſh army conſiſted of infantry; and Henry, fearing that the French horſe would break them by the fury of the firſt charge, ordered the archers to fix into the ground piles, or ſtakes, pointed at both ends with iron, and ſix or ſeven feet long, in their front, and alſo on their flanks, or intervals between the horſe and foot. Theſe formed a kind of temporary fortification, behind which the archers were ſecure from the violent charge of the enemy's cavalry.

The two armies, ranged in order of battle, ſtood facing each other the greater part of the day; the Engliſh not caring to advance, leſt they ſhould loſe the advantage of the ground; nor the French, for fear of being more crowded together than they were already. At length Henry advanced at the head of his main diviſion, the two wings moving at the ſame time, till he came very near the village of Agincourt; when the French horſe moved forwards to attack the Engliſh archers. Upon which the latter halted, pitched their ſtakes, interweaving them together, and bending them a little towards the enemy. Guarded by this fence, they diſcharged a ſhower of arrows which nothing could reſiſt: the ranks were thinned, and the line thrown into great diſorder. The archers who lay in ambuſh among the buſhes of the meadow, charged the French in flank, and made a dreadful ſlaughter. The Engliſh took advantage of the enemy's diſorder, fell upon them with their battle-axes, and cut them to pieces, almoſt without reſiſtance. The conſtable perceiving the diſtreſs of his advanced party, haſtened to their aſſiſtance, but under terrible diſadvantages; for the ſoil being wet and miry, both horſe and foot moved with the greateſt difficulty; and continuing ſtill to preſs more cloſely upon one another, preſented a defenceleſs front to the Engliſh, who ſoon threw the whole line into irretrievable diſorder: their buſineſs was rather that of executioners than ſoldiers. The field was now covered with the diſmounted, the ſlain, and the wounded; men and horſes were blended in one dreadful confuſion. The conſtable himſelf, together with the principal commanders of the firſt line, were left dead on the field of battle. The whole body was totally defeated, and a general flight enſued.

The duke d'Alençon, at the head of the ſecond line, ſtood firm in an adjacent field; and, on perceiving the route of the firſt diviſion, advanced to repair the diſgrace of his countrymen. Henry met him at the head of his center, and a dreadful conteſt enſued, eſpecially round the king's perſon. D'Alençon, in order to ſnatch, if poſſible, the victory from the enemy, commanded eighteen French knights of approved valour to watch attentively the motions of the Engliſh monarch, and uſe their utmoſt efforts either to kill, or take him priſoner. But the genius of Henry ſaved him from this imminent danger. Animated with the amazing ſucceſs of his archers, and deſirous of diſtinguiſhing himſelf by actions worthy of an Engliſh monarch, the king alighted from his horſe, and advanced, at the head of his diviſion, with a confidence which ſeemed to inſure the victory. He charged the enemy with ſuch fury as was almoſt irreſiſtible, and was met by d'Alençon with a ſpirit worthy of his rank. He received the attack with a firmneſs that deſerved a better fate. The French knights, who had never loſt ſight of Henry, cut themſelves a paſſage to the ſpot where he fought in perſon; and ruſhing upon him with the utmoſt violence, would, probably, have made themſelves maſters of his perſon, had not David Gam, a Welſh captain, and two other officers, perceiving the danger that threatened their ſovereign, flown to his aſſiſtance; and all the eighteen knights ſoon fell, breathleſs, on the field; but Gam, and his two gallant countrymen, were alſo mortally wounded. Henry, to ſhew his gratitude for their generous aſſiſtance, knighted them all as they lay on the field. Having paid this generous tribute of acknowledgment to merit and loyalty, Henry darted into the thickeſt part of the battle, to revenge the late attempt againſt his life; but his ardour and impetuoſity again involved him in the moſt imminent danger. His brother, the duke of Glouceſter, who had fought by his ſide, was ſtruck to the ground, and the enemy preſſed in crowds to avail themſelves of the incident. Henry was again ſurrounded by a hoſt of foes, but he was a ſtranger to fear: he covered the body of his brother with his ſhield, and defended him with his ſword. In this ſituation he received ſo violent a blow on his helmet with a battle-axe, that he fell on his knees, and would, poſſibly, have been ſeized by the enemy, had not the duke of York advanced to his aſſiſtance, at the head of the freſh body of troops. This intimidated the enemy; they fell back, and Henry and his brother had time to recover from their alarming ſituation. Another reinforcement immediately followed that led by the duke of York; and Henry again attacked the French with ſuch fury, that they were unable to ſupport the ſhock; they fell into diſorder, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued.

Driven to deſpair at ſeeing the defeat of his diviſion, d'Alençon made one furious effort, determined either to retrieve the battle, or ſpare himſelf the mortification of ſurviving the diſgrace of his country. He put himſelf at the head of a choſen band of volunteers; and cutting his way to the ſpot where Henry fought in perſon, ruſhed upon the monarch, killed the duke of York by his ſide, and, with a furious ſtroke of his ſword, cleft the crown on Henry's helmet. The monarch returned the ſalutation with ſuch violence, that he fell to the ground, and was immediately diſpatched by his followers. The death of D'Alençon completed the rout of his diviſion: they conſulted their ſafety in a precipitate and diſorderly flight.

All reſiſtance was now over. The third line of the French, indeed, ſtill ſtood firm, were more numerous than the whole Engliſh army, and might have renewed the battle with ſome proſpect of ſucceſs, had they not been ſeized with a general panic. But the deſtruction of their countrymen had deprived them of all thoughts of reſiſtance, and they retired from the field of battle without having exchanged a ſingle blow with the Engliſh. But the firſt line had now rallied themſelves, and ſeemed to advance with a reſolution of making another effort for the palm of victory. At the ſame time, ſome gentlemen of Picardy having collected about ſix hundred peaſants, had fallen on the Engliſh baggage, and were deſtroying the unarmed followers of the camp, who fled before them. Henry, on ſeeing the enemy both in his front and rear, began to entertain apprehenſions leſt his priſoners ſhould alſo join in the attempt to tear the wreath of laurel from his brow; and therefore thought it neceſſary to iſſue general orders for putting them to death; but, on diſcovering the real cauſe, he put a ſtop to the ſlaughter, and the greater part of them were preſerved.

This battle was fatal to France, on account of the great number of princes and nobility either ſlain or taken priſoners. Among the former was the conſtable d'Albret, the dukes of Brabant, Barre, and Alençon, the count of Marle, and the archbiſhop of Sens. Among the priſoners, the dukes of Orleans and Bourbon, the counts of Eu, Vendome, and Richemont, and the marſhal de Boucicaut, were the moſt remarkable. Henry was maſter of fourteen thouſand priſoners. Ten thouſand men are ſaid to have fallen in this battle; and as the ſlaughter fell chiefly on the cavalry, it was computed that eight thouſand of them were gentlemen. The Engliſh loſt only forty men; among whom the perſon of the greateſt note was the duke of York, whoſe death was more honourable than his life.

A public thankſgiving was now held in the Engliſh army for this ſignal and unexpected victory; and as ſoon as that decent tribute of gratitude was performed, Henry ſent for Montjoy, a French herald, who had been diſpatched from the dauphin to obtain permiſſion to bury the dead, and aſked him to whom he thought the victory belonged; the herald replied, to the Engliſh. Henry then deſired to know the name of a village to which he pointed with his hand; and being told it was called the Caſtle of Agincourt, "Let this action" ſaid the king, "be hereafter known by the appellation of The Battle of Agincourt."

Had Henry known how to have made a proper advantage of his victory, and the dreadful conſternation of the enemy, every thing muſt, in all probability, have ſubmitted to his arms. But the poverty of the princes of Europe in theſe times, and the ſmall reſources of their kingdoms, rendered it impoſſible for them to maintain an army, for any length of time, in the field; and this, perhaps, was the true reaſon why Henry attempted not to profit any farther from his victory. He purſued his route, by eaſy marches, to Calais; and, after reſting his forces, embarked for Dover, where he landed on the ſixteenth of November.

But the diſtreſs occaſioned by the battle of Agincourt was ſo far from being ſufficient to put a period to the fury of factions in France, that they continued to rage with ſtill greater violence. All the principles of honour, and all the motives of intereſt, were ſacrificed at the altars of ambition and revenge. The duke of Burgundy redoubled his efforts to reinſtate himſelf in the poſſeſſion of the government. Iſabella of Bavaria, the wife of the unfortunate Charles VI. deteſtable in her character, and capable of the greateſt crimes, having been baniſhed to Tours, entered into a ſtrict alliance with him againſt the dauphin, who was attached to the oppoſite party. The duke of Burgundy now entered France at the head of an army, reduced ſeveral ſtrong places, releaſed the queen from her confinement, and made himſelf maſter of the king's perſon. Paris was a ſecond time deluged with blood; and nothing but an invaſion from England was wanting to complete the ruin of that divided kingdom.

A. D. 1418. Nor was that additional ſcourge of heaven long delayed. Henry landed at Beville, in Normandy, on the firſt of Auguſt, at the head of an army of twenty-eight thouſand men. Falaiſe, Cherbourgh, Evreux, and Caen, ſubmitted to him, and he inveſted the city of Rouen; but the place being defended by a numerous garriſon, Henry was obliged to turn the ſiege into a blockade; and ſeveral negotiations for a peace were carried on between the king of England and the leaders of both factions, but without ſucceſs.

A. D. 1419. The garriſon of Rouen was now reduced to extremity by famine, and deſired to capitulate. Henry very readily liſtened to their propoſals; and it was agreed, that on paying a ſtipulated contribution, the city ſhould be preſerved from plunder. The ſurrender of Rouen was followed by that of all the towns and fortreſſes in Upper Normandy. But a ſudden reconciliation taking place between the dauphin and the Burgundian faction, greatly contributed to diminiſh Henry's expectations of ſucceſs. This reconciliation was, however, blaſted, even in the bud. The duke and the dauphin having agreed to an interview on the bridge of Montereau, the former was there aſſaſſinated by ſome noblemen in the train of the latter. They had ſeized this opportunity of revenging the aſſaſſination of the duke of Orleans. The moſt dreadful conſequences followed this deſperate act. The dauphin was accuſed of the crime, becauſe it was perpetrated in his preſence, and by his moſt intimate friends. The new duke of Burgundy and the queen threatened the prince with deſtruction, and conſpired the ruin of the kingdom. Every ſentiment of honour, of patriotiſm, and even of perſonal intereſt, gave way to the tranſports of revenge. During theſe tranſactions, Henry had made himſelf maſter of Pontoiſe and Giſors, advanced to the gates of Paris, and obliged the court to remove to Troye. His enemies, inſtead of combining againſt him, abandoned to him the kingdom.

A. D. 1420. Propoſals for a general peace were now made to Henry by the queen and duke of Burgundy; and the terms being agreed upon, Henry, accompanied by his two brothers, the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, repaired to Troye, in order to conclude that famous treaty, by which a weak monarch, a furious woman, and a prince of the blood, enraged againſt his country, gave the crown of France to a ſtranger.

This treaty conſiſted of a great number of articles; but the following are the principal: That Henry ſhould eſpouſe the princeſs Catharine: That Charles, during his life, ſhould enjoy the title and dignity of king of France: That Henry ſhould be declared and acknowledged heir of the monarchy, and be entruſted with the preſent adminiſtration of the government: That the crown of France ſhould deſcend to his heirs: That France and England ſhould be for ever united under one king; but ſhould ſtill retain their ſeveral uſages, cuſtoms, and privileges: That all the princes, peers, vaſſals, and communities of France, ſhould ſwear, both that they would adhere to the future ſucceſſion of Henry, and alſo pay him preſent obedience as regent: That Henry ſhould unite his arms to thoſe of Charles and the duke of Burgundy, in order to ſubdue the adherents of the pretended dauphin; and that thoſe princes ſhould make neither peace nor truce with him, but by common conſent and agreement.

This treaty was followed by the marriage of Henry with the princeſs Catharine, eſteemed the greateſt fortune and the fineſt woman of her time. The ſtates of the kingdom, and the parliament of Paris ſwore obedience to the king of England, who now aſſumed the reins of government as regent of the kingdom. The dauphin, in the mean time, behaved with ſurpriſing ſpirit and intrepidity. He had diſpatched the count de Vendome to ſollicit a ſupply of men from the Scots, whoſe king ſtill remained a priſoner in England. The regent, however, reflecting, that if Henry became abſolute maſter of France, his country muſt be the next victim to his ambition, reſolved to aſſiſt the dauphin; and accordingly a ſupply of ſeven thouſand men was ſent him, under the command of the earl of Buchan. Aſſiſted by theſe forces, the dauphin made himſelf maſter of Pont de l'Eſprit and Niſmes, in Languedoc; and threw ſtrong garriſons into Melun, Montereau, Montargis, Meaux, and Compeigne.

Henry perceived that it was now neceſſary to take the field, in order to check the progreſs of the dauphin. He firſt marched againſt Sens, which ſubmitted, after a very faint oppoſition. Montereau opened its gates at the firſt ſummons, and ſeveral ſmall towns followed its example. But the reduction of Melun was attended with more difficulty. Great part of that city was encompaſſed with the river Seine, and the whole defended by a ſtrong wall, flanked with bulwarks and towers. De Barbaſon, one of the beſt officers in France, commanded the garriſon, and made a noble defence. The place was inveſted on the twelfth of July, and did not ſurrender till the eighteenth of November, when famine forced the garriſon to ſubmit; but not without capitulating for their lives; it being agreed that none of the garriſon or inhabitants ſhould be put to death, except ſuch as had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy. Barbaſon himſelf was ſuſpected of being one of the aſſaſſins; but by the interceſſion of Henry his puniſhment was changed into perpetual impriſonment.

A. D. 1421. The ſupplies granted by the ſtates of France not being ſufficient to anſwer the complicated exigencies of the ſtate, Henry found it neceſſary to paſs over into England in order to procure a ſubſidy from the parliament. The ſupply was granted; but the parliament preſented an addreſs, in which they obſerved, that the conqueſt of France might, in all probability, prove the ruin of England, which would be in the utmoſt danger of becoming a province of that kingdom: they already perceived that the intereſt of the monarch and that of the nation, were no longer the ſame.

During the abſence of Henry, the dauphin, aſſiſted by a body of ſeven thouſand Scots, under the command of the earl of Buchan, defeated the duke of Clarence at Baugé in Anjou. The duke was ſlain in the action, and the earls of Somerſet, Huntingdon and Suffolk were taken priſoners. Upwards of eleven hundred men fell in the action. The earl of Buchan, as a reward for his conduct and courage, was honoured with the office of conſtable of France.

Theſe advantages alarmed Henry, and he paſſed over to Calais at the head of four thouſand men at arms, and twenty-four thouſand archers. The dauphin, knowing it would be madneſs for him to meet the Engliſh monarch in the open field, retired beyond the Loire, and determined to act wholly on the defenſive. Henry ſoon recovered the places he had loſt, and made himſelf maſter of Dreux, Tiſliers, Nogent, Gallorden, and ſeveral other caſtles. The garriſon of Meaux had for ſome time greatly haraſſed the inhabitants of Paris, at whoſe particular requeſt Henry inveſted the place, which was ſtrongly fortified, and defended by a numerous garriſon, commanded by the baſtard of Vaurus, who had diſtinguiſhed himſelf both by his courage and cruelty againſt the Engliſh.

A. D. 1421. After a ſiege of ſeven months, the garriſon, being reduced to the utmoſt extremity deſired to capitulate; their requeſt was granted, and it was agreed that all the inhabitants and ſoldiers ſhould have their lives preſerved: but that all the Engliſh, Welſh, Iriſh, and Scotch, who carried arms in the place, ſhould be entirely at the king's mercy, together with the baſtard of Vaurus, and three other officers of the garriſon. Theſe terms were agreed to, and all the Engliſh, Scotch, and Iriſh, found among the garriſon, together with all thoſe who had been concerned in the murder of the duke of Burgundy, were immediately put to death. The governor Vaurus, underwent an exemplary fate; the bravery of that officer could be exceeded by nothing but his cruelty; he uſed to hang, without any diſtinction of age or quality, all the Engliſh and Burgundians that fell into his hands: Henry, highly incenſed at ſuch a barbarous and ſhocking practice, cauſed him to be hanged on the ſame tree, which he had made the inſtrument of his inhuman executions.

The reduction of Meaux was followed by that of Compeigne, Gamaches, and St. Valery. By theſe acquiſitions Henry ſaw himſelf maſter of all France on this ſide the Loire, except Anjou and Maine, and the caſtles of Guiſe and Crotoy, in Picardy. And to crown all the other proſperities of Henry, his queen was delivered at Windſor of a ſon, who was called by his father's name, and whoſe birth was celebrated by rejoicings equally pompous and equally ſincere, at Paris and at London.

A. D. 1422. But the glory of Henry had now nearly reached its ſummit; his career of glory was arreſted by the king of terrors, and all his mighty projects vaniſhed like the miſt of the morning. He was ſeized with a fiſtula, which the ſurgeons at that time knew not how to cure, and was ſoon convinced that his diſeaſe was mortal. He ſent for his brother the duke of Exeter, the earl of Warwick, and the Engliſh nobility who happened to be near him, and delivered to them, with great tranquillity, his laſt inſtructions, which were to the following effect:

He began with obſerving that though his life had been ſhort, it had been replete with glory, and employed in promoting the happineſs of his people; that though his pretenſions to the crown of France had proved the deſtruction of many thouſands, yet theſe calamities ought not to be imputed to him, but to thoſe whoſe obſtinacy and injuſtice had forced him to have recourſe to arms, by refuſing to accept of a reaſonable peace: that he ſhould have beheld the approach of death without concern, had not his laſt moments been ſomewhat embittered by the reflection, that he had not been able to finiſh a war he had ſo happily begun; but hoped they would continue towards his infant ſon the ſame fidelity and attachment which they had profeſſed during his life, and which had been cemented by ſo many mutual good offices. He added, as his laſt advice, that if they found themſelves unable to place his ſon on the throne of France, they would never at leaſt make peace with that kingdom, unleſs the dutchy of Normandy was for ever annexed to the crown of England; and earneſtly requeſted that they would aſſiduouſly cultivate the friendſhip of the duke of Burgundy, and never give liberty to the French princes taken at the battle of Agincourt, till his ſon was of age, and able to hold the reins of government. He left the regency of France to his eldeſt brother the duke of Bedford; that of England to his younger the duke of Glouceſter, and the care of his ſon's perſon to the earl of Warwick.

All the noblemen promiſed to obſerve faithfully his dying inſtructions, and to pay the ſame obedience to his infant ſon as they had done to himſelf. Comforted with theſe aſſurances, Henry made preparations for his approaching diſſolution; and declared, in his laſt moments, that he ſeriouſly intended to have made a cruſade againſt the infidels, as ſoon as he had finiſhed the conqueſt of France; an enterprize which he vainly imagined would have expiated all the calamities occaſioned by his wars. He paid the debt of nature on the thirty-firſt of Auguſt, in the thirty-fourth year of his age, and the tenth of his reign.

Henry poſſeſſed many great and noble qualities. He was affable, polite, generous, and magnanimous; ſincere in his attachments, a friend to juſtice, a friend to merit, and a friend to his country. He excelled all his cotemporaries in perſonal courage, and military atchievements. His abilities were great, his judgment ſound, his genius extenſive; he was equally qualified to ſhine both in the cabinet and the field. He enjoyed the ſingular talent of attaching his friends by affability, and gaining his enemies by clemency and addreſs. In a word, he would have merited all the encomiums to which a great hero, and a great king are entitled, if he had not ſullied his glory by the injuſtice of uſurpation; though thoſe who are willing to give indulgence to ambition in a monarch, will not conſider this as a fault; perhaps they will rank it among his virtues.

Henry left only one ſon, who was not full nine months old at the death of his father. His widow, Catherine of France, married, ſoon after his death, a Welſh gentleman, Sir Owen Tudor, ſuppoſed to be deſcended from the ancient princes of that country.

She bore him two ſons, Edmund and Jaſper; the elder of whom was created earl of Richmond, and the younger earl of Pembroke. By this alliance the family of Tudor was firſt raiſed to diſtinction, and afterwards mounted the throne of England.

During this reign the dreadful ſchiſm which had ſo long divided the Latin church was terminated by the council of Conſtance, who depoſed John XXIII. for his crimes, and elected Martin V. in his place. The authority of a general council over the pope was eſtabliſhed in this aſſembly; and John Huſs, and Jerome of Prague, who had adopted the opinions of Wickliffe, were burnt alive as heretics, notwithſtanding the ſafe conduct they had received from the emperor of Germany. This act of cruelty and treachery, occaſioned a bloody war in Germany, where Ziſca, general of the Huſſites, rendered his name immortal by his victories.

HENRY VI. ſurnamed of WINDSOR.

A.D. 1422. THE parliament of England had greatly increaſed their power during the two laſt reigns. The deficiency of the Lancaſter family in their title to the crown was of uſe in eſtabliſhing the freedom and importance of the commons. The princes of that houſe never ventured to impoſe taxes without the conſent of parliament, and the Engliſh conſtitution was by that means founded on a baſis, that could not be removed, even by the power of abſolute princes. Conſcious of their own authority, and determined to ſupport the power they had acquired, the parliament paid very little regard to the verbal will of their late monarch; they changed the name of regent into that of protector, from a perſuaſion that the latter implied leſs authority than the former. They advanced the duke of Bedford to that office, but permitted the duke of Glouceſter to diſcharge its duties during his abſence. Nor did they think it prudent to truſt this power wholly in the hands of either; they named a council, without whoſe advice and concurrence no meaſures of importance could be determined. They refuſed to confirm that part of Henry's will which appointed the earl of Warwick the guardian of his ſon's perſon: and entruſted the care of their infant king to the biſhop of Wincheſter. The two princes, Bedford and Glouceſter, made no oppoſition to this change in the plan of government: they were unwilling to raiſe the leaſt diſturbance in their country; they choſe to cultivate peace and harmony in the kingdom, and made no ſcruple of ſacrificing ſome part of their own power to make ſo valuable an acquiſition.

The unfortunate Charles VI. did not ſurvive Henry above two months. He had indeed for ſeveral years poſſeſſed only the appearance of royal authority; but even this ſhadow of ſuperior power was of great conſequence to the Engliſh; it divided the duty and affection of the French, between them and the dauphin. That prince, on the death of his father, was proclaimed and crowned king at Poictiers, under the name of Charles VII. the city of Rheims, where that ceremony was uſually performed, being then in the hands of the Engliſh. Charles VII. was a prince of a mild and generous diſpoſition, but indolent, irreſolute, and addicted to pleaſure. He, however, gave the pleaſing expectation of one day correcting the faults of his youth, and was able to gain over to his cauſe a great number of partiſans. The French renounced not wholly their attachment to their natural ſovereign; it was impoſſible for them not to ſee the diſadvantage of being governed by a foreign prince. This was ſoon perceived by the duke of Bedford, and every method that human prudence could ſuggeſt, taken to prevent the conſequence. He immediately proclaimed Henry VI. king of France, and aſſumed himſelf the title of regent of that kingdom. He aſſembled at Paris all the nobility attached to the Engliſh intereſt, and exhorted them to acknowledge young Henry for their ſovereign. They immediately complied with his requeſt; they ſwore allegiance to Henry as king of France, and did homage to him, in the perſon of the regent, for the lands they held from that crown.

Charles, though now reduced to a very low ebb of fortune, was ſtill maſter of the counties of Berry, Bourbon, Languedoc, Lyonnois, Forrez, Auvergne, a great part of Xaintonge, and Poictou, together with the earldoms of Comminges and Armagnac, bordering on the Pyranees. So that his power was ſtill reſpectable, eſpecially as both his officers and miniſters were men of great parts and integrity.

Henry was in poſſeſſion of Normandy and Guienne, Picardy, Champagne, la Brie, the Iſle of France, and the city of Paris; beſides the provinces belonging to the duke of Burgundy, his vaſſal and ally. The duke of Bedford was one of the moſt accompliſhed princes in Europe, whether we conſider him as a ſoldier or a ſtateſman. He was aſſiſted by officers equally diſtinguiſhed for their perſonal courage and military talents; particularly the duke of Somerſet, the earls of Saliſbury, Warwick, and Arundel, Sir John Faſtolf, and Sir John Talbot. But Bedford well knew that every foreign aſſiſtance would be neceſſary, before an Engliſh regent could hope to complete the conqueſt of France. Accordingly he applied himſelf aſſiduouſly to increaſe the number of his friends on the continent, and had the good fortune to form an alliance with the duke of Britany, and his brother the count of Richemont. He alſo prevailed upon the Engliſh council to releaſe James king of Scotland, who had continued a priſoner in England ever ſince his having been taken by Henry IV. It had been ſuppoſed, that the Scots would never attempt any thing to diſturb the peace of England, while their king was a priſoner in that court; but the late aſſiſtance ſent to Charles, ſufficiently proved that this opinion was founded on a chimerical baſis; and that a much greater advantage might be procured from releaſing James, who having contracted a natural friendſhip for the Engliſh, would ſtill continue their firm ally, eſpecially as his obligations would be ſo greatly increaſed by reſtoring to him at once his liberty and his crown.

But notwithſtanding theſe alliances, Bedford perceived that the utmoſt circumſpection would be neceſſary to render the advantages the Engliſh had gained in France permanent. He perceived, that the French in general were impatient under the new government; and that the ſufferings of a young prince expelled his native throne by the rebellion of his own ſubjects and the arms of ſtrangers, could not long fail of exciting the compaſſion of all his people, whoſe hearts were unbiaſſed by faction; eſpecially as the preſent ſituation of France naturally engaged the attention even of the meaneſt perſons, and was become the common topic of converſation.

A. D. 1424. The war had, ſince the death of Henry V. been carried on with various ſucceſs; ſometimes fortune was favourable to the French, and ſometimes to the Engliſh; places were taken and retaken ſucceſſively, without any remarkable advantage. The duke of Milan ſent Charles a reinforcement of a thouſand men at arms, and five hundred lances; but his chief reliance was upon the Scottiſh auxiliaries, whom he called his guardians, and of whom he had now no leſs than fifteen thouſand in his ſervice.

He had already created the earl of Buchan conſtable of France; and he now conferred the title of earl of Evreaux on general Stuart; and that of duke of Terouranne on the earl of Douglas, who was conſidered as one of the firſt generals of his time.

One of Charles's partiſans having reduced Yvri, on the frontiers of Picardy, a place of great importance, the regent determined to retake it; and accordingly marched at the head of his army, and inveſted the place. The governor perceiving that it would be impoſſible to defend the town for any length of time, agreed to capitulate, if not relieved by a certain day. The propoſal was accepted; and no army appearing within the limited time, the place was delivered up to the beſiegers. Charles had not, however, neglected the neceſſary means for ſuccouring a place of ſo much importance. He had diſpatched the earl of Buchan, conſtable of France, aſſiſted by the earl of Douglas and ſeveral French noblemen, at the head of a detachment of twenty thouſand men, being the flower of his whole army, to relieve Yvri; but before they reached the neighbourhood of that place, the term had been, for ſome days, expired, and the town was in poſſeſſion of the enemy.

As it was now impoſſible to retake the place, Buchan led his army to Vernueil, which the inhabitants delivered up to him in ſpite of the garriſon. The conſtable might now have retired in ſafety, with the glory of having made an acquiſition, equal, in point of utility, with that he was ſent to relieve; but that impetuoſity which had ſo often been deſtructive to France, proved fatal to Buchan. He called a council of war, in order to deliberate on the meaſures neceſſary to be purſued in this dangerous criſis. The wiſer part of the council declared unanimouſly for a retreat; and uſed ſuch reaſons as nothing but a mind determined to liſten to no argument could oppoſe. It was urged, that all the miſfortunes of the French had proceeded from their raſhneſs in giving battle, when no neceſſity obliged them to riſque a deciſive action: that this army was the laſt reſource of the king, and the only defence of the few provinces he ſtill poſſeſſed; and that every reaſon invited him to embrace cautious counſels, which allowed time for his ſubjects to return to their duty, and gave leiſure for diſcord to ariſe among his enemies, who not being united by any band of common intereſt, could not long preſerve the animoſity they now cheriſhed againſt the true heir of France. But a vain point of honour had more weight than all theſe prudential reaſons. It was thought derogatory to their reputation to turn their back to the enemy, as their forces were more numerous than thoſe of the Engliſh; and it was therefore determined to wait their arrival. The experience of former miſfortunes could not reſtrain the impetuoſity of the French.

During theſe debates, the duke of Bedford was advancing towards the French, at the head of fifteen thouſand men; and on his arrival near the camp of the enemy, under the walls of Vernueil, he took poſſeſſion of an advantageous ſpot of ground, flanked by a hill, on which he poſted a body of two thouſand archers, and furniſhed all his infantry with ſharp ſtakes, like thoſe uſed with ſo much ſucceſs at the battle of Agincourt, to check the fury of the French cavalry. The earl of Douglas having ſurveyed the poſition of the Engliſh camp, declared that, in his opinion, the French army ſhould ſtand upon the defence, and not begin the battle, as the enemy had choſen their own ground, where they could not be attacked without great diſadvantage. This prudent advice, which was ſeconded by the conſtable, and every officer of experience in the army, appeared to Aymer, viſcount of Narbonne, a headſtrong, imprudent man, as the effect of timidity; nor did he fail to upbraid the commanders, in expreſs terms, with puſillanimity, and of diſhonouring, by their meanneſs, the arms of France. No anſwer was, however, made to his invective; which ſo highly exaſperated him, that, ſnatching up one of the ſtandards of the diviſion, he exclaimed, "Let all who love their ſovereign follow me;" and ruſhing immediately out of the line, he advanced to the charge with the moſt irregular impetuoſity. Douglas and the conſtable ſeeing the confuſion that now prevailed in their army, and finding their authority deſpiſed, determined to periſh like ſoldiers in the inevitable deſtruction which they knew muſt be the conſequence of this headlong raſhneſs.

The regent had ordered all his cavalry to diſmount, and to place their horſes in the rear of the army, forming round them a kind of barricade with the carriages of the army. The attack, though made in the utmoſt diſorder, was ſo furious, that a body of their horſe on the right wing broke the oppoſite wing of the Engliſh, and advanced to the barricade which ſurrounded the horſes, and behind which a body of archers were placed. Theſe received them with ſuch a dreadful ſhower of arrows, as obliged them to fall back. At the ſame time, thoſe who were poſted on the hill ſo galled the Italians, who were marching up in another line, that they fled with great precipitation. This gave the body of reſerve an opportunity of forming themſelves, and marching to the ſupport of the main body, where the fight had continued for three hours with great obſtinacy, without any perceivable advantage; but this ſeaſonable reinforcement turned the ſcale of victory in favour of the Engliſh. The French horſe were driven back upon their foot by the arrows of the Engliſh, and a dreadful ſlaughter enſued. Douglas and the conſtable perceiving the total rout of their army inevitable, and determined not to ſurvive the diſgrace, ruſhed into the thickeſt part of the battle, and fell among a heap of foes. Beſides theſe two great generals, the headſtrong Narbonne, the ſon of the earl of Douglas, the counts Aumale, Ventadour, and de Tonnerre, the lords Grandville, Manni, Gamaches, and Guitri, with many other perſons of diſtinction, periſhed in the action. The duke of Alençon, the marſhal de la Fayette, the lords of Goucour and Mortemar, were taken priſoners. About four thouſand French, and ſixteen hundred of the Engliſh, were ſlain on the field of battle. Vernueil ſurrendered the next day to the victors.

The ſituation of Charles was now truly deplorable. He had loſt the braveſt of his troops, and the flower of his nobility, in the late fatal engagement. His party was diſpirited; he had hardly money ſufficient to purchaſe the neceſſaries of life, much leſs to pay an army; nor could he raiſe any among his ſubjects without exciting a general diſcontent, which, in his preſent circumſtances, it was neceſſary to avoid. But in the midſt of his diſtreſs, when ſcarce the leaſt ray of hope appeared, the intrigues of a woman ſowed the ſeeds of diſſention among his enemies. Jaqueline, counteſs of Hainault, animated by a violent antipathy to her huſband, the duke of Brabant, couſin-german to the duke of Burgundy, determined to diſſolve her marriage, where nothing but the ceremony had probably as yet intervened. She was a princeſs of a maſculine ſpirit, and uncommon underſtanding; and her huſband of a ſickly conſtitution, and weak intellects. She, however, knew her huſband's family would exert all their power to prevent the pope from diſſolving the marriage; and therefore, in order to effect her purpoſe with more facility, ſhe made her eſcape to England, and put herſelf under the protection of the duke of Glouceſter, who being enamoured of her perſon and fortune, ventured to marry her without waiting for the papal diſpenſation. Glouceſter was endowed with many noble qualities, but at the ſame time of an impetuous temper, and violent paſſions. He conſidered not the conſequences of an action he was determined to perform. Soon after his marriage, he repaired into the Low Countries, to take poſſeſſion of her dominions. The duke of Burgundy exclaimed loudly againſt this conduct; and conſidering himſelf as inſulted by it, marched in perſon to the aſſiſtance of the duke of Brabant. A ſharp war was now kindled in the Low Countries. The labours of the duke of Bedford to reſtrain the impetuous temper of his brother were in vain; nor was he able to ſoften the reſentment of the duke of Burgundy. He now found it would be uſeleſs to puſh the conſequences of his victory at Vernueil, and took a journey to England, where the departure of his brother had excited troubles in the adminiſtration. This ceſſation of hoſtilities gave Charles leiſure to recover from his defeat. He laboured aſſiduouſly to gain the friendſhip of the princes of the blood, whoſe revolt had almoſt occaſioned the total ruin of the monarchy. The duke of Burgundy was diſguſted with the Engliſh, but he had not yet overcome his hatred to Charles; the murder of his father ſtill filled his breaſt with reſentment. The duke of Britany had received no ſuch injury, and therefore liſtened to the propoſals made by Charles for an accommodation; and the count of Richemont accepted of the dignity of conſtable. That great general, who was an excellent ſubject, but a bad courtier, had been diſgraced for the violence he exerciſed againſt the miniſters and favourites of Charles; but he ſoon regained, by his ſervices, the favour and friendſhip of his maſter.

A. D. 1426. The defection of the duke of Britany alarmed the regent, and war was declared in form againſt the Bretons. The earl of Warwick immediately took the field; and laying ſiege to Pont Orſon, carried the town by aſſault. He afterwards took and fortified Beauvron, where he fixed his head-quarters, and thence extended his ravages over the adjacent country, to the very gates of Rennes. The conſtable Richemont exerted all his power to raiſe a ſufficient number of troops to put a ſtop to theſe incurſions, and was fortunate enough to ſucceed. He ſoon found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men, and marched immediately againſt the enemy. Warwick, whoſe whole corps did not amount to more than eight thouſand, ſhut himſelf up in Beauvron. The conſtable immediately inveſted the town, and propoſed to reduce it by famine. But Giac, prime miniſter to Charles, and who hated the conſtable, neglected to ſend him the neceſſary ſupplies of men and money, ſo that Richemont deſpaired of being able to effect his purpoſe; but exaſperated to find himſelf baffled in his firſt attempt, he raſhly reſolved to make a general aſſault. The garriſon behaved with the utmoſt intrepidity; the beſiegers were every where beaten off; and Warwick perceiving a great diſorder in the ranks of the enemy, ſallied out, and falling upon their rear, put them to flight with great ſlaughter, and made himſelf maſter of all their baggage and artillery.

The defeat of the conſtable's army, the great deſertion of his troops, and the diſſentions which prevailed in Charles's councils, encouraged the earl of Warwick to undertake the ſiege of Montargis, as a place of the utmoſt importance for facilitating the regent's intention of carrying the war beyond the Loire. He accordingly inveſted the town, and ſoon reduced the garriſon to the laſt extremity. The baſtard of Orleans, afterwards the famous count de Dunois, reſolved to march to the relief of Montargis. He was then only twenty-three years of age, but had ſerved with great reputation in eight campaigns. He was natural ſon to that duke of Orleans who had been aſſaſſinated by the duke of Burgundy, and had been educated for the church, but thought proper to exchange his eccleſiaſtical for a military habit. This gallant leader, at the head of no more than ſixteen hundred men, attacked the Engliſh camp with ſo much fury, that the earl of Warwick, who knew nothing of his approach, was obliged to raiſe the ſiege. This advantage raiſed the hopes of Charles's party, and eſtabliſhed the military character of Dunois.

A. D. 1427. The duke of Bedford, having ſettled affairs in England, returned to France; and after forming a numerous army on the frontiers of Britany, fell ſo unexpectedly into that province, that nothing could reſiſt his progreſs. All the attempts of the duke of Britany were in vain; ſo that after ſeeing the greater part of his territories waſted with fire and ſword, he deſired an interview with Bedford; and a treaty was ſigned between them, by which the duke of Britany not only returned to his former engagements with the Engliſh, but alſo ſigned the treaty of Troye, acknowledging the duke of Bedford regent of France, and engaging to do homage for his dutchy of Britany to the king of England.

A. D. 1428. The regent having thus forced the duke of Britany to ſubmit, formed a project, the ſucceſs of which would have ſecured to England the conqueſt of France. This was the taking of Orleans, a city of the utmoſt importance, and which was now the only barrier that oppoſed his entrance into the ſouthern provinces. The conduct of this ſiege was committed to the earl of Saliſbury, one of the moſt conſummate generals of the age. He marched from Paris about the latter end of July, at the head of ſixteen thouſand men, aſſiſted by the earl of Suffolk, the lord Talbot, Sir John Faſtolf, and other excellent officers. He immediately advanced through the county of Beauſſe, and made himſelf maſter of all the towns that lay in his route to Orleans. He paſſed the Loire at Beaugenci, and inveſted the place on the ſide of Sologni, on the twelfth of October.

Every motion of the Engliſh ſufficiently indicated their intention of beſieging Orleans, and every precaution was accordingly taken for its defence. The command of this important city was given to the count de Gaucourt, an officer of great courage and experience, and inviolably attached to the family of Orleans. Many other officers of diſtinction threw themſelves into the place. The troops that formed the garriſon were all veterans, and long familiar with danger. The citizens themſelves had acquired the military turn, ſo common in that age, and were therefore extremely well qualified to aſſiſt the regulars in the defence of the place. Many new fortifications were raiſed, the old ones repaired, and the greater part of the buildings in the ſuburbs pulled down, that they might not be uſed by the Engliſh in carrying on the ſiege. The fate of this city engaged the attention of Europe; the fortune of the kingdom ſeemed to depend entirely upon it.

The firſt operation of this ſiege was againſt a bulwark erected to cover the caſtle of Tourelles, which defended the head of the bridge over the Loire. The Engliſh artillery ſoon demoliſhed the parapets, and made a breach ſufficiently large for ſtorming it. Preparations were now made both by the French and Engliſh; the former for attacking, and the latter for defending the bulwark. The firſt attempt did not ſucceed; the Engliſh were obliged to retreat, leaving two hundred and fifty men dead in the breach. This repulſe, however, ſerved only to increaſe the ardour of the beſiegers; they continued battering the work with ſuch fury, that it was ſoon abandoned by the French, and the Engliſh took poſſeſſion of it without any farther oppoſition. Forts were now erected both above and below the bridge, for battering the city. But ſtill the place was inveſted only on the ſide of Sologni; that towards the Beauſſe was entirely open; and the baſtard of Orleans found means to throw himſelf into the city at the head of eight hundred men. It was eaſily perceived, that while the city could be ſupplied with troops and proviſions, it would be impoſſible to reduce it. The earl of Saliſbury therefore ordered ſixty ſmall forts or redoubts to be built at proper diſtances round the city; but while he was pointing out the proper ſpots where they ſhould be erected, a ſtone diſcharged from a canon in the place put a period to his life. The loſs of this great general was univerſally lamented by the army: the ſoldiers conſidered themſelves as invincible while he was at their head.

The command of the Engliſh army now devolved on the earl of Suffolk, who, aſſiſted by the famous Talbot, Talbot, one of the greateſt captains of that age, puſhed the ſiege with unremitting vigour. Sallies were frequently made by the garriſon, and the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour were performed both by the beſiegers and the beſieged. On the twenty-firſt of December, a freſh reinforcement of Engliſh and Burgundian troops arrived; but ſtill the number was not ſufficient to inveſt the place; and the forts which had been erected in conſequence of the orders iſſued by the earl of Saliſbury, were at too great a diſtance from each other to prevent the enemy from throwing into the place large quantities of ammunition and proviſions.

A. D. 1429. Four months had already been ſpent in continual ſallies and engagements, when the regent ordered a convoy to ſet out from Paris with ſalt-fiſh, herrings, and other proviſions of a ſimilar kind, for the uſe of the beſiegers during the Lent. This convoy was eſcorted by a guard of ſeventeen hundred men, under the command of Sir John Faſtolf, an officer of approved valour and great experience. Charles, who had advanced to Chinon, a town in Touraine, about twenty leagues diſtant from Orleans, receiving intelligence of the march of this convoy, ſent the count de Clermont, at the head of three thouſand men, to attack the Engliſh in their route. The count came up with the convoy at Rouvrai St. Denis on the twelfth of February. Falſtolf, apprized of his approach, and knowing himſelf too weak to ſuſtain the impetuous ſhock of the French in the open field, drew up his men behind a barricado of his waggons, and in this poſition received the firſt ſhock of the French, which was made with their uſual fury; but they were not able to force the temporary fortification. At the ſame time, they met with ſo warm a reception, that they were thrown into confuſion. Faſtolf perceived his advantage, ſallied from his barricado, and routed the enemy with prodigious ſlaughter. In this action, generally called The Battle of the Herrings, one hundred and twenty French noblemen and perſons of diſtinction loſt their lives, beſides a great number of common ſoldiers. The count de Dunois, having received notice of the count of Clermont's march, found means to eſcape from Orleans, and advanced to ſupport him at the head of a body of veterans; but he arrived too late. He, however, ſecured his retreat; and the convoy reached the Engliſh camp, without meeting with any farther oppoſition.

This defeat, together with the alarming aſpect of Charles's affairs in general, filled that monarch and his whole court with confuſion; and an offer was made, that Orleans ſhould be ſequeſtered into the hands of the duke of Burgundy. But Bedford rejected the propoſal with indignation; and obſerved, "That he was not in a humour to beat the buſhes, while others ran away with the game." This ſarcaſm ſo diſguſted the duke of Burgundy, that he recalled all his troops from the ſervice of the Engliſh. But notwithſtanding this defection, the place was every day more and more cloſely inveſted by the enemy. The utmoſt ſcarcity prevailed in the city; and Charles meditated an inglorious retreat into Dauphine. Mary, of Anjou, his queen, and the fair Agnes Sorrel, his miſtreſs, found means, however, to inſpire him with more noble ſentiments. Love, which uſuelly ſoftens the heart, rouſed his courage; he determined to conquer or periſh. At this dangerous criſis a country girl delivered him from the danger with which he was threatened, and placed him on the throne of his anceſtors.

The name of this heroine was Joan d'Arc, afterwards much better known by the name of The Maid of Orleans. She was born at the village of Dom. Remi, near Vaucouleurs, on the borders of Lorraine. At this time ſhe was about twenty years of age, of an irreproachable life, and had not hitherto been remarked for any ſingularity. She, indeed, poſſeſſed a genius ſuperior to moſt in her claſs of life, but had been wholly employed in country buſineſs. A continual recital of the calamities of France had made ſo great an impreſſion on her imagination, that loſing ſight of every other object, and abandoning herſelf to the tranſports of enthuſiaſm, ſhe fancied that ſhe heard heavenly voices, and doubted not but ſhe was called upon by the Deity to undertake the defence of the kingdom. She communicated her viſions to the governor of Vaucouleurs, who at firſt treated her with neglect; but her frequent returns prevailed upon him to ſend her to the king. She ſupported before the court the character of an inſpired perſon with an aſtoniſhing candour and firmneſs. An aſſembly of divines, and the parliament of Poictiers, who examined her on the ſubject of her miſſion, pronounced that there was ſomething ſupernatural in her. It was an object of policy to make her caſe be conſidered as miraculous; but in an age devoted to ſuperſtition, admiration and wonder, it was hardly neceſſary to employ art to effect this purpoſe. Her enthuſiaſm, therefore, joined to the extraordinary qualities ſhe poſſeſſed, could not fail of making lively impreſſions on the vulgar. She promiſed to deliver Orleans, and conduct Charles to Rheims, in order to his coronation. She now wrote a letter to the duke of Bedford, commanding him, in the name of God, to raiſe the ſiege, and to evacuate France. Every method was taken to publiſh the predictions of the Maid of Orleans, and which were believed with the moſt implicit faith. It was pretended, that ſhe had demanded of the king, as the inſtrument of her future victories, a particular ſword which was preſerved in the church of St. Catherine de Fierbois, and which, though ſhe had never ſeen, ſhe deſcribed with ſo many particular circumſtances, as plainly proved her ſupernatural knowledge. The Engliſh affected to ſpeak of her with deriſion; but were ſtruck with the opinion which every where prevailed of her heavenly miſſion. The French troops gave credit to all her predictions, and were ready to attempt the moſt daring actions from an aſſurance of victory.

This extraordinary engine being thus prepared, it was reſolved to try its force upon the enemy. The Maid was armed cap-a-pie, and mounted on a fine horſe richly capariſoned. The ſword of St. Catherine was ſent for, and delivered to her with great formality. It was now determined to ſend this inſpired leader with a large convoy of proviſions and ammunition to the beſieged, who were by this time reduced to the laſt extremity. Joan accordingly marched at the head of twelve thouſand choſen men deſtined to eſcort the convoy, with a conſecrated banner in her hand. She was aſſiſted by the lords of Gaucourt, Ray, and St. Severe, the admiral Crevant, and other excellent officers. The garriſon of Orleans were informed of the deſign, and a great number of boats were prepared to carry the convoy over the Loire. As ſoon as the Maid appeared on the ſide of Sologne, the count de Dunois made a vigorous ſally on the Engliſh on the ſide of Beauſſe, to prevent their ſending troops to the other ſide of the river, while the boats were loading with the proviſions and ammunition deſtined for the town. The Engliſh on that ſide were too weak to encounter ſo ſtrong an eſcort; and their inaction being conſidered by the French as the effect of terror imprinted on their minds by heaven, to facilitate the enterprize of the Maid of Orleans, fell upon them with ſuch enthuſiaſtic fury, that they were defeated, after a long reſiſtance, and the convoy paſſed into Orleans. A natural event ſerved alſo to increaſe the ſuperſtition of the French. During the time of the action, there happened a violent ſtorm of thunder, lightening, and hail. This, it may eaſily be ſuppoſed, was conſidered as the voice of heaven declaring in their favour. Had the attempt miſcarried, it would have been interpreted in an oppoſite ſenſe. Joan was received into Orleans as a tutelar angel, and the whole ſucceſs attributed to her: her preſence diſpelled every thought of danger. The garriſon believed themſelves invincible under her ſacred influence; and the frequent and ſucceſsful ſallies which Coronation of HENRY VIth. at Paris they made, completed the conſternation of the enemy. The Engliſh aſcribed to the operation of the devil what the French conſidered as the work of the Deity. They raiſed the ſiege of Orleans on the twelfth of May; and retired before an army who had ſo long trembled at the name of the Engliſh.

Charles now ſuffered his army to take the field, in order to improve the ſucceſs that had ſo lately attended their efforts. At the ſame time, the Engliſh, by a ſtrange miſtake, after raiſing the ſiege of Orleans, inſtead of keeping their forces in a body to act powerfully againſt the enemy, diſtributed great part of them into places near the Loire, which they had ſubdued when they firſt paſſed that river. Being thus ſeparated, the French met with little reſiſtance in the places they attempted. The Maid of Orleans ſtill headed their troops; and wherever ſhe appeared, the Engliſh were ſtruck with a panic, while the French believed themſelves ſupported by an inviſible hand. Gargeau, a ſmall fortreſs, into which the earl of Suffolk had been ſo imprudent as to throw himſelf, with four hundred men only, was obliged to ſurrender at diſcretion, and the earl himſelf was taken priſoner. Melun ſuffered the ſame fate, with many other towns and caſtles garriſoned by the Engliſh. Beaugenci only held out a regular ſiege, but was at laſt obliged to ſurrender.

Lord Talbot, who, on the impriſonment of the earl of Suffolk, took the command of the Engliſh army, found that his whole force amounted to no more than ſix thouſand men. He therefore endeavoured to avoid an engagement with the enemy, who were at leaſt double that number. But being overtaken at Patay, a battle became inevitable; and the event was what might be expected from a handful of men oppreſſed by the power of ſuperſtitious prepoſſeſſion. They were totally defeated: above two thouſand fell in the action, and about two hundred were taken priſoners; among whom were the lords Talbot, Scales, and Hungerford, Sir Thomas Rempſton, and ſeveral other officers of note.

The Maid of Orleans had now performed one part of her promiſe, the relief of that city; but the other, and more difficult taſk, remained ſtill to be executed, the crowning of Charles at Rheims. Before this could be done, it was neceſſary to paſs over a large tract of country occupied by the Engliſh; an enterprize which was raſh, and, perhaps, impracticable in any other conjuncture than the preſent. Charles, who had hitherto never expoſed his perſon, allowed himſelf to be carried away by the torrent of his ſucceſs, and the inſtigation of the Maid of Orleans. This interval of enthuſiaſm ſecured his victories. Without proviſions, without reſources, he marched ſecurely, at the head of twelve thouſand men, through the midſt of his enemies. Troye and Chalons opened their gates at his approach. The inhabitants of Rheims drove out the Engliſh garriſon, and ſent him the keys of their city, which he entered in triumph. The ceremony of his coronation was immediately performed in preſence of the Maid of Orleans, who attended with her conſecrated banner in her hand. Charles now appeared more venerable in the eyes of his ſubjects. Numbers immediately joined him; they returned from their prepoſſeſſions and errors, and conceived the utmoſt averſion to the ſhameful yoke of ſlavery they had ſo long endured. Loan, Soiſſons, Chateau-Thierri, and ſeveral other towns and fortreſſes, ſubmitted to their lawful ſovereign.

During this reverſe of fortune, the duke of Bedford acted with the moſt conſummate prudence. He retained Paris in ſubjection by his vigilance and ſeverity. He alſo renewed his alliance with the duke of Burgundy; and being joined by five thouſand men, which the biſhop of Wincheſter was conducting on a cruſade againſt the Huſſites, he was once more in a condition of taking the field againſt the French, and checking their rapid ſucceſs. The Maid of Orleans, after Charles was crowned at Rheims, conſidering her commiſſion as accompliſhed, was ſollicitous to return to the place of her nativity; but her influence was ſo great over the troops, that the count de Dunois prevailed upon her to continue in the army till the Engliſh were entirely driven out of France.

Bedford being advanced as far as Montereau, on the Yonne, ſent an herald to Charles, offering to give him battle in any indifferent place he ſhould name, in order to put a final period to the war by a general engagement. But Charles, who had learned wiſdom in the ſchool of adverſity, refuſed to hazard his crown on the uncertain event of a battle. The regent, therefore, returned into the Iſle of France, in order, by his preſence, to prevent the towns from revolting; and alſo to give the French nobility an opportunity of retiring from the army, where they ſerved at their own expence.

A. D. 1430. It having been determined in the Engliſh parliament to ſend young Henry into France, in order to his being crowned at Paris; he embarked at Dover with a ſplendid retinue, and landed at Calais on the nineteenth of May. But the army of Charles being then in the neighbourhood of Paris, it was thought prudent to carry the young king to Rouen, till the enemy was removed farther from the capital: and in order to effect that deſign, the regent laboured aſſiduouſly to induce the duke of Burgundy to act with more vigour than he had done ſince he recalled his troops from the ſiege of Orleans. Accordingly he ceded to him all the places the Engliſh poſſeſſed in Champagne and Brie; and the duke immediately entered France at the head of a powerful army. He reduced Troye and Soiſſons; and being joined by the earls of Suffolk and Arundel, he inveſted Compeigne. The place was well provided with every thing neceſſary for making a noble defence; and the garriſon was commanded by Flavi, a brave and experienced officer.

But as Compeigne was conſidered as a city of the utmoſt importance, a detachment of about ſix hundred men, under the command of the Maid of Orleans, and Xaintrailles, a celebrated general, threw themſelves into the place, which gave freſh ſpirits to the garriſon. The next day the Maid of Orleans, at the head of a conſiderable party, made ſo deſperate a ſally upon the quarters of John of Luxemburg, the Burgundian general, that he was driven from his poſt. The fury of that enthuſiaſtic leader carried her too far. Her retreat was cut off; and, after making the moſt deſperate reſiſtance, ſhe was taken priſoner by the baſtard of Vendome, who immediately delivered her up to the Burgundian general. The captivity of the Maid of Orleans was thought equal to a deciſive victory. Te Deum was publicly ſung at Paris, and the regent obtained from the duke of Burgundy the cuſtody of that extraordinary woman. The garriſon of Compeigne, however, continued to make a noble defence, till the ſiege was raiſed by a large detachment from Charles's army.

During theſe tranſactions, young Henry continued at Rouen; but it was now determined to perform the ceremony of his coronation. He accordingly repaired to Paris, attended by the dukes of Bedford and Burgundy, and a ſplendid train of the nobility of both nations. Sunday, the ſeventeenth of December, was appointed for the ceremony, which was accordingly performed, with great magnificence, in the church of Notre Dame; where the cardinal of Wincheſter placed the crown on the head of Henry, and the nobility ſwore allegiance to him.

A. D. 1431. Though the conduct of the Maid of Orleans had been irreproachable, and ſhe certainly was entitled to be treated as a priſoner of war, it was determined to try her as a ſorcereſs and impoſtor. Religion was to be intereſted in this act of oppreſſion. The biſhop of Beauvais, in whoſe dioceſe Joan was taken priſoner, demanded that ſhe ſhould be tried before an eccleſiaſtical court, affirming her guilty of hereſy and magic. The univerſity of Paris, a body deſtined for the inſtruction of mankind, meanly ſupported the abſurd requeſt of the prelate; and ſeveral clergymen of rank, among whom was the cardinal of Wincheſter, were ſelected to paſs ſentence upon her. She appeared before the court in her military apparel, but loaded with irons. During four months they haraſſed her with captious queſtions, which ſhe anſwered with wonderful art and intrepidity: ſhe was not intimidated though before a tribunal of eccleſiaſtics, whoſe perſons ſhe had been always taught to revere. She boldly avowed the deſigns ſhe had formed againſt the Engliſh; ſhe told them, with an air of confidence, that it would not be long before they were driven out of France. Being interrogated about her pretended revelations, and whether ſhe would ſubmit to the judgment of the church with regard to their being real? ſhe only anſwered, "That ſhe was certain they came from heaven, to whoſe judgment ſhe would leave the deciſion; determined not to give them up to any other authority, even though the church ſhould declare them illuſions." When aſked, Why ſhe aſſiſted with a conſecrated banner in her hand, at the coronation of Charles, "It is but juſt," ſaid ſhe, "that the perſon who had ſhared in the danger of the enterprize, ſhould alſo partake of the glory." She, however, ſoon perceived ſhe had gone too far, in refuſing to ſubmit to the deciſion of the church; ſhe appealed to the pope; declared herſelf willing to recant; and acknowledged the illuſion of thoſe revelations which the church had rejected. In conſequence of this recantation, her puniſhment was mitigated to perpetual impriſonment, and to be fed during life on bread and water.

But this ſentence was not ſufficient to ſatisfy the vengeance of Joan's enemies. Enough had indeed been done to convince both the French and the Engliſh, that the opinion of divine influence, which had ſo much encouraged the one and daunted the other, was wholly without foundation. Had they ſtopped here, their proceedings might have been vindicated upon political reaſons; but her death was determined. Suſpecting that the female dreſs, which ſhe had ſince her ſentence conſented to wear, was not agreeable to her, they purpoſely placed in her apartment a ſuit of men's apparel, and watched the effect of that temptation. The ſtratagem ſucceeded. Joan, at the ſight of a dreſs in which ſhe had acquired ſo much honour, and which ſhe once believed ſhe wore by the appointment of heaven, revived all her former enthuſiaſtic notions: ſhe ventured in her ſolitude to clothe herſelf again in the forbidden garment. Her inſiduous enemies caught her in that ſituation: her fault was interpreted to be nothing leſs than a relapſe into hereſy: no recantation would now ſuffice, and no pardon could now be granted her. She was delivered over to the civil magiſtrate, on pretence of hereſy and magic: this admirable heroine, the terror of the Engliſh, and the deliverer of France, was burnt alive in a ſlow fire, in the market-place of Rouen. Such was the end of the famous maid of Orleans, whoſe actions muſt excite ſurprize and admiration, whether they were owing to innate courage, or reſulted from the effects of enthuſiaſm.

A. D. 1432. But the death of the maid of Orleans was far from reſtoring to the Engliſh the advantages they had loſt. They were ſtill unfortunate; and their affairs went every day more and more to decay. In this alarming criſis an event happened which gave a fatal blow to the hopes of the Engliſh. The dutcheſs of Bedford, ſiſter to the duke of Burgundy, paid the debt of nature, and was buried in the church of the Celeſtines at Paris. This unfortunate event diſſolved the cloſe connection that had hitherto ſubſiſted between her brother and the regent; and the marriage of the latter, about four months after her death, with Jaqueline of Luxemburg, occaſioned a breach between them. The cardinal of Wincheſter mediated a reconciliation between theſe princes, and brought them both to St. Omers for that ſalutary purpoſe. But a point of honour rendered the whole abortive. The regent expected the firſt viſit, as he had condeſcended to come into the duke of Burgundy's territories, in order to have an interview with him. But Philip, proud of his great power, and independent dominions, refuſed to pay this compliment to the regent; and the two princes, unable to adjuſt the ceremonial, parted without ſeeing each other.

A. D. 1435. The duke of Burgundy had for ſome time ſeen his error, and began to repent of the wounds he had given to his country, and of the injury he had done to himſelf, by placing its crown upon the head of a foreigner. Time, reflection, and the public calamities, made an impreſſion upon his heart, which was naturally diſpoſed to generoſity, and weakened that ardent deſire of revenge, which had armed him againſt his ſovereign. Charles diſavowed the aſſaſſination of the duke's father; offered all the ſatisfaction and atonement that could be deſired of him, and baniſhed Tannegui du Chatel, the murderer of that prince, from his court. This proof of his deſire to remove every difficulty which might oppoſe a reconciliation had the deſired effect: a congreſs was appointed at Arras, under the mediation of the pope and the council of Baſle. The French offered to cede Normandy and Guienne to the Engliſh, but on condition of doing homage to Charles, conformable to the ancient cuſtom. This offer was rejected with diſdain, and the Engliſh plenipotentiaries departed immediately from the congreſs. Nothing now remained but to diſcuſs the pretenſions of Charles and Philip; and this was ſoon performed, becauſe the vaſſal was in a capacity of giving law to his ſovereign. It was ſtipulated that Philip ſhould receive reparations and acknowledgements for the murder of his father; that Charles ſhould cede to him all the towns of Picardy ſituated between the Somme and the Low Countries, and ſeveral other territories, which, as well as the other territories in poſſeſſion of Philip, ſhould be held, during his life, without doing any homage, or ſwearing any fealty to the preſent king. At the ſame time Charles releaſed his ſubjects from all obligations to allegiance if he ever infringed this treaty. So diſhonourable were the conditions, by which France purchaſed the friendſhip of the duke of Burgundy.

Soon after the concluſion of this treaty, the duke of Bedford paid the debt of nature at Rouen. He was juſtly eſteemed one of the greateſt perſons of the age; and it is difficult to ſay whether he ſhone moſt in the field or the cabinet, whether he was a greater general or politician, and whether he was moſt eſteemed for his valour, his equity, or his moderation. About the ſame time Iſabella, the widow of Charles VI. finiſhed the period of her mortal exiſtence. This monſter of nature, who viewed with horror the progreſs and ſucceſs of her own ſon, in recovering poſſeſſion of his kingdom, may be conſidered as having expiated her crimes, if they could, indeed, be expiated, by the hatred of the French and the contempt of the Engliſh.

A. D. 1436. Though the death of the duke of Bedford greatly increaſed the misfortunes of the Engliſh in France, and gave Charles every advantage he could wiſh for extending his conqueſts, yet ſuch parties were formed in the Engliſh council, that it was ſeven months before the commiſſion of the duke of York, who was appointed regent of France, paſſed the ſeals. The French monarch wiſely improved every moment, and made a rapid progreſs in eſtabliſhing his authority, which he had nearly effected when the duke of York arrived. The capital had been ſome time reduced, ſo that the territories of the Engliſh now chiefly conſiſted of Guienne and Normandy. But Charles was unable to meet the Engliſh in the field; ſeveral places were taken, but no action of importance enſued. The French, grown wiſer by experience, wiſely avoided a general engagement.

The duke of Burgundy attempted to reduce Calais with an army of fifty thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of ſeveral ſmall caſtles in the neighbourhood of that city. The Flemings, who were then much more famous for manufacture than war, vainly imagined that the appearance of their numerous army would be ſufficient to intimidate the garriſon, and that the gates would be opened at their approach. They were deceived. The garriſon, inſtead of being intimidated, dreadfully haraſſed their camp, with ſucceſsful ſallies. In the mean time the duke of Glouceſter, at the head of fifteen thouſand men, landed at Calais, and ſend a herald to the duke of Burgundy, offering him battle. Philip accepted his challenge; but his Flemings had ſo ſeverely felt the effects of the valour of the Engliſh, that they could not be prevailed upon to meet them in the open field; they quitted their camp, and made a precipitate retreat. Philip, fearing that the garriſon of Calais might take advantage of this confuſion in his army, drew up his regular troops to ſecure his retreat, and retired in good order to Gravelines; leaving behind him all his baggage and artillery, which fell into the hands of the Engliſh.

Glouceſter, determined to revenge the inſult of the duke of Burgundy, led his army into Artois, and after laying the whole country waſte with fire and ſword, returned to Calais loaded with plunder. Nor was this all the loſs the duke of Burgundy ſuſtained; he was hardly returned to his own dominions before he had the mortification to ſee the maritime parts of his poſſeſſions in Flanders, ravaged by an Engliſh fleet; while he himſelf was in the utmoſt danger of loſing his life in a ſedition at Bruges, after ſeeing the French marſhal, Liſle-Adam, almoſt torn in pieces by the fury of the populace.

The hoſtilities in France were now carried on by both parties in a very languid manner. Deſtitute of reſources, of induſtry and of commerce, the two nations were drained by the expences of the war; and their troops were obliged to ſubſiſt by plundering and oppreſſing the country both of friends and enemies. Propoſals of peace were often propoſed, and as often rejected: both inſiſted on terms which could not be granted. At the ſame time both the Engliſh and French courts were filled with factions. The duke of Glouceſter and the cardinal of Wincheſter, continually oppoſed each other, and the intereſt of the nation was ſacrificed to their perpetual enmities. The dauphin of France headed a faction againſt his father. He was of a reſtleſs and ambitious diſpoſition, and found means to bring over to his intereſt, the dukes of Alençon and Bourbon, with the counts of Vendome and Dunois. Charles perceived his danger, and was very deſirous of procuring the releaſe of the duke of Orleans, who had continued a priſoner in England ever ſince the battle of Agincourt, as the only perſon whoſe merit and rank could balance the credit of the dauphin's party. After a tedious negotiation, which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the duke of Glouceſter, it was determined to ſet him at liberty on his paying a ranſom of thirty-ſix thouſand pounds of our preſent money, an immenſe ſum in thoſe days, and nearly equal to two thirds of all the extraordinary ſupplies granted by the parliament to ſupport the war, during an interval of ſeven years. The duke of Burgundy diſplayed a noble inſtance of generoſity on this occaſion; he renounced his ancient reſentments, and paid the ranſom of a prince who had been long his enemy.

A. D. 1441. But the releaſe of Orleans did not put a period to the diviſions in the Engliſh council: nothing leſs than the deſtruction of Glouceſter could ſatisfy the malice and ambition of the cardinal of Wincheſter. He was, however, unable to attack the duke in perſon, and therefore formed the moſt inhuman plot, infamous by its agents, and deteſtable by its motives. He cauſed his dutcheſs to be accuſed of witchcraft; and it was pretended, that a waxen image of the king was found in her poſſeſſion, which ſhe and her aſſociates, Sir Roger Bolingbroke, a prieſt, and one Margaret Jordan of Eye, melted before a ſlow fire, with an intention of making Henry's force and vigour waſte away by the like inſenſible degrees. The accuſation was well calculated to affect the weak and credulous mind of the king, and to gain belief in an ignorant age. The dutcheſs was accordingly brought to trial with her confederates. The nature of the crime, ſo oppoſite to all common ſenſe, ſeemed ſufficiently to exempt the witneſſes from obſerving common ſenſe in their evidence. But this was of no conſequence in a court, where it was determined to find the priſoners guilty. The dutcheſs was condemned to do public penance and to ſuffer perpetual impriſonment in Cheſter caſtle. Theſe violent proceedings, however, produced not the intended effect. The people were perſuaded that they were wholly owing to the malice of Glouceſter's enemies, and acquitted the dutcheſs. They were even more attached to the duke than before.

A. D. 1444. The Engliſh council had for ſome time been engaged in a matter of very great importance, that of giving a queen to England. It was eaſily foreſeen that this circumſtance would be ſufficient to decide for ever the victory between the two contending parties; and therefore both exerted their utmoſt influence to procure for the princeſs they favoured the honour of ſharing the Engliſh throne. The duke of Glouceſter warmly recommended the daughter of the count d'Armagnac; but had not influence ſufficient to effectuate his purpoſe. The cardinal and his friends had caſt their eyes upon Margaret of Anjou, daughter of Regnier, duke of Anjou and Lorraine. He was titular king of Sicily, Naples and Jeruſalem, and deſcended from the count of Anjou, brother to Charles V. who had left theſe magnificent titles, but without any real power or poſſeſſions to his poſterity. The princeſs herſelf was the moſt accompliſhed woman of her age, both in body and mind; and ſeemed to poſſeſs thoſe qualities which would equally qualify her to acquire the aſcendant over Henry, and to ſupply all his defects and weakneſſes. She was of a lively and daring ſpirit, great penetration, and uncommon reſolution. Such was the princeſs deſigned as a conſort to Henry, by the cardinal and his friends, and the earl of Suffolk was diſpatched to the continent with propoſals of marriage, which were accepted. Henry himſelf was ſo charmed with the deſcription and merit of Margaret, ſent over by the earl of Suffolk, that he empowered that nobleman to promiſe a ceſſion of Anjou and Maine, at that time in the hands of the Engliſh, to Charles of Anjou, her uncle, then prime miniſter and favourite of the French king. Great oppoſition was, however, made in the Engliſh council to the ratification of this marriage treaty; the duke of Glouceſter and his friends exerted all their influence to ſet it aſide; but their efforts were in vain; the cardinal and his faction prevailed, and the contract was approved by the council. Suffolk was dignified with the title of marquis, and received thanks of the parliament for concluding the marriage.

A. D. 1445. The new queen had not been long in England, before ſhe ſufficiently indicated her intentions of being miſtreſs of her huſband's conduct as well as his affections. The oppoſition made by the duke of Glouceſter to her marriage, had filled her mind with envy, and induced her to enter into a cloſe correſpondence with the cardinal and the marquis of Suffolk, who, ſtrengthened by her friendſhip, and animated by their common hatred againſt the duke of Glouceſter, reſolved to effect the ruin of that patriotic nobleman. He was accordingly ſtripped of all his preferments, and even entirely removed from the council-board. But this unjuſtifiable method of proceeding raiſed ſuch commotions in the nation, that the authors of his diſgrace thought it abſolutely neceſſary for their own ſafety, to colour over their baſe proceeding with a ſhew of juſtice.

A. D. 1447. They accordingly declared that they intended to impeach him before the parliament; but the duke was too great a favourite with the citizens of London, for them to attempt the execution of their baſe deſigns in the capital. The members were ſummoned to meet at St. Edmundſbury, and the duke cited to appear. Conſcious of his own innocence, the duke determined to appear, and accordingly was preſent at the opening of the parliament on the tenth of February. But the very next day, he was arreſted, and put under a ſtrong guard. The people were highly exaſperated at this method of proceeding; but perſuaded that the duke, on his trial, would ſufficiently exculpate himſelf from every charge that could be exhibited againſt him, no tumult was excited in his favour.

His enemies, however, did not intend to bring him to a fair and open trial. The lords who were to ſit as his judges took no pains to conceal their ſentiments with regard to his innocence; they even threw out ſeveral intimations of their being determined to do ſtrict juſtice upon his accuſers, provided they were unable to prove the charge againſt him. This ſufficiently intimidated the faction, and the duke was ſoon after found dead in his bed. It was, indeed, pretended, that his death was natural; and his body was accordingly expoſed to public view, without exhibiting any marks of external injury; but no one doubted of his having fallen a ſacrifice to the vengeance of his enemies. An artifice formerly practiſed on Edward II. and on Richard II. could deceive nobody.

Thus fell, by the treacherous hand of malice, Humphrey of Woodſtock, duke of Glouceſter, the moſt learned perſon of his age. He founded at Oxford one of the firſt public libraries in England, and was a generous patron to men of ſcience, and able artiſts of every profeſſion. His hearſe was watered by the tears of the people. His enemies ſaw the grief of the people with terror, and thought it abſolutely neceſſary to give ſome colour to their proceedings. Several of the duke's domeſtics were accordingly tried, and received ſentence of death; but they were no ſooner ſuſpended, than they were cut down, and received their pardon.

The cardinal of Wincheſter did not, however, long triumph over the fall of Glouceſter. He died about ſix weeks after him, in all the horrors of a guilty conſcience. Happy would he now have thought himſelf, had he applied his mind more aſſiduouſly to provide for his paſſage into eternity, and not have embrued his hands in the blood of the innocent. By the death of the cardinal, the queen, and her favourite, Suffolk, were deprived of the great ſupport they derived from his experience, his birth, his riches, and his order; and left expoſed to all the effects of the unpopular meaſures they afterwards purſued. The miniſter did not, however, immediately feel the reſentment of an injured people. He, for ſome time, enjoyed his power; and the next ſeſſions of parliament he was created duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1448. During theſe domeſtic troubles in England, Charles was very aſſiduous in eſtabliſhing the happineſs of his people. The face of his kingdom was entirely changed. He reſtored the adminiſtration of public juſtice, regulated the finances, eſtabliſhed diſcipline among his troops, encouraged commerce and agriculture, and made his ſubjects forget their former misfortunes. The kingdom was now in a condition to act with vigour in recovering thoſe dominions which were ſtill in the hands of the Engliſh; and an accident ſoon happened which gave Charles a pretence for re-commencing hoſtilities, which had been terminated by a truce.

The death of the duke of Glouceſter ſeemed to offer a fair opportunity for ceding the province of Maine to Charles of Anjou, purſuant to the marriage contract. But the Engliſh miniſtry ſtill endeavoured to poſtpone the ceſſion, as they well knew it muſt be attended with a popular clamour, which might probably ſhake their authority. At length, however, orders were ſent to Sir Francis Surienne, governor of Mans, the capital of the county, to deliver that city into the hands of Charles of Anjou. Surienne, who was a native of Arragon, and had ſerved the Engliſh above twenty years, diſputed the authenticity of the order, and abſolutely refuſed to deliver up the place. The count de Dunois was therefore ſent, at the head of a numerous body of troops, and a large train of artillery, to reduce it by force. Surienne made a noble defence, but was at laſt obliged to capitulate; by which the garriſon, conſiſting of two thouſand five hundred men, were ſuffered to march out, with all their effects. They retired into Normandy; but being refuſed admittance into any of the fortified towns, and falling into great diſtreſs, Surienne led his troops into Britany, ſurpriſed the town of Fougeres, repaired the fortifications of Pont Orſon and Beuvron, and procured ſubſiſtence by extending his depredations over the whole province.

This breach of the truce, in which Britany had been included, induced the French monarch to demand ſatisfaction from the duke of Somerſet, governor of Normandy. Somerſet replied, that he was greatly concerned for theſe indefenſible actions; but that the whole had been executed without his privity and conſent; nor had he any authority over the troops that had committed the ravages of which he complained. Application was now made to the court of England, who diſavowed the inſult, and redreſs was promiſed for the injuries received. But the court of France, deſirous of rendering an accommodation impracticable, eſtimated the damages at no leſs than one million ſix hundred thouſand crowns. Charles was determined to take advantage of his preſent ſuperiority over the Engliſh.

A. D. 1449. He accordingly declared war againſt Henry, and ſoon annexed Normandy to his dominions. The brave Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, indeed, ſupported his reputation and glory to the laſt. "He was" ſays father Orleans, "equal to an army." But the province was invaded in four different places, and Talbot had only an handful of forces under his command; ſo that nothing could be expected from that gallant officer, eſpecially as the greater part of the garriſons conſiſted of Normans, who opened their gates to the enemy almoſt at the firſt ſummons. Guienne ſuffered the ſame fate; and that province, which had for three centuries formed a part of the dominions of the crown of England, was now re-united to that of France.

But more fatal misfortunes than thoſe of loſing Normandy and Guienne now threatened the Engliſh. The ſword of civil war was ready to be drawn, in order to drench the fields with the blood of their owners. The duke of York, firſt prince of the blood, was deſcended, by his mother, from the houſe of Mortimer, which enjoyed an inconteſtible title to the crown of England, after the demiſe of Richard II. when the rights of ſovereignty were uſurped by the houſe of Lancaſter. His perſonal merit was great, and he had contracted ſeveral powerful alliances. He had married the daughter of Nevil, earl of Weſtmorland, whoſe family was more potent than any other in the kingdom. The earl of Warwick was one of that family, a nobleman extremely popular, and ſo amazingly rich, that thirty thouſand perſons were conſtantly ſubſiſted at his tables in his different manors and caſtles. His hoſpitality and munificence rendered his authority over his numerous partiſans almoſt abſolute. The duke of York, who had commanded with great applauſe in France, had lately been deprived of his commiſſion, without any reaſon being aſſigned for ſo imprudent an exertion of power. On his return to England, ſome dark hints, with regard to the pretenſions of his family to the crown, were dropped by his partiſans, and had the deſired effect. The virtues of the duke of York, and the great ſervices he had performed for his country, were extolled to the ſkies.

The queen and Suffolk were alarmed at his increaſing popularity; and a commotion having lately happened

The Duke of Suffolk beheaded in a long Boat near Dover happened in Ireland, it was thought proper to inveſt him with the title of lord-lieutenant, and ſend him into that iſland, as the only perſon capable of reſtoring tranquillity. York well knew the true reaſon for his being ſent out of the kingdom, but made no difficulty of accepting the commiſſion. His mild and gentle behaviour ſoon produced the deſired effect; the Iriſh returned to their duty, without being compelled by force. They even became ſo ſtrongly devoted to him and his family, that no miſfortunes were able to ſhake their conſtancy.

A. D. 1450. The people, ever ſince the death of Glouceſter, had deteſted Suffolk, as the aſſaſſin of that patriotic nobleman. He was hated by the great as prime miniſter, and the declared favourite of the queen; and as the poverty of the crown obliged him to have recourſe to arbitrary meaſures, it was impoſſible for him to eſcape the machinations and reſentment of ſo formidable a faction. The popular clamours aroſe to an amazing height; and Adam Moleyns, biſhop of Chicheſter, was murdered in a tumult excited by a patriotic leader of the multitude. In the agonies of death, the biſhop charged Suffolk with being a traitor to his country. This charge increaſed the public diſcontent, and the Houſe of Commons determined to impeach him.

Accordingly they accuſed the duke of high-treaſon. They aſcribed to him the loſs of the Engliſh dominions on the continent; and even inſiſted, that he had entered into a deſign to dethrone the king. The violence of faction had, however, carried the Commons too far; their accuſation could not bear examination; it was ſupported by no evidence. A new charge of miſdemeanors was therefore drawn up againſt him, chiefly regarding the perverſions of authority, and, in all probability, founded entirely upon facts. Henry was now alarmed for his miniſter. He perceived that the Commons were determined to carry on the proſecution with the utmoſt vigour, and feared the upper houſe would declare him guilty. He therefore ſent for all the lords, ſpiritual and temporal, to his apartment, produced Suffolk before them, and aſked him what he could ſay in his own defence. He denied the charge, but ſubmitted himſelf to the pleaſure of the king, who baniſhed him from the kingdom during five years.

But this ſentence was far from ſatisfying the lords. They returned, in a very ill humour, to their houſe, and entered a ſtrong proteſt againſt theſe proceedings. They declared, “That the ſentence pronounced on the duke of Suffolk was not the reſult of their advice, but purely the king's own act, which ſhould not at all infringe their privileges; and that if Suffolk had inſiſted on his right, and not ſubmitted voluntarily to the king's pleaſure, he was entitled to a trial by his peers.”

The duke of Suffolk, who conſidered this temporary baniſhment as the only expedient that could ſave him from the fury of the people, prepared, with great alacrity, for his departure; flattering himſelf, that as he ſtill enjoyed the queen's favour and confidence, he ſhould be ſoon recalled. But his enemies were determined that his life ſhould pay the forfeit of his crimes. They accordingly employed a captain of a ſhip to cruize off Dover, and intercept him in his paſſage to the continent. The captain, who had imbibed the common prejudices, performed his duty with great exactneſs. The duke was ſeized near Dover, his head ſtruck off on the ſide of a long-boat, and his body thrown into the ſea. No enquiry was made after the authors of this atrocious act of violence, though the court threatened to ſend an army into Kent, and lay the whole county waſte, in revenge for the murder of Suffolk, perpetrated near that coaſt.

The duke of Somerſet ſucceeded the late miniſter in all his power and credit with the queen; and as he was the perſon who commanded on the continent when the French provinces were loſt, the public, who always judge by the event, ſoon made him the object of their animoſity and hatred. Somerſet was now in the ſame dangerous ſituation experienced by Suffolk; and the parliament was no ſooner broke up, than various commotions were excited in different parts of the kingdom. They were, indeed, ſoon quelled; but ſufficiently indicated the diſpoſition of the people, and proved a prelude to an inſurrection of a more alarming nature, and which, for ſome time, threatened the nation with very dangerous conſequences.

One John, or rather Jack Cade, a native of Ireland, having been outlawed for a rape and murder committed in Suſſex, had taken ſanctuary, and was forced to abjure the kingdom. He, however, ſoon after, returned into Kent, and obſerving the diſcontents of the people, determined to turn them to his own advantage. He took upon himſelf the name of John Mortimer, pretending that he was the ſon of Sir John Mortimer, who had been beheaded in the beginning of the preſent reign, and conſequently a near relation of Richard duke of York, the perſon from whom the people hoped for redreſs of all their grievances. The very mention of that popular name was ſufficient to procure him multitudes of followers, and Cade ſoon found himſelf at the head of twenty thouſand men. The arch rebel perceiving that vaſt numbers daily flocked to his ſtandard, advanced to Blackheath, giving out, that he was going to reform the government, and eaſe the people of that load of taxes, by which they had been ſo long oppreſſed.

The court, on receiving intelligence of this inſurrection, ſent a meſſage to the inſurgents, demanding the reaſon for their appearance in arms. Cade replied, that they had no deſign to offer the leaſt violence to the perſon of the king; they only deſired to preſent a petition to the parliament, that the miniſters who oppreſſed the people might be removed from the royal preſence. At the ſame time, he delivered to the deputies two papers, enumerating the grievances of the nation. Among other particulars, they prayed that the duke of Somerſet might be puniſhed, as the principal author of the loſs of Normandy; that the king's council might be filled with the princes of the blood, and other prudent and judicious perſons; and not with vicious and profligate men of bad principles and corrupt morals, from whom neither happineſs nor tranquillity could be expected.

Theſe remonſtrances were, however, ſo far from producing the intended effect, that the miniſtry, thinking themſelves highly inſulted, determined to have recourſe to violent methods for quelling the rebellion. An army of fifteen thouſand diſciplined forces, under the command of Sir Humphrey Stafford, was ſent againſt the inſurgents. Cade artfully affected to be terrified at the general's approach, and retired, with the main body of the rebels, to Sevenoak, but left a ſtrong detachment in ambuſcade to intercept Stafford in his march. The royal army followed without obſerving the neceſſary cautions, and were ſo furiouſly attacked by Cade's concealed forces, that great numbers of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight. The general himſelf fell in the action.

Animated by this ſucceſs, Cade returned to Blackheath, and again ſent a remonſtrance to the king and council, demanding, “That the dukes of York, Exeter, Buckingham, and Norfolk, ſhould be recalled to court; that the murderers of the good duke of Glouceſter, together with all thoſe who had contributed to the loſs of the Engliſh territories on the continent, ſhould be brought to condign puniſhment.” The government, alarmed at the late defeat of their forces, and knowing that the ſecret friends of the duke of York were on the point of declaring themſelves, reſolved, if poſſible, to purchaſe their ſafety by ſacrificing ſome individuals to the fury of the populace. The lords Say and Cromer, who had rendered themſelves very unpopular, were committed to the Tower; and the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and the duke of Buckingham, ſent to treat with the inſurgents. Cade received them with the utmoſt complaiſance, but told them he was abſolutely determined not to lay down his arms, till the king came in perſon and granted their requeſts. The effect of this conference was reported to the council, and the king, perſuaded he had every thing to fear from the fury of the inſurgents, ſet out, with his whole court, for Kenelworth caſtle.

Their retreat was no ſooner known to Cade, than he marched directly towards the capital; where the citizens, alarmed at the ſucceſs of the rebels, opened their gates, and Cade entered in triumph at the head of his forces. He had even the inſolence to ſtrike his ſword againſt London-ſtone, crying out, "Now is Mortimer lord of London. He, however, maintained, for ſome time, great order and diſcipline among his followers. He always led them out at the approach of night into the fields, where they continued till the morning, when they again returned into the city. But being reſolved, in order to gratify their malevolence againſt Say and Cromer, to put thoſe miniſters to death, he could no longer reſtrain their riotous diſpoſitions. They plundered the houſes of the more opulent citizens, and committed ſo many diſorders, that the inhabitants perceived, there was a neceſſity for joining the regular troops, in order to prevent the deſtruction with which they were threatened. Accordingly when Cade marched out of the city in the evening, they ſeized the gates, and put the detachments that guarded them to death.

Cade and his followers, at their return in the morning, found the gate of the bridge ſhut and barricadoed againſt them. They attempted, however, to force a paſſage. A battle enſued, and the conteſt continued till night, without either party gaining any remarkable advantage. The rebels were greatly diſpirited at not being able to open themſelves a paſſage into the city; and the miniſtry took advantage of their timidity. They drew up a general pardon for the inſurgents, provided they would lay down their arms; and another for Cade in particular, on condition of his abandoning his rebellious projects. Theſe pardons were iſſued under the great ſeal, and prudently publiſhed during the night in the camp of the inſurgents. The effect was aſtoniſhing. The morning no ſooner appeared than Cade found himſelf deſerted by the greater part of his followers, and retreated to Rocheſter, where the reſt diſperſed, notwithſtanding all his remonſtrances and artful ſpeeches, by which he endeavoured to perſuade them, that the pardon they had received was of no effect, as it had not received the ſanction of the parliament. Perceiving that all his arts were exerted in vain, he fled into the wolds of Suſſex, with a few of his friends, who were determined to ſhare his fate. A price was now ſet upon his head by the government, and he was ſlain by one Iden, a gentleman of Suſſex, who ſent his head to London. The duke of York was ſtrongly ſuſpected of having excited this inſurrection, in order to make a trial of the ſentiments of the people. He was ſtill in Ireland, where his ſucceſs had entitled him to the public eſteem and confidence; but he now haſtened to return to England, perſuaded that his perſonal ſecurity depended upon the vigour of his meaſures; and the whole kingdom was immediately filled with his pretenſions and rights.

A. D. 1451. Soon after his landing, he wrote a very ſubmiſſive letter to the king, in which he pointed out the grievances of the nation, and offered his beſt ſervices to reform the abuſes that had crept into the government. The miniſtry perceived the duke's real intention; but their preſent ſituations obliged them to act cautiouſly; and it was reſolved to return a civil anſwer. Accordingly the king, in a letter to the duke, told him, "That he had for ſome time been ſenſible of the neceſſity of reforming the government, and intended to nominate a council for that purpoſe, and of conſtituting the duke of York as their preſident." Adding, "that till this could be effected, ſuch precautions ſhould be uſed that the duke of Somerſet ſhould be ready to take his trial whenever it was thought neceſſary." It was imagined by the miniſtry, that this remarkable condeſcenſion would deprive the duke of York of all pretenſions for taking up arms; but they were miſtaken; the offers were declared unſatisfactory by the duke's friends, and it was reſolved to proceed in their ſcheme early in the enſuing ſpring.

This intereſting conteſt engaged the attention of the whole kingdom. The people were divided in opinion with regard to the pretenſions of the houſes of Lancaſter and York. Many plauſible reaſons were urged by the partiſans of both parties. "Richard II. ſaid the friends of Lancaſter, was dethroned by an act of the nation; and Henry IV. was placed in the ſeat of power by the ſame authority. The right of ſucceſſion was a rule admitted only for the general good, and could not be pleaded to the deſtruction of the national tranquillity. Two glorious reigns had conſolidated the poſſeſſion and rights of the reigning family, and the people were bound to allegiance by the numerous oaths of fealty they had taken. Even the duke of York himſelf, had renounced claims to which he might have been entitled, by having done homage to Henry, as his lawful ſovereign. To what calamities, added they, would the nation be expoſed, if diſputes and revolutions, which muſt be attended with bloodſhed, and all the violences of civil contention, were encouraged." It was urged on the contrary, by the partizans of the duke of York, "That the maintenance of order in the ſucceſſion of princes, was the baſis of public tranquillity; that the injuſtice committed by the violation of it, could not be too ſoon repaired; that the lapſe of many ages was neceſſary to give avidity to a violent eſtabliſhment; that both the depoſition of Richard and the coronation of Henry IV. had been occaſioned by a popular inſurrection rather than by a deliberate act of the nation; that the lawful heirs of the crown had, indeed, ſubmitted to neceſſity and force, but had never renounced their rights; and that a revolution deſtined to eſtabliſh order, ſo far from proving ruinous to the ſtate, would prevent ſimilar diſputes for the future." Theſe arguments were continually repeated, and appeared weaker or ſtronger in proportion to the prejudice of the party. But they tended not to heal the animoſities of the people; arms alone were ſufficient to decide the important conteſt.

A. D. 1452. As ſoon as the ſpring was conſiderably advanced, the duke of York, who was then in Wales, had joined his friends, and entered England at the head of a formidable army. No acts of hoſtility were, however, committed; they marched peaceably forwards, and publiſhed a manifeſto, declaring that their ſole intent was to promote the good of the nation; to releaſe the oppreſſed ſubject from a burden he was unable to bear: and to bring a corrupt adminiſtration to juſtice. Theſe plauſible reaſons produced the deſired effect. The people, who groaned under enormous taxes, gladly joined the duke's ſtandards; he ſoon ſaw himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, and directed his march towards London, expecting to have met with no oppoſition from the royal army, but he was miſtaken; the queen and Somerſet had exerted all their power to raiſe a number of forces ſufficient to meet the duke in the open field, and their attempts were ſucceſsful. The king marched from London againſt him; but before the two armies met, York was informed of his danger, changed his route, and, by forced marches, reached the capital, before Henry knew that he intended to evade a battle. But the duke ſoon perceived that he had placed too much confidence in the promiſes of the Londoners; inſtead of receiving him with open arms, they ſhut their gates againſt him.

Henry no ſooner received advice that the duke had paſſed by his army, than he returned with the utmoſt expedition towards the capital, while the duke of York croſſed the Thames at Kingſton, and being joined by Thomas Courtney, earl of Devon, and the lord Cobham, he encamped on Bremheath near Dartford. The king followed him cloſe, and, marching over London-bridge, encamped on Black-heath. The duke of Somerſet, who attended the king on this occaſion, and ſeems to have been an able politician, adviſed Henry to cruſh this rebellion in its bud, and not wait till it had gathered ſtrength, and become formidable. He obſerved, that this was the time to attack the inſurgents, who might be defeated with eaſe, and the nation freed from all future attempts of this kind, as the great ſuperiority of the royal army almoſt inſured a victory. But Henry was ſo impolitic as to neglect this prudent counſel. He liſtened to the advice of ſome timorous, perhaps treacherous noblemen, and had recourſe to negotiation. This counſel was indeed better adapted to the pacific genius of Henry, and to that averſion he always entertained to ſpilling the blood of his ſubjects. Certain prelates and noblemen were ſent to know the reaſons for the duke's appearing in arms, and upon what terms he was willing to reſtore the tranquillity of the nation.

York, with the greateſt appearance of reſpect and moderation, told the meſſengers, that the proſperity of his country was his ſole intention; that he deſired nothing more than to reform the government, by bringing to juſtice the duke of Somerſet, and others of the council, who had trampled on the laws of the kingdom, and oppreſſed the people. He added, that he was willing to diſband his forces, and throw himſelf at Henry's feet, if the perſons he had mentioned were taken into cuſtody, and brought to anſwer the charge he was ready to exhibit againſt them in parliament. Henry made no difficulty of complying; Somerſet was put under arreſt, and the duke of York by this condeſcenſion, deprived of all excuſes for keeping up a body of forces. He ſaw his error, but determined to keep his word. Accordingly, he diſmiſſed his army, and repaired to court without arms, and without a paſſport. When he came into the royal preſence, he openly avowed the cauſe of his taking up arms, and inſiſted that the duke of Somerſet ſhould be immediately brought to trial; when to his great aſtoniſhment, that miniſter came from a private cloſet in the preſence-chamber, and bitterly reviled him for his treaſonable practices. A virulent contention enſued, and a torrent of the moſt indecent invectives were poured out, without the leaſt regard to the preſence of the ſovereign.

Somerſet inſiſted on putting the duke of York to death immediately; but the more diſpaſſionate members of the council, fearful of carrying matters to ſuch extremities, would not permit that any violence ſhould be offered to his perſon. Any attempt of that kind would, indeed, in all probability, have been attended with very diſagreeable conſequences to the government. The duke was accordingly diſmiſſed, after making a formal ſubmiſſion to the king, and acknowledging, upon oath, his title to the crown.

A. D. 1453. But Somerſet did not long enjoy his triumph over the duke of York. The bad ſucceſs of an enterprize which had been taken againſt Guienne, and in which the brave Talbot, the glory of the Engliſh arms, periſhed; together with the birth of a ſon to Henry, which cut off all the duke's hopes of ſucceeding to the crown, without the effuſion of human blood, ſerved, once more, to kindle the flame of civil diſcord, and increaſe the activity and zeal of the partizans of the houſe of York. But it was thought neceſſary to conceal their intentions under the maſk of ſubmiſſion, as the candour of his late conduct in diſbanding his forces, and the oath he had taken to the king, had lulled the court into a perfect ſecurity. The king had for ſome time been afflicted with a dangerous diſeaſe, which had occaſioned the meeting of parliament to be poſtponed ſeveral times. The ſecret friends of the duke of York were determined not to loſe ſo favourable an opportunity of procuring that nobleman his ſeat in the council, from which he had been unjuſtly excluded. They accordingly inſinuated to the queen and Somerſet, that when the preſent diſpoſitions of the people were conſidered, there was very little reaſon to expect that the parliament would be very ready to comply with their deſires; on the contrary, it was ſufficiently apparent, that, conformable to the wiſhes of the nation, that aſſembly would appoint a new miniſtry. They added, that the only ſure method of preventing that misfortune would be to admit into the council, the duke of York, the earls of Warwick and Saliſbury, and ſome other popular noblemen, in order to convince the public, that they had no intention of making their own wills the ſole rule of government. This advice appeared ſo plauſible to the queen and her favourite, who dreaded the effects of a parliament cenſure, that they readily embraced the propoſal, and theſe noblemen took their ſeat at the council-board before the meeting of the parliament.

A. D. 1454. The miniſter ſoon felt the effects of his complaiſance. The Yorkiſts had no ſooner gained admittance into the council, than their credit ſuperſeded that of their adverſaries. The proceedings of government were changed; they renewed the proſecution againſt Somerſet, and even ventured to arreſt him in the queen's preſence, and to ſend him priſoner to the Tower. The council was now entirely governed by the duke of York, and the king ſtill continuing in a ſtate incapable of holding the reins of government, it was thought neceſſary to appoint the duke of York lieutenant of the kingdom; with powers to hold the enſuing ſeſſion of parliament in the king's name. This title was ſoon after changed into that of protector, by the parliament.

A. D. 1454. But York did not long enjoy this plenitude of power. Henry recovered from his late indiſpoſition; and the duke's commiſſion was ſuperſeded; Somerſet was releaſed from his confinement, reſtored to his former power in the adminiſtration, and, in conjunction with the queen, directed all the affairs of government. The duke of York had now every thing to fear, and after concerting meaſures proper to be purſued in this alarming conjuncture, retired into Wales in order to raiſe a body of forces. He well knew that the proceedings of the council in releaſing Somerſet, without bringing him before the parliament, would be conſidered as a ſufficient reaſon for renewing his pretences to reform the government. He was not deceived. The popular clamour againſt the miniſter was ſoon as loud as before; and the people flocked from all parts to his ſtandard, ſo that he ſoon found himſelf at the head of three thouſand men.

Thinking himſelf now ſufficiently powerful to reſiſt any force the king could bring into the field againſt him, he marched directly to London, hoping to ſurprize Henry in the capital. But he was deceived in his expectations. The king, at his approach, marched out to meet the inſurgents, though his army conſiſted of no more than two thouſand men. Richard, without advancing any pretenſions to the crown, demanded only a reformation of government. This requeſt was denied, and a battle was fought at St. Albans between the two parties, in which the Yorkiſts were victorious. The duke of Somerſet, the earls of Northumberland and Stafford, the lord Clifford, with many knights and gentlemen of eminence, and above eight hundred common ſoldiers were killed on the ſpot. The king himſelf fell into the hands of the duke of York, who treated him with the greateſt reſpect and tenderneſs. This was the firſt blood ſpilt in that fatal quarrel which ſubſiſted thirty years, which was ſignalized by twelve pitched battles, and which gave occaſion to the moſt cruel and ſanguinary exceſſes. No leſs than eighty princes of the blood fell in theſe dreadful conteſts, and the ancient nobility of England were almoſt entirely annihilated.

A. D. 1455. Affairs did not, however, immediately proceed to the laſt extremities. Margaret of Anjou ſupported, in ſome meaſure, the tottering throne; and the nation was kept in ſuſpence by the irreſolute temper of the duke of York. The parliament, which met ſoon after the battle of St. Albans, granted to the Yorkiſts a general indemnity, reſtored the protectorſhip to the duke, but, at the ſame time, they renewed their oaths of fealty to Henry. The queen did not behold the ſucceſs of the duke of York with idle reſignation. Henry Beaufort, duke of Somerſet, the ſon of him who fell at St. Albans, glowed with impatience to revenge the death of his father. Humphrey Stafford, duke of Buckingham, was equally enflamed in a deſire of vengeance for the loſs of his ſon, who periſhed in the ſame conteſt; and all the princes and nobles, allied or attached to the houſe of Lancaſter, determined to exert all their endeavours to pluck the duke of York from the ſeat of power.

Richard, regardleſs of this oppoſition, lived in ſuch apparent ſecurity, as aſtoniſhed his enemies. Perſuaded that an attempt to wreſt the ſceptre from a family who had held it near ſixty years, would be attended with the utmoſt difficulty, and, perhaps, prove abortive, after deluging the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants; he reſolved to wait for ſome favourable opportunity for aſſerting his rights, and ſeizing the crown to which he had an indiſputable title. His great care was to acquire the love of the people, without which he knew all his efforts muſt be ineffectual. Deſirous of convincing them that his conduct was not influenced by paſſion or intereſt, he paid the utmoſt attention to the affairs of the royal family: he eſtabliſhed the houſhold of the prince of Wales, and ſettled on him a decent maintenance; and, at the ſame time, left the king and queen at liberty to act as they thought proper. He was perſuaded it was not in their power to diveſt him of the dignity of protector, becauſe his patent could not be revoked without the conſent of parliament. But the queen was of too active and enterprizing a ſpirit to be diverted from her purpoſe by ſuch ſlender obſtacles.

A. D. 1456. On the meeting of the parliament, Henry, who had now, in ſome meaſure, recovered his former health, came to the houſe, and declared from the throne his reſolution to re-aſſume the reins of government; and deſired the duke of York's patent might be annulled. No oppoſition was made to the king's declaration: Henry was declared to be reinſtated in his ſovereign authority, and Richard's patent was revoked. Had Margaret been ſatisfied with this ſucceſs, ſhe might, perhaps, have enjoyed her authority for ſome time without diſturbance; but elated with this favourable turn of fortune, ſhe reſolved to ſecure her future tranquillity by arreſting the perſons of York, Saliſbury, and Warwick.

A. D. 1457. In order to effect this dangerous undertaking with more ſecurity, the court removed to Coventry; and letters, under the privy-ſeal, were diſpatched to thoſe three noblemen, commanding them to attend the king on affairs of importance. They made no ſcruple to obey the order; but when they were within a few miles of Coventry, they received intelligence from their friends, that deſigns were formed againſt their liberties and lives. They immediately ſeparated themſelves. Richard withdrew to his caſtle of Wigmore, in Herefordſhire; Saliſbury to Middleham, in Yorkſhire; and Warwick to his government of Calais, which had been conferred on him after the battle of St. Albans. This treacherous attempt deſtroyed all remains of confidence; and an unuſual degree of animoſity took place between the partiſans of the houſes of York and Lancaſter. But ſtill the archbiſhop of Canterbury, and other perſons of peaceable diſpoſitions, hoped it was not yet too late to interpoſe their good offices for bringing about a reconciliation between the two parties, and prevent the dreadful conſequences of a civil war, which otherwiſe appeared inevitable. For ſome time, all offers were rejected; but at laſt their labours ſeemed to promiſe a happy termination to theſe alarming diſſentions; and it was agreed that all the great leaders of both parties ſhould meet at London, in order to effect a ſolemn reconciliation.

A. D. 1458. But their appearance reſembled the meeting of two numerous armies, rather than that of the chief nobility of the ſame kingdom. They ſeemed to be followed by the greater part of the inhabitants. The duke of York and his partiſans took up their quarters near each other for mutual ſecurity. The ſame precaution was obſerved by the chiefs of the other party; and the mayor of London, at the head of five thouſand men, patrolled the ſtreets, to keep the peace between them. At length an apparent reconciliation was effected; but the terms upon which it was founded took not away the ground of difference. This agreement was, however, notified to the public by a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's cathedral, where the duke of York led queen Margaret, and a chief of one party walked hand in hand with a chief of the oppoſite; exhibiting every appearance of a cordial reconciliation and undiſguiſed confidence. But, unfortunately for the peace of the nation, there was very little ſincerity on either ſide. Inſtead of labouring ſincerely in the great ends of union; inſtead of taking their places at the council-board, to which they were now entitled, the confederated lords ſuddenly retired to the places where their intereſt was moſt conſiderable; the duke of York to the borders of Wales; the earl of Saliſbury to the north; and the earl of Warwick to his government of Calais.

A. D. 1459. The peace was, however, obſerved; but in ſuch a manner, that it was ſufficiently evident the leaſt accident would revive the flames of civil diſcord. This was too ſoon effected. The earl of Warwick having returned to London, to juſtify his conduct with regard to ſome ſhips he had taken in the channel, a fray happened between one of his ſervants and a domeſtic belonging to the queen; in which the latter, who was the aggreſſor, was deſperately wounded. The companions of each party took part in the quarrel; the ſtreets of London were filled with blood and confuſion; the attorney-general was killed in the commotion, and the earl himſelf narrowly eſcaped. Both parties, in every county in England, now openly made preparations for deciding the conteſt by the ſword.

Armies were raiſed in different parts of the kingdom; and it was expected, that when the reſpective forces of each party were joined, the diſpute would be determined by a general engagement. The earl of Saliſbury having raiſed a number of troops, was marching to join the duke of York; but was overtaken on Bloreheath, on the borders of Staffordſhire, by lord Audley, at the head of a much ſuperior body of forces. The river Stow, a ſmall ſtream, but of conſiderable depth, ran between the two armies, and its banks were lined with lord Audley's troops. Saliſbury well knew that his forces were not able to engage thoſe of the enemy in the open field, and had recourſe to ſtratagem. He ordered a detachment of his beſt archers to advance briſkly to the banks of the river, and pour a ſhower of arrows upon the royaliſts. This being effected, he ſounded a retreat, and his forces retired with the appearance of precipitate confuſion. This produced the deſired effect. The royaliſts were deceived; and thinking the Yorkiſts were flying before them, began to paſs the ſtream with great precipitation; but when part of the royal army had paſſed the brook, Saliſbury ſuddenly turned upon them; and partly by ſurpriſe, and partly by the diviſion of the enemy's forces, totally routed them. The reſt of the army were ſeized with a panic, fled in the utmoſt diſorder, and Saliſbury obtained a complete victory. Lord Audley himſelf, and ſeveral of his principal officers, fell in the action.

Encouraged by his ſucceſs, York joined Saliſbury at Ludlow, and openly declared his pretenſions to the crown. He was ſoon after joined by the earl of Warwick, at the head of a body of veterans from Calais. The queen, and all the nobility in the intereſt of the houſe of Lancaſter, were now convinced of the neceſſity of exerting their whole power to prevent the Yorkiſts from wreſting the ſceptre from Henry's hand; and an army, ſuperior in numbers to that of the inſurgents, was ſoon ready to take the field. The Yorkiſts were encamped near Ludlow; and the royaliſts advanced immediately to Worceſter, where they halted. Henry, in order to prevent the effuſion of human blood, ſent Richard Beauchamp, biſhop of Saliſbury, with an offer of pardon to the rebels, if they would lay down their arms. But his propoſals were refuſed, and both parties prepared to decide their quarrel by the ſword.

But the night preceding the intended engagement, the Calais veterans, who had hitherto imagined they were going to reſcue the king from the hands of a wicked miniſtry, perceived their miſtake. They found that the conteſt was to wreſt the ſceptre from the hand of Henry, whom they conſidered as their lawful ſovereign, and therefore deſerted to the royal army. This defection ſo intimidated the Yorkiſts, that they ſeparated the next day, without making the leaſt diſpoſition for a battle. The duke of York fled to Ireland; the earls of Marche, Saliſbury, and Warwick, into Devonſhire, where Sir John Denham provided them with ſhips, which carried them over to Calais. The parliament meeting ſoon after at Coventry, an act of attainder was paſſed againſt the duke of York, the earls of Saliſbury and Warwick, and their principal adherents; who were all declared traitors, their eſtates forfeited, and their heirs diſinherited.

A. D. 1460. There now remained no hopes of accommodation; every thing wore the aſpect of war and deſolation. Warwick, who was greatly beloved both by the ſoldiers and ſeamen, was very ſucceſsful in his cruiſes; and having received invitations from his partiſans, he landed in Kent, with the earls of Saliſbury and Marche, at the head of fifteen hundred men. He was ſoon joined by the archbiſhop of Canterbury and the lord Cobham, and marched directly to London, amidſt the acclamations of the people. The city gates were immediately thrown open; and his troops continually increaſing, he ſoon found himſelf in a condition of facing the royal army, which haſtened from Coventry to attack him. The two armies met at Northampton, and a furious battle enſued. For ſome time, the victory continued doubtful; but the lord Grey of Ruthin, who commanded the vanguard of the royal forces, deſerting to the enemy in the heat of the engagement, the whole army was filled with conſternation, and Warwick obtained a complete victory. The duke of Buckingham, the earl of Shrewſbury, the lords Egremont and Beaumont, Sir William Lucy, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, were among the ſlain. Henry himſelf, that empty ſhadow of a king, was again taken priſoner, but uſed with great tenderneſs and reſpect, the innocence and ſimplicity of his manners having procured him the higheſt regard of the people. He bore this change of condition with the utmoſt fortitude and reſignation. Perhaps his natural imbecillity rendered him equally inſenſible of good or bad fortune.

Henry was conducted to London; and ſoon after his arrival, a parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter the beginning of October. The duke of York arrived from Ireland three days after the opening of the ſeſſion. He repaired immediately to the Houſe of Lords, and advanced towards the throne; but was ſtopped by the archbiſhop of Canterbury, who aſked him if he had yet paid his reſpects to the king? York was confounded at this queſtion, and for ſome time continued ſilent; but at laſt replied, That he knew of no perſon to whom he owed that title. This ſudden declaration alarmed the aſſembly; and Richard ſtanding near the throne, complained to the houſe of the various calamities his family had ſuffered ſince the depoſition of Richard II. enumerated the cruelties by which the houſe of Lancaſter had paved their way to the ſeat of power; inſiſted on the miſeries which had attended the government of Henry, and exhorted them to do juſtice to the lineal ſucceſſor. This regard to law and liberty was very unuſual in times of violence and licentious tumult. The aſſembly were ſtruck with ſo uncommon a precedent, and examined, with the utmoſt calmneſs and tranquillity, the duke's pretenſions. At laſt they pronounced a deciſion, calculated, as far as poſſible, to pleaſe both parties. They declared, that the duke's title was indefeaſible; but as Henry had now enjoyed the crown thirty-eight years without any oppoſition being made to his title, they determined that he ſhould continue to poſſeſs both the title and dignity during his life; but that the adminiſtration of the government ſhould, in the mean time, remain with Richard, who ſhould be acknowledged the true and lawful heir of the monarchy, and ſucceed to the crown immediately on the deceaſe of Henry: that every one ſhould ſwear to maintain his ſucceſſion: that it ſhould be high-treaſon to attempt his life; and that all former acts for ſettling the ſucceſſion of the crown, during the two laſt reigns, ſhould be repealed.

This act was paſſed by the unanimous conſent of the whole legiſlative body; and the accommodation celebrated by a ſolemn proceſſion to St. Paul's, at which Henry, and both houſes of parliament, aſſiſted. The king himſelf appeared not to be the leaſt affected with this ſudden revolution in his affairs. Satisfied with the preſent tranquillity he was permitted to enjoy, he devoted his whole time to exerciſes of devotion, and committed entirely the care of the adminiſtration to thoſe who acted under the ſanction of his name and authority.

Very different were the ſentiments of queen Margaret. She was a woman ſuperior to her ſex, whom no dangers could intimidate, and who was capable of the utmoſt efforts of heroiſm. She had taken refuge in Scotland with the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, and was now exerting all her talents to bring the northern counties of England over to her intereſt. The duke of York was ſoon appriſed of the impending ſtorm, and trembled for the conſequences. A ſummons was ſent her to repair immediately to London, in order to put a ſtop to her enterprizes, or of procuring a pretence for baniſhing her from the kingdom. No regard was paid to the mandate; but advice was ſoon received, that ſhe was advancing towards the capital at the head of twenty thouſand men. Richard had only five thouſand, but marched as the head of this little army to ſtop the progreſs of the queen; while his ſon, the earl of Marche, repaired to the borders of Wales, in order to raiſe a more conſiderable body of forces, and join his father. The queen determined not to loſe the opportunity of attacking Richard before his army was increaſed by the additional forces of his ſon. She therefore quickened her march; and the duke of York, conſcious of his being unable to meet, in the open field, an army ſo ſuperior in numbers, threw himſelf into Sandal-caſtle, ſituated in the neighbourhood of Wakefield.

Margaret advanced to the gates of the fortreſs, and uſed every method in her power to provoke the duke to a battle. For ſome time, all her arts were vain; but ſhe at laſt effected by ſtratagem what could not be done by any other method. She marched, at the head of the main body of her army, towards the capital, leaving only a ſmall detachment in the neighbourhood of the caſtle. But during the night, ſhe ſeparated her army into two diviſions, and placed them in ambuſh on the ſides of Wakefield-green. On the queen's departure, York drew out his forces, and determined to give the enemy battle; but he had hardly drawn them up in order of battle, before he was attacked, both in flank and rear, by the two bodies placed in ambuſh for that purpoſe. He now perceived his error, but it was too late to retrieve it, and reſolved to ſell his life as dear as poſſible. His courage was changed into deſpair. He attacked the enemy with the utmoſt fury; and his followers catching the enthuſiaſtic valour of their leader, purſued his track of ſlaughter in a firm, compacted body. The conteſt did not laſt above half an hour, but that ſhort interval of time was crowded with deſtruction. Above two thouſand eight hundred of the duke's army were cut in pieces, and he himſelf fell in the action. His ſon, the duke of Rutland, a youth of ſeventeen, whoſe exterior figure, as well as other accompliſhments, are repreſented by hiſtorians as extremely amiable, was murdered in cold blood by lord Clifford. The earl of Saliſbury was wounded and taken priſoner, and immediately beheaded, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, by martial law, at Pomfret. The body of the duke of York being found among the ſlain, his head was cut off by lord Clifford, and ſent to Margaret, who cauſed it to be fixed on the walls of York, encircled with a paper crown, in deriſion of his title.

Thus periſhed, in the fiftieth year of his age, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, a prince endowed with many great and amiable qualities, and who ſurely merited a better fate. He loſt his life by adhering to principles which render him an object of our eſteem. Had he followed the ferocious practice of the times, and founded his throne on the blood of his enemies, he might, in all probability, have enjoyed the Engliſh ſceptre, notwithſtanding all the efforts of the houſe of Lancaſter. He left behind him three ſons, Edward, George, and Richard; and three daughters, Anne, Elizabeth, and Margaret.

A. D. 1461. The queen was too much elated by her late victory. Inſtead of keeping her whole force together to act againſt the enemy, ſhe ſeparated her army into two diviſions; ſending one of them, under the command of Jaſper Tudor, earl of Pembroke, againſt Edward, now duke of York, who was raiſing forces on the borders of Wales; while ſhe herſelf marched with the other diviſion towards the capital, where the earl of Warwick was left to command the Yorkiſts. As ſoon as Edward had finiſhed his levies, he began his march towards London, in order to join the earl of Warwick, and retaliate on Margaret the cruelty his friends had ſuffered. He was met by the earl of Pembroke at Mortimer's Croſs, in Herefordſhire, where a battle enſued; but Pembroke's army being far inferior to that of Edward, they were ſoon routed, and above four thouſand men fell in the action. He himſelf eſcaped by flight; but his father, Sir Edward Tudor, was taken priſoner, and, with ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, put to death with the utmoſt brutality. Theſe illegal and horrid executions were afterwards an hundred times repeated by the leaders of both parties; ſo atrocious and ſanguinary are civil commotions!

This defeat was ſoon after compenſated by Margaret, who was then leading her victorious forces towards London. Warwick, appriſed of her approach, advanced as far as St. Albans to meet her; and a battle enſued upon Barnard-heath. For ſome time, the Yorkiſts had the advantage; but lord Lovelace, who commanded a conſiderable diviſion of the army, treacherouſly withdrawing from the combat, victory declared for Margaret. About two thouſand five hundred Yorkiſts were ſlain in the conteſt, and the perſon of the king himſelf fell again into the hands of his own party. Lord Bonneville and Sir Thomas Kiriel, to whoſe care the king had been intruſted, continued with him after the defeat of the army, relying on the royal promiſe of protection. But Margaret paid no regard to the aſſurances given by Henry: ſhe cauſed both their heads to be ſtruck off by the hand of the executioner.

The duke of York ſtill continued his march towards the capital, and was ſoon after joined by the earl of Warwick, at the head of the remainder of his forces. Margaret, who thought it imprudent to remain in the neighbourhood of London, retired into the north, where ſhe hoped to increaſe her army to ſo formidable a number, as would inſure ſucceſs againſt all oppoſition. Edward, therefore, continued his march, and was received by the citizens as their guardian angel. He was, indeed, formed to attract the love of the people. His external figure was beautiful beyond deſcription; his conſtitution active and hardy; his judgment quick and penetrating; and his abilities as a ſoldier ſurpaſſed by none of his age. But his failings unhappily obſcured the lovely dawn that uſhered in the morning of his youth. He was cruelly vindictive: the laurels he gained in the field were ſtained by the ſtreams of noble blood with which he deluged both the field and the ſcaffold. More reſolute than his father, and more certain of the attachment of the people, whom he had entirely gained over by his popular manners, he determined to aſſume the title and dignity of king; perſuaded that all the misfortunes of his family were owing to their timidity in not ſupporting their claim to the crown with the neceſſary firmneſs and intrepidity.

But notwithſtanding his plauſible title, it was neceſſary to obtain a national conſent, or at leaſt ſomething that had the appearance of it. Time would not permit the aſſembling of a parliament, which might alſo be attended with other inconveniencies; a leſs regular method therefore was choſen. The army was ordered to aſſemble in the fields near Clerkenwell, whither an infinite crowd of people reſorted. In the midſt of this multitude, an harangue was pronounced, diſplaying the title of Edward, and inveighing againſt the uſurpation and tyranny of the Lancaſter family. After which, the people were aſked, whether they were ſtill deſirous that Henry of Lancaſter ſhould continue to hold the ſceptre of England? The whole multitude exclaimed againſt the propoſal. It was then demanded, whether they would accept of Edward, duke of York, for their king? The anſwer was a loud and general exclamation of applauſe. The experiment having thus far happily ſucceeded, a great council was called at Barnard's-caſtle, where the popular election was confirmed, and the new king was proclaimed on the fifth of March, in the ſtreets of London and Weſtminſter, by the name of Edward IV.

This tranſaction finiſhed the reign of Henry VI. a prince who had been long the ſport of fortune, though he enjoyed the crown even in his cradle. But he was not formed for governing a ferocious people. In leſs violent times, when the laws were more reſpected, he might, perhaps, have ſwayed the Engliſh ſceptre with applauſe. His virtues rendered his perſon reſpectable, but they were not ſufficient to ſupport him againſt the powerful attacks of inſatiable ambition.

EDWARD IV.

A. D. 1461. THE very commencement of Edward's reign was marked with blood! A tradeſman in the city, whoſe ſhop was known by the ſign of the crown, having told his ſon, in a jocular manner, that he would make him "heir to the crown," the expreſſion was conſtrued as a ſarcaſm upon Edward's title, and the ſhopkeeper ſuffered death for his pleaſantry. But this was only the beginning of thoſe ſanguinary actions which almoſt deſtroyed the nobility of England, and laid great part of the country waſte. Every diſtrict of the kingdom was filled with the two implacable factions diſtinguiſhed by the white and red roſes; the former being the badge of the houſe of York, and the latter of that of Lancaſter; and Edward was too much diſpoſed to confirm his authority by cruel executions. Margaret, who was a ſtranger to fear, and who conſidered her repeated defeats as the moſt powerful motives for new attempts, exerted all her abilities to recruit her army, and engage the uſurper of her huſband's throne. She had already rendered herſelf extremely popular in the northern counties, and ſoon found herſelf at the head of ſixty thouſand diſciplined forces.

Edward was alarmed at her ſucceſs, and haſtened, with an army of forty thouſand men, to check her progreſs. He was accompanied by the earl of Warwick, and continued his march, with the utmoſt expedition, till he reached Pontefract, in Yorkſhire. Lord Fitzwalter was now detached with a body of troops, to take poſſeſſion of Ferrybridge, a paſs over the river Aire, and then of the utmoſt importance. Fitzwalter executed his commiſſion with ſucceſs, and took poſt on the north ſide of the ſtream. The royal army was commanded by the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Northumberland, and the lord Clifford; all of them famous for their military abilities, and unſhaken friends to the Lancaſter family. The king and queen, with their young ſon the prince of Wales, retired to York, in expectation of an event which muſt finally decide the conteſt for the Engliſh throne.

The ſurpriſal of Ferrybridge was conſidered as an event of the utmoſt importance; and it was determined, if poſſible, to drive the enemy from that advantageous poſt. Accordingly lord Clifford was ſent, at the head of a party, during the night; and reaching the poſt before break of day, he fell ſo unexpectedly upon the enemy's detachment, that the greater part of them were cut to pieces, the paſs was recovered, and Fitzwalter himſelf ſlain in the action.

This loſs greatly affected the ſpirits of the Yorkiſts; an incident the more alarming, as a deciſive engagement was every hour expected. The earl of Warwick perceived the danger; and ordering his horſe to be brought, he ſtabbed him with his ſword in preſence of the whole army; and kiſſing the hilt of the weapon, he ſwore to ſhare the fate of the meaneſt ſoldier, and either conquer or periſh. At the ſame time, a proclamation was iſſued, by which every perſon who pleaſed was at full liberty to retire; but the whole army declared, they would gain the victory, or fall with their leaders. Animated by this reſolution, lord Fauconbridge undertook to recover the paſs in poſſeſſion of lord Clifford. Accordingly he paſſed the Aire at Cailleford, three miles above the place; and marched with ſuch ſecrecy and expedition, that Clifford was ſurpriſed, his detachment routed, and he himſelf found among the ſlain.

Edward now led his troops againſt the enemy; and the two armies met at Touton, where a bloody battle enſued. While the Yorkiſts were advancing to the charge, there happened a heavy fall of ſnow, which being driven by a briſk wind in the faces of the Lancaſtrians, prevented them from knowing, with any degree of exactneſs, the diſtance of the enemy. Lord Fauconbridge, who led the van of Edward's army, improved this advantage. He ordered his men to advance as near as poſſible; and after diſcharging a flight of arrows on the enemy, to retire with the utmoſt expedition to their former poſt. This ſtratagem produced the deſired effect. The Lancaſtrians perceiving, by the force of the arrows, that the enemy was very near, emptied their quivers by repeated diſcharges, without producing any great effect; and then advanced, ſword in hand, to decide the dreadful conteſt. The Yorkiſts, who had kept their arrows, poured in ſo dreadful a diſcharge, that the advanced line fell back on the main body. The earl of Northumberland perceiving the diſadvantage of his forces, preſſed forward, and the battle ſoon became very obſtinate and bloody. The dreadful conteſt continued ten hours with unremitting fury, and without any perceivable advantage on either ſide. The field was covered with dead, and the groans of the wounded augmented the horrors of the battle. Towards evening, the Lancaſtrians began to give ground, and retreat in good order towards Tadcaſter bridge. Animated with the appearance of the victory, the Yorkiſts redoubled their efforts, and attacked the enemy with ſo much fury, that they were unable to ſupport the charge. Their ranks, which they had hitherto maintained with ſurpriſing firmneſs, were broken, and a precipitate flight enſued. Edward had iſſued orders to give no quarter, ſo that the carnage was ſhocking to humanity. Above thirty-ſix thouſand perſons periſhed that day by the ſwords of their countrymen. Among theſe were the earl of Weſtmorland, and his brother Sir John Nevil, the earl of Northumberland, the lords Dacres and Welles, and Sir Andrew Trollop. The earl of Devonſhire, who had lately eſpouſed the cauſe of Henry, was taken priſoner, and ſoon after beheaded at York. Henry, his queen, and the young prince, eſcaped into Scotland; but the inteſtine diviſions which then prevailed in that kingdom prevented their receiving any effectual aſſiſtance.

Edward thought it unneceſſary to purſue the fugitive family. He returned to London, and ſummoned a parliament, which met at Weſtminſter on the fourth of November. No difficulty was made againſt acknowledging Edward's title to the crown; they even declared, that he was properly poſſeſſed of the throne from the moment he aſſumed the government, tendered to him by the acclamations of the people. They reverſed ſeveral acts paſſed in the late reigns, particularly the attainders of the earls of Cambridge, Saliſbury, and Glouceſter, and that of lord Lumley. They alſo paſſed an act of forfeiture and attainder againſt Henry, queen Margaret, their infant ſon prince Edward, and their principal partiſans. Such, in theſe ferocious times, was too often the fortune of princes!

A. D. 1462. But Edward was not contented with the dreadful ſacrifice that had been already made to his ſafety: he thought it neceſſary that others, tho' they had never appeared in arms againſt him, ſhould feel the weight of his power. John de Vere, earl of Oxford, a nobleman venerable for his years, and venerable for his virtues, together with his ſon Aubrey de Vere, were tried by martial law, for a pretended correſpondence with Margaret, and beheaded on Tower-hill. Sir Thomas Tudenham, Sir William Tyrrel, Sir Baldwin Fulford, and John Montgomery, ſuffered the ſame fate. Edward diſtributed the eſtates of theſe victims to his ambition, among his own adherents. Nor did he neglect the opportunity of cultivating the eſteem of the clergy. He confirmed their privileges, exempted them from being proſecuted in civil courts for felony, and other offences: indulgences which could not fail of engaging that powerful body of men in his intereſt.

While Edward was employed in eſtabliſhing his throne, Margaret was ſolliciting the court of France for aſſiſtance to replace Henry in the ſeat of power. Lewis XI. who had lately ſucceeded his father, was ſufficiently inclined to feed the flames of civil diſcord among ſuch dangerous neighbours, by giving aſſiſtance to the weaker party: but having formed the project of humbling his own nobility, he was not in a capacity of furniſhing Margaret with a ſufficient number of troops to effect the intended purpoſe. He, however, ſent a ſmall body of forces, under the command of Varenne, ſeneſchal of Normandy, who landed in Northumberland, and made himſelf maſter of Alnwick-caſtle.

A. D. 1463. As nothing could be expected from this handful of men, Margaret paſſed over to France, in order to ſollicit, in perſon, a more powerful aſſiſtance. She even offered to deliver up Calais, on condition of receiving an army ſufficient to drive Edward from the throne. The duke of Britany ſupplied her with twelve thouſand crowns, and Lewis with two thouſand men at arms. With this inconſiderable force Margaret landed at Bamburgh, in Yorkſhire, and found means to take poſſeſſion of that caſtle; but on receiving advice that Edward was advancing againſt her, at the head of a numerous army, ſhe retired into Scotland. Edward ſoon reduced the caſtles of Bamburgh and Alnwick; and ſeeing no enemy in the field to oppoſe him, he returned to London.

But Margaret was not idle. She exerted herſelf with ſo much ſucceſs in Scotland, that ſhe raiſed a numerous army, who followed her ſtandard chiefly for the ſake of plunder. She entered Northumberland about the latter end of April, and for ſome time was extremely fortunate. She ſurpriſed the caſtle of Bamburgh; and being joined by the duke of Somerſet and Sir Ralph Piercy, with their followers, ſhe took a conſiderable number of places in that part of the country. The firſt check ſhe met with was from lord Montague, who routed a detachment of her forces on Hedgley Moor, where Sir Ralph Piercy, their leader, was ſlain. Elated with this ſucceſs, Montague determined to give battle to Margaret's army, without ſtaying for the reinforcements he expected from Edward, who was marching to the northward at the head of a powerful army. Montague accordingly advanced againſt the queen's forces, encamped on a plain near Hexham. He made a furious attack during the night, and was received with equal intrepidity. But after ſeveral unſucceſsful attempts, he forced the trenches, and put the Lancaſtrians to flight. The duke of Somerſet, the lords Hungerford, Roſs, and Moleyns, Sir Thomas Huſſey, Sir Thomas Wentworth, and Sir John Findcarn, were taken priſoners, and their heads ſtruck off by martial law. Edward's policy led him to exterminate his enemies. He ſought to eſtabliſh, by their blood, a throne he had procured by violence, and which was therefore unſteady and inſecure. Henry being well mounted, fled into Lancaſhire, where he continued concealed for a twelvemonth, but was at laſt diſcovered, and committed to the Tower. His imbecillity was ſo great, that no attempt was made againſt his life.

Margaret, with her infant ſon, fled into an adjacent foreſt, where the ſplendor of her attire ſoon betrayed her into the hands of robbers, who ſtripped her of her rings and jewels. Fortunately for her, the richneſs of the booty occaſioned a quarrel among them; and while they were thus engaged with one another, Margaret and her ſon made their eſcape into the thickeſt part of the foreſt, where they wandered for ſome time, ſpent with hunger and fatigue, and oppreſſed with terror and affliction. In this wretched condition, the queen perceived another robber approaching with a naked ſword in his hand. There was now no poſſibility of effecting an eſcape, and ſhe trembled for the life of her ſon. But happily recollecting, that he might poſſibly be one of thoſe perſons who had been unfortunately proſcribed for adhering to the intereſt of her huſband, ſhe approached the robber with an air of majeſtic confidence, and preſenting to him the young prince, called out, "Here, my friend, I commit to your care the ſafety of the king's ſon." Struck with awe at the name of his prince, and penetrated with compaſſion at beholding perſons of the higheſt rank reduced to ſuch melancholy diſtreſs, the robber, who was not wholly loſt to humanity and virtue, vowed to devote himſelf to her ſafety and protection. He accordingly conducted her out of the foreſt, to a village by the ſea-ſide, whence ſhe ſoon after eſcaped to Flanders.

Edward had now no enemy to fear. He had ſet his foot upon the neck of oppoſition. The parliament had confirmed his title, and he was in quiet poſſeſſion of the throne. He therefore applied himſelf to acquire a general popularity. He lived with his ſubjects in the moſt familiar manner. He attended leſs to the cares of royalty, than to the diſſipation of amuſements and the allurements of paſſion. He became the general patron among the men, and the general lover among the ladies. Even foreign princes courted his alliance; and ſeveral matches worthy of him were propoſed, particularly Margaret, daughter to the king of Scotland; Iſabella, ſiſter to Henry IV. of Caſtile; and Bona, daughter of the duke of Savoy, and ſiſter to the queen of France. The laſt was choſen, and the earl of Warwick was ſent to demand the princeſs in marriage. But while the earl was labouring to promote at once the glory of his maſter and the advantage of his country, an event happened which rendered his negotiation abortive, and for ever alienated his affections from his ſovereign.

Edward being at a hunting-match in Wychwood-foreſt, took the opportunity of paying a viſit to the dutcheſs of Bedford, who then reſided at Grafton-manor, near Stony Stratford. The dutcheſs, ſoon after her huſband's death, had married Sir Richard Wideville, a private gentleman, to whom ſhe bore ſeveral children, particularly Elizabeth, remarkable at once for the grace and beauty of her perſon, and her mental accompliſhments. This amiable lady had married Sir John Gray of Groby, by whom ſhe had ſeveral children; but her huſband having embraced the Lancaſtrian party, and falling at the ſecond battle of St. Albans, his eſtate was forfeited to the crown; and his widow had returned to her father's ſeat, where ſhe lived in privacy and retirement. The preſence of the king was thought a favourable opportunity for the beautiful widow to obtain ſome grace from the young monarch, who was ſo greatly celebrated for his condeſcenſion and gallantry, eſpecially to thoſe of her ſex. She accordingly threw herſelf at the king's feet, and, with a flood of tears, implored his pity on her diſtreſſed family.

Struck with the charms of the beautiful widow, love, under the guiſe of compaſſion, ſtole into the heart of the amorous monarch. He raiſed her from the ground with the aſſurance of favour. The elegant converſation of the amiable object every moment increaſed his paſſion; and Edward, in his turn, became a ſuppliant at the feet of Elizabeth. Her virtue, however, withſtood all the efforts of his addreſs. This behaviour augmented his paſſion, and he offered to ſhare his throne with the object of his affections. The marriage was ſecretly performed at Grafton-manor, and every precaution taken to prevent ſo important a ſecret from being known.

During theſe tranſactions, Warwick had laboured ſo aſſiduouſly in conducting his negotiation, that nothing remained but the ratification of the treaty, and the bringing over the princeſs to England. Edward's marriage could not be long concealed; and the intelligence at laſt reached the ears of Warwick, who immediately broke off his negotiation, and returned to England glowing with reſentment and indignation at this inſult offered to his honour. The king's marriage was now publickly declared, and ſhe was crowned at Weſtminſter-abbey on the twenty-ſixth of May. Edward took no pains to regain the friendſhip of Warwick, to whom he was indebted for his crown: on the contrary, he took methods which tended directly to widen the breach between them. He laviſhed a profuſion of honours and eſtates on the family of his queen. Her father was created earl of Rivers, and made high conſtable of England. Her brother, John Wideville, was married to the daughter and heireſs of lord Scales, to whoſe honours and eſtates he ſucceeded; and all her friends and relations were raiſed and enobled by the royal favour. This partiality excited an uncommon degree of jealouſy among the nobility, eſpecially as Edward had obtained from parliament a general reſumption of all the grants which had been made ſince his acceſſion to the throne.

A. D. 1465. Warwick ſaw the diſcontents of the nobles with a ſecret ſatisfaction, and plainly perceived that he ſhould be ſoon in a condition to make Edward feel the weight of his reſentment. In the mean time, he obtained permiſſion to retire to his caſtle of Warwick, where he practiſed by the arts of popular patriotiſm uſual with perſons diſcontented with the meaſures of the court. Edward knew the cauſe of his ſequeſtrating himſelf from the affairs of government, and took the moſt prudent methods for rendering any attempt, that might be made by that ambitious nobleman, abortive. He concluded a treaty of alliance with Philip, duke of Burgundy, a deſcendant of the houſe of Lancaſter, but who made no ſcruple of ſacrificing to his political ambition the intereſt of that unfortunate and oppreſſed family. The duke of Britany alſo entered into an alliance with him, and the king of Scotland prolonged the truce for forty years. He was equally ſucceſsful in obtaining ſupplies from his parliament; they granted him ſubſidies with a liberality unknown in any former reign. The Commons alſo paſſed a bill of attainder againſt the ſmall remains of the Lancaſtrian party; and by theſe forfeited eſtates the king was enabled to gratify his friends; but his favours were chiefly beſtowed on the queen's family. That princeſs now procured her ſiſter Catherine to be married to the young duke of Buckingham, a minor, and a ward of the crown. William Herbert having eſpouſed Mary, another of her ſiſters, was created lord Dunſter, and afterwards earl of Huntingdon: and Anne, a third ſiſter, married a ſon and heir of Gray, lord Ruthyn, who was now honoured with the title of earl of Kent.

Warwick and his friends ſaw this profuſion of favours laviſhed on the Wideville family with ſecret indignation; and were joined by a multitude of diſcontented nobles; among whom was the duke of Clarence, Edward's brother. Warwick, however, ſtill preſerved the external marks of ſubmiſſion to Edward, but redoubled his attention to increaſe his popularity. His houſe was always open, his tables always ſpread for every one who choſe to partake of his hoſpitality; and hence he became a greater favourite with the people than ever.

A. D. 1469. The duke of Clarence, already diſguſted by the meaſures of the court, now contracted an intimate connection with Warwick, by marrying his eldeſt daughter, Iſabella, by which he obtained a very noble ſettlement; and the earl retired to his government of Calais, under pretence of celebrating the nuptials. The ſpirit of faction now threatened the kingdom with all the horrors of civil diſcord; but the ſame ſpirit which threw the nation into confuſion, ſo biaſſed the pens of the hiſtorians of thoſe times, that it is impoſſible to trace the cauſes of the various inſurrections; ſome imputing the whole to the intrigues of Warwick; while others aſſert, that by his aſſiſtance they were ſuppreſſed. But however that be, the firſt inſurrection was excited in the north, headed by one Robert Hillyard, generally called Robin of Ryddeſdale; but the inſurgents were ſoon routed, and their leader executed. The malecontents were, however, rather animated than diſcouraged by the ill ſucceſs of their firſt attempt. They again aſſembled in more formidable numbers; and were joined by lord Fitz Hugh, and Henry Neville, ſon to the lord Latimer. But as both theſe noblemen were totally ignorant of military affairs, the command was given to Sir John Conyers, an officer of great reputation and experience. Their firſt intention was to make themſelves maſters of the city of York; but being diſappointed in procuring a ſufficient train of artillery, they reſolved to direct their march towards the capital; and openly declared, "That they were marching to deliver their lawful ſovereign, king Henry, from his confinement, and re-place him on the throne of his anceſtors."

Alarmed at the progreſs of the rebels, and the continual augmentation of their numbers, Edward iſſued orders to the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, and the earl of Rivers, to aſſemble an army in Norfolk, and the adjacent counties. He alſo wrote to his friend the earl of Pembroke, commanding him to aſſemble the Welſh, and croſs the country immediately, in order to intercept the march of the rebels from the north.

Pembroke ſoon found himſelf at the head of ten thouſand men, and marched with great expedition againſt the inſurgents, who were then in the neighbourhood of Northampton. In his route he was joined by the earl of Devonſhire, at the head of a conſiderable body of archers. As ſoon as the two armies came in ſight of each other, Pembroke detached all his cavalry, under the command of his brother, Sir Richard Herbert, with orders to obſerve the poſition of the enemy, and, if he thought it practicable, to attack their rear. Sir Richard executed his orders; but perceived that ſuch wiſe precautions had been taken by the leader of the inſurgents, that an attack muſt be attended with the utmoſt diſadvantage. The fiery ſpirit of the Welſh could not, however, be reſtrained by prudential reaſons: they fell upon the rear of the enemy, and were repulſed with conſiderable ſlaughter.

During theſe tranſactions, the earl of Warwick arrived from Calais; and the rebels, flattering themſelves with being powerfully aſſiſted by that popular nobleman, changed their route. Inſtead of purſuing the road to London, they directed their march towards Warwick-caſtle. Pembroke, impatient of revenge, followed the rebels with ſuch expedition, that he came up with them near Banbury, and the two armies encamped near each other. During the night, a trivial difference about quarters ariſing between the earls of Pembroke and Devonſhire, the latter retired with his archers, and left Pembroke alone to encounter the rebels. This deſertion filled the inſurgents with hopes of obtaining a complete victory; and Sir Henry Neville, one of their leaders, having charged the royaliſts at too great a diſtance from the main body, was ſurrounded, and taken priſoner. This misfortune checked the ardour of the rebels, and they returned to their camp. But Pembroke having, without any form of trial, put the noble priſoner to death, they were exaſperated to a degree bordering on madneſs. They attacked the Welſh army with a fury that was irreſiſtible, put them to the ſword without mercy; and having taken Pembroke and his brother priſoners, cauſed them both to be immediately beheaded. Elated with their late ſucceſs, they detached a party to Grafton-manor, ſeized the earl of Rivers and his ſon John, and ſtruck off their heads in the market-place of Northampton. But they committed no farther diſorders. Contented with having deſtroyed the moſt obnoxious of Edward's miniſters, they diſperſed, and returned quietly to their own habitations. Perſuaded all theſe miſfortunes were owing to the deſertion of the earl of Devonſhire, the king cauſed that nobleman to be executed in the like ſummary manner. All the laws of humanity were ſacrificed to paſſion and reſentment.

A. D. 1470. The duke of Clarence and the earl of Warwick now engaged in open rebellion; but their meaſures were ſo ill concerted, that they were obliged to fly to the court of France for protection. Lewis XI. one of the moſt politic princes of his age, now undertook to reconcile Warwick with queen Margaret, who then reſided at Angers. Perhaps no two perſons ever entertained a greater animoſity againſt each other than Warwick and Margaret. His father had been executed by the orders of the queen. He himſelf had twice reduced Henry to captivity, had baniſhed Margaret, and put her moſt zealous friends and partiſans to death. He had been the ſcourge of the houſe of Lancaſter. But all theſe difficulties Lewis found means to remove. They were both highly exaſperated againſt Edward, and their common intereſt formed an union between them. It was determined to re-eſtabliſh Henry on the throne. At the ſame time, it was agreed, that Warwick and the duke of Clarence ſhould direct the adminiſtration of the government during the minority of young Edward, Henry's ſon; that prince Edward ſhould marry the lady Anne, ſecond daughter of that nobleman; and that in caſe of failure of male iſſue in the prince, the crown ſhould deſcend to the duke of Clarence, to the entire excluſion of king Edward and his poſterity.

Edward, intoxicated with the love of pleaſure, and too vain of his own power, neglected to take the neceſſary meaſures for breaking the force of the ſtorm that was gathering round him. He received authentic intelligence of this extraordinary treaty from the duke of Burgundy, who had fitted out a large fleet to intercept Warwick in his paſſage; but he availed himſelf not of the diſcovery. He was even ſo confident of rendering the attempt abortive, that he declared, the duke might have ſaved himſelf the trouble of guarding the ſeas, as he wiſhed for nothing more than to ſee Warwick landed in England. It was not long before that nobleman appeared. He landed at Dartmouth about the middle of September, and immediately declared for king Henry. The name of Warwick, ſo dear to the Engliſh, his immenſe credit, and the turbulent diſpoſition of the Engliſh, drew to his ſtandard, in a few days, an army of ſixty thouſand men.

So unexpected a defection of the Engliſh alarmed Edward. He ſaw his folly when it was too late to prevent the conſequences. He was then with his army in the north, and employed in quelling an inſurrection raiſed in Yorkſhire by the lord Fitz Hugh, who had married one of the ſiſters of the earl of Warwick. But on receiving advice of the ſucceſs of that popular nobleman, he immediately altered his route, and directed his march towards London with great expedition. Warwick, determined, if poſſible, to engage Edward before he reached the capital, advanced acroſs the country, and came up with the royal army in the neighbourhood of Nottingham. The marquis of Montague, the brother of Warwick, had raiſed an army of ſix thouſand men, and was following Edward, in order, as it was imagined, to reinforce the royal army. But the king had no ſooner halted, on account of the approach of Warwick, than the marquis fell upon the rear of the royal army, during the night, with the utmoſt fury, and the air reſounded with the cry of "God ſave king Henry!" The king, alarmed at the noiſe, ſtarted from his bed, and was ſoon convinced that it was the cry of war, generally uſed by the Lancaſtrian party. Lord Haſtings haſtened into his apartment, and informed him of his danger; urging him to make his eſcape from an army where he appeared to have ſo many concealed enemies, and ſo few zealouſly attached to his ſervice. He had hardly time to get on horſeback, before the enemy attacked his quarters. A few minutes would have determined the fate of Edward. He fled with the utmoſt precipitation, attended with a ſmall retinue, to Lynn in Norfolk, where he fortunately found ſome Dutch ſhips ready for the ſea, and ſailed immediately. But his danger did not terminate with his embarkation. A fleet of ſhips belonging to the Eaſterlings, who were then at war both with France and England, were hovering on the Norfolk coaſt, and gave chace to the king's veſſels; and it was with the utmoſt difficulty that they eſcaped into the port of Alcmaer, in Holland.

Warwick had now no enemy to oppoſe him. In no longer a ſpace of time than eleven days from his landing, he was left entire maſter of the kingdom. He immediately directed his march towards London, delivered Henry VI. from the Tower, re-placed him on the throne, and proclaimed him king with the utmoſt ſolemnity. The moſt conſiderable partiſans of the York family either ſought protection beyond the ſeas, or took ſhelter in ſanctuaries where the eccleſiaſtical privileges afforded them ſhelter from the inſults of their enemies. It is computed, that in London alone, no leſs than two thouſand perſons ſaved themſelves in this manner; and among the reſt, Edward's queen, who went privately by water from the Tower to Weſtminſter-abbey, in order to avoid the violence of the citizens, who now appeared as extravagantly zealous for Henry as ever they had been for Edward. The earl of Worceſter, conſtable of England, fell into the hands of the Lancaſtrians, and was ſoon afterwards beheaded. He was the firſt nobleman in England who diſtinguiſhed himſelf by his love for letters, and who laboured aſſiduouſly to propagate genuine learning among his unpoliſhed countrymen.

A parliament was ſummoned to meet at Weſtminſter; and as no exertions of liberty could be expected in this aſſembly, their proceedings were intirely directed by the ruling party. The treaty with Margaret was here fully ratified. Henry was acknowledged king; but as his incapacity for government was univerſally acknowledged, the regency was entruſted to Warwick and Clarence, till prince Edward reached the age of majority; and in default of that prince's iſſue, Clarence was declared ſucceſſor to the crown. Edward was declared a traitor to his country, and an uſurper of the throne. Even the paternal eſtate of the York family was declared to be forfeited. All his friends were attainted; particularly the duke of Glouceſter, his younger brother. The attainders of the dukes of Somerſet and Exeter, the earls of Pembroke, Oxford, Richmond, and Ormond, were reverſed; and all who had ſuffered for adhering to Henry were reſtored to their honours and eſtates.

Clarence and Warwick now aſſumed the government in Henry's name, and diſpoſed of all poſts, both civil and military. The judges, ſheriffs, and coroners, were changed in every part of the kingdom. The archbiſhop of York, brother to the earl of Warwick, was appointed chancellor, and the duke of Clarence lord lieutenant of Ireland. At the ſame time, the paternal eſtate of the York family was ſettled upon him. The marquis of Montague was reſtored to his favourite poſt of warden of the eaſt marches of Scotland, and a long truce was concluded with France.

Edward, when he landed at Alcmaer, was kindly received by De Bruges, governor of Holland, under the duke of Burgundy. But that prince was greatly perplexed with regard to the meaſures moſt proper for him to purſue in this unexpected revolution. He was fearful of plunging himſelf into a war with England, by giving the unfortunate exile an aſylum in his dominions; and he was already attacked by Lewis XI. who had made himſelf maſter of Amiens and St. Quintin. He therefore ſent his ſecretary, Philip de Comines, to Calais to diſcover the intentions of Vauclere the governor, with regard to his future conduct. He found the governor, the garriſon, and all the inhabitants of the town, dreſſed in Warwick's livery, which they had aſſumed on the firſt news of that nobleman's ſucceſs, and was aſſured that the earl was ſending over four thouſand men to begin hoſtilities in the duke's dominions, who, as the protector of Edward, had been declared the enemy of England. Philip, though alarmed at this intimation, told the governor that his maſter's treaty, which was made with the kingdom as well as the king of England, was ſtill in force: and that the duke of Burgundy conceived himſelf bound to obſerve the articles, the change of the king's name from Edward to Henry making no difference. Theſe arguments would, however, have had little weight with the Engliſh government, had they not been ſupported by the merchants of London and Calais, who had then great influence on the affairs of the nation, and who were afraid of loſing the principal part of their commerce with the duke of Burgundy. At their inſtances therefore the earl of Warwick put a ſtop to all hoſtilities, and it was agreed that the treaty ſhould continue in force; and the duke, on his part, promiſed to give no aſſiſtance to Edward. But this covenant was very ill obſerved; for though he refuſed to ſupply him openly, he equipped four large veſſels in the name of ſome private merchants, and cauſed fourteen ſhips to be ſecretly hired of the Eaſterlings. This ſmall ſquadron, together with a conſiderable ſum of money, he delivered to Edward, who immediately ſailed for England, with his ſmall retinue and a body of two thouſand men. On his departure the duke iſſued a proclamation, forbidding all his ſubjects to give him any aſſiſtance on pain of death.

A. D. 1771. Edward reached the coaſt of Norfolk on the twelfth of May, and ſent Sir Robert Chamberlain and Sir Gilbert Debenham on ſhore, to diſcover the ſentiments of the people with regard to his intereſt; but they ſoon perceived that the great vigilance of the earl of Oxford had rendered it very unſafe for them to land in that country. It was, therefore, reſolved to ſtand farther to the northward; but a ſtorm ariſing in the night, they were obliged to continue at ſea till the fourteenth, when they landed at Ravenſpur in Yorkſhire. Edward was ſoon convinced that the policy of the earl of Warwick with regard to changing the magiſtrates was very detrimental to his intereſt, and that it would be neceſſary for him to have recourſe to art and diſſimulation to effect his purpoſe. He pretended, and even made an oath, that he came not to challenge the crown, but to recover his paternal eſtates, which had been unjuſtly taken from him by the parliament.

This political diſſimulation produced the deſired effect upon the minds of the people. Compaſſion ſupplied the place of affection: numbers, deceived by his humble pretenſions, flocked to his ſtandard, and the nobility were very willing to receive him as a fellow-ſubject, though not as a king. He marched directly for the capital of the county where he landed, and found the inhabitants univerſally diſpoſed to aſſiſt him in recovering the eſtates he enjoyed from his anceſtors, though not in the recovery of his crown. It was, therefore, thought neceſſary to give them every ſatisfaction in his power with regard to his pretenſions; and he ſcrupled not to take a ſolemn oath in the cathedral, never to renew his claim to the crown; to govern the city in a kind and courteous manner; and to be a true and faithful ſubject to king Henry.

But Edward never intended to obſerve his oath any longer than it tended to promote his own intereſt. His army was now conſiderably increaſed, and it was determined to march towards the capital where Edward had many powerful friends. Warwick had aſſembled an army in the neighbourhood of Leiceſter, and advanced to give his enemy battle; but Edward by following another road paſſed him unmoleſted, and preſented himſelf before the gates of London. The city ladies became powerful advocates in behalf of the gallant Edward; while his creditors, knowing that they had no other chance for the recovery of their debts, than by re-placing him in the ſeat of power, joined their inſtances in his favour, and Edward entered the city in triumph, while Henry, deſtined to be the ſport of fortune, was again committed to the Tower. He was now in a condition to oppoſe his enemies, and being informed that the earl of Warwick was marching to give him battle, he advanced to meet him, and the two armies came in ſight of each other in the neighbourhood of Barnet. Margaret was every day expected with a conſiderable reinforcement of foreign troops, and all her friends held themſelves in readineſs to join her ſtandard. But Warwick, who was determined either to gain the whole honour of the victory or periſh in the attempt, waited not for Margaret's arrival. The night before the engagement, the duke of Clarence, who had ſecretly entered into engagements with his brother, deſerted to the king, and carried with him twelve thouſand men.

Warwick was now too far advanced to retreat, and rejected with diſdain the terms of peace offered him by Edward and Clarence. He told them, "that he had rather be conſiſtent with himſelf, than to follow the example of a perfidious duke; and that he was determined either to gain the victory or loſe his life." This defection of Clarence greatly affected the ſpirits of Warwick's ſoldiers; and had the earl not been ſo near the enemy he would, in all probability, have declined a battle, and waited the arrival of Margaret; but he was now ſeveral days march from a place of ſafety; and to have attempted a retreat in the face of an army ſuperior in numbers to his own, would have been certain ruin; nor would his intrepid ſoul, a ſtranger to fear, ſuffer him to turn his back upon the enemy.

Early in the morning of the fourteenth of April, both armies were drawn out in order of battle. Edward's van-guard was commanded by the duke of Glouceſter; the main body by himſelf; and the rear by lord Haſtings. The right wing of Warwick's army was commanded by the marquis of Montague and the earl of Oxford; the left by Warwick himſelf aſſiſted by the duke of Exeter; and a ſtrong body of archers poſted in the center by the duke of Somerſet.

Never was victory contended for with more obſtinacy; nor ever were leaders more determined to conquer or periſh. The battle began at four in the morning, and the troops of Warwick, though inferior to thoſe of Edward in number, charged the enemy with ſuch impetuoſity, that the earl of Oxford's diviſion broke the main body of Edward's army; but purſuing the fugitives with too ſanguine an eagerneſs, left their main body defenceleſs. Edward ſaw the miſtake, and attacked the weakened part of Warwick's diviſion at the head of a body of reſerve. Oxford ſoon ſaw his error, and wheeled about to recover his former ſtation; but unfortunately his men, who wore ſtars for their badges, returning from the purſuit and paſſing near the duke of Exeter's diviſion, the latter miſtook their ſtars for ſuns, the badge which diſtinguiſhed Edward's ſoldiers, and charged them ſo furiouſly, that they drove them off the field before the miſtake was diſcovered. This gave the forces of Edward's routed wing an opportunity of rallying. The battle was now no longer equal; the late unfortunate accident had occaſioned a ſuſpicion of treachery. They, however, defended themſelves with the utmoſt bravery, and, in all probability, would have put a final period to Edward's reign, could the unfortunate accident have been retrieved. But that was impoſſible. Warwick in vain exerted all his efforts to ſupport his forces, now borne down by the weight of numbers. He perceived the battle was irretrievably loſt, and diſdaining life when victory was gone, he ruſhed into the middle of Edward's ranks, and fell covered with wounds. His brother, the marquis of Montague, followed his example, and periſhed by his ſide. Their deaths completed the route of their army; and as Edward had iſſued orders to give no quarter, a dreadful carnage enſued. About two thouſand fell on the ſide of the conquerors, and three thouſand on the ſide of the vanquiſhed. The duke of Somerſet and the earl of Oxford fled into Wales, and joined the earl of Pembroke, who was raiſing troops for Warwick's army.

The day after the fatal battle of Barnet, Margaret with her ſon the prince of Wales, landed at Weymouth in Dorſetſhire, attended by the counteſs of Warwick, the prior of St. John of Jeruſalem, the lord Wenlock, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, at the head of a conſiderable body of French troops. The queen had hardly time to repoſe herſelf after the fatigue of a very tempeſtuous paſſage, before ſhe received the fatal intelligence of the defeat and death of Warwick, and the captivity of her huſband. The ſoul of Margaret, hitherto a ſtranger to fear, could not ſupport the ſhock. Her courage and magnanimity gave way to grief and deſpair. She retired to the abbey of Beaulieu in Hampſhire, and regiſtered herſelf, her ſon, and her followers, as perſons claiming ſanctuary in that religious retirement. But her ſpirits were ſoon raiſed from the abyſs of terror into which the weight of her misfortunes had plunged them, by the appearance of the duke of Somerſet, the earl of Devonſhire, the viſcount Beaumont, Sir Thomas Fulford, Sir John Forteſcue, Sir Thomas Seymour, and many other perſons of diſtinction, who, on the firſt news of her landing, ſet out at the head of their vaſſals and dependents to offer her all the aſſiſtance in their power, and to declare their reſolution of ſpending their lives and fortunes in her defence.

This inſtance of affection encouraged Margaret to make one final attempt for the recovery of her throne. She left her ſanctuary, and putting herſelf at the head of her foreign forces, began her march through the counties of Devon and Somerſet, where her army was every day conſiderably increaſed by the continual acquiſition of new partiſans. On the twenty-ninth of April the queen reached Tewkeſbury in Glouceſterſhire, where ſhe propoſed to halt and refreſh her wearied troops after their long and fatiguing march; and then proceed to the borders of Wales in order to join the earl of Pembroke, who had raiſed a conſiderable body of archers. But the activity of Edward prevented this junction. He no ſooner received advice of the queen's landing, than he ſet out at the head of his army to give the Lancaſtrians battle, before their whole ſtrength was conſolidated: and after a very painful and fatiguing march, encamped, on the third of May, within three miles of the enemy. Aſtoniſhed at the approach of Edward's army, a council was immediately held in the queen's camp, where it was reſolved to paſs the Severn, in order to join Pembroke's forces; but the city of Glouceſter refuſing to open her gates, it was conſidered as impracticable to croſs the river in their preſent ſituation without expoſing their rear to inevitable ruin. It was therefore determined, to intrench the army in a part adjacent to the town of Tewkeſbury, where the troops would be flanked on both ſides ſides with hollow ways, ditches, hedges, and broken ground, and the rear defended by the town and abbey; while a ſtrong entrenchment was to be thrown up in the front of the army. Could this reſolution have been completely executed, the queen's camp would have been impregnable; but the activity of Edward prevented them from effecting their deſign; he determined to attack them the next day, before their fortifications could be completed. The Lancaſtrians had, however, uſed ſuch expedition, that Edward owed his ſucceſs to ſtratagem.

He drew up his army in two lines, the firſt of which was commanded by his brother the duke of Glouceſter, while he himſelf, aſſiſted by the duke of Clarence and lord Haſtings, led the other. The Lancaſtrian army was formed into three lines; the firſt was commanded by the duke of Somerſet and his brother lord Beaufort; the ſecond by the prince of Wales, aſſiſted by lord Wenlock; and the third by the earl of Devonſhire. The duke of Glouceſter began the attack with the utmoſt fury; but Somerſet's diviſion, who guarded the front of the entrenchment, received them with ſuch intrepidity, that they were repulſed with conſiderable ſlaughter; and had Somerſet been as remarkable for prudence as he was for valour, Edward, in all probability, would have been obliged to abandon the attempt. But Glouceſter, purſuant to the orders he had received from his brother, perceiving the intrenchments were not to be forced, pretended to retire in confuſion. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; Somerſet, whoſe diſpoſition was naturally impetuous, led his diviſion through the defiles of the intrenchment, leaving orders for the ſecond and third lines to ſupport him, and attacked the Yorkiſts in the open field with the utmoſt fury. A dreadful conteſt enſued, and continued without any perceptible advantage on either ſide, till a detachment of two hundred horſe from Edward's army, attacked the Lancaſtrians in flank, and threw them into diſorder. Somerſet was now obliged to fall back through the defiles to his former ſtation, which he ſhould not have quitted; but was followed ſo cloſely by Glouceſter's diviſion, that the greater part of his troops were cut to pieces. Amazed at not being ſupported, the duke threw his eyes around the camp, and perceived lord Wenlock ſtanding cooly at the head of his diviſion. Somerſet conſtrued this into an act of treachery, and riding up to him with the utmoſt fury, clove the head of that nobleman with his battle-axe.

The duke of Glouceſter had purſued his advantage with ſo much prudence, that his whole diviſion was now within the intrenchments, and was ſoon followed by Edward, at the head of the ſecond line. Confuſion now reigned in every part of the queen's camp. The whole army betook themſelves to a precipitate flight after a faint reſiſtance, and Edward gained one of the moſt complete victories recorded in hiſtory; ſcarce a perſon of any note in the queen's army eſcaping either death or captivity. Among the ſlain were the earl of Devonſhire, lord Beaufort, Sir John Delves, Sir Edward Hambden, Sir Edward Whittingham, and Sir John Luckner. The duke of Somerſet, the grand prior of St. John, and about twenty gentlemen of rank and fortune, took ſanctuary in the abbey-church. But Edward paid no regard to eccleſiaſtical privileges: he ſent a detachment of his forces, who dragged them from their aſylum, and put them immediately to death, according to the barbarous policy of that relentleſs monarch. Margaret of Anjou and her ſon had alſo taken ſanctuary in another religious ſtructure, and were dragged from thence by Edward's ſoldiers. The queen was ſent to the Tower, where ſhe continued four years in cloſe confinement, when ſhe was releaſed by Lewis XI. who generouſly paid fifty thouſand crowns for her ranſom. She retired to France, where ſhe paſſed the remainder of her days in privacy and retirement; after having aſtoniſhed the world by a courage and reſolution, which would have done more honour to her ſex, had ſhe alſo been endowed with its ſoftneſs and other amiable qualities.

But a more melancholy fate attended the young prince her ſon. He was brought into the preſence of Edward, who aſked him, in an inſulting manner, "How he dared to invade his dominions?" The noble youth, forgetting his preſent ſituation, replied, with an unſeaſonable vivacity, "That he came to recover his father's crown, and to claim his juſt inheritance." Stung with this intrepid anſwer, the ungenerous Edward, inſenſible to pity, ſtruck the young prince on the face with his gauntlet; and the dukes of Clarence and Glouceſter, and lord Haſtings, conſidering the blow as a ſignal for farther violence, hurried the prince into the next apartment, where they diſpatched him with their daggers.

Henry himſelf ſurvived the battle of Tewkeſbury only a few days. That unfortunate prince, whoſe innocence and melancholy imbecillity might have defended him from the attempts of violence, fell a victim to the misfortune of being born to a crown. He is ſaid to have fallen by the unrelenting hand of the bloody duke of Glouceſter. His body was expoſed to public view, in order to perſuade the people that his death was natural. But this precaution produced a very contrary effect, by recalling many ſimilar inſtances in the Engliſh hiſtory, and ſuggeſting a compariſon not at all favourable to the government.

The earl of Pembroke, convinced that the fatal battle of Tewkeſbury had put a final period to the hopes of the Lancaſtrian family, fled into Britany, carrying with him his nephew, the young earl of Richmond, afterwards Henry VII. The only partiſan that now remained was the baſtard of Fauconbridge, who took the advantage of Edward's abſence to attempt the recovery of the capital. He had been honoured with a vice-admiral's commiſſion by the earl of Warwick, and appointed to guard the channel; but having been ſtripped of his employment on the death of that nobleman, he withdrew with the ſhips under his command, and for ſome time ſubſiſted by piracy. The landing of Margaret induced him to aſſiſt that princeſs in recovering the Engliſh ſceptre; and being joined by three hundred men from the garriſon of Calais, he landed with his forces at Sandwich, and was admitted into Canterbury by the magiſtrates. Vaſt numbers flocked to his ſtandard; and he marched immediately for London, at the head of ſeventeen thouſand men. He entered Southwark without oppoſition; and had not the news of Edward's victory at Tewkeſbury arrived in the critical moment, he had been maſter of the capital. But the citizens, encouraged by the hopes of effectual aſſiſtance from their victorious monarch, ſhut their gates againſt the inſurgents. They made, however, a deſperate attempt to carry the bridge by ſtorm; but being repulſed with great ſlaughter, they deſerted their leader, who was ſoon after taken priſoner, and executed, according to the ſummary manner of thoſe ferocious times.

Edward had now no competitor for the throne, nor any enemy to fear. A parliament was ſummoned, which, like the other aſſemblies of that kind during the civil wars, ratified all the acts of the victor, recognized his title, and again attainted the whole Lancaſtrian party. But proſperity was of more pernicious conſequence to Edward than adverſity. He had ſufficient firmneſs to ſupport all the evils of the latter, but he could not reſiſt the allurements of the former. He devoted himſelf to amuſements, and was far more attentive to fill his coffers than to remove the complaints and grievances of his ſubjects. His familiar manners, and pleaſing addreſs, rendered him, however, extremely popular, notwithſtanding the cruelties he had exerciſed on his enemies. The melancholy ideas of deſtruction were abſorbed in the gay ſcenes of pleaſure and diſſipation.

A. D. 1474. But the deſire of foreign conqueſts, which had ſo nobly emblazoned the reigns of his predeceſſors, at length rouſed Edward from the couch of voluptuouſneſs. A treaty of alliance was concluded with Charles duke of Burgundy; by which it was ſtipulated, that Edward ſhould croſs the ſeas with an army of above ten thouſand men; and that Charles ſhould join him with all his forces, in order to invade the territories of Lewis: that Edward ſhould challenge the crown of France; and that the ſword of war ſhould not be ſheathed till he had obtained the provinces of Guienne and Normandy: That Champaigne, and ſeveral other territories, ſhould be procured for the duke; and that all his dominions ſhould be freed from the burden of homage to the crown of France. It was added, that neither party ſhould make peace without the conſent of the other. The Engliſh parliament, always ready to aſſiſt their ſovereign in any attempt to humble France, granted him a large ſubſidy; and every precaution was taken to render the ſucceſs of this expedition as brilliant as thoſe that attended the attempts of his predeceſſors.

A. D. 1475. Edward, attended by the principal nobility of England, landed at Calais, at the head of thirty thouſand archers, and prepared to carry his conqueſts into the very heart of France. But the ſanguine hopes of the Engliſh were greatly leſſened, when the duke of Burgundy joined them with only his common equipages. That prince, tranſported by the violence of his temper, had led his army to the frontiers of Germany, where they were employed againſt the duke of Lorrain, and other princes of the Empire. Edward was greatly diſguſted at this breach of the treaty, and determined to take every advantage that offered for promoting his own intereſt. Lewis XI. a prince who diſdained all military glory, and who, dreading the events of war, regulated all his proceedings by a policy, which the more certainly anſwered his purpoſe, as he was not over ſcrupulous in adhering to his engagements. Money was the great hinge on which his politics turned. He made very advantageous offers to Edward; and a treaty was concluded at Pecquigni, near Amiens; by which it was ſtipulated, "That Lewis ſhould pay ſeventy-five thouſand crowns, to indemnify Edward for the expences of the expedition; that he ſhould alſo pay him annually the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns during their joint lives; that the dauphin of France ſhould marry Elizabeth, Edward's daughter, and ſettle on her ſixty thouſand livres a year as her jointure; and that neither party ſhould encourage civil wars in the other's dominions, but, on the contrary, aſſiſt in ſuppreſſing the inſurrections of their ſubjects." At the ſame time, Lewis gained over the Engliſh miniſters to his intereſt, by ſettling penſions on them to the amount of ſixteen thouſand crowns a year. Lord Haſtings had two thouſand; lord Howard, and others, had nearly the ſame proportion: nor were theſe great miniſters aſhamed to receive wages from a foreign prince. The two monarchs had afterwards an interview on the bridge of Pecquigni, where mutual profeſſions of friendſhip paſſed between them; and the Engliſh had free acceſs into the city of Amiens, where Lewis reſided. But though the French king teſtified the utmoſt confidence in Edward, he, at the ſame time, artfully eluded the propoſal of his making a journey to Paris. "Edward," ſaid he privately to Comines, "is very handſome, and very amorous. Some lady at Paris may invite him to return in a leſs civil manner: it is better the ſea ſhould be between us." But notwithſtanding the profound diſſimulation of Lewis, he could not forbear throwing out ſome railleries on the eaſy ſimplicity of Edward, in allowing himſelf to be diſarmed by money; but perceiving he was overheard by a Gaſcon who had ſettled in England, he was immediately ſenſible of his blunder. He ſent a meſſage to the gentleman, and engaged him to remain in France. "It is but juſt" ſaid he, "that I pay the penalty of my talkativeneſs."

A. D. 1476. Edward being thus diſengaged from foreign wars, applied himſelf to the adminiſtration of juſtice, and the purſuit of ſuch meaſures as tended to fill his own coffers. The diſbanding of the army lately returned from France, had filled the whole country with robbers; no perſon could travel without the utmoſt danger of loſing his life or effects. Determined to remove this grievance, the king made a circuit, with his judges, through the kingdom, and exerted exerted himſelf with ſuch vigour and impartiality in the diſtribution of juſtice, that he reſtored the public peace, and freed the roads from thoſe gangs of banditti, by whom they were ſo lately infeſted. But Edward knew that theſe proceedings, however popular and neceſſary, would not be ſufficient to procure him any ſubſidies from the parliament. The leading men of the nation were too highly offended by the miſcarriage of the late expedition, from which they had formed ſuch ſanguine expectations, to think of granting any farther ſupplies. Recourſe was therefore had by Edward to other methods for accumulating treaſure. He engaged in commerce, which he carried on, with great advantage, as a private merchant. He ſold the profits of vacant biſhopricks. He demanded fines for the reſtitution of temporalities. He ranſacked old records to find defective titles, and obliged the proprietors to pay large ſums for their confirmation; and he impoſed exorbitant taxes upon the clergy. Theſe methods, aſſiduouſly purſued, brought very large ſums into his treaſury, and ſaved him the mortification of a refuſal from his parliament.

A. D. 1477. The duke of Clarence, who had ſo greatly contributed to the reſtoration of Edward by his deſertion from Warwick, could never regain the friendſhip of his brother; the levity and violence of his temper rendered him always ſuſpected. Richard, duke of Glouceſter, a cloſe, reſerved, and deliberate prince, was ſtill a greater enemy to Clarence than the king. Glouceſter had already formed the bloody deſign of ſeizing the crown on the death of Edward, whoſe health was daily declining by his exceſſive debauchery. He therefore became an enemy to Clarence from principle, becauſe he ſtood before him in the order of ſucceſſion. A combination between ſuch potent adverſaries could not fail of deſtroying Clarence; and it was determined to begin by attacking his friends, not doubting but his paſſion would betray him into meaſures which would give them ſufficient advantage over him. The king hunting one day in the park of Burdet of Arrow, in Warwickſhire, killed a white buck, which was a great favourite of its owner; and Burdet, tranſported with rage, wiſhed the horns of the deer in the belly of the perſon who had adviſed Edward to commit that inſult upon him. This pardonable expreſſion of reſentment was conſidered as a capital crime in a friend to the duke of Clarence, and he was publicly beheaded at Tyburn for this pretended offence. The next that fell a ſacrifice to their reſentment againſt Clarence, was John Stacy, an eccleſiaſtic; who being better acquainted with mathematics and aſtronomy than moſt men of that age, was conſidered by the vulgar as a magician, and his friendſhip with Clarence rendered him obnoxious to the court. He was tried for that imaginary crime, and put to death for his learning. The ignorance of the age furniſhed the government with pretences for exerciſing their paſſions and reſentments.

Theſe inſtances of cruelty and injuſtice, which Clarence could not help perceiving were pointed at him, excited in his breaſt a thorough deteſtation for the authors. But inſtead of endeavouring to render their malice abortive by ſilence and reſerve, he loudly remonſtrated againſt the iniquity of his perſecutors, and defended, with unſhaken firmneſs, the innocence of his friends.

A. D. 1478. His enemies had now obtained what they thought ſufficient to convict him. He was arreſted, and committed to the Tower. A parliament was alſo ſummoned. The king appeared perſonally as his brother's accuſer, and pleaded the cauſe againſt him. The liberty of judgment was taken from the court by this ſtrange method of proceeding; ſo that, though only ſome raſh expreſſions were objected againſt him, he was condemned to ſuffer death. The Commons alſo meanly ſupported the injuſtice of the peers, by petitioning for his execution. It is aſtoniſhing that the parliament, which had long aſſumed the power of refuſing the moſt neceſſary ſubſidies, ſhould, in this inſtance, be ſo ſervilely ſubmiſſive to the court. Can it be ſuppoſed, that the lives, even of the princes of the blood, were, in theſe times, leſs regarded than the public money? And yet this is the only method of accounting for their proceedings.

Edward, who had taken ſo much pains to convict his brother, did not ſuffer him to languiſh long in priſon. The only favour he granted him, after his condemnation, was to leave him the choice of his own death, and he deſired that he might be drowned in a butt of malmſey; a circumſtance which ſhews, that he was extremely fond of that liquor, or that he was governed by caprice in every circumſtance of his conduct. His behaviour to his laſt moments was expreſſive of his character. He left two children by the eldeſt daughter of the earl of Warwick; a ſon, created an earl by his grandfather's title; and a daughter, afterwards counteſs of Saliſbury.

A. D. 1481. Edward now devoted his time to pleaſure and amuſement. He ſlumbered on the couch of indolence, and all the glories of his reign were abſorbed in the whirlpool of effeminacy. Lewis ſaw his ſupine conduct with a ſecret pleaſure; and being deſirous of marrying the dauphin to the daughter of Maximilian of Auſtria, an infant only two years of age, the treaty was now concluded, though he had promiſed, by the treaty of Pecquigni, that the dauphin ſhould marry the princeſs Elizabeth. Aſtoniſhed and incenſed at this unpardonable affront, Edward awoke from his lethargy, and vowed to take ample vengeance on Lewis for his perfidy. But that politic monarch, whoſe prudence was equal to his falſhood, foreſaw the gathering ſtorm, and had taken meaſures to break its force. He ſent ambaſſadors to James III. of Scotland, offering him great advantages if he would break his truce with Edward, and carry his arms into the northern parts of England. James, who was a very weak prince, and lived on bad terms with his own nobility, imprudently liſtened to the artful ſuggeſtions of Lewis, and levied an army to execute a deſign, to which he was far from being equal; but when his forces arrived on the borders of England, the barons conſpiring againſt his favourites, put them to death with the form of a trial; and his whole army immediately diſperſed. Soon after, the duke of Glouceſter entered Scotland at the head of the Engliſh forces, made himſelf maſter of Berwick, and forced James to accept of a peace, by which that important fortreſs was ceded to the Engliſh.

A. D. 1483. The war in Scotland being thus happily terminated, Edward devoted his whole attention to the war he meditated againſt France; but while he was employed in making the neceſſary preparations, he was ſeized with a mortal diſtemper, which put an end to his life on the ninth of April, in the forty-ſecond year of his age, and the twenty-third of his reign.

The hiſtory of this prince ſufficiently diſplays his genuine character. In his youth he was active and intrepid, but cruel and vindictive. He was more remarkable for his vigour than for either prudence or virtue. The latter part of his reign was wholly ſpent in indolence and pleaſure; but the death of his brother ſufficiently indicates, that his paſſion for cruelty continued amidſt all the ſcenes of voluptuouſneſs; and he left a throne polluted with blood to his ſucceſſor.

Edward prince of Wales, and Richard duke of York, were the only ſons that ſurvived their father. The former was twelve, and the latter ſix years of age, when he paid the debt of nature. Four daughters ſurvived him.

1. Elizabeth, promiſed in marriage to the dauphin of France, but afterwards married to Henry VII.
2. Cicely, betrothed to the prince of Scotland, but afterwards married to the lord Weiles.
3. Anne of York, married to Thomas Howard duke of Norfolk, earl marſhal and lord treaſurer of England.
4. Catherine of York, married to William Courtney, earl of Devonſhire.

EDWARD V.

A. D. 1483. THE young prince, who had, for ſome time, reſided at Ludlow-caſtle, in Shropſhire, under the care of his uncle, the earl of Rivers, was proclaimed the very day of his father's death, in the ſtreets of London, by the name of Edward V. But unhappily for him, two irreconcileable parties divided the court; that of the queen and her relations, particularly the earl of Rivers, her brother, the moſt accompliſhed nobleman in England; and the marquis of Dorſet, her ſon by a former huſband; and that of the ancient nobility, who envied the ſudden exaltation and unlimited credit of the Wideville family. At the head of this party were the duke of Buckingham, lord Haſtings the chamberlain, and the lords Howard and Stanley. The late king ſaw with regret the dreadful conſequences that might reſult from theſe alarming diviſions, during the minority of his ſon, and endeavoured to reconcile the contending parties. He ſent for them as he lay on his death-bed, conjured them to lay aſide their animoſities, and labour to promote peace and unanimity in the kingdom during the tender years of his ſon; and prevailed upon them to embrace each other with all the marks of a cordial reconciliation. But his labours were in vain. His eyes were no ſooner cloſed by death, than all their former animoſities revived; they followed their ſeparate intereſts, and each endeavoured to gain the duke of Glouceſter, who had been appointed by his brother regent of the kingdom, over to their party. Glouceſter, who was at once both cruel and ambitious, and capable of the moſt inhuman crimes, concealed his dark purpoſes under the maſk of profound diſſimulation and policy. He affected the greateſt zeal for the ſervice of the queen, that he might acquire a full influence over her conduct. The earl of Rivers had been intruſted by the deceaſed monarch with the care and education of his ſon; and the queen was now deſirous that he ſhould levy a body of troops, to conduct his young ſovereign to London, in order to his being crowned with the uſual ſolemnities. Glouceſter perſuaded the queen, that an armed force on this occaſion might be dangerous, and was not at all neceſſary. An order was therefore ſent to Rivers to bring the young king to London, with no greater retinue than was neceſſary to ſupport his ſtate and dignity.

The earl, who never ſuſpected the treachery of Glouceſter, readily obeyed. He was met at Northampton by that prince and the duke of Buckingham; and after paſſing a friendly evening with them, he was arreſted the next day by Glouceſter's orders; and, together with Sir Richard Gray, one of the queen's ſons, and Sir Thomas Vaughan, who poſſeſſed a conſiderable poſt in the king's houſhold, ſent priſoners to Pontefract caſtle. In vain did the young monarch, with all the eloquence of tears and intreaties, intercede with his inhuman uncle for the releaſe of perſons ſo dear to him. Glouceſter refuſed his requeſt, and conducted Edward to London, where he was received, by the loudeſt acclamations, of the people.

The account of theſe tyrannical proceedings no ſooner reached the ears of the queen, than ſhe conceived the whole deſign of the duke of Glouceſter; and conſidering her brother and two ſons as irretrievably loſt, ſhe fled to the ſanctuary of Weſtminſter, with the duke of York, the marquis of Dorſet, and the reſt of her family; reſolving there to await the returns of better fortune. Lord Haſtings was then at London; and though he hated the queen and her relations, had ſtill a ſincere affection for his late maſter, and was unalterably devoted to the king and his brother. He was well acquainted with the deſign of ſeizing Rivers, and pleaſed that the ſcheme had taken effect; but he was confident that nothing more was intended than to ſuppreſs the queen's party. He entertained not the leaſt ſuſpicion of Glouceſter's real deſign. Accordingly he wrote to Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, and then lord chancellor of England, deſiring him not to be alarmed at what had happened, as every thing would tend to promote the peace and happineſs of the kingdom.

On Glouceſter's arrival, a council was ſummoned, to ſettle the adminiſtration, and he was declared protector of the realm, without waiting for the meeting of the parliament. The queen was the only perſon who yet ſuſpected the duke's intentions. He had carefully concealed his ſentiments from his intimate friends, under the artful veil of diſſimulation; but he well knew, that unleſs he could find means to get the duke of York into his power, all his ſchemes muſt prove abortive. He therefore complained to the council, that the queen's ill-grounded apprehenſions were an indignity to the government; and repreſented the neceſſity of the young prince's appearance at the coronation of his brother; propoſing, that if the queen refuſed to liſten to the voice of reaſon, he ſhould be taken from the aſylum by force. At the ſame time, he affirmed, that ſanctuaries were intended only for the protection of malefactors, and were therefore utterly uſeleſs to a perſon who, by reaſon of his tender age, could lie under the burden of no crime, and who, for the ſame reaſon, was abſolutely incapable of claiming ſecurity from any ſacred retreat. Cardinal Bourchier, the primate, and Rotheram, archbiſhop of York, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the protector's reaſons, and declared that ſanctuaries were inviolable; but as they penetrated not the duke's deſign, they offered to uſe every argument in their power to induce the queen to comply with the wiſhes of the council. Both theſe prelates were perſons of great integrity and honour: and the queen perceiving, that if ſhe refuſed to comply, the young prince would be taken by force, ſhe produced her ſon; and after bedewing him with her tears, and bidding him an eternal adieu, ſhe delivered him to the cardinal, who carried him immediately to his uncle.

The treacherous and ambitious Glouceſter ſeemed to be for ever excluded from the throne by unſurmountable obſtacles. The numerous iſſue of Edward, and the two children of Clarence, had preferable titles to him. But no reſtraints were ſufficient to with-hold his violence; his fierce and ſavage nature was ſtartled at no crimes; every thing gave way to his ambition. The death of the earl of Rivers, and the other priſoners confined in Pontefract caſtle, was firſt determined; and the protector found no difficulty in obtaining the conſent of his party to that ſanguinary meaſure; but fearing that a trial might fill the people with apprehenſions, eſpecially as the crimes that could be alledged againſt them were far from being capital, it was reſolved to diſpatch them without any legal proceſs; and orders were immediately diſpatched to Sir Ralph Ratcliffe, a man capable of the moſt enormous actions, to behead his noble priſoners.

The very day theſe bloody orders were executed, the protector ſummoned a council to meet in the Tower; and having already diſcovered, by his agents, that Haſtings was unalterably attached to the children of his deceaſed maſter, he determined to ruin a man whoſe power and popularity were ſufficient to render all his deſigns abortive. Haſtings, not the leaſt ſuſpecting any deſign was formed againſt his life, repaired to the council, where he met the protector, whoſe behaviour was remarkably affable. After a ſhort ſtay, Richard retired from the board, deſiring the lords to continue their deliberations during his abſence. He ſoon returned with an angry and enflamed countenance, biting his lips, and exhibiting all the marks of the moſt violent indignation. "My lords," ſaid he, "what puniſhment do thoſe deſerve who have plotted againſt my life?" Haſtings replied, that they deſerved the puniſhment of traitors. "Theſe traitors," replied the protector, "are the ſorcerers my brother's wife, and Jane Shore his miſtreſs, with others their aſſociates. See to what a condition they have reduced me by their incantations and witchcraft!" On uttering theſe words, he uncovered his arm, which was ſhrivelled and decayed. The members of the council, who well knew that his arm had always been in that condition, were confounded, and looked upon one another with aſtoniſhment. After a conſiderable pauſe, Haſtings anſwered, "Certainly, my lord, if they are guilty of theſe crimes, they deſerve the ſevereſt puniſhment." "And do you reply to me," ſaid the protector, "with your ifs and your ands? You are the chief abettor of that witch Shore: you are yourſelf a traitor; and I ſwear by St. Paul, that I will not dine before your head be brought me!" He ſtruck the table violently with his hand; a number of armed men ruſhed into the council-chamber, and ſeized the members. Haſtings was led immediately to the green before the chapel of the Tower, where, after confeſſion to a prieſt, who happened accidentally to be on the ſpot, he was beheaded on a timber log lying on the green. The archbiſhop of York, the biſhop of Ely, and lord Stanley, who aſſiſted at the council, were ſent to different apartments in the Tower, and no perſon ſuffered to viſit them.

Two hours after, the protector, apprehenſive that the inhabitants of London, by whom Haſtings was greatly beloved, would raiſe a tumult in the city, cauſed a proclamation, well penned, and fairly written, to be read to the populace, enumerating the crimes of Haſtings, and apologizing for the precipitate manner of the execution, from the ſuddenneſs of the diſcovery. But the conduct of Richard could not deceive the people. It was obſerved, that the proclamation had certainly been drawn by the ſpirit of prophecy. Glouceſter was, however, yet deſirous of obſerving ſome conſiſtence in his proceedings; and he therefore ordered Jane Shore to be apprehended, and tried before the council for ſorcery and witchcraft. No proofs were, however, found againſt her, notwithſtanding the ignorance and abſurdity of the age, and ſhe was acquitted of the charge. But the protector was determined ſhe ſhould not eſcape his vengeance. He cauſed her to be indicted before the ſpiritual court for lewdneſs and adultery; and ſhe did penance, in a white ſheet, at St. Paul's, before all the people. She, however, ſurvived her misfortunes; and was alive in the reign of Henry VIII. when Sir Thomas Moore knew her. But though ſhe had greatly recommended herſelf by acts of beneficence and humanity; though ſhe had removed the ſtings of poverty from the breaſts of the indigent, and applied the balm of comfort to the wounds of affliction, ſhe found no friends in adverſity, and ſpent the evening of her life in miſery and want.

The death of the priſoners at Pontefract, and that of Haſtings, exciting no inſurrection among the people, Glouceſter became more confident: he threw off the maſk of diſſimulation, openly aſpired to the crown, and perpetrated other acts of injuſtice and violence. He propagated doubts with regard to the validity of Edward's marriage with the lady Elizabeth Wideville; pretending that he had, previous to that tranſaction, been privately married to the lady Eleanor Talbot, daughter to the earl of Shrewſbury. But this not gaining belief, he had recourſe to a ſtill more deteſtable calumny. He gave out, that both Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence, were illegitimate; that the dutcheſs of York had received into her bed different lovers, who were the fathers of theſe children, and that Glouceſter alone was the lawful offspring of the duke of York. Human nature muſt be ſunk to the loweſt degree of brutality, when it ſcruples not to throw ſuch horrid calumnies on perſons whom even inſtinct teaches to reverence. The dutcheſs of York, his own mother, on whom ſo baſe an aſperſion was thrown, was ſtill alive, and a princeſs of irreproachable virtue. But no conſiderations could change the purpoſe of Glouceſter. He cauſed theſe impudent aſſertions to be promulgated from the pulpit. Dr. Shaw, an eminent orator of thoſe times, was appointed preacher in St. Paul's; and having choſen for his text the following paſſage from the Wiſdom of Solomon, "Baſtard ſlips ſhall not thrive," he enlarged upon all the arguments that had any tendency to throw an odium on the births of Edward IV. and the duke of Clarence. He afterwards extolled the virtues of the protector to the ſkies, repreſenting him as the legal heir of the crown, and the only hope of the nation; concluding his panegyric, by crying aloud, "God ſave king Richard." The audience kept a profound ſilence, which greatly diſconcerted both the protector and the preacher. Shaw loſt all his popularity from this ſhameful proſtitution of his talent, and Richard himſelf was beheld with contempt.

But Glouceſter was not to be diverted from his purpoſe by one miſcarriage. He had, indeed, proceeded too far, to think of receding. It was neceſſary for him to perſevere: he muſt either gain the ſceptre or periſh. It was therefore agreed in the council, which now conſiſted wholly of Richard's creatures, that another attempt ſhould be made to obtain the voice of the people in his favour. Accordingly the lord mayor, aldermen, and livery of London, were aſſembled at Guildhall; where the duke of Buckingham, in a ſtudied harangue, expatiated on the virtues of the duke of Glouceſter; and concluded with aſking, Whether they would have that prince for their king? A profound ſilence reigned through the whole aſſembly. The duke repeated the ſubſtance of his harangue, and aſked the ſame queſtion; but the ſame ſilence was continued. The mayor deſired the recorder might addreſs the aſſembly, he being always conſidered as the mouth of the city. The experiment was accordingly tried, but with no better ſucceſs; not a word eſcaped from the lips of the audience. "This is aſtoniſhing obſtinacy," cried the duke; "declare your ſentiments one way or other. But you ought to remember, that your conſent is not conſidered as neceſſary. The lords and commons have ſufficient authority to place whom they pleaſe on the throne; and when we aſk your conſent, it ſhould be conſidered as a favour. However, I now demand, in plain terms, whether you will, or will not, have the protector for your ſovereign?" This ſpeech, which was conſidered rather as a menace than an appeal to their judgment, occaſioned a general murmur through the whole audience. At length ſome of the meaneſt apprentices, incited by bribes from the government, ſet up a feeble cry of "Long live king Richard." This was conſidered as a ſufficient declaration of the ſentiments of the nation; the voice of the people was the voice of God; and Buckingham haſtened to acquaint the protector, that he was called upon to aſſume the reins of government. Richard pretended to be aſtoniſhed at the propoſal. He declared he would obſerve inviolably his loyalty to his preſent ſovereign, and exhorted them to imitate his example. He, however, ſuffered himſelf to be perſuaded to accept the crown; and from that moment he acted as the legitimate and legal poſſeſſor of the Engliſh throne.

Theſe proceedings ſufficiently indicated the fate of the two young princes. Their death was determined, and a commiſſion ſent to Sir Robert Brakenbury, conſtable of the Tower, to put a period to the lives of thoſe innocent children. But that gentleman poſſeſſed too much virtue to be concerned in an office ſo ſhocking to humanity. Sir Walter Tyrrel, a man practiſed in the ſcenes of blood, was next applied to. and he accepted the inhuman commiſſion. Tyrrel choſe three aſſociates, Slater, Dighton, and Foreſt, and having, by Richard's expreſs order, obtained the keys of the Tower, he led his companions in iniquity to the door of the chamber where the two princes lodged, bidding them execute their orders. They found the unſuſpecting innocents in a ſound ſleep, and after ſuffocating them with the bolſter and pillows, they buried their bodies deep in the earth, at the ſtair-foot, under a heap of rubbiſh. Theſe particulars were afterwards confeſſed by the perpetrators, in the following reign; though they were never puniſhed for a crime that ſhocks human nature.

RICHARD III.

A. D. 1483. THE whole annals of hiſtory does not afford an inſtance of a more flagrant uſurpation than that of Richard, nor of one more repugnant to every principle of juſtice and public intereſt. But no perſon of diſtinction ſtood forth in defence of injured innocence, ſo that the tyrant was ſuffered to wear a crown he had polluted with the blood of his own relations. He was, indeed, deſirous of gaining over the nobility to his intereſt; but his actions had been too notorious and execrable to prevail on the more virtuous part of that powerful order. Buckingham, to whom he chiefly owed his crown, was loaded with preferments. But he either preſumed too far upon his favour, or Richard thought it dangerous to augment his authority any farther, for he denied a requeſt made by that powerful nobleman. Buckingham, haughty, violent and avaricious, was ſo highly offended, that he left the court and retired to his caſtle of Brecknock, where the biſhop of Ely, who had been ſeized with lord Haſtings, was then confined. This prelate, who was an able politician, and a zealous friend to the houſe of Lancaſter, conſidered this diſguſt as a favourable incident to bring the duke over to his own party, eſpecially as the duke's family had been zealous Lancaſtrians. He was not miſtaken. Buckingham liſtened with great attention to the arguments of the prelate, and a ſcheme was formed for driving the tyrant from the ſeat of power, and placing on the throne the young earl of Richmond, who was to marry the princeſs Elizabeth, now the lawful ſucceſſor of Edward IV. This alliance they thought could not fail of engaging the two families of York and Lancaſter in their intereſt; and conſequently extinguiſh the flames of civil diſcord which had ſo long ſpread deſolation over the kingdom. It has been already obſerved, that the earl of Pembroke, ſoon after the battle of Tewkeſbury, had fled to the court of Britany, carrying with him his nephew, young Henry, earl of Richmond. That prince was now conſidered as the head of the Lancaſtrian party. He was heir, by the female line, to the houſe of Somerſet, and grandſon to Sir Owen Tudor, who had married Catharine of France, the widow of Henry V.

This project being formed, application was made to the queen dowager, who willingly gave her conſent, hoping ſoon to be in a capacity of retaliating on the head of the uſurper all the injuries he had inflicted on her family. The young earl of Richmond alſo engaged to celebrate his marriage with Elizabeth as ſoon as he arrived in England. Thus far every thing ſucceeded according to their wiſhes; but though the utmoſt care was taken to keep thoſe deſigns an impenetrable ſecret, yet they eſcaped not the vigilance of Richard, and he haſtened to put the kingdom in a poſture of defence. He collected his troops, and began his march towards the weſtern counties, where he was informed the earl of Richmond propoſed to land, and where ſeveral of his friends were already in arms, expecting to be joined by the duke of Buckingham, at the head of his forces.

That nobleman had collected a powerful army, and was now advancing, by long and haſty marches, into the foreſt of Deane, in order to croſs the Severn, and join his weſtern friends at Saliſbury. But on approaching the borders of that river, he found that the waters had overflowed their banks in a manner before unknown. The Welſh, alarmed with ſuperſtitious terrors at this extraordinary event, and, at the ſame time, diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, abandoned his camp, and Buckingham in a few days was left only with one ſervant, who was faithful enough to attend his maſter in diſtreſs. He had now no other reſource than that of concealing himſelf till the arrival of the earl of Richmond, or ſome other accident occaſioned a revolution in the government. He accordingly diſguiſed himſelf in the habit of a peaſant, and took ſhelter in the houſe of an old ſervant of his family. But being diſcovered in his retreat, he was carried to Shrewſbury, and inſtantly beheaded without any form of trial.

The earl of Richmond had not been wanting on his part to join his friends on the day appointed. He embarked with five thouſand men at St. Maloes, on board forty veſſels, but being overtaken with a terrible ſtorm, his fleet was ſeparated, and he was obliged to return to the court of Britany, where he learned the unwelcome news of the death of Buckingham, and the diſperſion of his friends. Nothing but the abhorrence in which Richard was held by the greater part of the Engliſh, could have animated the earl and his friends to perſevere in their deſign, and make another attempt to wreſt the ſceptre from the hand of the tyrant.

A. D. 1484. Richard flattered himſelf that he had cruſhed the rebellion in its bud, and therefore ventured to call a parliament, who had now no other choice than that of recognizing the uſurper's authority, and acknowledge his title to the crown. His only ſon Edward, then twelve years of age, was created prince of Wales; the duties of tonnage and poundage were granted him for life; and Richard, in order, if poſſible, to reconcile the people to his government, paſſed ſeveral acts, which greatly tended to promote the happineſs of the ſubject.

But the intended marriage between the earl of Richmond and the princeſs Elizabeth, filled the breaſt of Richard with uneaſineſs. He ſaw the danger of ſuch a connection, and determined, if poſſible, to prevent it. In order to this, he paid his court to the queen dowager with ſuch art and addreſs, made ſo many profeſſions of a ſincere and unalterable friendſhip, that Elizabeth, tired with confinement, and thinking her former projects totally deſtroyed, liſtened to propoſals of the murderer of her children, and even promiſed him her daughter in marriage; Richard having made way for this ſtrange connection by carrying off his former wife by poiſon. The queen's conſent being obtained, Richard applied to the court of Rome for a diſpenſation, for concluding an alliance, generally conſidered as inceſtuous. But before this papal inſtrument arrived, the face of affairs was ſuddenly changed, and Richard hurled from the ſeat of power.

A. D. 1485. The earl of Richmond, ſurrounded with many noble exiles from England, having received ſome troops from Charles VIII. who now filled the throne of France, ſailed from Harfleur on the firſt of Auguſt, with a retinue of two thouſand perſons; and after a paſſage of ſix days, arrived at Milford-haven, in Wales, where he landed without oppoſition. The next day he continued his march to Haverfordweſt, where he was joyfully received by the inhabitants. As he advanced, he was continually joined by the partiſans of both families, ſo that his camp ſoon wore a reſpectable aſpect.

Richard, on the firſt intelligence that Henry, earl of Richmond, was preparing for another invaſion, took poſt at Nottingham, as one of the moſt centrical towns of his kingdom, and propoſed to march on the firſt alarm to the place which was moſt expoſed to danger. But he ſhould have remembered that he had much more to fear from his ſecret, than from his open enemies. The duke of Norfolk was the only nobleman ſincerely attached to his intereſt; the reſt were friends to the earl of Richmond, and only waited for a favourable opportunity to deſert his ſtandard. But the perſons that gave Richard the greateſt uneaſineſs, were lord Stanley, and his brother Sir William, whoſe connections with the earl of Richmond were ſtrongly ſuſpected by the uſurper. He had, indeed, employed the former to levy a body of five thouſand men, but inſiſted that he ſhould leave his ſon, the lord Strange, as a hoſtage for his fidelity. This obliged lord Stanley to uſe the greateſt precautions in his proceedings. He found means indeed of informing Henry of his friendly intentions; but his equivocal behaviour rendered his deſigns ſuſpicious to both armies.

The continual increaſe of Henry's army alarmed Richard, and he determined to give him battle as ſoon as poſſible, and decide, by a general action, their diſpute for the crown of England. Henry declined not the engagement, and the two armies came in ſight of each other at Boſworth, a place in Leiceſterſhire, rendered famous in hiſtory for the battle which terminated the quarrel between the houſes of York and Lancaſter. The royal army, which conſiſted of twelve thouſand men, all veterans and well armed, were formed into two lines. The firſt was commanded by the duke of Norfolk; and the ſecond by Richard in perſon, who appeared that day with the royal diadem on his head. The earl's army did not conſiſt of more than five thouſand men, but was alſo divided into two lines; the firſt commanded by the earl of Oxford, and the ſecond by himſelf in perſon: Sir Gilbert Talbot commanded the right wing, and Sir John Savage the left. While the two armies were preparing for battle, lord Stanley poſted himſelf, at the head of four thouſand men, on a piece of ground fronting the interval between the two armies, while his brother Sir William Stanley, with three thouſand, ſtood facing him on the other ſide of the interval. Richard, ſuſpecting Stanley's deſign, ſent him an order to join his army; but receiving an equivocal anſwer, he was ſo enraged at his treachery, that he would have ſtruck off the head of his ſon, had he not been diſſuaded from that reſolution by ſome of his chief officers, who repreſented to him, that ſuch an act could be attended with no advantage, and would certainly provoke Stanley and his brother to join the enemy, though perhaps their intention at preſent might be to remain neuter, till near the concluſion of the battle, and then declare for the party that ſeemed to have gained the advantage. Richard ſubmitted to theſe reaſons, well knowing that a victory over the earl of Richmond would enable him to take ample revenge on all his enemies.

Both armies now moved forward, and the battle was begun by a general diſcharge of arrows; after which the combat became cloſe and bloody. The duke of Norfolk made a motion to encloſe the left wing of Richmond's army, which being perceived by the earl of Oxford, he fell with the utmoſt fury upon Norfolk's diviſion, but was in the utmoſt danger of being ſurrounded. Lord Stanley ſaw that it would be impoſſible for him to extricate himſelf from his preſent ſituation without aſſiſtance, and therefore advanced at the head of his forces, and joining Oxford's line ſecured his flank, and ſtood ready to receive the front of the line commanded by the king in perſon. At the ſame time Sir William Stanley fell upon the flank of Richard's line, and drove them back upon the main body. Norfolk, however, advanced to the charge with more fury than ever, and a dreadful carnage enſued. But the battle was no longer equal; the royal forces were intimidated by the deſertion of Stanley and his brother; while it inſpired Henry's with unuſual courage. Senſible of his deſperate ſituation, the furious tyrant threw his eyes around the field, and diſcovering his rival at no great diſtance, he ſoon opened himſelf a paſſage to the ſpot where Henry fought in perſon, killed Sir Henry Brandon, his ſtandard-bearer, unhorſed Sir John Cheyney, and advanced againſt Henry with all the fury of deſpair. He called aloud to him to pay the forfeit of his treaſon, and rebellious invaſion of his kingdom. Henry declined not the combat; but the two leaders were hardly engaged when Sir William Stanley, breaking in with his troops, ſurrounded Richard, who, after performing the moſt aſtoniſhing acts of valour, fell covered with wounds. The loſs of the king put an end to the conteſt; the royaliſts, deprived of their leader, ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight.

The loſs of the vanquiſhed amounted to four thouſand men, among whom were the duke of Norfolk, the lord Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Richard Ratcliffe, Sir Robert Piercy, Sir Robert Brakenbury, Sir William Conyers, and Sir Richard Clendon. The earl of Richmond's loſs did not exceed an hundred men. The body of Richard being found in a heap of ſlain, was thrown careleſly acroſs a horſe, and in that ignominious manner it was conveyed to Leiceſter, amid the ſhouts of the inſulting populace, and buried without any ceremony, in the church of the Grey Friars.

Henry, by a policy that tended greatly to augment his power, pardoned all who ſubmitted to him. Sir William Cateſby, the tool of Richard's crimes, was the only perſon that ſuffered. He was diſcovered after the battle, and conveyed to Leiceſter, where he was beheaded. Lord Lovel, and the two Staffords, who had incurred the univerſal odium of the people for their attachment to the tyrant, would, in all probability, have ſuffered the ſame fate, had they fallen into the hands of the victor; but they fortunately made their eſcape.

Richard was the laſt of the Plantagenet family that poſſeſſed the crown of England; but not the laſt male heir; for the earl of Warwick, ſon to the duke of Clarence, was ſtill alive, and the only branch of the numerous poſterity of Edward the third, the reſt having periſhed in the civil wars, which, after raging thirty years, was finally terminated by the battle of Boſworth. It would be ſuperfluous to add any thing farther with regard to the character of Richard, the hiſtory of his reign being abundantly ſufficient to diſplay it; for whatever abilities he might poſſeſs as a general, a warrior, or a legiſlator, they were rendered deteſtable by his vices.

HENRY VII.

A. D. 1485. THE victory obtained by Henry at Boſworth put a final period to the dreadful wars between the two roſes, which had ſo long manured the kingdom with the blood of its inhabitants. The power of the houſe of York was now no more. This was ſo well known that the common ſoldiers were prompted, even in the field of battle, to beſtow the title of king upon their general. Every quarter reſounded with the acclamations of "Long live king Henry." Stanley, deſirous of giving ſome appearance of formality to this popular election, brought the crown which had been taken from Richard, and placed it on the head of the victor.

This general voice of the army was conſidered as a circumſtance of great importance in favour of Henry, whoſe title to the crown was by no means unexceptionable. The root of his family was John of Ghent, earl of Lancaſter, fourth ſon to Edward III. That prince was thrice married; firſt, to Blanche of Lancaſter, by whom he had two daughters; Philippa, married to John, king of Portugal; and Elizabeth, eſpouſed to John Holland, duke of Exeter; and a ſon, who afterwards aſcended the throne by the name of Henry IV. and whoſe male deſcendants became extinct in the perſon of Henry VI. ſecondly, to Conſtance, princeſs of Caſtile and Leon, who bore him one daughter, married to the king of Caſtile; and thirdly, to Catherine, widow of Sir Otter Swinford. This lady had for ſome years before her marriage, lived with John of Ghent as his miſtreſs, and, during that interval, bore him four children, John Beaufort, duke of Somerſet; Henry Beaufort, cardinal of Wincheſter; Thomas Beaufort, duke of Exeter; and Joan Beaufort, counteſs of Weſtmorland. Theſe children were indeed afterwards legitimated by the parliament; but the ſame act which freed them from the opprobious name of baſtards, excluded them from the crown. John Beaufort, the eldeſt, left a ſon called by his own name, and enjoyed his title of duke of Somerſet. The latter had only one daughter, named Margaret, who married Edmund Tudor, duke of Richmond, whoſe eldeſt ſon was Henry VII.

From this genealogical deduction it is ſufficiently evident that Henry's ſlender title to the crown was ſubject to two materials objections; the acknowledged priority of right in the houſe of York, and the illegitimacy of all John's children by his third marriage. Add to this, that Henry's mother, from whom he derived his right, was ſtill alive, and evidently preceded him in the order of ſucceſſion. Henry's projected marriage with the princeſs Elizabeth was therefore the only proper method by which he could overcome the difficulties attending his claim, as by that means the rights of both houſes would be united. But as Henry was not inclined to be indebted to a woman for his crown, nor diſpoſed to part with it to the next ſucceſſion, ſhould ſhe die without iſſue, he reſolved to take upon him the dignity of king by virtue of his popular election, joined with his being the head of the houſe of Lancaſter, and to act as ſuch before any formal coronation. At the ſame time his jealouſy of the houſe of York, a weakneſs he conſtantly entertained, induced him to commit to the Tower, the earl of Warwick, an innocent prince then only ten years of years.

Henry entered London on the twenty-ſecond of Auguſt, and was received with all thoſe demonſtrations of joy, which the hopes of being delivered from the miſeries of civil wars could inſpire. He repaired directly to St. Paul's, where he offered the ſtandards he had taken in the late battle, and Te Deum was ſung for his victory. He ſoon after aſſembled the chief of the nobility, and ſolemnly ſwore to marry the princeſs Elizabeth; a meaſure the more neceſſary as the people began to be alarmed at a report induſtriouſly propagated, that he had already engaged in a contract of marriage with Anne, daughter and heireſs of Francis, duke of Britany.

While the neceſſary preparations were making for the coronation of Henry, an epidemical diſtemper broke out in London. This dreadful diſeaſe, which ſwept away many thouſands of the inhabitants, was, from the ſymptoms attending it, termed the ſweating ſickneſs, and is thought to have been the firſt time it ever appeared in the world. The confuſion it occaſioned delayed the ceremony, and Henry employed the interval in rewarding the ſervices of his faithful friends and adherents. John de Vere, earl of Oxford, was made conſtable of the Tower; Jaſper, earl of Pembroke, uncle to the king, and the tutor and guardian of his tender years, was created duke of Bedford; the lord Stanley, earl of Derby; and Sir Edward Courtney, earl of Devonſhire.

As ſoon as the late alarming diſtemper was entirely ceaſed, Henry was crowned with great pomp and ſolemnity on the thirtieth of October, by cardinal Bouchier, archbiſhop of Canterbury. To augment the ſplendor of this ceremony, Henry inſtituted a body guard, conſiſting of fifty archers, called yeomen, under the command of a captain, to be always in attendance on his perſon: a precaution, which, in all probability, Henry conſidered as indiſpenſably neceſſary to his own ſafety, though he prudently concealed his real ſentiments, under the pretence of augmenting the grandeur of the Engliſh court.

On the ſeventh of November the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and entailed the crown upon Henry, not by recognition or ordinance, but by ſettlement. It was enacted, "That the inheritance of the crown ſhould reſt, remain, and abide in him and the heirs of his body;" and as he was under a ſentence of attainder or outlawry, they extricated themſelves from that difficulty by eſtabliſhing it as a maxim, "That the crown takes away all attainders and corruptions of blood." Henry was, however, ſtill ſo diſſatisfied with his title, that he applied to Rome for a confirmation of it, as if the authority of that court extended to matters of this kind. Innocent VIII. who then filled the papal chair, made no difficulty of granting his requeſt; he even denounced the ſentence of excommunication againſt all thoſe who ſhould dare to diſturb him or his ſucceſſors in the poſſeſſion of the crown.

The act of ſettlement being finiſhed, a bill for reverſing the attainders of one hundred and ſeven perſons, who had ſuffered for their adherence to the houſe of Lancaſter, was paſſed without any oppoſition. It was certainly laudable in Henry to procure the reſtoration of his friends to their honours and eſtates; but the revenge which he exerciſed againſt the retainers of the York family cannot ſurely be conſidered in that light. Yet, at his inſtigation, the parliament paſſed a bill of attainder againſt the late king himſelf, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surry, the viſcount Lovel, the lords Zouche and Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Walter and Sir James Harrington, Sir William Berkeley, Sir Humphry Stafford, and about twenty other gentlemen, who had fought on Richard's ſide in the battle of Boſworth. On the ſeventh of November the parliament met at Weſtminſter, and entailed the crown upon Henry, not by recognition or ordinance, but by ſettlement. It was enacted, "That the inheritance of the crown ſhould reſt, remain, and abide in him and the heirs of his body;" and as he was under a ſentence of attainder or outlawry, they extricated themſelves from that difficulty by eſtabliſhing it as a maxim, "That the crown takes away all attainders and corruptions of blood." The act of ſettlement being finiſhed, a bill for reverſing the attainders of one hundred and ſeven perſons, who had ſuffered for their adherence to the houſe of Lancaſter, was paſſed without any oppoſition. It was certainly laudable in Henry to procure the reſtoration of his friends to their honours and eſtates; but the revenge which he exerciſed againſt the retainers of the York family cannot ſurely be conſidered in that light. Yet, at his inſtigation, the parliament paſſed a bill of attainder againſt the late king himſelf, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Surry, the viſcount Lovel, the lords Zouche and Ferrers of Chartley, Sir Walter and Sir James Harrington, Sir William Berkeley, Sir Humphry Stafford, and about twenty other gentlemen, who had fought on Richard's ſide in the battle of Boſworth. The parliament muſt have been totally deaf to the voice of reaſon and juſtice, to declare perſons guilty of treaſon who had done nothing more than ſupported a monarch in actual poſſeſſion of the crown againſt the earl of Richmond, who had not then even pretended to claim the title. It is therefore no wonder that this meaſure, which was equally mean and imprudent, drew upon Henry the hatred of the Engliſh, who were greatly attached to the blood of their ancient kings.

Though Henry requeſted no ſupplies from the parliament, that aſſembly thought proper to ſettle on him for life the duty of tonnage and poundage, which had been enjoyed in the ſame manner by ſome of his immediate predeceſſors. But when they preſented the bill for the royal aſſent, they petitioned his majeſty to eſpouſe the princeſs Elizabeth: they indeed thought proper to cover their real reaſon under the dutiful pretence of their having heirs of his body. The king promiſed to comply with their deſires; and after having reſtored Edward Stafford, eldeſt ſon to the duke of Buckingham, who had forfeited in the late reign, to all the honours and eſtates of his family, he diſſolved the parliament.

Though many of the partiſans of the houſe of York had been attainted by the late ſtatute, Henry thought proper to publiſh a proclamation, offering a general pardon to all that had carried arms againſt him, provided they ſubmitted within a limited time. The offer was gladly embraced by many of that party, who immediately left their ſanctuaries, and ſubmitted to Henry's government. This act of clemency tended greatly to quiet the minds of the people, and introduce peace and harmony among all ranks and orders of men.

A. D. 1486. Henry did not long delay fulfilling the promiſe he had made to the parliament. He married the princeſs Elizabeth on the eighteenth of January. A prodigious concourſe of people were aſſembled on this occaſion, and exhibited a greater appearance of ſincere joy than either at his firſt entry or coronation. Henry remarked this general favour ſhewn to the houſe of York with diſpleaſure. It revived in his ſullen mind the animoſity he had ſo long entertained againſt that party, and deſtroyed all his domeſtic peace. Even the princeſs herſelf, tho' of a diſpoſition truly amiable, and truly virtuous, felt the effect of the prejudices he had conceived againſt her family.

But though he entertained no cordial affection for the immediate deſcendants of the houſe of York, he was very deſirous of conciliating the affections of the people to his government. He knew that the northern counties were particularly attached to that family, and therefore determined to make a progreſs into thoſe parts, in order to remove their prejudices by his preſence and converſation. But he had hardly reached Lincoln, before he was informed that lord Lovel, and his two brothers, the Staffords, had left their ſanctuary of Colcheſter-abbey, and were once more in arms againſt the government; that the latter were marching to beſiege the city of Worceſter; and the former, at the head of three or four thouſand men, was advancing to attack him in York. This intelligence did not intimidate Henry: he aſſembled a ſmall body of troops, in whom he could confide, and ſent them againſt the inſurgents, under the command of the duke of Bedford. But that able general well knew that his little army were formidable only for their zealous attachment to their maſter, and publiſhed a general pardon to all who ſhould lay down their arms. This prudent meaſure produced the deſired effect. Lovel, who was never celebrated for his courage and intrepidity, was ſo terrified with the fears of deſertion among his troops, that he abandoned his army, and made his eſcape into Flanders, where he was protected by the dutcheſs of Burgundy. His forces immediately ſubmitted; and the other body of inſurgents, informed of this miſcarriage, raiſed the ſiege of Worceſter, and diſperſed. The two Staffords took ſanctuary in the church of Colnham, a village near Abingdon; but the privilege of that aſylum not extending to rebels, they were taken from the altar, and Humphrey, the elder, executed at Tyburn. The younger pleading that he acted under the influence of his brother, received a pardon.

The ſuppreſſion of this inſurrection did not, however, reſtore the tranquillity of the government. Henry was hardly returned to his capital, before he received information of another ſcheme of a ſtill more dangerous nature, though, at the ſame time, of a very extraordinary and romantic kind. A report had, for ſome time, prevailed among the people, that Edward duke of York, youngeſt ſon to Edward IV. had eluded his uncle's cruelty, by making his eſcape from the Tower. The pleaſure with which this intelligence was received by the people, encouraged one Richard Simon, a prieſt of Oxford, who wanted neither ſubtilty nor courage, to raiſe a fictious prince to diſpute with Henry the poſſeſſion of the throne. The inſtrument of this impoſture was Lambert Simnel, a youth of fifteen years of age. He was the ſon of a baker, but endowed with underſtanding and addreſs far ſuperior to his years and condition. The ſeditious prieſt had firſt inſtructed his pupil to perſonate the duke of York; but another report prevailing about that time, that the earl of Warwick had found means to leave the place of his confinement; and obſerving that this intelligence was ſtill more acceptable to the people, Simnel, by the dexterity of Simon, was immediately converted into Warwick. However qualified the young impoſtor might be to ſuſtain the character he was to perſonate, and however capable the prieſt might be of giving him the neceſſary inſtructions, there is great reaſon to think, that perſons of a much higher rank had joined in this conſpiracy; becauſe it appears that Simnel had better information in matters relating to the royal family than he could have derived from a perſon in Simon's ſituation. It has even been ſuſpected, that the queen dowager, diſcontented with the king, and offended at the ſtate of abſolute inſignificance to which ſhe was reduced, favoured this ridiculous enterprize. Henry himſelf ſeems to have been of this opinion; for he ſoon after cauſed the queen dowager to be cloſely confined in the monaſtery of Bermondeſey, and ſeized all her lands and revenues: nor did ſhe ever regain her liberty, but ended her life in poverty, ſolitude, and confinement.

Simnel having received ſufficient inſtructions for ſupporting the character he was to perſonate, was ſent to Ireland, where the deception was not ſo likely to be diſcovered, and where the houſe of York had a great number of partiſans. The attempt ſucceeded. The impoſtor no ſooner claimed the protection of the earl of Kildare, as the unfortunate Warwick, than that credulous nobleman received him as a true Plantagenet. The populace followed his example. Simnel was received with acclamations of joy, and crowned in Dublin, with a diadem taken from a ſtatue of the Virgin, under the title of Edward VI. No oppoſition was made to theſe proceedings: the claim of Henry was totally forgotten.

The Engliſh government was alarmed at this revolt of Ireland; but Henry immediately conceived the meaſures he ought to purſue. He ordered Warwick to be taken from the Tower, and led in proceſſion through the principal ſtreets of London, that the people might be convinced of the abſurdity of Simnel's pretenſions. This expedient had its proper effect in England; but in Ireland it was thought that the king had produced a counterfeit Warwick; and Henry found it would be abſolutely neceſſary to have recourſe to arms, in order to ſuppreſs the rebellion. He was the more confirmed in this opinion, on being informed that John, earl of Lincoln, ſon of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and of Elizabeth, eldeſt ſiſter of Edward IV. had engaged in this conſpiracy. Lincoln was a nobleman of courage and capacity, and had formed very aſpiring views. The rigour of Henry towards the earl of Warwick, and his jealouſy of all the eminent perſons among the friends of the houſe of York, had filled him with apprehenſions, and he had retired to the court of the dutcheſs dowager of Burgundy for ſafety. That princeſs was deſcended from the houſe of York, and ſympathiſed in all the miſfortunes which had attended her family. The preſent revolt in favour of Simnel, ſeemed to offer a fair opportunity for making Henry feel the weight of her reſentment.

A. D. 1487. She accordingly ſent over into Ireland a body of two thouſand veteran forces, under the command of Swart, a brave and experienced officer. The earl of Lincoln and lord Lovel embarked with theſe forces, and joined Simnel. Elated with this unexpected reinforcement, and encouraged by the countenance of perſons of ſuch high condition, the Iriſh determined to invade England, where they flattered themſelves with being joined by all the partiſans of the houſe of York. Henry was ſoon appriſed of the rebels intention, and raiſed a conſiderable army to oppoſe them. The inſurgents landed near Foudrey, in Lancaſhire, and directed their march towards York; but finding themſelves diſappointed in the hopes they had formed of being joined by multitudes of the Engliſh, it was determined to give Henry battle the firſt opportunity. They were encamped on a riſing ground, at Stoke, a village near Newark, when Henry's army appeared. The inſurgents, marching down the hill, began the engagement with great fury; and the battle was maintained for three hours, with equal valour on both ſides; though the Iriſh were dreadfully galled by the arrows of the Engliſh, being wholly deſtitute of defenſive armour. The Engliſh under the earl of Lincoln, and the Germans under Swart, made ſo noble a reſiſtance, that the greater part of Henry's vanguard was cut in pieces; but at length the valour of the royal army bore down all reſiſtance; and, after a bloody conflict, obtained a complete victory. The earl of Lincoln, Lovel, and Swart, fell in the action, with four thouſand of their troops; but Simnel, and his tutor Simon, were taken priſoners. The latter being a prieſt, was condemned to a cloſe impriſonment; but the former, as too contemptible to excite any apprehenſion in Henry, received a pardon, was made a ſcullion in the king's kitchen, and was afterwards raiſed to the poſt of a falconer. Such was the iſſue of Simnel's attempt to perſonate the duke of Warwick; which, however ridiculous in itſelf, threw the whole nation into confuſion, and was at laſt terminated by a bloody engagement.

A. D. 1488. Henry, freed from all domeſtic diſturbances, turned his thoughts to the affairs of Europe. Thoſe of Britany particularly engaged his attention, as they were very intereſting to England. The nobles of that province had revolted againſt their late duke, Francis II. on account of his being governed by a favourite of very mean extraction, who oppreſſed the people; and the king of France conſidered this rebellion as a favourable incident for annexing that dutchy to his crown, eſpecially as he was invited by the States to aſſiſt them againſt the intrigues of the duke of Orleans; who being diſguſted with the lady of Beaujeu, ſiſter of Charles VIII. and regent of that kingdom, had retired into Britany, and greatly inflamed the diſcontented nobility. Charles accordingly ſent an army into that dutchy, under pretence of delivering the nobles from oppreſſion, but in reality to reduce the province. It was the intereſt of Charles to perſuade the king of England, that no hoſtile deſigns were entertained againſt Britany, and ambaſſadors were ſent to Henry for that purpoſe. But all his artifices were in vain; the Engliſh monarch ſaw clearly that France entertained a deſign of ſubduing Britany. But either perſuaded that the attempt would prove abortive, or unwilling to incur the expences of a foreign war, Henry contented himſelf with obſerving a neutrality. The French met with very little oppoſition in their progreſs, and the nobles began to be alarmed for their ſafety. They were now convinced, that inſtead of aſſiſting them againſt the ambitious deſigns of the duke of Orleans, the army they had called in for the preſervation of their liberty were labouring to render them ſlaves. They therefore retired from the French forces, collected an army of ſixty thouſand men, and obliged the French to raiſe the ſiege of Nantz. Elated with this ſucceſs, they raſhly engaged the French army at St. Aubin, and were totally defeated. The duke of Orleans himſelf fell into the hands of the victors, and the whole force of Britany was diſſipated. Soon after this miſfortune, Francis paid the debt of nature, and his death expoſed his dominions to a total revolution.

The duke left an only daughter to ſucceed him; and it ſeemed evident that the marriage of that princeſs would decide the fate of Britany. But ſhe was in no condition to oppoſe the arms of France: for notwithſtanding the duke of Orleans was now a priſoner, and, conſequently, the pretence for invading Britany no longer exiſted, the invaders continued their operations with the ſame avidity. Henry now thought proper to act as auxiliary to the princeſs Anne; but ſent over no more than ſix thouſand men, a force incapable of effecting any thing deciſive againſt the numerous armies of France. They acted entirely on the defenſive; and inſtead of relieving, plunged the dutchy into ſtill greater diſtreſs.

A. D. 1490. But even this dangerous ſituation could not render the Britons unanimous among themſelves. The object of diſſention was the marriage of their dutcheſs. At laſt the party of Maximilian, king of the Romans, prevailed; and the marriage of the dutcheſs with that prince was celebrated by proxy, and Anne immediately aſſumed the title of Queen of the Romans. But Maximilian was in no condition to give aſſiſtance to his diſtreſſed conſort: he was deſtitute both of troops and money, and embaraſſed by continual revolts of the Flemings. The court of France now began to perceive their error. It was found that it would be very difficult, perhaps impoſſible, to reduce the dutchy of Britany by arms; and that negotiation only could annex it firmly to the French crown. Charles, the young king of France, had formerly been affianced to the daughter of Maximilian; and that princeſs, though too young to conſummate her marriage, had been ſent to the court of France to be educated, and now actually bore the title of queen. But notwithſtanding theſe engagements, it was now perceived, that it would be more advantageous for Charles to marry the dutcheſs of Britany, by which that rich province would be for ever annexed to the crown of France. The whole art of perſuaſion was therefore ſecretly employed to convince the Britons, that they could never enjoy a happy tranquillity, but by being united to the French monarchy. The Britons were influenced by their ſuggeſtions; but the young dutcheſs herſelf had imbibed the ſtrongeſt prejudices againſt Charles, whom ſhe conſidered as the author of all the miſfortunes of her family.

A. D. 1491. But notwithſtanding her repugnance to this meaſure, ſhe conſented to ſacrifice both her engagements and her prejudices to the intereſt of the people. The marriage was celebrated at Langey, in Touraine. The princeſs was then conducted to St. Denis, where ſhe was crowned, and thence made her entrance into Paris amidſt the joyful acclamations of the people. The daughter of Maximilian was ſent back to her father, and the dutchy of Britany annexed to the crown of France; an acquiſition of the utmoſt importance to that kingdom.

Maximilian, tranſported with rage at this double affront, threatened the moſt dreadful vengeance againſt Charles. Henry had alſo reaſon to reproach himſelf for his inaction: he ought to have ſupported the Britons with a force proportional to the importance of the union of Britany with France. His chagrin ſtimulated him the more to revenge, as he piqued himſelf upon the depth of his policy. A war with France was always flattering and agreeable to the Engliſh; and Henry immediately ſummoned a parliament to obtain ſupplies. He opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech from the throne; in which he told them, that the king of France, grown inſolent with power, had treated the Engliſh with contempt, and refuſed to pay the tribute which Lewis XI. had ſtipulated with Edward IV. that he was determined to head his army in perſon; mentioned the victories of Creſſy, Agincourt, and Poictiers, and expreſſed his expectations of being equally ſucceſsful. The Engliſh were flattered with theſe pleaſing ideas; a large ſubſidy was granted him; and Henry, though he well knew that war was not his province, and that Maximilian had neither money nor troops to ſecond him, affected all the ardour of a conqueror.

A. D. 1492. Elated with the hopes of conqueſt, and of enriching themſelves with the ſpoils of the enemy, the Engliſh prepared, with the greateſt alacrity, to follow their prince; and many of them ſold their eſtates, that they might appear in the field with greater ſplendor, and lead their followers in a manner becoming their rank. The Engliſh army, conſiſting of twenty-five thouſand foot, and ſixteen thouſand horſe, landed at Calais on the ſixth of October. The lateneſs of the ſeaſon being conſidered as an indication that the war would ſoon be terminated, Henry replied, "It is of little conſequence at what ſeaſon the invaſion is begun, as one ſummer will not be ſufficient for the reduction of France." But notwithſtanding all his boaſts of conqueſt, he had, at that very time, perhaps before he landed at Calais, begun a negotiation for a peace. In order, however, to ſave appearances, he laid ſiege to Boulogne; and engaged ſeveral perſons of diſtinction in his army to preſent a petition, requeſting him to accommodate his differences with France, on pretence that his allies were not in a condition to give him much aſſiſtance, and that it would be difficult to find ſubſiſtence for his troops during the winter. The French well knew that Henry wanted nothing but money; and Charles, who was very impatient of undertaking the conqueſt of Naples, was eaſily diſpoſed to give him ſeven hundred and forty-five thouſand crowns, and an annual penſion of twenty-five thouſand to himſelf and his heirs. Thus, as lord Bacon very juſtly obſerves, peace and war equally contributed to fill the coffers of Henry; the former giving him the money of his ſubjects, and the latter that of his enemies.

Henry had now great reaſon to think that the peace he had concluded with France would be laſting; and as he had nothing to fear from domeſtic enemies, he flattered himſelf with enjoying a long ſeries of uninterrupted tranquillity. But he was miſtaken: his enemies were indefatigable; and the dutcheſs of Burgundy in particular meditated vengeance againſt him. Careleſs of the means employed to ſatisfy her reſentment, ſhe determined to raiſe up another impoſtor, in order to ſhake the throne of Henry. By means of her emiſſaries, ſhe propagated, or rather revived a report, that her nephew, Richard Plantagenet, duke of York, had made his eſcape from the Tower, when his elder brother was murdered by the cruelty of his uncle, and ſtill lay concealed in ſome ſecret retreat. She ſoon perceived that the report was received with pleaſure; and that the people entertained the greateſt expectations that he would ſoon make his appearance, and attempt to recover the throne of his anceſtors. It was now neceſſary to procure a youth proper for perſonating Edward, and a young Jew ſeemed to anſwer her moſt ſanguine wiſhes. He was the ſon of one Warbec, a Jew, who had been converted to chriſtianity, and whoſe buſineſs having called him to London in the reign of Edward IV. his wife was there delivered of a ſon. He was called Perkin, or Peter; and Edward, who was ſuſpected of carrying on a ſecret correſpondence with Warbec's wife, was his godfather. The comelineſs of his perſon, his inſinuating manners, and the verſatility of his genius, rendered him extremely well adapted to the part he was to act. He ſoon learned the leſſons neceſſary for perſonating the duke of York; but as the ſeaſon ſeemed not then favourable for appearing in the world, ſhe ſent him to Portugal, under the care of lady Brumpton, where he continued a whole year, unknown to all the world.

When the dutcheſs found that a war between England and France was inevitable, ſhe determined to produce the impoſtor; and he was accordingly ſent over to Ireland, where he aſſumed the name of Richard Plantagenet. He wrote letters to the earls of Kildare and Deſmond, inviting them to join his party. The vulgar received him with open arms; and the ſtory of his eſcape from the cruelty of his uncle was ſoon ſpread over the whole kingdom, and procured him a multitude of partiſans.

Charles VIII. imagined that this pretended prince might be of advantage to him during his war with Henry, and Perkin was accordingly invited to the court of France. He was there received with all the honours due to the heir of the Engliſh crown. A magnificent palace was aſſigned him, with a handſome penſion, and a guard for his perſon. Numbers of Engliſh gentlemen came to Paris, in order to offer their ſervice to Perkin, who now began to appear dangerous to the government. The countenance of the king of France gave great credit to a fiction extremely well calculated to pleaſe the people. But, on the concluſion of the peace with England, Charles found it neceſſary to diſmiſs the counterfeit Plantagenet.

A. D. 1493. Perkin, on his leaving France, retired to the court of the dutcheſs of Burgundy, under pretence of craving her protection. That princeſs affected a total ignorance of his pretenſions, and ſeemed to examine every circumſtance with the moſt ſcrupulous anxiety. After many affected doubts, and the ſevereſt ſcrutiny, ſhe burſt into a tranſport of tenderneſs, embraced him as her nephew, the ſole heir of the Plantagenets, and the legitimate ſucceſſor of Edward IV. She even aſſigned him guards, and a magnificent equipage, and honoured him with the title of the "White Roſe of England." Many perſons of rank and condition came to her court from England, to aſſiſt him in his enterprize, and ſhare his fortune. Even Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain, who had been ſo inſtrumental in putting the crown upon the head of Henry, entertained the project of a revolt in his favour. Sir Robert Clifford went over to Flanders, and openly joined the impoſtor. The whole nation was thrown into a ſtate of uncertainty. The murder of the two princes had been always doubted, the infernal deed having been committed under the impenetrable veil of night and ſecrecy; and the countenance given to Perkin by Charles of France and the dutcheſs dowager of Burgundy, gave countenance to the impoſtor. Henry ſaw his danger, and that the utmoſt prudence and precaution were neceſſary to divert the force of the impending ſtorm.

Could Henry have aſcertained the death of the real duke of York, the conſpiracy muſt have fallen immediately to the ground; but of the five perſons who had been employed in the baſe aſſaſſination, two only remained alive; ſo that their teſtimony, though they agreed in the ſame ſtory, was not thought ſufficient to put the fact beyond all doubt and controverſy. Henry, however, found a clue, by means of his ſpies, which guided him through the labyrinth of this myſtery. He diſcovered the pedigree and adventures of Perkin, and traced the whole conſpiracy from its firſt formation. The ſtory was immediately publiſhed for the ſatisfaction of the nation. He bribed Clifford himſelf, one of the chief perſons in the court of the pretended prince, to diſcover the ſecrets of his party. Henry had no ſooner procured the neceſſary intelligence, together with the names of the principal conſpirators then in England, than they were arreſted, and their execution intimidated others. But the trial of Stanley required more ſolemn preparations. His rank and former ſervices ſeemed to ſecure him againſt any accuſation and puniſhment. It was feared that the death of ſo illuſtrious a perſon would be attended with many inconveniences, unleſs his crime was apparent to the whole nation. The king was, however, determined that he ſhould not eſcape his vengeance. Clifford was directed to come over privately to England, and to accuſe Stanley before the council. The treacherous inſurgent obeyed. He threw himſelf at the king's feet while ſeated at the council-table, aſked pardon for his paſt offences, and offered to atone for them by any ſervices in his power. Henry told him, that the beſt proof he could give of his penitence, and the only ſervice he could now render him, was to make a full confeſſion of his guilt, and to name his accomplices. Clifford immediately accuſed Stanley, who was preſent, as the chief abettor of the conſpiracy. Stanley himſelf could not diſcover more ſurpriſe than was affected by Henry on this occaſion. Clifford inſiſted upon his charge, and offered to lay before the council the whole proof of his guilt. Henry ſeemed to heſitate, but at laſt ordered Stanley to be ſent to priſon, and he was ſoon after tried and beheaded.

A. D. 1495. The execution of Stanley ſtruck the conſpirators with terror. They perceived that all their ſecrets were diſcovered, and abandoned the idol they had worſhipped to his fate. Perkin had no other reſource than his deſpair. He embarked with his few followers, amounting to about ſix hundred men, and appeared on the coaſt of Kent. But the people were not now diſpoſed to favour him: the whole account of his impoſture was known, and the late executions had taught the people caution. Perkin miſtruſting ſomething of this kind, landed a ſmall party only, in order to diſcover the true diſpoſition of the Kentiſhmen, who were drawn up with great regularity to receive him. His retainers met with a very friendly reception, and Perkin himſelf was invited to land; but the wary youth ſuſpecting the whole to be a deception, and that a deſign was formed to take him priſoner, refuſed to commit himſelf to their hands. Deſpairing of being able to make themſelves maſters of the impoſtor's perſon, the Kentiſh men took the whole party, conſiſting of one hundred and fifty perſons, priſoners. Theſe were all tried, condemned and executed; and their bodies hung upon gibbets along the coaſts, as a terror to others. Diſappointed in the reception he hoped to meet with, Perkin ſailed to Corke in Ireland; but found no countenance there, except among the very loweſt of the people, and was obliged to conceal himſelf with the wild Iriſh in the bogs and foreſts of that country.

Henry now convoked a parliament, where the eſtates of all perſons convicted of having engaged in the ſupport of Perkin, were confiſcated; and the famous ſtatute was enacted, wherein it was declared, "That no perſon who ſhould by arms, or otherwiſe, aſſiſt the king for the time being, ſhould ever afterwards, either by courſe of law, or act of parliament, be attainted for ſuch an inſtance of obedience." This act, which Henry ſtrenuouſly promoted on account of his diſputed title, affords a glaring inſtance how far the prejudices, even of the wiſeſt men, may carry them to obtain the object of their wiſhes. Henry was fearful that his example, when he aſcended the throne, rather than this law, would be followed; and therefore endeavoured to bind the legiſlature itſelf, by preſcribing rules to future parliaments; an attempt evidently repugnant to the very fundamental principles of all political government. The ſame parliament alſo authoriſed him to levy, by courſe of law, all the ſums which any perſon had agreed to pay him by way of benevolence; an act which gave a ſanction to that arbitrary method of exaction.

Charles VIII. whoſe family had long claimed the crown of Naples, had now, in purſuance of his right, undertaken the conqueſt of that kingdom. His progreſs was amazingly rapid. The Neapolitans, long unuſed to arms, were in no condition of meeting the French veterans in the open field; ſo that Charles was ſoon maſter of the whole country, and even of the capital itſelf. The Italian ſtates were now ſufficiently alarmed for their own territories; and a powerful league was formed againſt him, in which Henry became one of the contracting parties. Charles, unable to ſupport himſelf againſt ſo powerful a combination, was obliged to abandon all his conqueſts, and return ingloriouſly to France, with the loſs of the greater part of his army.

A. D. 1496. Exaſperated at the meaſures purſued by Henry, Charles recommended Perkin, who ſtill lurked among the wild Iriſh, to the king of Scotland, who entertained no favourable diſpoſition towards England. Perkin immediately abandoned his retreat, and repaired to the Scottiſh court, where he was received with the utmoſt kindneſs and hoſpitality. James IV. who was firmly attached to the intereſt of France, owned him as the ſon of Edward IV. and appeared to be ſo thoroughly convinced of his being the real duke of York, that he rejected the alliance which was now offered him by Henry. He even married the young adventurer to his niece, the lady Catherine Gordon, daughter to the earl of Huntly, and one of the moſt beautiful and accompliſhed ladies of the age. At the ſame time, he publicly declared, that he would aſſiſt him with all his forces, in recovering the inheritance of his anceſtors; and it was agreed in the Scottiſh council to carry this deſign into immediate execution. A numerous army was accordingly aſſembled, under the command of the king in perſon, attended by the young adventurer. On their entering Northumberland, Perkin publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he inveighed bitterly againſt Henry, as an uſurper, a tyrant, and a murderer; and invited all his ſubjects to aſſiſt him in recovering the throne of his anceſtors.

But this manifeſto, though drawn up with great ſpirit and preciſion, produced very little effect: the claim of Perkin was grown obſolete, and his being aſſiſted by the Scots rendered him an unwelcome viſitor to the Engliſh. James ſoon perceived that he had undertaken a taſk he was unable to perform; and, deſirous of repaying himſelf the expences of the expedition, ravaged Northumberland in the moſt cruel manner. Perkin pretended to be greatly affected with the miſeries of his plundered ſubjects, and remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt the proceedings of the army. But all his repreſentations were in vain. James told him, "That he was perſuaded his concern was only employed in behalf of his enemy, and that he was anxious to preſerve what would never belong to him." The depredations were accordingly continued without the leaſt intermiſſion, till advice arrived that a numerous army was advancing againſt them, when the Scots thought proper to retire into their own country.

A. D. 1497. Henry never loſt an opportunity of extorting money from his ſubjects. The Scottiſh invaſion furniſhed him with a ſufficient pretence for demanding a ſupply from his parliament; and a ſubſidy, to the amount of one hundred and twenty thouſand pounds, with two fifteenths, were accordingly granted. His avarice, which was his ruling paſſion, rather than his neceſſities, induced him to this exaction; and the people, often diſguſted with neceſſary taxes, were far from being diſpoſed to ſubmit to thoſe which were uſeleſs to the ſtate. The Corniſhmen, who ſtill preſerved ſome remains of the ancient ferocity of their anceſtors, were highly exaſperated at being obliged to ſupport ſo unneceſſary a burden. They complained loudly againſt this impoſition, from which they conſidered themſelves exempted; as the northern counties had uſually repelled the incurſions of the Scots, without burdening the other parts of the kingdom. Michael Joſeph, a farrier of Bodmin, who was conſidered as the leader of the multitude, greatly incited the ill-humour of the people by the moſt inflammatory reflections on the proceedings of the government. He was joined by Thomas Flammoc, a lawyer, who had long been conſidered as the oracle of the neighbourhood. He perſuaded them, that they had no right to pay the tax, as the northern nobility were obliged, by the tenures of their eſtates, to defend the borders againſt the Scots; adding, that the only way to obtain redreſs was to deliver a petition to the king, and to ſecond it with ſuch a force as would give it authority; avoiding, at the ſame time, every ſpecies of oppreſſion, in order to convince their fellow ſubjects, that the good of the people had induced them to have recourſe to this method for procuring a redreſs of their grievances.

Theſe ſpeeches produced the deſired effect. The multitude flocked together, armed with ſuch weapons as are generally poſſeſſed by countrymen. Flammoc and Joſeph were choſen their leaders, and the rabble marched directly towards the capital. At Wells they were joined by lord Audley, a nobleman deſcended from an ancient family, but of a very reſtleſs and ambitious temper. Audley, by his authority, kept the inſurgents from committing the leaſt violence or diſorder during their march. When they reached Wincheſter, inſtead of continuing their route directly to London, as they at firſt intended, they marched into Kent, from a ridiculous notion, that the inhabitants of that country would join them in great numbers. But they ſoon found that their expectations were built on a chimerical expectation: not one of the Kentiſhmen would join their ſtandard. They were not, however, intimidated by this diſappointment; they continued their march to Blackheath, and encamped between Greenwich and Eltham.

The inhabitants of London were greatly alarmed; apprehending that their wealth might tempt the inſurgents to plunder the city. Fortunately for them, as well as for Henry, the army intended to chaſtiſe the Scots, was ready for action, and immediately ſent againſt the Corniſh rebels. The troops were divided into three bodies; the firſt commanded by the earl of Oxford, the ſecond by the king in perſon, and the third by lord d'Aubeney, a general in whoſe abilities and courage the ſoldiers placed the higheſt confidence.

Lord Oxford was directed to poſt the left wing of his diviſion near Lewiſham, and to extend his right towards Foots-Cray, in order to ſecure all the roads and defiles by which it was poſſible to eſcape in that direction. Lord d'Aubeney was ordered to march directly againſt the front of the rebels, extending his right wing towards the left of the earl of Oxford's diviſion. The king himſelf encamped in St. George's Fields, his troops forming a kind of body of reſerve. This excellent diſpoſition rendered it almoſt impoſſible for any of the rebels to eſcape, as they had no ſhipping to croſs the Thames, the only paſſage that was left open.

It was given out that Henry intended to attack the inſurgents on the Monday following, whereas the king really intended to give them battle on the Saturday. This falſe rumour occaſioned a capital miſtake among the Corniſhmen; for while their main body was encamped on the middle of the heath, their advanced guard was poſted at Deptford-bridge, without any intermediate detachment between them.

D'Aubeney advanced againſt the rebels about four in the afternoon, and attacked their advanced guard with the utmoſt fury, and after a very ſmart conflict, drove them from their poſt, and followed them ſo cloſe up the hill, that he gained the ſummit before any aſſiſtance could be ſent from the main body to oppoſe him. This advantage inſpired d'Aubeney with a kind of contempt for the enemy, tho' they were formidable for their numbers, and far from being deficient in valour. He charged them at the head of his men with great impetuoſity; but met with a reſiſtance he did not expect: his valour carried him too far, and he was taken priſoner. Victory ſeemed now inclined to declare for the inſurgents; but lord Oxford falling in the critical moment upon their rear, changed the fortune of the day; they could not ſtand the ſhock of theſe veteran forces, being wholly deſtitute both of horſe and artillery. Fifteen hundred of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt taken priſoners, with their leaders. Lord Audley was beheaded on Tower-hill; but Flammoc and Joſeph were executed at Tyburn. The reſt of the priſoners were diſmiſſed without any puniſhment, a favour which Henry's character gave them no reaſon to expect. Perhaps their inoffenſive behaviour pleaded ſufficiently in their favour; or perhaps he hoped to obliterate the remembrance of his former ſeverities by this inſtance of unuſual lenity.

This commotion in England induced James to make a ſecond invaſion of the northern counties. He met with no oppoſition, and ſat down before Norham caſtle. The earl of Surry commanded the few forces in thoſe counties; and as ſoon as the Corniſh rebellion was ſuppreſſed, Henry ſent the beſt of his troops to join that nobleman in Yorkſhire. With this reinforcement he advanced againſt the Scots, who immediately raiſed the ſiege, and retired with ſuch precipitation that the earl could not overtake them. He, however, continued the purſuit; and made himſelf maſter of the ſtrong caſtle of Ayton, ſituated between Berwick and Edinburgh. A new negotiation was now entered into for a peace, but the conferences were rendered abortive: only a truce for a few months was concluded.

The principal reaſon that prevented a truce from taking place between the two kingdoms, was James's refuſal to give up Perkin Warbec. But though he would not conſent to ſacrifice the perſon he had engaged to protect, he deſired him to quit his dominions. The unhappy fugitive was now reduced to a melancholy ſituation. Flanders could no longer furniſh him with an aſylum, as the Flemiſh, having ſuffered conſiderably by the interruption of their trade with England, had made an accommodation with Henry. He had therefore no other reſource than to return to Ireland, where he again reſided among his partizans, who ſtill continued firm to his intereſt.

A. D. 1498. The Corniſh rebels, on their return to their country, boaſted that they owed not their pardon to Henry's clemency, but to his fear that their puniſhment would have rouzed the whole nation; the people being ready to take up arms againſt the government. Animated by theſe repreſentations, the people again aſſembled; and hearing that Perkin was in Ireland, it was agreed to invite him over, and place him at their head. The young adventurer liſtened to their propoſals, and having prevailed upon a few perſons to follow his fortune, he landed in Whitſand-bay on the coaſt of Cornwall. He repaired immediately to Bodmin, where, being joined by three or four thouſand men, he iſſued a proclamation, in which he aſſumed the title of king of England, by the name of Richard IV.

Strangers to diſcipline, and ſtrangers to the danger of ſupporting themſelves againſt the attacks of a regular army, they were perſuaded that their force was invincible, and reſolved to undertake the ſiege of Exeter, which they promiſed themſelves would fall an eaſy conqueſt to their arms. They carried this wild project into execution; but being deſtitute of artillery, and almoſt every other requiſite neceſſary for forming a regular ſiege; the aſſailants, who attempted to ſcale the walls, were repulſed in every attack. While the rebels were thus employed in an attempt that exceeded their power, ſeveral of the nobility and gentry of Devonſhire, formed an aſſociation in defence of Henry's government, and raiſed forces in order to drive the inſurgents from the walls of Exeter. Henry alſo diſpatched the lord d'Aubeney, at the head of four thouſand men, to the relief of that city; and followed himſelf with a more numerous army.

Perkin was now intimidated; and, raiſing the ſiege of Exeter, he retired to Taunton in Somerſetſhire. His army, when he lay before Exeter, conſiſted of about ſeven thouſand men, but many of theſe having joined him from the hopes of plunder, left the army when he raiſed the ſiege. The young adventurer perceiving that the number of his followers daily decreaſed, and that lord d'Aubeney was in full march to attack him, did not think proper to venture a battle. He fled with threeſcore horſe to the monaſtery of Beaulieu, in the New Foreſt, where he and his retinue regiſtered themſelves, as perſons entitled to the benefit of that ſanctuary. Lord d'Aubeney was no ſooner informed of their flight, than he detached a party of three hundred horſe in purſuit of the fugitives; but finding they were already within the walls, he ſurrounded the aſylum, till he received further inſtructions from Henry. In the mean time the rebels, finding themſelves deſerted by their leader, ſubmitted to the mercy of the king, and received a pardon. The lady Catherine Gordon, wife of Perkin, fell into the hands of Henry, who treated her with a kindneſs that does him honour. He ſoothed her mind with many tokens of regard, placed her in a reputable ſtation about the queen, and aſſigned her a penſion, which ſhe enjoyed till her death, which happened during the reign of his ſucceſſor.

But the fate of Perkin himſelf was not ſo eaſily determined; he had taken ſhelter in a ſanctuary which had never been violated. Some of the council adviſed the king to drag him from the altar by force, and inflict upon him the puniſhment he ſo juſtly deſerved for his temerity. But Henry thought the remedy too violent: he was unwilling to offend the whole body of the clergy, who conſidered theſe religious retreats as ſacred and inviolable. At the ſame time he was deſirous of convincing, even the moſt bigotted part of his people, that Perkin was an impoſtor, which would effectually put an end to his pretenſions, without depriving him of his life. He therefore cauſed ſecret applications to be made to the young adventurer, offering him his pardon, if he would quit his ſanctuary, and deliver himſelf into the king's hands. Perkin, deſtitute of all aſſiſtance, liſtened to the propoſals; he was conducted in a kind of mock triumph to London, and committed to the Tower.

A. D. 1499. The volatile genius of Perkin was, however, ill adapted to confinement; he made his eſcape from the Tower, and fled to the ſanctuary at Shene. The prior of that religious retirement interceded with Henry, and obtained his pardon. Perkin was again ſent a priſoner to the Tower. But the ſpirit of intrigue had taken poſſeſſion of his mind. He found means to open a correſpondence with the young earl of Warwick, who having been kept in confinement from his earlieſt infancy, was ignorant even of the common tranſactions of life. He was therefore unable to ſee the conſequence of liſtening to the ſuggeſtions of Perkin: he engaged with the impoſtor to make their eſcape. Their plot, however, was diſcovered, and Perkin, having now rendered himſelf unworthy of all favour, was condemned and executed. Nor did Henry omit ſo favourable an opportunity of freeing himſelf from a prince he had always beheld with malevolence. He cauſed the unfortunate earl of Warwick, the only male remaining of the Plantagenet family, to be accuſed of forming deſigns to diſturb the government. He was eaſily found guilty, and Henry ſuffered him to be executed. This act of tyranny was thought, even by Henry himſelf, to ſtand in need of ſome apology; and it was accordingly pretended, that Ferdinand, king of Arragon, would not conſent to the marriage of his daughter, with the prince of Wales, while any prince of the houſe of York remained alive. But this apology was far from ſatiſfying the people: they exclaimed againſt the injuſtice of this cruel proceeding: they beheld with deteſtation a prince, who ſcrupled not to ſacrifice every principle of humanity to the dictates of an avaricious policy.

A. D. 1502. The marriage between Arthur, prince of Wales, and the princeſs Catherine of Arragon, was celebrated ſoon after the death of Warwick; but the prince, who was then about ſixteen years of age, did not long ſurvive his nuptials; he died of a conſumption, and, it was ſaid, without conſummating his marriage. Henry, unwilling to reſtore Catherine's dowry, which was two hundred thouſand ducats, obliged Henry, his ſecond ſon, whom he now created prince of Wales, to marry the princeſs, a diſpenſation from the pope being obtained for that purpoſe. This marriage occaſioned very remarkable events in the following reign. About the ſame time Henry married his eldeſt daughter Margaret, to James IV. king of Scotland; an event which gave occaſion to one of the members of the council to remark, that England, in conſequence of this alliance, might poſſibly fall under the dominion of Scotland. "No," replied Henry with ſome vivacity, "Scotland, in that caſe, would only become an acquiſition to England." He ſpoke not by the ſpirit of prophecy; but the event actually happened in the beginning of the ſucceeding century.

The plague, during theſe tranſactions, raged with uncommon violence; upwards of thirty thouſand perſons were ſwept away by it in the city of London. Among many others who fell victims to its fury, was cardinal Morton, archbiſhop of Canterbury, a prelate of great parts and experience in buſineſs; but ſo entirely devoted to the avaricious will of his maſter, and at the ſame time ſo fertile in deviſing oppreſſive methods to fleece the people, that he was beheld with deteſtation, and died without receiving the tribute of a tear.

But the loſs of his favourite miniſter diverted not the thoughts of Henry from his darling purſuit of heaping up riches. Avarice was always the ruling paſſion of his ſoul, and was now increaſed by age to an immoderate degree. He was already poſſeſſed of more perſonal riches than any other ſovereign in Europe; but his deſire of acquiſition ſeemed to increaſe in proportion as it was gratified. He now iſſued out commiſſions for impoſing fines and redemptions upon all perſons in the counties of Wilts, Dorſet, Somerſet, and Devon, that ſhould be found to have favoured the Corniſh rebels under lord Audley and Perkin Warbec. At the ſame time he iſſued orders to all the ſheriffs, to ſummon every gentleman poſſeſſed of forty pounds a year in land to repair to court, within a limited time, and receive the order of knighthood. Theſe oppreſſive methods procured him the hatred of his ſubjects, though this hatred was, by his great abilities, tinctured deeply with fear. All the powers on the continent courted his alliance; and all the malecontents of England were over-awed into a peaceful acquieſcence.

The buſy, reſtleſs, and furious paſſion of jealouſy, however, ſtill encroached upon his repoſe. Henry was of a diſpoſition never to be eaſy under the ſmalleſt ground of apprehenſion, and an accident happened which greatly diſturbed his peace. Edmund de la Pole, ſecond ſon of John de la Pole, duke of Suffolk, and Elizabeth, ſiſter of Edward IV. was, on the death of his elder brother, conſidered as the next lineal heir to the crown, whenever the lines of Edward and of George, duke of Clarence, ſhould become extinct. Edmund had claimed the inheritance of his title and eſtates on the death of his brother, who periſhed in the battle of Stokefield; but his extravagance having rendered him unable to ſupport the title of duke, he was obliged to reſign that dignity, and Henry, in conſequence of that ceſſion, allowed him to retain the lands of the earldom, with the dignity of earl of Suffolk. Edmund was of a very paſſionate diſpoſition, and happened, in one of his furious ſallies, to kill a man. He applied to the king for a pardon, which was not refuſed; but being little indulgent to perſons connected with the houſe of York, he obliged him to appear perſonally before the court of King's-Bench, and plead his pardon like a common felon. Suffolk ſo highly reſented this affront, that he fled over to Flanders, and was protected by the dutcheſs of Burgundy. Henry was alarmed at his retreat; he thought he ſaw a new pretender ready to diſpute his throne; and in order to prevent any deſign from being formed againſt him, he diſpatched ſome of his emiſſaries to Flanders, promiſing him every advantage he could deſire, if he would return. The offer was accepted: the earl came over to England, where he plunged into all his former exceſſes, to the ruin of his credit and fortune: he was obliged to retire into Flanders, where he again renewed the fears and jealouſy of Henry.

A. D. 1503. Finding all his offers to prevail upon Suffolk to return ineffectual, and perſuaded that he was forming deſigns againſt the government, he had recourſe to the ſame artifice he had ſo ſucceſsfully uſed in the caſe of Perkin Warbec. He applied to Sir Robert Curſon, governor of the caſtle of Hammes, near Calais, to attempt the diſcovery of Suffolk's ſecret intentions. He accordingly abandoned his poſt, under pretence of diſaffection to the government, retired into Flanders, and offered his ſervice to the earl of Suffolk. That nobleman received him with particular marks of eſteem, formed a very intimate connection with him, and ſhewed him, in confidence, ſeveral letters he had received from his correſpondents, in which the meaſures of Henry were treated with great freedom. Curſon immediately informed Henry of the diſcoveries he had made, in conſequence of which the earl of Devonſhire, William de la Pole, brother to the earl of Suffolk, Sir James Tyrrel, and Sir James Windham, were taken into cuſtody, and the two latter were afterwards condemned and executed. The death of Tyrrel gave univerſal ſatisfaction, on account of his participation in the murder of the two young princes, ſons to Edward IV. Suffolk was, however, beyond the reach of Henry; but that nobleman, finding the dutcheſs of Burgundy was now become indifferent with regard to the partizans of the houſe of York, he retired to the court of Philip, archduke of Auſtria, where he was received with great marks of kindneſs and regard.

Henry was ſtill employed in inventing new ſchemes for ſatisfying his avarice. His agents in this complicated ſcene of extortion, were Sir Richard Empſon and Edward Dudley. The former was the ſon of a ſieve-maker, and by the boldneſs of his meaſures endeavoured to conceal the meanneſs of his birth: the latter was a perſon of fortune and family, as well as of great abilities; circumſtances which render his memory ſtill more execrable, if poſſible, than that of his partner in iniquity. The inſolence of theſe two miniſters were carried to that height, that they did not even obſerve the common forms of juſtice; they fleeced the ſubject with the moſt arbitrary licentiouſneſs. Such as refuſed tamely to yield up their property, were impriſoned, fined, and ſome of them executed, in conſequence of private trials, without any fair examination, or the verdict of a jury. Henry, who ſhared the fruits of this oppreſſion, covered the authors with the ſhield of his authority. Informers, ſpies, and other vermin of a ſimilar kind, filled every part of the kingdom; while Henry was deaf to the groans of the oppreſſed, and inſenſible to the reproaches of his people.

A. D. 1505. An event which now happened in Spain, for ſome time diverted Henry's thoughts from oppreſſion. Iſabella, queen of Caſtile, paid the debt of nature, and it was foreſeen that this incident would greatly affect the fortunes of her huſband Ferdinand, king of Arragon. Henry's ſituation was, in ſome particulars, ſimilar to that of Ferdinand, and therefore he regarded the iſſue of theſe tranſactions as a precedent for himſelf. Joan, the daughter of Ferdinand by Iſabella, was married to the archduke Philip, and being, in right of her mother, heireſs of Caſtile, ſeemed entitled to diſpute with Ferdinand the preſent adminiſtration of that kingdom, It was of the utmoſt importance for Henry to ſupport the pretenſions of Ferdinand. He was very ſenſible that the greater part of his ſubjects were convinced of the ſuperiority of his wife's title to the crown; and he dreaded leſt the prince of Wales, who was every day advancing towards manhood, might be tempted by his own ambition, and the example of the archduke, to lay immediate claim to the crown.

A. D. 1506, Ferdinand, though ſo cloſely connected with Henry, ſoon found that it would be impoſſible for him to continue in the adminiſtration. His former exactions and impoſitions had rendered him very unpopular, and a reſolution was taken to declare Philip and Joan, king and queen of Caſtile. Philip therefore embarked with his conſort for Spain, on the ſixth of January; but being overtaken by a dreadful ſtorm, he was obliged to put into the harbour of Weymouth for ſafety. Spent with the fatigues of a turbulent voyage, the duke and his conſort went on ſhore to procure ſome refreſhment, contrary to the advice of his council, who ſtrongly oppoſed the reſolution.

Alarmed at hearing that a large fleet had, for ſome days, been ſeen on the coaſt, Sir John Trenchard, a gentleman of conſiderable property in the county of Dorſet, aſſembled a body of forces, and being joined by Sir John Cary, who was alſo at the head of a few troops, they came to that town. As no accommodations could be expected fit for entertaining perſons of their dignity, he invited them to his houſe, and immediately diſpatched an expreſs to inform the court of this important incident. Henry ſent the earl of Arundel to compliment them in his name; to aſſure them that he hoped ſoon to have the pleaſure of embracing them, and that, in the mean time, they might command in his dominions. Philip would willingly have declined the honour of an interview; but he well knew that he muſt not now depart without the king's conſent, and therefore ſet out immediately for the court, which was then at Windſor, where he and his conſort were received by Henry with all the marks of the moſt cordial friendſhip. But the Engliſh monarch was determined to draw ſome advantages from this fortunate event; and accordingly hinted to Philip, that as he had changed his condition, by accepting the crown of Caſtile, the treaty of commerce between England and the Low Countries ought to be renewed. No objections were made to this propoſal, and a new treaty was drawn up and ſigned by both princes.

But though this treaty was very advantageous to England, Henry was far more deſirous of ſucceeding in another attempt, which regarded himſelf only. He had been very uneaſy at the reception the earl of Suffolk had met with at Philip's court, and was determined to employ the preſent opportunity of procuring that fugitive to be ſent back to his own country. Accordingly he complained to Philip, that his ſubjects found an aſylum in his dominions, particularly the earl of Suffolk. "I really thought," replied the king of Caſtile, "that a perſon of ſo little conſequence was incapable of giving you the leaſt uneaſineſs. But to convince you, that I am deſirous of giving you all the ſatisfaction in my power, I will baniſh him from my territories." "You will greatly increaſe the obligation," ſaid the king, "by carrying your complaiſance a little farther, and deliver Suffolk into my hands: I can then depend upon his ſubmiſſion and obedience." "If I grant your requeſt," ſaid Philip, "I ſhall bring a ſtain of diſhonour upon us both. It will be ſaid that I was treated as a priſoner in your dominions." "Then there is no farther diſpute," replied Henry, "I will take all the diſhonour upon myſelf." Philip perceived that Henry was determined to carry his point, and therefore gave his conſent, on condition that no attempt ſhould be made againſt his life. Henry very readily agreed to this reſtriction, and even condeſcended to write a letter to the earl with his own hand; aſſuring the unfortunate exile, that he ſhould meet with the kindeſt reception in England. This invitation, added to that of Philip, who was perſuaded that Henry would make no difficulty of granting his pardon, produced the deſired effect. Suffolk returned to England; but on his appearance, was immediately committed to the Tower, where he continued till the next reign, when he fell a ſacrifice to the deteſtable jealouſies of the ſtate.

Philip was now ſuffered to proceed on his voyage, after being detained in England above three months. He was joyfully received by his ſubjects. Ferdinand withdrew to his own kingdom of Arragon; and Philip was placed upon the throne of Caſtile, amidſt the acclamations of the people. But he did not long enjoy his crown. He died on the twenty-fifth of September, after a reign of about three months; and his conſort was ſo afflicted at his loſs, that ſhe fell into a deep melancholy, which rendered her incapable of holding the reins of government. Philip therefore reſumed the adminiſtration during the minority of Charles of Luxembourgh, afterwards ſo well known by the name of Charles V.

A. D. 1507. The Flemings having thus loſt their prince, invited the emperor Maximilian to reſume the government of the Low Countries during the minority of his grandſon. He accepted the invitation; but being engaged in affairs of importance, which detained him in Germany, he ſent his daughter Margaret, widow to the duke of Savoy, with the character of governante of the Low Countries, till his arrival. A proviſional treaty of commerce was ſoon after concluded between Margaret and Henry, until ſome differences which had ariſen between the Engliſh and Flemings could be amicably adjuſted.

But no buſineſs of ſtate, except where his jealouſy was concerned, could divert the attention of Henry from his avaricious proceedings; and the oppreſſions of Empſon and Dudley were more flagitious than ever. Sir William Capel, who had been lord-mayor of London about four years ſince, was now proſecuted upon a frivolous charge of not having puniſhed a perſon who had paid him falſe money during the time of his mayoralty, and fined two thouſand pounds. He refuſed to pay ſo exorbitant a ſum, and was immediately ſent to the Tower, where he continued till the death of Henry. Laurence Aylmer, lord mayor of London, and his two ſheriffs, were alſo proſecuted upon charges equally frivolous, and each fined a thouſand pounds. But they imitating the example of Capel, were committed to the King's-bench priſon. Several other gentlemen were proſecuted in the ſame manner; ſo that it is no wonder the names of Empſon and Dudley became obnoxious to the people. By theſe iniquitous practices, Henry amaſſed the enormous ſum of two millions, ſeven hundred and fifty thouſand pounds, an amazing quantity in thoſe times. His rigid œconomy daily augmented this heap of wealth; and the more he advanced in years, the more deteſtable he became by his avarice; a vice never found in a great and cultivated mind.

A. D. 1508. But Henry now began to perceive, that neither riches, power, nor ſucceſs, could ſecure him from the misfortunes incident to human nature. He had for ſome years laboured under a conſumptive diſorder, too inveterate to be conquered by the preſcriptions of the healing art, which had exerted all its powers in preſerving a life Henry was ſo unwilling to reſign. At length his diſorder became deſperate: he found his end was approaching. The thoughts of death effected what reaſon had attempted in vain. Henry entered deep into himſelf, and trembled at the gloomy proſpect that now opened before him. He now ſaw the wickedneſs and folly of accumulating riches by violence and extortion, and was deſirous of performing ſome actions that might recommend him to the mercy of the Deity, and obtain, in ſome meaſure, the applauſe of his people. He diſtributed large ſums in charity; releaſed, at his own expence, all priſoners confined for debts under forty ſhillings; and, ordered, by his laſt will, that reſtitution, as far as poſſible, ſhould be made to thoſe who had ſuffered by the infamous agents of his oppreſſive avarice. But theſe meaſures, however commendable in themſelves, are more efficacions in relieving the conſciences of the unjuſt, than in ſatiſfying the Deity. There is little merit in abandoning what we can no longer enjoy.

A. D. 1509. In this manner Henry paſſed the laſt months of his life; and paid the debt of nature on the twenty-fourth of April, in the twenty-fourth year of his reign, and the fifty-ſecond of his age.

The reign of Henry was more advantageous to his people than honourable to himſelf. He put a final period to the civil wars which had ſo long diſtracted the kingdom. He maintained order and regularity in the ſtate: he depreſſed the exorbitant power of the nobility; and by his firmneſs and intrepidity, together with the friendſhip and alliances he contracted with foreign princes, he became one of the greateſt monarchs in Europe. His reign, in ſome meaſure, humanized the ferocious manners of the Engliſh. He inherited a fund of good ſenſe, which was greatly improved by ſtudy and experience. His judgment was ſound, and his ſagacity remarkable. His prudence and valour ſurmounted every difficulty. Theſe ſhining qualities acquired him the eſteem of all the princes of Europe, and he was generally known by the appellation of the Engliſh Solomon. But his activity and firmneſs, his wiſdom, his love of peace, and his courage in war, cannot wipe away the ſtains which the odious vice of avarice left upon his memory.

Henry had ſix children by his queen; but only three ſurvived him; one ſon, and two daughters.

1. Henry Tudor, born at Greenwich on the twenty-fourth of February, 1491, and ſucceeded his father by the name of Henry VIII.

2. Margaret Tudor, born on the twenty-ninth of November, 1489: firſt married to James IV. king of Scotland; and afterwards to Archibald Douglas, earl of Angus. She left children by both.

3. Mary Tudor, born in the year 1498: married firſt to Lewis XII. king of France; and after his deceaſe, to Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

The great object of Henry's policy was to humble the nobility, and to keep them in a proper degree of ſubordination. Accordingly he aboliſhed, by his vigour and firmneſs, the practice of having retainers, which had been long an object of pride to the nobility; and who, by this method, engaged a multitude of people in their ſervice. Theſe became the tools of their injuſtice and rebellion. He alſo paſſed an act of parliament, by which the nobility were enabled to alienate their poſſeſſions, without paying the enormous fines before neceſſary. This enabled the people to purchaſe eſtates, and, conſequently, to augment their power; while it diminiſhed that of the barons, by furniſhing them with the means of prodigality and expence. Commerce and induſtry were every day advancing in their progreſs, though the real methods of encouraging trade were entirely unknown. The intereſt of money, the profits of exchange, and the exportation of plate and bullion, were prohibited. Prices were fixed for woollen cloths, for hats, and the wages of labourers: nor could any perſon bind his children apprentices, who did not poſſeſs twenty ſhillings a year in land. Theſe were ſo many obſtacles which impeded the progreſs of commerce and induſtry. Henry, however, paſſed ſeveral wiſe laws for the execution of juſtice, for the puniſhment of murderers, and for ſubjecting the clergy to capital puniſhments on the commiſſion of groſſer enormities.

The arts and ſciences now began to emerge from that obſcurity under which they had been ſo long concealed. The city of Conſtantinople was taken by the Turks in the year 1453; and the Greeks, among whom ſome remains of learning were ſtill preſerved, being ſcattered by theſe enthuſiaſtic barbarians, took ſhelter in Italy, and imported, together with their admirable language, a tincture of their ſcience, and their refined taſte in poetry and eloquence. The purity of the Latin tongue was alſo revived; the ſtudy of antiquity became faſhionable; and the eſteem for literature gradually propagated itſelf through every nation in Europe. But what ſtill more contributed to diſſeminate the ſciences, was the diſcovery of the art of printing, which ſpreads with ſuch rapidity, from country to country, the wiſdom and follies of men. William Caxton, citizen and mercer of London, being ſent ambaſſador by Edward IV. to the duke of Burgundy, learned that uſeful art during his abode in the Low Countries, and introduced it into England about the year 1474. He tranſlated ſeveral books from the French, and printed them himſelf in one of the chapels of Weſtminſter-abbey, by permiſſion of John Iſlip the abbot. The book on "The Game of Cheſs," dated 1474, but without Caxton's name, is generally reckoned the firſt production of the Engliſh preſs. The invention was ſoon purchaſed by the monaſteries, and preſſes were ſet up at Oxford, Cambridge, St. Albans, and other places.

The dawn of literature was uſhered in by the diſcovery of a new world. Chriſtopher Columbus, a native of Genoa, one of thoſe bold and original geniuſes born for the inſtruction of mankind, undertook to extend the limits which ignorance had ſet to the world. His knowledge of the true figure of the earth, however obtained, was far ſuperior to that of any of his cotemporaries; and he generouſly determined not to ſuffer the diſcoveries he had made to continue in obſcurity. He conceived a project of ſailing to the Indies by a weſtern courſe, and of opening to his country a new ſource of opulence and power. But the Genoeſe rejected this notion as chimerical: they conſidered it as impoſſible for a weſtern coaſt to lead to the Indies. Stung with diſappointment and indignation, Columbus retired from Genoa; and, after a ſeries of difficulties, obtained a ſmall fleet from Ferdinand and Iſabella of Spain. He ſailed on the third of Auguſt, 1492, on the moſt adventurous attempt ever undertaken by man, and in the fate of which the inhabitants of two worlds were intereſted. He was ſucceſsful; and the conſequence was the diſcovery of America. Soon after, the Portugueſe found a paſſage to the Eaſt-Indies by the Cape of Good Hope, by which they carried on an advantageous trade with the inhabitants of the Eaſt. Diſcoveries of this important kind rouzed the torpid genius of mankind; and improvements were daily made in geography, navigation, and aſtronomy. New ideas opened to the human mind, the faculties were extended, and advances were continually made in uſeful and ornamental learning. The art of artillery and engineering were brought to ſome degree of perfection, and changed intirely the operations of war.

Among the men of genius and learning that flouriſhed in theſe times, were Sir John Fortiſcue and Sir Thomas Lyttleton. The former was one of the moſt learned men of his age: he was lord chief juſtice of the King's-bench in the reign of Henry VI. and conſtituted chancellor to that unfortunate prince after Edward IV. had taken poſſeſſion of the throne. He followed the fortunes of the houſe of Lancaſter, and was many years in exile with queen Margaret, and prince Edward her ſon. Soon after the deciſive battle of Tewkſbury, he was thrown into priſon, and attainted, with other Lancaſtrians, but found means to procure his pardon from Edward IV. His celebrated book, "De Laudibus Legum Angliæ," was written for the uſe of prince Edward. His treatiſe on the "Difference between an abſolute and a limited Monarchy," was not publiſhed till the year 1714.

Sir Thomas Lyttleton was judge of the Common Pleas, and a knight of the Bath, in the reign of Edward IV. He was the author of the celebrated book of "Tenures or Titles," by which all eſtates were anciently held in England. The firſt edition of this work was publiſhed at Rouen about the year 1533. Sir Edward Coke's Book of Inſtitutes is a comment on this work.

HENRY VIII.

A.D. 1509. THE Engliſh, who had long groaned under the avaricious tyranny of Henry VII. conſidered the acceſſion of his ſon to the throne as an event pregnant with happineſs; ſo that young Henry aſcended the throne with every advantage which nature and fortune could beſtow. Amiable in his perſon and addreſs, in the bloom of youth, bleſſed with uncommon talents, and poſſeſſed of immenſe wealth, he ſaw himſelf at the head of a flouriſhing kingdom, where the arts and ſciences wanted only a liberal benefactor to promote their progreſs; and as the public tranquillity was ſecured by a long peace and powerful alliances, the people had already formed the greateſt expectations from his diſtinguiſhed abilities. It was not immediately perceived that his paſſions would render him a tyrant; nor was he tinctured with the vice of avarice. He was no ſooner ſeated on the throne, than his diſpoſitions appeared to be the reverſe of his father: he diſplayed a liberality that bordered on profuſion.

Henry had been educated as an eccleſiaſtic; there being no hopes of his ever aſcending the throne till the death of his elder brother removed the difficulty, and rendered him heir apparent to the Engliſh crown. By this means he very early imbibed a taſte for literature, particularly for theology, which he ever after cultivated with great attention. This qualified him for the many diſputes he afterwards carried on with Luther and the pope; and to this, perhaps, all his meaſures, with regard to religion, were owing.

But however oppoſite the diſpoſitions of young Henry were to thoſe of his father, he did not think it neceſſary to diſplace thoſe ſtateſmen who had ſerved with fidelity in the preceding reign. His grandmother, the counteſs of Richmond, was ſtill alive; and as ſhe was highly eſteemed for her prudence and virtue, he wiſely liſtened to her advice in the eſtabliſhment of his new council. It was compoſed of Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, and lord-chancellor; Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſecretary and lord privy-ſeal; Howard, earl of Surry, lord treaſurer; Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, lord-ſteward of the houſhold; lord Herbert, chamberlain; Sir Thomas Lovel, maſter of the wards, and conſtable of the Tower; Sir Edward Poinings, knight of the garter, comptroller; Sir Henry Manny, afterwards lord Manny; Sir Thomas Darcy, afterwards lord Darcy; Thomas Ruthal, doctor of laws; and Sir Henry Wyat. Theſe were thoroughly experienced in buſineſs; nor had they borne any part of the public odium during the life of the late king.

The gay and ſpirited diſpoſition of Henry ſoon changed the aſpect of the court: the ſcenes of œconomy and avarice now gave way to thoſe of diſſipation and profuſion. One party of pleaſure ſucceeded another. Tilts, tournaments, and carouſals, were exhibited with all the magnificence of that age; and the prodigious treaſures amaſſed by the late king were diſſipated in the giddy expences of his ſucceſſor.

Henry did not, however, forget the complaints of his people. He publiſhed a proclamation to encourage complaints againſt all who had made uſe of the royal authority to the prejudice of his ſubjects. The opportunity was embraced with avidity; the ſpies and informers, who had ſo long exerciſed an unbounded tyranny over the kingdom, now felt the weight of juſtice, and fell victims to the reſentment of the public. Empſon and Dudley, who had been ſo often loaded with execrations, were cited before the council, to anſwer for their conduct. But it was ſoon found, that however obnoxious they were rendered by their late conduct, they could not be condemned by the laws of their country. Empſon artfully obſerved, that the only crime of which both himſelf and Dudley were accuſed, conſiſted in their having enforced a ſtrict execution of the laws; that they had acted entirely in obedience to the king, to whom the execution of the laws was entruſted by the conſtitution; that it belonged not to them, who were merely inſtruments in the hands of the ſupreme power, what laws were recent or obſolete, expedient or hurtful, ſince they were all equally valid while they remained unrepealed by the legiſlature. The council perceived Empſon's arguments were unanſwerable, and therefore thought proper to commit theſe obnoxious miniſters to the Tower, till a new accuſation could be formed againſt them. After ſome deliberation, it was determined to accuſe them of high-treaſon. It was ſaid, "That, conſcious of the popular odium incurred by their unjuſt proceedings, they had ſummoned their friends, while the late king lay on his death-bed, to conſult them on the meaſures neceſſary to be taken to ſecure them from the reſentment of the public." Theſe meaſures were conſtrued into a conſpiracy to ſeize the perſon of the new king, and to take up arms in defence of themſelves and their party. This ſtrange accuſation, however abſurd and improbable, was ſufficient to convict them of the crime laid to their charge, and they fell victims to the juſt reſentment of an injured people.

While the public attention was engaged in the proſecution of theſe obnoxious miniſters, the council was employed in deliberating on the expedience of the king's conſummating his marriage with Catherine of Arragon. Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, a zealous prelate, and violently attached to the papal authority, ſtrongly ſupported the intereſt of the princeſs. Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, urged, that it was contrary to a poſitive command of the Deity himſelf, for a man to marry his brother's widow, and, conſequently, that the pope's diſpenſation was invalid. Fox oppoſed to this argument the unlimited authority of Chriſt's vicar, and that the pope's diſpenſation was abundantly ſufficient. To this weak argument he added others of a much ſtronger tendency, founded on political motives. He repreſented the danger of forcing Ferdinand into an alliance with France, and of the two monarchs joining to reſent the affront offered to the king of Arragon in the perſon of his daughter, after ſhe had been ſo long affianced to Henry. He expatiated on the known virtue, modeſty, and noble diſpoſitions of the princeſs; her affection for the king, the large dowry ſhe brought, and the neceſſity of forming a cloſe alliance with Spain, in order to counterbalance the great power of France. Theſe arguments prevailed, and the marriage was accordingly conſummated.

But though the biſhop of Wincheſter had been ſucceſsful with regard to the conſummation of Henry's marriage, he ſoon perceived that his power began to decline. He had acquired ſuch habits of caution and frugality during the preceding reign, that he could not now lay them wholly aſide. He remonſtrated againſt the ſchemes of diſſipation and expence purſued by the young monarch, and by that means loſt his favour: while Surry, who made his own intereſt the ſole motive of his conduct, was very officious in promoting the liberality, pleaſure, and magnificence which now prevailed. Wincheſter expoſtulated with him on his remarkable change of conduct, but without effect: Surry derived great advantages from the diſſipation of his maſter; and at the ſame time engaged him in ſuch a courſe of idleneſs, that he became negligent of the affairs of ſtate, and willing to entruſt the government to the care of his miniſters. Fox was highly exaſperated againſt Surry, and determined to introduce ſome perſon who might be a ſpy upon his actions. He caſt his eyes upon Dr. Thomas Woolſey, as a perſon well qualified to anſwer his purpoſe. He was the ſon of a butcher at Ipſwich, but diſtinguiſhed by his prudence, his talents, and his learning. Woolſey had recommended himſelf by his addreſs to Henry VII. who had employed him with advantage in ſome difficult commiſſions. Nor was it long before the young courtier gained the favour of his maſter. His inſinuating addreſs, his taſte for pleaſure, and his love of letters, could not fail of rendering him very acceptable to Henry. We ſhall ſoon ſee him at the head of the adminiſtration.

A. D. 1510. The wars in Italy ſtill raged with the utmoſt violence, and attracted the attention of all the princes in Europe. A league had been formed at Cambray between the pope, the emperor and the kings of France and Spain, for ſtripping the republic of Venice of her territories on the continent. Julius II. that warlike and imperious pontiff, had planned this confederacy. Forgetting the cares of religion, in order to increaſe the power of the holy ſee, he ſcrupled not to involve Italy in all the horrors of war, and deluge, with chriſtian blood, the countries over which he preſided as vicar of the Prince of Peace. The French ſoon reduced the Venetians to extremities, and recovered the territories claimed by the contracting princes. But the pope had no ſooner obtained poſſeſſion of the dominions he pretended to belong to the church, than he determined to break the league of Cambray, and reduce the power of Lewis, which he now conſidered as too formidable. In order to this, he endeavoured to excite the ſtates of Europe againſt the French monarch, and was particularly deſirous of engaging young Henry in his favour. He ſent that monarch a conſecrated golden roſe, a favour never beſtowed by the popes but on their moſt favourite princes. He engaged Ferdinand to aſſiſt him, and entered into a treaty with the Swiſs cantons.

Having formed ſo powerful a confederacy, he attacked the duke of Ferrara, an ally of France. Lewis, who never imagined a deſign was formed for attacking his territories, made no preparations for repelling the attempts of the enemy; but determining not to abandon his ally, he ſent orders to Chamont his general, and governor of Milan, to ſupport the duke with all his forces. Chamont prepared immediately to obey the commands of his ſovereign, and hearing that the pontiff was arrived at Boulogne, he reſolved to ſurprize him. He accordingly led his army towards the city, and had he not been amuſed with ſome of the pope's envoys, he would, in all probability, have put an end to all the projects of this enterpriſing pontiff; but inſtead of puſhing the ſiege with vigour, he liſtened to propoſals offered by Julius, which that artful churchman never intended to perform. This ſuſpenſion of hoſtilities furniſhed an opportunity for a body of Venetian troops to throw themſelves into the caſtle; and Chamont, being deſtitute of artillery ſufficient for taking the fortreſs, was obliged to abandon the undertaking.

Lewis, after trying every method in his power to bring about a treaty of peace with this imperious pontiff, determined to ſubdue him by force of arms, and to depoſe him in a council ſummoned to meet at Piſa. But no danger could intimidate the old pontiff; he laid ſiege to Mirandola in perſon; and tho' he was then ſeventy years of age, he mounted the trenches, viſited the works, encouraged the engineers, and at length entered the breach with the foremoſt of his forces.

While the pope, worn out with age, was fighting at the head of his forces, Lewis, ſtill in the vigour of life, was debating in his council. He laboured to ſtir up all the clergy in Europe, and the pope all the ſoldiers. The general council was ſummoned to meet at Piſa, where a few cardinals, who were enemies to the pontiff, made their appearance. But this council proved an idle undertaking, while the papal war was very ſucceſsful. Julius, without ſuſpending for a moment his military operations, fulminated anathemas againſt the biſhops aſſembled at Piſa.

A. D. 1512. Henry was courted by both parties, but at laſt, by the inſtigations of Ferdinand, who had joined the pontiff, declared againſt France. The glory of ſerving the pope, and of conquering provinces, excited the ambition of the young monarch; and the parliament readily granted ſupplies for an enterprize that was agreeable to the people. Ferdinand, always attentive to his own intereſt, while he ſeemed to be acting for that of others, perſuaded Henry that it would be more for his advantage not to land his troops at Calais, but at Fonterabia, where he might eaſily make a conqueſt of Guienne, and where he promiſed to aſſiſt him with a Spaniſh army. But the real intention of Ferdinand was to turn this force to the acquiſition of the kingdom of Navarre. Julius had excommunicated John d'Albert, its preſent king, as an adherent to the council of Piſa; and the dominions of an excommunicated prince were an object worthy to excite the violence and rapacity of Ferdinand the catholic.

Henry, who ſuſpected not the deſigns of Ferdinand, agreed to the propoſal. The marquis of Dorſet was appointed general of the land forces, which were landed in the province of Guipuſcoa, about the middle of June. The Engliſh admiral, in his return, made ſeveral ſucceſsful deſcents on the coaſt of Britany, and being joined by a ſquadron of ſhips commanded by Sir Thomas Knivet, the depredations were continued with advantages. Alarmed at the attempts of the Engliſh, the French fleet of thirty-nine ſhips, was ordered to ſail from Breſt under the command of Primauget, an admiral of great courage and conduct. The two fleets ſoon after met, and a furious engagement enſued. At length Primauget's ſhip was ſet on fire, and determining not to periſh alone, he bore down upon the Engliſh admiral, and grappling with her, both ſhips ſoon became involved in the ſame inevitable deſtruction. This dreadful ſcene ſuſpended the action between the other ſhips; they were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at ſo frightful a ſcene of horror and confuſion. After ſome time time the French ſhip blew up, and the dreadful exploſion deſtroyed the Engliſh. This alarming cataſtrophe, in which above ſixteen hundred men periſhed, ſo affected both parties, that the engagement was not renewed; the French retired to Breſt, and the Engliſh continued cruizing in the Channel.

The duke of Alva, who commanded the Spaniſh forces, having joined the Engliſh, preparations were made for opening the campaign. But Dorſet, who was no ſtranger to Ferdinand's intentions, was ſurpriſed prized to find, that inſtead of purſuing the conqueſt of Guienne, his army moved towards the frontiers of Navarre. The Engliſh general complained to Ferdinand, that inſtead of undertaking the ſiege of Bayonne, which would open a paſſage into Guienne, the forces had taken a different rout. Ferdinand replied, that as the king of Navarre was connected with France, he thought it would not be adviſeable to form the ſiege of Bayonne, till meaſures were taken for preventing that prince from cutting off their proviſions, by forming a camp between the ſea and the mountains of Navarre. Dorſet agreed to theſe propoſals, and an Engliſh officer was ſent to that prince to know his intentions. D'Albert declared that he would obſerve an exact neutrality, and give no obſtruction to the attempts of the Engliſh. Ferdinand pretended not to be ſatisfied with this anſwer, he inſiſted that the king of Navarre ſhould join the combined army, or deliver into his hands ſix of the moſt conſiderable places in his dominions, together with his eldeſt ſon as an hoſtage. The artful Spaniard well knew that theſe terms could not be complied with, and on the return of the meſſenger with intelligence that the propoſal was rejected, orders were ſent to the duke of Alva to invade Navarre, and reduce the whole kingdom to ſubjection. The Engliſh general now perceived the intereſts of his maſter were to be ſacrificed to the ambitious views of the Spaniard, and refuſed to aſſiſt in the reduction of Navarre. He retired to his camp at Fontarabia, reſolving there to wait for freſh orders from England. But even his inaction anſwered the views of Ferdinand. It kept the French army in awe; and by preventing Lewis from aſſiſting d'Albert, the kingdom of Navarre fell into the hands of Ferdinand. The ſeaſon was too far advanced, and the French had taken too many precautions in putting Bayonne in a proper poſture of defence, for Dorſet to think of making any progreſs in the reduction of Guienne: he returned to England without having had an opportunity of leading his forces againſt the enemy. Henry was highly diſpleaſed at the ill ſucceſs of the enterprize; and Dorſet found the utmoſt difficulty to convince him that the miſcarriage was entirely owing to the fraudulent deſigns of Ferdinand, who was now ſtiled in Spain, "the wiſe, the prudent;" in Italy, "the pious;" in France and in England, "the perfidious."

A. D. 1513. But though this war was attended only with diſgrace to the Engliſh arms, yet it ſerved to weaken France. Lewis was obliged to recall his troops to the defence of his own dominions, and by that means loſt all his Italian conqueſts. Julius triumphed in the diſgrace of the French monarch; but he did not long enjoy his good fortune: he paid the debt of nature on the twenty-firſt of February, and was ſucceeded in the papal chair by John de Medici, under the appellation of Leo X. one of the greateſt princes that ever filled the pontifical ſeat. He was the patron of arts, and the friend of learning. Deſirous of attaching Henry firmly to his intereſt, he ſent him a veſſel loaded with hams and wine. The arrival of this veſſel, which carried the papal banner, in the Thames, filled the Engliſh with exultation, and excited their natural antipathy againſt France.

The famous Wolſey was now at the head of the Engliſh miniſtry; and perceiving the ardour of Henry for war, he exerted all his abilities to provide an army that might retrieve the martial glory of his countrymen. Hoſtilities were firſt commenced at ſea, but without any advantage to either of the contending princes. It was on the continent that the deciſive blows were intended to be ſtruck. The van of the army, conſiſting of eight thouſand men, was led by the earl of Shrewſbury, aſſiſted by the earl of Derby, the lords Fitzwalter, Haſtings, and Cobham, and Sir Rice ap Thomas, captain of the light horſe. This diviſion being landed at Calais, was ſoon followed by another body of ſix thouſand men, under the command of lord Herbert, chamberlain, attended by the earls of Northumberland and Kent, the lords Audley and Delawar, together with Carew, Curſon, and other gentlemen. Henry now prepared to follow his forces; but before his departure, he cauſed the unfortunate earl of Suffolk to be beheaded. What reaſons induced Henry to commit this cruel action, is not abſolutely known. The French hiſtorians tell us, that it was in obedience to the dying commands of his father; while others think, that Henry, exaſperated at the conduct of his brother Edward de la Pole, who had accepted a command in the French ſervice, ſatiated his vengeance on the unhappy Suffolk.

About the thirtieth of June, Henry landed at Calais with the third diviſion of his army, conſiſting of twelve thouſand men. He was attended by the duke of Buckingham, and many others of the principal nobility. But he ſoon perceived the little reliance he ought to place on the engagements of princes; for among all his allies, the Swiſs only performed the conditions of the treaty. The emperor Maximilian had promiſed to join them with a body of eight thouſand men; but though he had received from Henry one hundred and twenty thouſand crowns for that purpoſe, he failed in his engagements. He made ſome atonement, however, to the Engliſh monarch, by joining him, in the Low Countries, with ſome German and Flemiſh ſoldiers, who were of great ſervice in giving an example of diſcipline to Henry's new-raiſed forces. The emperor himſelf enliſted as a volunteer in the Engliſh army, and bluſhed not to receive an hundred crowns a day for his ſervice. He was, however, treated with the higheſt reſpect by Henry, and in reality directed all the operations of the combined army.

The earl of Shrewſbury, and lord Herbert, before the landing of Henry, had formed the ſiege of Terrouenne, a town ſituated on the borders of Picardy. The garriſon, which conſiſted of not more than a thouſand men, commanded by Teligini and Crequi, made a noble defence. The town was, however, at laſt reduced to extremities, for want of ammunition and proviſions; and Lewis determined, if poſſible, to ſend a ſupply. Eight hundred cavalry were choſen for making this dangerous attempt, each of whom carried behind him a ſack of gunpowder and two quarters of bacon. Thus equipped, and headed by Fontrailles, they made a ſudden irruption into the Engliſh camp, ſurmounted all reſiſtance, and advanced to the foſſe of the town, where each horſeman threw down his burden. Then returning on a gallop, they again forced themſelves a paſſage with very little loſs.

This inſult was, however, ſoon revenged. Informed that a large body of French horſe was approaching, Henry ordered ſome troops to paſs the Lis, and give them battle. The conteſt was ſoon decided. The French cavalry, though conſiſting chiefly of gentlemen who had behaved with the greateſt intrepidity in many diſperate encounters, were ſeized with ſo unaccountable a panic, that they immediately betook themſelves to flight, and were purſued by the Engliſh. The duke of Longueville, Buſſi d'Amboiſe, Clermont, Imbercourt, the chevalier Bayard, and ſeveral other perſons of diſtinction, were taken priſoners in endeavouring to rally their forces. This action is ſometimes called the battle of Guinegate, but more frequently the "Battle of the Spurs;" becauſe the French that day made more uſe of their ſpurs than their ſwords.

Henry, who was now at the head of an army of fifty thouſand men, inſtead of profiting by this victory, and marching into the heart of France, as he might eaſily have done, returned to the ſiege of Terrouenne, while the French were ſtruck with aſtoniſhment at this ſhameful behaviour of their cavalry. They would have been leſs alarmed, if the whole body had been cut to pieces. They prognoſticated a fatal termination to the war with England, and were fearful that Henry would revive the dreadful ſcenes of Poictiers and Agincourt. But his ſupine negligence revived their ſpirits: Terouane ſoon after ſurrendered, and Henry inveſted Tournay, a place always incorporated with France, and the cradle of the French monarchy.

That city was incapable of making any long defence, the garriſon being almoſt deſtitute of military ſtores and proviſions. Accordingly the place was hardly inveſted before the garriſon offered to capitulate. The terms were accepted, and Henry entered the city in triumph. Sir Edward Poinings was appointed governor, and the biſhop's ſee being then vacant, Henry conferred it on his favourite Wolſey, who immediately took poſſeſſion of the revenues, which were very conſiderable.

While Henry was thus engaged in reducing the towns of France, the Swiſs entered Burgundy, and laid ſiege to Dijon, which was in no condition to reſiſt ſo formidable an army. Ferdinand ſeemed deſirous of taking advantage of the diſtreſs of Lewis; whoſe dominions were now ſurrounded by enemies. Tremouille, governor of Burgundy, perceived the dangerous ſituation of his maſter, and ſeduced the Swiſs into a negotiation. He made no objection to the terms they offered, perſuaded that his conduct would be diſavowed by Lewis: and the enemy, without making the leaſt enquiry into the powers of that nobleman, agreed to withdraw their army, on the promiſe of being paid four hundred thouſand crowns. The retreat of the Swiſs accelerated the departure of Henry. He arrived in England on the ſeventeenth of October, highly ſatiſfied with the ſucceſs of his firſt campaign.

While the Engliſh monarch was employed in reducing the towns of France, James IV. of Scotland, who had declared for Lewis, was ravaging the northern parts of Northumberland, at the head of fifty thouſand men. He made himſelf maſter of the caſtles of Norham, Etal, Werk, Ford, and other fortreſſes of leſs importance. The earl of Surry, who commanded the Engliſh forces, marched into the northern counties to ſtop the ravages of the invaders. His army conſiſted of about twenty-ſix thouſand men, five thouſand of which had been ſent over from the army in France. The Scots were encamped on the high grounds near Chiviot hills, in a very advantageous ſituation. The river Till ran in their front; nor could their camp be approached but by one narrow paſs, which was defended by their artillery.

Surry, perceiving that it would be madneſs to attack the enemy in their preſent ſituation, diſpatched an herald to the Scottiſh monarch, offering to meet him in the plain of Milfield, appointing a day for the combat, and inviting him to try the valour of his forces on equal ground. But the anſwer he received was far from being ſatiſfactory, and he determined to have recourſe to a ſtratagem, in order, if poſſible, to draw the Scots from their advantageous ſituation. He made a feint of marching towards Berwick, in order to retaliate the ravages of the enemy, and cut off their proviſions.

This motion occaſioned a council of war to be ſummoned in the Scottiſh camp, where an old nobleman, who had learned prudence from experience, adviſed James to return immediately to Scotland with his booty. He obſerved, that enough had been done to fulfil his engagements with France; that it would be imprudent to hazard a battle with the Engliſh in their own country; and that, in ſerving France, Scotland was not to be neglected merely to pleaſe the French ambaſſador, who was deſirous of engaging others in the moſt dangerous enterprizes, in order to relieve his maſter from his preſent diſtreſs. But James liſtened not to this prudent advice; he determined to give battle to the Engliſh the firſt favourable opportunity. The army was accordingly put in motion, the huts in which the ſoldiers had been quartered were ſet on fire, and the Scots deſcended in diſorder from the hills. Surry obſerved the precipitate decampment of the Scottiſh army, and the ſmoke of the huts concealing his motions from the enemy, he paſſed the Till with his van-guard and train of artillery, at the bridge of Twiſel, while the reſt of his army croſſed the ſtream at a ford farther up the river.

As ſoon as the ſmoke was a little evaporated, James perceived that a battle was inevitable, and that he had now loſt his advantageous ſituation. He immediately drew up his army in three diviſions. The right was commanded by the earl of Huntley, aſſiſted by lord Hume; the left by the earls of Lenox and Argyle; and the center by the king in perſon: a fourth body under the earl of Bothwell, formed a corps de reſerve. The Engliſh army was divided into two lines: the main body of the firſt was led by lord Howard; the right wing by Sir Edmund Howard, and the left by Sir Marmaduke Conſtable. The main body of the ſecond line was commanded by the earl of Surry himſelf; the right wing by lord Dacres, and the left by Sir Edward Stanley. In this poſition the armies approached each other, and met in Floudon field. The battle was begun by the earl of Huntley, who charged with ſuch fury, that he broke the left wing of the Engliſh, and drove them off the field. But the ſame ſucceſs did not attend the other commanders: they could not ſupport the ſhock of the Engliſh; and Huntley at his return found the Scottiſh army in great diſorder. Elated with the ſucceſs of the wing commanded by Huntley, the diviſion under Lenox and Argyle, had broke their ranks, and notwithſtanding the remonſtrances of La Motte, the French ambaſſador, had ruſhed headlong on the enemy, imagining themſelves ſure of victory. But they ſoon found their miſtake. Sir Edward Stanley's diviſion ſtood firm; while Dacres, who commanded in the ſecond line, wheeling about during the action, attacked them ſo furiouſly in the rear, that they could not ſuſtain the ſhock; the greater part of them were cut to pieces, and the reſt eſcaped by a diſorderly flight. This misfortune did not, however, intimidate the diviſions under the king and Bothwell. Animated by the valour of their leaders, they ſtill made head againſt the Engliſh; and forming themſelves into a circle continued the engagement till night put an end to the ſlaughter. The ſlain on both ſides were nearly equal, being about five thouſand men: but the morning ſoon diſcovered that the two armies were now unequal. The Engliſh had loſt very few officers, while the whole flower of the Scottiſh nobility were ſlain. The king himſelf was miſſing; but whether he fell by the ſword of the Engliſh, or by the poniard of an aſſaſſin, is not known. A body ſuppoſed to be that of the Scottiſh monarch, was found among the dead, and conveyed to London in a leaden coffin, where it remained ſome time unburied, as James lay under the ſentence of excommunication, on account of his confederacy with France, and oppoſition to the Holy See. Henry, however, obtained his abſolution from the pontiff, and the body was accordingly interred.

Such was the event of the battle of Floudon; and Henry had now a fair opportunity of inſiſting on his own terms with Scotland, perhaps of conquering the whole country. But he generouſly liſtened to the requeſt of his ſiſter, who, on the death of her huſband, became regent of the kingdom of Scotland during the minority of her ſon, and concluded with her a treaty of peace. At the ſame time he created the earl of Surry, duke of Norfolk; Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk; Charles Somerſet, lord Herbert, earl of Worceſter; and Sir Edward Stanley, lord Monteagle; Margaret of York, daughter to the duke of Clarence, obtained the title of counteſs of Saliſbury, as heireſs to her brother the earl of Warwick, beheaded by Henry VII. Wolſey, who was both the favourite and miniſter of Henry, was promoted to the biſhopric of Lincoln, and the pope permitted him to retain the revenues of the biſhopric of Tournay.

A. D. 1514. Lewis was very deſirous of reſtoring tranquillity to his dominions, and ſheathing, by an honourable peace, the ſword of deſtruction. He appeaſed Leo X. by renouncing the council of Piſa, which had been transfered to Lyons; and the pontiff, in return, took off the excommunication that had been denounced againſt him and his kingdom. He offered to Ferdinand to give in marriage to either of his grandchildren, his daughter Renee, and to cede with her his claim to the dutchy of Milan; and he engaged the emperor Maximilian in the ſame views, and that prince was eaſily induced to conſent to propoſals that were advantageous to his family. Henry was not averſe to a peace; the perfidious conduct of his allies had convinced him that they were more intent on promoting their own intereſts, than in fulfilling their promiſes. A negotiation was therefore opened between the two princes, and a peace ſoon after concluded on the following conditions: That Tournay ſhould remain in the hands of the Engliſh; that Richard de la Pole ſhould be baniſhed to Metz, and reſide there on a penſion aſſigned by Lewis; that Henry ſhould receive a million of crowns, being the arrears due by treaty to his father and himſelf; and that Lewis ſhould marry the princeſs Mary, Henry's ſiſter, who ſhould bring four hundred thouſand crowns as her portion, and enjoy as large a jointure as even the former queen of France, who was heireſs of Britany. It was alſo ſtipulated, that the two princes ſhould mutually aſſiſt each other with troops in caſe either of them was attacked by an enemy. The princeſs Mary, one of the moſt beautiful and accompliſhed women of the age, was then in her twentieth year, and Lewis in his fifty-ſixth. He met her at Abbeville, where the nuptials were celebrated with the utmoſt magnificence: but his paſſion for this amiable princeſs coſt him his life. His conſtitution was too much impaired to withſtand the exceſſes of pleaſure into which he plunged. He died in leſs than three months after his marriage, and left his people to bewail his loſs with the tears of affection. He was ſincerely beloved by his ſubjects, and deſervedly acquired the honourable appellation of "Father of his Country." His young queen ſoon after married Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk.

A. D. 1515. While Wolſey was conducting the negotiation for a peace with France, the archbiſhop of York was poiſoned at Rome by his chaplain, in revenge for a blow the prelate had given him. Information was immediately ſent to Henry, informing him of this cataſtrophe, and that the pope had determined to keep the ſee of York vacant, till the king's pleaſure ſhould be known. He did not wait long, Henry immediately conferred it upon Wolſey, and the pontiff confirmed his election. That celebrated churchman now governed the kingdom, tho' he affected only to follow the inclinations of Henry. He ſeemed to be only the companion of his pleaſures, but held in reality the reins of government. Preferments were heaped upon him with unbounded profuſion. He was not only archbiſhop of York, but alſo biſhop of Durham and Lincoln, and farmed, on very eaſy terms, the biſhoprics of Bath, Worceſter, and Hereford, which were enjoyed by Italians who reſided abroad. He ſoon after obtained a cardinal's hat, which augmented at once his pride and oſtentation. His houſhold was compoſed of eight hundred perſons, among whom were ſeveral of the nobility. He was the firſt clergyman who wore ſilk and gold. But ſtill his ambition was not ſatisfied; he wanted the great ſeal of England, then in the hands of Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury. The primate was a perſon of great prudence and conduct; he had never engaged in any court intrigues; nor even gave offence to any party. Wolſey therefore did not attempt to deprive him of his poſt of chancellor, which perhaps he could not have effected, but took every opportunity of mortifying him, in order to provoke him to reſign.

In order to this he prevailed upon the pope to appoint him legate a latere, which gave him precedency in the province of Canterbury; and being thus empowered to have the legantine croſs borne before him, he cauſed alſo that of York to be carried with it in an erect poſition. This privilege had formerly occaſioned violent diſputes between the two metropolitans; and was at laſt decided by the king's laying his expreſs command on the archbiſhops of York, not to have the croſs carried before them in the province of Canterbury. Warham remonſtrated with Wolſey on his conduct in this particular, but without effect; and the primate being of a peaceable diſpoſition, choſe rather to retire to his ſee, and employ himſelf wholly to the duties of his office, than remain at court, where he was every day affronted. Accordingly he reſigned the great ſeal into the hands of Henry, who, two days after, committed it to the cuſtody of Wolſey. Fox, biſhop of Wincheſter, who had ſo long directed the affairs of government, and even introduced Wolſey to the king's favour, could not bear to find himſelf neglected. He accordingly obtained leave to retire to his biſhopric, and at leaving the council-board he told the king, that "he hoped he would not ſuffer the ſervant to be greater than the maſter." "Fear not, my good lord biſhop," replied Henry, "it ſhall be my care that ſubjects ſhall obey, and not command."

Francis I. who aſcended the throne of France on the death of Lewis XII. was a prince of great courage, and wanted only the talent of diſcretion to render him ſuperior to all the princes of Europe. He renewed the treaty made by his predeceſſor with Henry, and, induced by the ardour of conqueſt, he paſſed into Italy. His deſign was to conquer the dutchy of Milan, which Lewis XII. had loſt, and to wreſt it once more from the unhappy family of Sforza. He was ſupported by the Venetians, who wanted at leaſt to recover the Veroneſe, of which they had been ſtripped by the emperor Maximilian. His oppoſers were pope Leo X. an active and intriguing prince, and Maximilian, worn out with age and infirmities: but his moſt dangerous enemies were the Swiſs, irritated againſt France, by the refuſal of Lewis XII. to fulfil the treaty concluded before Dijon, and inflamed with the harangues of Matthew Schaner, cardinal of Sion. They had aſſumed the title of "Defenders of the popes, and protectors of princes;" and indeed for the laſt ten years this appellation was not merely imaginary.

The French monarch on his march to Milan continued to negotiate with that nation. Practiſed in the art of diſſimulation, which they had learned from the cardinal of Sion, they amuſed the king with empty promiſes, till they received advice that the military cheſt of France was arrived, when they deſcended from their mountains into the plain, though deſtitute of cavalry, and oppoſed themſelves to the progreſs of the French arms. A dreadful battle enſued at Marignan near Milan. The victory was conteſted with a perſeverance hitherto unknown; and it required all the heroic valour of Francis to inſpire his troops with courage to ſupport themſelves againſt the deſperate aſſaults of theſe mountaineers. After a bloody action in the evening, night and darkneſs parted the combatants. The king ſlept on the carriage of a cannon within fifty paces of a Swiſs battalion. As ſoon as the dawn appeared, the action was renewed with redoubled fury; and it was not till the Swiſs had loſt their braveſt troops, that they could be prevailed upon to retire. The field was ſtrewed with twenty thouſand ſlain on both ſides; and the old marſhal Trivulcio, who had been preſent at eighteen pitched battles, uſed to call this "The Battle of the Giants."

The victory of Marignan was followed by the reduction of the Milaneſe. Both the pope and the Swiſs became allies of Francis. He compelled Maximilian to reſtore the Veroneſe to the Venetians; and procured for Leo X. the dutchy of Urbino, which ſtill belongs to the church. Sforza himſelf, tired with the viciſſitudes of fortune, diſguſted with the tyranny of the Swiſs, and deſirous of privacy and repoſe, put himſelf into the hands of Francis; and after ſtipulating for an annual penſion of thirty thouſand ducats, reſigned his pretenſions to the dutchy of Milan, and retired into France.

The glory acquired by Francis in this expedition excited the jealouſy of the Engliſh monarch; and it was the intereſt of Wolſey to cheriſh this diſcontent. The cardinal enjoyed the revenues of the biſhopric of Tournay; but ſaw with regret, that the titular biſhop of that ſee was protected at the court of France. The reſentment and diſguſt of a miniſter are too often ſufficient to kindle the flames of diſcord between two nations. An ambaſſador was ſent to Maximilian, to engage him to renew the war in Italy. He made no difficulty of complying; but the enterprize was unſucceſsful: the Germans were driven out of Italy. This unfortunate expedition diſappointed Henry and Wolſey in their deſigns to leſſen the power of France.

A. D. 1516. In the mean time, Charles V. the ſucceſſor of Ferdinand the Catholic, who was born with ſuperior talents, and who had been carefully educated, ſeemed deſirous, though very young, to give diſturbance to the French monarch; but thought it prudent to conceal his real deſign till his authority in his new dominions was ſufficiently eſtabliſhed. Francis appeared diſpoſed to take advantage of this opportunity; but Charles diverted the ſtorm, by making him an offer which gained his friendſhip. He engaged to marry the daughter of Francis, then an infant of a year old; to receive, as her dowry, all her father's pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples; to pay him an hundred thouſand crowns a year till the conſummation of the marriage; and to give the king of Navarre ſatisfaction with regard to his dominions.

A. D. 1518. But notwithſtanding this alliance, the increaſing power of Charles gave Francis great uneaſineſs; and he was deſirous of gaining the confidence and friendſhip of the Engliſh monarch; and took the only method of ſucceeding, by aſſiduouſly labouring to gain the affections of Wolſey. He flattered his pride, affected to conſult him in his moſt ſecret affairs, and endeavoured to perſuade him that he conſidered his directions as ſo many oracles. As ſoon as he perceived he had gained the cardinal's favour, Bonnivert, admiral of France, was ſent ambaſſador to the court of London. That able politician addreſſed himſelf with ſo much art to the paſſions of the haughty cardinal, that he negotiated a treaty, in which the reſtitution of Tournay was one of the articles. It was ſtipulated, that the princeſs Mary of England ſhould eſpouſe the dauphin, though they were both infants; that Tournay ſhould be her dowry; that Francis ſhould pay Henry ſix hundred thouſand crowns, as a reimburſement of his expences in building a citadel at Tournay; and that he ſhould pay Wolſey an annual penſion of twelve thouſand livres, as an equivalent for the revenues of his biſhopric.

While theſe negotiations were carrying on between the courts of France and England, Germany was agitated with thoſe religious diſputes which produced the Reformation. Leo X. by the encouragement he had given to learning, furniſhed arms againſt himſelf. Cardinal Pole complimented him upon his ſucceſs in the propagation of the ſciences; but at the ſame time reminded him, that it might be of dangerous conſequence to make mankind too learned. The pontiff, however, proceeded in the noble courſe he had begun; and, by his magnificence, gave occaſion to that remarkable revolution that happened in the Chriſtian world during his pontificacy. His predeceſſor, Julius II. under whoſe reign painting and architecture were ſo greatly improved, was deſirous that Rome ſhould be adorned with a ſtructure ſuperior to that of St. Sophia at Conſtantinople. He had the courage to undertake what he never could finiſh. Leo X. was extremely fond of this noble project; but it required prodigious ſums of money, and his magnificence had exhauſted his treaſury. He had therefore recourſe to the ſale of indulgences, in order to fill his coffers, and be enabled to carry on his intended deſign. A favourable opportunity offered. The Turks had juſt defeated the Mamelucks in Egypt, and it was apprehended that they would now turn their whole force againſt the Chriſtians.

It was ſtill believed that the pope, out of the inexhauſtible treaſure of the church, ariſing from the merits of Chriſt and the works of ſupererogation of the ſaints, had a power of diſtributing indulgences on certain conditions preſcribed by him, to the greateſt and moſt profligate of mortals, for a plenary remiſſion of ſin. Theſe indulgences were at firſt ſuppoſed to extend only to the relaxation of penances and eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. Urban II. in the beginning of the eleventh century, was the firſt that granted a full remiſſion of all ſins to thoſe who ſhould take up arms for the recovery of the Holy Land from the Infidels. This practice was continued by his ſucceſſors; ſome of whom extended the benefit of their indulgences to ſuch perſons, who being unwilling, or unable to carry arms in perſon, maintained a ſoldier in their room. At length, theſe ſpiritual favours were diſtributed to thoſe who took the field againſt heretics, or enemies to the Romiſh church. Great ſums were raiſed by theſe means, but ſeldom applied to the purpoſes intended. The Auguſtins, as being moſt in favour with the lower claſs of people, were made the brokers of this ſcandalous commerce. Each friar, or agent, was entruſted with a ſet of indulgences of all prices, of all denominations, in all caſes, and for all ſins: and the better to collect the money ariſing from the ſale of this pontifical merchandize, all Chriſtendom was divided into different departments, in each of which a certain number of theſe prieſts were commiſſioned to recommend and enforce the utility of indulgences.

But Leo X. who now attempted to fill his treaſury by this ſpecies of traffic, employed the Dominicans, who diſtinguiſhed themſelves by exaggerating the benefits to be derived from indulgences. The Auguſtin friars were highly affronted becauſe this occupation was not, as uſual, entruſted to them; eſpecially as they had ſome time ſince been employed for the ſame purpoſe in Saxony, and had thence acquired both reputation and profit. Martin Luther, an Auguſtin friar, and profeſſor of divinity at Wirtemberg, ſtimulated to revenge, was loud in his declamations againſt the church of Rome. He was a perſon of great learning, genius, and ſpirit, inflexible and opiniative; and there was no want of abuſes whereon to found his invectives. A prodigious number of vain and ſuperſtitious ceremonies had been introduced into the exerciſe of religion: divinity was corrupted with ſubtilties: the clergy were given up to indolence and pleaſure; and the court of Rome had been guilty of numberleſs frauds and uſurpations. Religion, often proſtituted, had become a cloak for the moſt ſordid rapacity, and the moſt unpardonable ambition. An inceſſant cry of reformation reſounded from all quarters, and Luther knew how to take advantage of it. He, however, confined himſelf, in his firſt writings, to expoſe the doctrine of indulgences, and, perhaps, had then no other deſign. But he went farther than he at firſt intended, as is the caſe in all diſputes, and in almoſt all tranſactions. It has been ſaid, and with an air of probability, that the beſt method of inducing this zealous reformer to change his opinion, would have been to have ſent him a cardinal's hat; but the contempt in which he was held by the church of Rome, proved fatal to her power.

Luther no longer kept any meaſures with the pontiff. He exhorted all princes to throw off the papal yoke: he railed againſt private maſſes; and met with the greater applauſe, as he inveighed againſt the the public ſale of them. His writings, full of zeal and fury, ſpread over Europe; and were the more attended to, as he ſupported his opinions from ſcripture, and other ancient writings of the Chriſtian church. The doctrines he inculcated were flattering to the princes of Europe, becauſe they furniſhed them with a pretence for throwing off the pope's authority, and for enriching themſelves with the wealth of the eccleſiaſtics. They flattered the vulgar by their novelty, and by the leſſons they taught of equality and liberty; and by the rigour and auſterity they inculcated, they ſerved to excite chimerical ideas of perfection, almoſt as ſeducing to ſelf-love as the tenet of a total relaxation of manners.

The Dominicans, ſupported by the pope's nuncios in Germany, cauſed his books to be burnt. The pontiff thundered out a new bull againſt him; but Luther, now protected by the princes of Germany, was not to be intimidated: he even ordered the pope's bull and the decretals to be burnt in the public market-place of Wirtemberg.

During theſe diſputes in Germany, the Engliſh were cultivating with avidity the bleſſing of peace. The arts found encouragement; trade was improved; manufactures were carried on with ſucceſs. Cardinal Wolſey made the nobleſt uſe of his power; he exerted it for the good of his country. His poſt of chancellor placed him at the fountain of juſtice, and never was it better adminiſtered. He was particularly careful to puniſh perjury, the worſt of crimes: he was a firm ſupporter of the poor, and enforced ſeveral excellent laws for the protection of the mercantile and induſtrious part of the people. We have already obſerved, that he was a great friend to literature. At this time the Engliſh had very little learning, and were wholly deſtitute of taſte. Wolſey ſaw this, and laboured aſſiduouſly to improve the one, and introduce the other. He ſpared no pains to diſcover perſons of literary accompliſhments, nor thought any reward too great to beſtow upon them. He employed no miniſters but ſuch as were ſcholars; and under his adminiſtration the dignified offices of the law, the church, and the ſtate, were filled with men whoſe literary merit was their only recommendation. He alſo founded lectures at Oxford for the improvement of learning; and Henry very readily gave his countenance to the noble and patriotic views of his favourite.

A. D. 1519. The death of the emperor Maximilian recalled the attention of Wolſey from his literary purſuits. Francis I. and Charles V. declared themſelves candidates for the imperial throne. Theſe competitors were worthy of each other: the former was diſtinguiſhed by his candour, his generoſity, and his valour; the latter by his prudence, his diſcretion, and his policy. Henry uſed all his intereſt to ſupport the election of Charles; and by his aſſiſtance he was elected by a majority of one voice among the electors. The addition of the imperial crown ſeemed to have placed Charles on the ſummit of human grandeur. He before poſſeſſed the dominions of Spain, thoſe belonging to the houſe of Auſtria, Burgundy, and Navarre, beſides his vaſt acquiſitions in the New World.

Theſe two great rivals had contended for the imperial throne without diſcovering the leaſt ſigns of perſonal enmity; but the preference given to the one could not fail of being diſagreeable to the other. Henry was courted by both theſe princes; and he might have held the balance of power between them, had his policy been equal to his ſtrength. But a monarch who is perpetually the dupe of his own paſſions, cannot purſue, with the requiſite ſteadineſs, the intereſts of his crown.

A. D. 1520. The character of Henry was well known to Francis, and he hoped to be able to gain his friendſhip and confidence by familiar converſation: he therefore ſollicited an interview near Calais. Wolſey, fond of diſplaying his riches, magnificence and power, ſeconded the requeſt of the monarch; and Henry, who was equally fond of pomp and honour, conſented to the propoſal. Charles was alarmed at this intended interview, and determined, if poſſible, to prevent its conſequences: but he well knew, that unleſs he could gain Wolſey over to his intereſt, all his attempts to procure the favour of Henry would be in vain. The cardinal now directed all the affairs of government; he had no competitor in the cabinet. Nor was his pomp leſs remarkable than his power: he celebrated maſs with all the ſtate and magnificence of the Roman pontiff: he was ſerved by biſhops; and even earls and dukes preſented him with the water and the towel. His dreſs was ſuperbly magnificent: he wore regal veſtments; his ſhoes were of ſilver gilt, ſet with pearls and precious ſtones. When he went abroad, two large croſſes of maſſy ſilver, the legantine and that of York, were carried before him by two tall prieſts; together with two pole-axes, two pillars of maſſy ſilver, golden cuſhions, and a train of ſtately horſes. Nor was he content with the great power, wealth, and authority he enjoyed in England, while there was one degree of eccleſiaſtical dignity to which he had not attained. He already began to concert meaſures for obtaining the papal throne. He eſtabliſhed a legantine court, whoſe arbitrary authority reſembled that of the inquiſition. Though remarkable himſelf for the licentiouſneſs of his manners, Wolſey became a rigid reformer of the actions of the laity; and what is, perhaps, ſtill more ſingular, he joined with him, as a judge in that court, a man whom he himſelf, as chancellor, had condemned for perjury. The whole kingdom dreaded his power; and his vanity roſe to ſuch a height, that he conſidered even the archbiſhop of Canterbury as far beneath him. That prelate having wrote a letter to him, in which he ſubſcribed himſelf, "Your loving brother." Wolſey complained of his preſumption. The primate, when informed of the offence he had given, ſaid coolly, "Know ye not that this man is intoxicated with proſperity?" But deſpotic exertions, when applied againſt the liberty of men's lives and manners, are particularly offenſive. The complaints of the people at laſt reached the ears of the ſovereign: he diſcovered his diſſatisfaction, and Wolſey ſet bounds to his authority: the deciſions of his court were made with more care and deliberation.

Such was the ſituation of Wolſey, when Charles V. in order to procure an interview with Henry, previous to that concerted with Francis I. landed at Dover. Wolſey was immediately diſpatched to compliment his Imperial Majeſty; and the next day he was met by Henry in perſon, who conducted him to Canterbury, where he was entertained with the utmoſt pomp and ſplendour. Charles paid his court to Wolſey in the moſt artful manner; and promiſed him his aſſiſtance in procuring the papacy, whenever there ſhould happen a vacancy in the pontifical throne. There was, however, little appearance of this promiſe being claimed. Leo X. was a young man, and likely to fill the chair of St. Peter when Wolſey was no more. It ſoothed, however, the ambition of that powerful prelate, who, in conſequence, devoted himſelf ſolely to the intereſt of the emperor.

The very day that Charles left England, Henry paſſed over to Calais, with his queen, and the whole court. Francis, attended in the ſame manner, came to Ardres, a ſmall town a few miles diſtant from Calais. The interviews were at firſt carried on with remarkable precaution; the number of guards on each ſide were carefully counted, and every ſtep was ſcrupulouſly meaſured and adjuſted. Francis, whoſe ſoul was above diſtruſt, determined to break through ſuch idle ceremonies: he viſited the Engliſh monarch without guards or attendants; and Henry, diſdaining to be excelled in ſo noble an inſtance of confidence, followed the example. From that moment they viſited each other without the leaſt precaution; a generous diſdain of ſuſpicion ſupplied the uſe of precaution. They paſſed their time in feaſts and tournaments, where they reſpectively diſtinguiſhed themſelves by their dexterity and addreſs in thoſe martial diverſions; but they parted without entering into any ſerious buſineſs.

Though the emperor received daily information from the cardinal, of what paſſed at this interview, he was very uneaſy with regard to the event. He came to Gravelines, where he was met by Henry, and the moſt cordial aſſurances of friendſhip and eſteem paſſed between the two monarchs. At the ſame time, the emperor renewed his promiſes of aſſiſting Wolſey in obtaining the papacy, and put him immediately in poſſeſſion of the revenues belonging to the biſhoprics of Bajadox and Palencia in Caſtile; an acquiſition which rendered the revenues of Wolſey nearly equal to thoſe of the crown itſelf.

A. D. 1521. But notwithſtanding all the endeavours of Henry to prevent any ill conſequences reſulting from the enmity that had been for ſome time viſible between Charles and Francis, it was not long before the ſparks of that fire which was to extend its flames through all Europe were viſible. The French ſent an army into Navarre to re-place the family of d'Albert on the throne of that kingdom. Had the French general confined himſelf to the reduction of Navarre, his conduct could not have been conſidered as a breach of the peace between Charles and Francis; but he had no ſooner ſubdued that country, than, finding the kingdom of Spain itſelf was in the utmoſt diſorder from an inſurrection of the people, he thought the opportunity too favourable to be neglected, and immediately laid ſiege to Logrogno in Caſtile. The Caſtalians were now convinced of their folly; the appearance of a foreign enemy put a period to their domeſtic diſſentions; they attacked the French with ſo much fury, that they drove them from their intrenchments, and even expelled them from Navarre. Robert de la Marck, duke of Bouillon, had the imprudence to attack the emperor's dominions in the Low Countries; and Charles, not doubting but that Robert was inſtigated by Francis, raiſed a powerful army, and openly commenced hoſtilities againſt the French monarch.

Henry affected to obſerve an exact neutrality; and the two monarchs, having ſatisfied their revenge by committing the moſt dreadful ravages and devaſtations on the territories of each other, carried their complaints to Henry, as the proper arbitor between them. Conferences were accordingly opened at Calais; but Charles, who depended on the favour of Wolſey, demanded poſſeſſion of Burgundy, and required to be freed from the homage which his anceſtors had paid for Flanders and Artois. The emperor well knew that theſe propoſals would be rejected; he made them with that intention, and, it is ſaid, with the approbation of Wolſey. But however that be, the conferences were broke off, and the cardinal of York ſoon after made a journey to Bruges, where he was received by the emperor with the ſame ſtate, magnificence and reſpect, as if he had been the king of England himſelf. And he concluded, in the name of his maſter, an offenſive alliance with the pope and the emperor againſt France.

Soon after the return of Wolſey, he commenced a proſecution againſt the duke of Buckingham, conſtable of England, the firſt nobleman both for family and fortune in the kingdom, who had unfortunately given the cardinal ſome cauſe of diſguſt. He was deſcended by a female line from the duke of Glouceſter, ſon of Edward III. and being infatuated with the whims of judicial aſtrology, and the vain predictions of a viſionary monk, he had flattered himſelf with the hopes of one day ſucceeding to the crown, and even meditated ſome project againſt the life of the king. He was tried by a jury of his peers, and declared guilty. But as his crime was rather founded on imprudence than malice, the execution of the ſentence was generally imputed to the malice and revenge of the cardinal.

The religious diſputes in Germany ſtill continued, and ſeveral of the princes had already declared in favour of Luther's reformation. England alſo, where there were ſtill a great many Lollards, who inculcated nearly the ſame tenets, would alſo have followed the German princes, had not the government firmly oppoſed the doctrines of the Wirtemberg profeſſor. Capricious fate, which ſports with the affairs of the world, ſo ordered it, that Henry himſelf ſhould be engaged in this diſpute. He had been ſtrictly educated in an attachment to the court of Rome, and had contracted an averſion to Luther, becauſe he had ſpoken diſreſpectfully of Thomas Aquinas, his favourite author. Vanity and reſentment, more than zeal for religion, induced Henry to become an author, and to combat the doctrines of the German monk. The book was ſoon finiſhed and ſent to Rome, where it was received with rapture by the pope, who beſtowed the title of "Defenders of the Faith" upon Henry and his ſucceſſors. Luther, who made no difference between noble and ignoble writers, ſoon wrote an anſwer to Henry, and treated him with all the acrimony of ſtile, to which, in the courſe of his diſpute, he had been ſo long accuſtomed. The controverſy now became more illuſtrious by Henry's entering the liſts; it engaged ſtill more the attention of mankind; and the Lutheran party acquired daily new converts in every part of Europe. It became a matter of competition to inſult, with moſt indecency, the pope and the church. They called the pontiff antichriſt, denominated his communion the ſcarlet whore, and gave to Rome the appellation of Babylon; expreſſions which however applied, were to be found in the ſcriptures, and therefore better calculated to act on the ignorant multitude than the moſt ſolid arguments.

Luther's cauſe found very few ſupporters in Italy. That ingenious nation, wholly intent upon intrigues and pleaſures, took no ſhare in theſe troubles. The Spaniards, notwithſtanding their learning kept themſelves quiet. The French, though they have the ſenſibility of thoſe nations with a ſtronger paſſion for novelties, were a long time before they engaged in theſe diſputes. It is a great problem whether Charles V. ought to have embraced or oppoſed the reformation. By throwing off the yoke of Rome, he would at once have taken ample revenge for all the injuries which the papal tiaræ had offered to the imperial crown, upwards of four hundred years; but, on the other hand, he would have been in danger of loſing Italy. He was obliged to keep fair with the pope, who was to join him againſt Francis I. Beſides, the inhabitants of his hereditary dominions were all catholics. At length it became abſolutely neceſſary for him to declare himſelf either for or againſt the reformation; he choſe the latter, tho' perhaps he really thought ſome of Luther's opinions were well grounded.

Charles ſummoned that reformer to come and give an account of his doctrine before the imperial diet at Worms. Luther, having obtained the emperor's ſafe conduct, made no ſcruple to appear, though he expoſed himſelf to the ſame fate as John Huſs; but this aſſembly being compoſed of princes, he truſted to their honour. He ſpoke before the emperor and diet, and defended his tenets with great reſolution. It is ſaid, that Charles V. was ſollicited by Alexander, the pope's nuncio, to order Luther to be ſeized, notwithſtanding his ſafe conduct; as Sigiſmund had delivered up John Huſs without paying any regard to public faith: but that Charles made anſwer, "he did not chuſe to have cauſe to bluſh like Sigiſmund."

A little after this diſpute with Luther, Leo X. paid the debt of nature in the flower of his age, and in the ninth year of his pontificate. He was a prince well qualified by his ſound judgment, moderation and temper, to have retarded the progreſs of the reformation, which now made a very rapid progreſs. He was ſucceeded in the papal throne by Adrian VI. who had been tutor to Charles, the preſent emperor. This pontiff was a perſon of great integrity, candour, and ſimplicity of manners; but the prejudices of the reformers were ſo violent againſt the church, that he rather hurt the cauſe by his imprudent exerciſe of thoſe virtues. He frankly confeſſed, that many abominable and deteſtable practices prevailed in the court of Rome.

A. D. 1522. Wolſey was not without hopes of being at this time choſen to fill the vacant chair, and had actually, at different ſcrutinies, nine, twelve, and nineteen voices. He, however, loſt his election; but the advanced age, and numerous infirmities of Adrian, ſtill allowed him to hope, that he ſhould ſoon be able to ſatisfy his ambition. Charles V. never intended to place Wolſey in St. Peter's chair. He was deſirous of having a pope who would be wholly at his devotion; and he was too well acquainted with the imperious temper of the cardinal of York, to think he would ever be ſubmiſſive to the will of any perſon whatever. But in order to diſſipate the chagrin of that haughty miniſter, he paid a new viſit to the court of England; where, beſides flattering the vanity of the king and cardinal, he repeated to Wolſey all the promiſes he had formerly made him of ſeconding his pretenſions to the papal throne. The inſinuating addreſs of Charles produced the deſired effect: Wolſey concealed his reſentment, the late treaty was renewed, and it was determined in the Engliſh council to declare war againſt France.

Clarencieux, king at arms, was accordingly ſent to the French court, with a declaration, that his maſter looked upon Francis as the firſt aggreſſor, and therefore found himſelf under a neceſſity of taking part with the emperor. The bloody ſtandard of war was now diſplayed; the ambaſſadors on both ſides were recalled; the effects of the merchants were ſeized in both countries; and Henry fitted out a ſtrong fleet for making prizes of the enemy's ſhips, and protecting the Engliſh commerce. The command of this fleet was given to the earl of Surry, who was now made lord high admiral of England; and the emperor alſo created him high admiral of his dominions. Surry, after taking ſome towns in Britany, landed at Calais, and laid ſiege to Heſden, but was not able to take the place.

The allies were, however, more fortunate in Italy, where the pope was entirely in their intereſt. A little before the death of Leo X. the artful cardinal of Sion found means to corrupt the Swiſs in the French pay, and to bring them over to the intereſt of the allies, who were by that means vaſtly ſuperior to the French army. Proſper Colonna, the pope's general, paſſed the Adda, and ſurpriſed Milan, where he had for ſome time held a correſpondence with ſeveral of the principal inhabitants. This was followed by the reduction of Pavia, Lodi, Parma, Placentia, and ſeveral other places in the Milaneſe.

A. D. 1523. The duke of Albany, regent of Scotland, having renewed the ancient league with France, now made preparations for invading the northern counties of England. The earl of Surry was ſent with an army to prevent his deſign. Surry entered Scotland, where he committed the moſt dreadful ravages, burnt the town of Jedburgh, with ſeveral villages and caſtles in that neighbourhood, and returned to Newcaſtle. Albany now approached the Engliſh borders, and ſent a herald to Surry, offering to give him battle; but Surry telling him that he ſhould never decline an engagement, though he did not chuſe to follow the counſel of an enemy, Albany paſſed the Tweed, and inveſted the caſtle of Werk, with a part of his army. Sir William Liſle, the governor, knowing that the fortreſs was in no condition to ſupport a long ſiege, made a deſperate ſally upon the enemy, and drove them from the works, with the loſs of three hundred men. This ſo intimidated the Scots, that they returned into their own country, and a truce for one year was concluded between the two kingdoms.

The war with Scotland had prevented the army from paſſing over to Calais before the middle of Auguſt. The duke of Suffolk was appointed commander; and on his arrival at St. Omers, he was joined by three thouſand foot, and five hundred horſe, in the Imperial ſervice. It was now determined to march along the banks of the Somme; and, if poſſible, to provoke the enemy to a deciſive engagement: but the French had learned prudence from paſt miſfortunes; they contented themſelves with haraſſing the van of the Engliſh army with flying parties; and depended on the ſtrength of their frontier garriſons, and the advanced ſeaſon of the year, to prevent the Engliſh from taking up their winter quarters in their country.

They were not deceived: for though the duke of Suffolk made himſelf maſter of Bray, Montdidier, Roye, and ſeveral other conſiderable places; and even advanced within eleven leagues of Paris, he found it would be impoſſible for him to canton his troops in the places he had conquered, as the duke of Vendome lay in Paris with a large body of troops, and the marſhal Tremouille was forming another army by draughts from the garriſons of Picardy. He was therefore obliged to return to Calais, in order to put his army into winter quarters; but before he reached that fortreſs, many of his ſoldiers periſhed by the inclemency of the weather. In conſequence of this retreat, moſt of the places he had taken during the campaign fell again into the hands of the French. Nor had Charles any better ſucceſs in the attempt he made, at the ſame time, upon Gaſcony. His forces inveſted Bayonne; but the French general, Leutrec, made ſuch a noble defence, that the Spaniards, after ravaging the adjacent country, were obliged to abandon the enterprize.

Theſe miſcarriages animated the French to exert themſelves againſt the powerful alliance that was formed againſt their country; and, in all probability, Francis would have been able to have ſupported himſelf againſt all the efforts of his enemies, had not the conſtable of Bourbon, the moſt able of all his generals, perſecuted by the hatred of the dutcheſs of Angouleme, the king's mother, ſacrificed to his reſentment his duty and the love of his country, and entered into the ſervice of Charles V. He was immediately created generaliſſimo of the emperor's armies, and marched into the dutchy of Milan, which the French had again invaded under admiral Bonnivet, his greateſt enemy. A general thoroughly acquainted with the French troops, their ſtrength and weakneſs, muſt have been of conſiderable advantage to Charles: but there were other circumſtances ſtill more in his favour. Moſt of the princes of Italy were in his intereſt. The people hated the French government; and he was aſſiſted by the beſt generals in Europe, particularly the marquis of Peſcara, Lannoy, and John of Medicis, names ſtill famous in Europe.

Bonnivet was but an indifferent ſoldier, and a worſe ſtateſman. He croſſed the Alps at the head of thirty-three thouſand men, and made himſelf maſter of Novaro, and ſome other places of leſs importance in Italy; and had he marched directly to Milan, he might, perhaps, have recovered that city for his maſter; but he loſt ſo much time in treating with the inhabitants, that the conſtable of Bourbon had an opportunity of putting the place into a poſture of defence. The reſt of the campaign was ſpent in ſeveral fruitleſs attempts upon Cremona, and other places, none of which he was able to reduce. The Italian generals ſaw his inabilities, and took care to cut off his proviſions; ſo that Bonnivet was obliged to retire into Piedmont, where he put his army into winter quarters.

During theſe tranſactions, pope Adrian VI. paid the debt of nature; and Clement VI. of the Medicean family, was elected in his place, by the intereſt of the imperial party. Wolſey was now convinced of the inſincerity of the emperor; and juſtly concluded, that he muſt never hope to mount the papal throne by his intereſt. He, however, diſſembled his reſentment, ment, congratulated the new pope on his election, and applied for a continuation of the legantine powers he had enjoyed under the two laſt pontiffs. Clement well knew the neceſſity of maintaining the friendſhip of this imperious miniſter, and not only granted his requeſt, but ſent him a commiſſion for life; a very unuſual conceſſion, and by which Wolſey obtained the whole papal authority in England. He, however, made a noble uſe of this extenſive power. He erected two colleges, one at Oxford, and another at Ipſwich. He invited learned men from every part of Europe, to fill the chairs of theſe colleges: and, in order to beſtow endowments on them, he ſuppreſſed ſome of the leſſer monaſteries, and diſtributed the monks into other convents. Theſe proceedings were countenanced at Rome: there was now an immediate neceſſity for learned men to defend the church againſt the forcible attacks of the reformers.

A. D. 1524. Bonnivet, the French general in Italy, having given offence to the Swiſs by his haughty carriage, theſe hardy mountaineers abandoned the French army, and returned to their own country. Deſerted by theſe forces, Bonnivet ſaw the neceſſity of a retreat. He left his camp, and was followed by the allied army. A ſharp action enſued, in which the greater part of Bonnivet's rear was cut to pieces. The chevalier Bayard was mortally wounded in this conteſt: he was conſidered as the model of ſoldiers and men of honour; and obtained the title of the "Knight without fear, and without reproach." When this brave gentleman could no longer ſupport himſelf on horſeback, he ordered his attendants to ſet him under a tree, and turn his face towards the enemy, that he might die in that poſture. Every perſon ſeemed to ſhare in his misfortunes. The ſoldiers, as they paſſed, dropped a tear; and the allied generals, and among the reſt the conſtable of Bourbon, came round him, and expreſſed their concern for his preſent condition. "Pity not me," cried he to Bourbon, "I die in the diſcharge of my "duty: they alone are the objects of pity, who fight "againſt their prince and their country."

Clement was now alarmed for Italy: the emperor ſeemed a more dangerous enemy than the French. The Florentines and Venetians were alſo ſatisfied with the advantage already obtained, and thought it prudent not to proſecute their victory. The pope proceeded ſo far in his oppoſition to Charles, that he ordered his nuncio at London to mediate a reconciliation between France and England. But however exaſperated the cardinal might be againſt the emperor, he determined to have the whole honour himſelf in bringing about ſo great an alteration. Accordingly he perſuaded Henry to refuſe the pope's mediation; and a new treaty was concluded between Henry and Charles for the invaſion of France.

Accordingly the conſtable of Bourbon paſſed the Alps, and entered Provence at the head of ten thouſand foot, two thouſand horſe, and eighteen pieces of cannon. The defenceleſs towns of Antibes, Frejus, Vignolles, and Aix, fell an eaſy conqueſt; and the conſtable ſat down, on the nineteenth of Auguſt, before Marſeilles, which was defended by a garriſon of three thouſand foot, and two hundred men at arms, beſides nine thouſand inhabitants, who took up arms on this occaſion. About the ſame time, the Spaniſh admiral, who had been ſent with a ſtrong fleet from Genoa to aſſiſt the land forces, made himſelf maſter of Toulon. The ſiege was carried on with the utmoſt vigour for about a month; when the approach of Francis, at the head of forty thouſand men, obliged the conſtable to abandon the enterprize, and retreat, with ſome precipitation, into Italy.

Had Charles been ſatisfied with defending his own dominions, in all probability, he might have rendered all the deſigns of his enemies abortive; eſpecially as the Engliſh were by no means ſanguine for carrying on the war with vigour. But he was deſirous of recovering the Milaneſe, and accordingly croſſed the Alps at Mount Cenis; and the conſtable being in no condition to oppoſe him, he marched immediately to the capital of that dutchy, and entered the city without oppoſition. The imperial forces fled to Lodi; and were preparing to abandon that place, when advice arrived that Francis had undertaken the ſiege of Pavia, one of the ſtrongeſt fortreſſes in Italy, and well provided for making a ſtout defence. Francis puſhed the ſiege with the utmoſt fury, and made ſeveral breaches in the walls; but the vigilance of Leyva, the governor, rendered all his attempts abortive; he inſtantly threw up new intrenchments behind the breaches.

A. D. 1525. The emperor, notwithſtanding his immenſe poſſeſſions, had not money to pay his troops; ſo little progreſs had induſtry and commerce as yet made in Europe. Bourbon pawned his jewels; and with that money, aſſiſted by his perſonal intereſt, he levied twelve thouſand men, and joined the imperial generals Piſcarra and Lannoy, who had gathered forces from all parts of Italy. The junction being completed, the army advanced to raiſe the ſiege of Pavia, where Francis, as imprudent as he was brave, perſiſted in his deſign, though he met with invincible obſtacles. Had Francis raiſed the ſiege, the imperial generals would, doubtleſs, have diſperſed, and he might have reduced the dutchy of Milan without any difficulty; but thinking his honour concerned, he reſolved either to make himſelf maſter of Pavia, or loſe his army in the attempt.

The French camp was ſurrounded with ſuch ſtrong intrenchments, that the imperial generals contented themſelves with cannonading the enemy for ſeveral days; when the Swiſs having recalled their troops from the French army, they attacked the intrenchments of the beſiegers about midnight of the twenty-fifth of February. Upon the firſt alarm, Francis put himſelf at the head of two thouſand cavalry, and fell with ſuch impetuoſity upon a body of troops commanded by Piſcarra, that the general was unhorſed, and dangerouſly wounded; and the whole corps would have been totally ruined, had not the duke of Bourbon, who had already made a dreadful ſlaughter in another part of the camp, haſtened to his aſſiſtance. The conteſt was now unequal; but the French, to defend the perſon of their king, gathered round him, and fought with all the fury of men driven to deſpair. La Pleſſe, la Tremouille, Galcas de San Severino, and admiral Bonnivet, were ſlain by his ſide. The king defended himſelf with aſtoniſhing vigour: his horſe was killed under him, and he received a deſperate wound in his leg; but he ſtarted up, and ſtill fought on foot with amazing valour.

Pomerant, an officer of ſome diſtinction, who had followed the duke of Bourbon in his revolt, came up at that inſtant; and ſeeing the king in ſuch a dangerous ſituation, drew his ſword; and placing himſelf by the ſide of Francis, aſſiſted him in keeping off the ſoldiers, who preſſed forward to take him alive. At the ſame time, he deſired that the duke of Bourbon might be called, to receive the king as a priſoner. But Francis, tranſported with rage, declared, that he would ſooner periſh than deliver his ſword to a traitor. "Send for Lannoy, viceroy of Naples," continued he; "to him I will ſurrender." That officer accordingly appeared; and the king ſaid to him, "M. de Lannoy, take this ſword; it is that of a king, who is not a priſoner from cowardice, but the accidents of fortune." Lannoy received the ſword upon his knee, kiſſed his hand with the profoundeſt reſpect, and preſented him his own ſword, ſaying, "I beg your Majeſty will be ſo good as to receive mine, which has this day ſpared the lives of many Frenchmen. It does not become an officer of the emperor to leave a king diſarmed, though a priſoner." Lannoy did not, however, think Francis ſafe in the army. He feared the German forces might ſeize his perſon as a ſecurity for their pay; and therefore carried him immediately to the ſtrong caſtle of Pizzighitone, where he remained for ſome time under the care of Alvazon, the Spaniſh governor, who ſerved him with the greateſt reſpect.

Pennaloſa, who was ſent expreſs to the emperor at Madrid, with the news of this remarkable victory, and who paſſed through France by means of a ſafe conduct which he received from the captive king, carried alſo a letter from Francis to his mother, who then reſided at Lyons. It contained only theſe few words "Madam, all is loſt except our honour." The princeſs was ſtruck with the greatneſs of the calamity. Every thing ſeemed to foretel inevitable ruin. The frontiers of France were unguarded; the treaſury exhauſted; a general conſternation prevailed throughout all orders of the ſtate, and violent diſſentions agitated the council of the queen-mother, who governed the kingdom during the abſence of her ſon. Charles affected to diſplay the utmoſt moderation on this event; but his conduct diſcovered the whole to be hypocritical and falſe. He appeared to deſire peace; but the conditions he required rendered it impoſſible that any treaty could be concluded.

The Engliſh monarch had been for ſome time jealous of the emperor's power, and diſſatisfied with his conduct; his pride now completed the diſguſt of Henry. Charles had hitherto always written to him with his own hand, and ſubſcribed himſelf "Your affectionate ſon and couſin;" but he had now forgot the ſtile of flattery. Elated with his proſperity, he dictated his letters to his ſecretary, and ſubſcribed himſelf "Charles." An incident of this kind could not fail of wounding the ſelf-love of Henry; and Wolſey had not forgot his behaviour with regard to the papacy; he had twice deceived him, and the reſentment of the haughty cardinal now exerted its whole force. He wanted only a pretence to break with Charles, and his behaviour now furniſhed him with one ſufficient for his purpoſe. A correſpondence was ſoon after opened by Henry with the dutcheſs of Augouleme, the regent of France; and he engaged to procure the liberty of Francis on very reaſonable terms. It was ſtipulated in return, that he ſhould enjoy an annual penſion during his life of one hundred thouſand crowns; and, at the ſame time, the regent acknowledged, that France owed him one million eight hundred thouſand crowns. The cardinal was promiſed the arrears of his penſion which had been granted him inſtead of the adminiſtration of the biſhopric of Tournay, amounting to twenty-nine thouſand ſeven hundred and ninety-three crowns; beſides which he was gratified with the additional ſum of one hundred thouſand crowns.

The natural conſequence of this alliance was a war with the emperor; but as the treaſury was almoſt exhauſted, Henry committed the care of recruiting it to Wolſey, who, inſtead of calling a parliament, where he expected a repulſe, he iſſued a decree in the king's name, for levying through the whole kingdom, one ſixth of all the lay revenues, and one fourth of thoſe belonging to the clergy. This tax was conſidered as ſuch a violent encroachment on the liberty of the ſubject, and ſuch a flagrant violation of Magna Charta, that it produced a dreadful clamour in every part of the nation, and it was feared a rebellion would be the conſequence. Henry, when informed of this alarming ferment, diſowned the meaſure, declaring, "That no neceſſities of the crown ſhould make him attempt the raiſing of money any other way than by the people's conſent in parliament."

Diſappointed in this attempt, the cardinal had recourſe to the old method of benevolences, which he imagined muſt appear leſs odious to the people. But he was deceived; it occaſioned very loud complaints and remonſtrances. The more illegal the impoſts he levied, the more the ſufferers were enraged. They regarded them not as neceſſary ſupplies for the ſtate, but as violent and tyrannical exactions. A lawyer having obſerved, that all benevolences had been aboliſhed by act of parliament in the reign of Richard III. it was anſwered, that Richard was an uſurper, that his parliaments were factious aſſemblies; and that his ſtatutes were of no force againſt a legal king. The judges who were conſulted on this occaſion, went ſo far as to affirm, that the king could, by commiſſion, exact whatever ſum he pleaſed. This deſpotic maxim was not, however, admitted by the people; they had recourſe to arms; and Henry had no better method of ſuppreſſing the inſurgents, than by granting them a general pardon.

Henry ſeems to have been hitherto unacquainted with the meaſures of the cardinal, and to have imagined that the people were happy and contented under his adminiſtration; but the clamours and frequent inſurrections which had happened in conſequence of the late attempts to oppreſs the ſubject having convinced him to the contrary, he was highly incenſed againſt his favourite, who was obliged to have recourſe to the moſt humble and abject ſubmiſſion to appeaſe the wrath of his maſter. He produced his will, in which he had left all his riches to the king, and laboured to convince him that all he did was to promote his honour, and would prove in the end highly advantageous. At the ſame time he made him a preſent of his ſtately palace at Hampton-court, which was then juſt finiſhed.

Moſt of the powers of Europe now intereſted themſelves in procuring the liberty of the French monarch; but the emperor inſiſted upon ſuch harſh terms, that Francis declared that he was reſolved to ſuffer any extremity rather than conſent to ſuch unreaſonable demands; and accordingly ſent into France a public act ſigned by his own hand, conſenting that his ſon, the dauphin, ſhould be placed on the throne, and he himſelf ſpend the remainder of his days in captivity. This appearance of reſolution had great effect upon Charles, who now began to liſten to terms of accommodation.

A. D. 1527. Accordingly a treaty was ſigned at Madrid on the fourteenth of January, whereby it was ſtipulated, That Francis ſhould relinquiſh to the emperor, the dutchy of Burgundy, with its ſovereignty and dependences, within ſix weeks after his return to France: That Francis ſhould be ſet at liberty in his own kingdom by the tenth of March, when the dauphin and the duke of Orleans, his two eldeſt ſons, ſhould be put into the emperor's hands as hoſtages: That if any difficulty ſhould occur with regard to the reſtitution of Burgundy, Francis ſhould return to Madrid, and remain there till the full performance of the treaty: That Francis ſhould reſign all his pretenſions to the kingdom of Naples, the dutchy of Milan, the lordſhip of Genoa, the counties of Aſti, Arras, Tournay, Mortaigne, St. Amand, Liſle, Douay, Orchies, Hedin; and alſo all ſovereignty which he could claim over the countries of Flanders and Artois: That the emperor ſhould reſign all his rights and pretenſions to the cities and lordſhips of Peronne, Montdidier, Rouen, Guiſnes and Ponthieu; together with all the cities and territories on the river Somme: That the duke of Bourbon ſhould be reſtored to all the eſtates and poſſeſſions he formerly enjoyed.

Such were the principal articles in the treaty of Madrid, which Francis engaged to ratify at the firſt town he ſhould enter upon his arrival in his own dominions. But though he was remarkably delicate in regard to the principle of honour, he did not think himſelf bound by a promiſe which force had extorted from him, and which was ſtrenuouſly oppoſed by the ſtates of Burgundy. Charles ſhould have foreſeen this circumſtance, and have behaved with more generoſity, or have drawn more advantage from the captivity of Francis. His uſual policy forſook him on this occaſion. Francis offered the emperor two millions of crowns as an equivalent for Burgundy; but Charles would not conſent to the leaſt alteration in the treaty. The French monarch, therefore, concluded an alliance againſt the emperor with Clement VII. the Venetians, and the principalities of Italy; a confederacy of which the king of England was declared the protector.

Irritated at this league, Charles determined to take ample vengeance on thoſe allies that had deſerted him in the time of danger; particularly the Roman pontiff, who, though he had chiefly owed his election to the good offices of the emperor, had ſo ungratefully abandoned the intereſt of his benefactor. He accordingly ordered the duke of Bourbon to advance towards Rome, and attack the pope in his capital. Bourbon executed the emperor's commands with the greateſt bravery and conduct, but was killed as he was mounting a ladder to ſcale the walls. His death inſpired his followers with fury and revenge. Rome, taken by aſſault, was pillaged, and became a ſcene of the moſt ſhocking barbarities. That renowned city never ſuffered more, even from Barbarians, than now from the hands of Chriſtians. Whatever was reſpectable in modeſty, whatever was ſacred in religion, ſeemed only to increaſe the brutality of the ſoldiers. The pope himſelf was taken priſoner, and treated with every indignity. When intelligence was brought the emperor of the ſucceſs of his arms againſt the Roman capital, he affected the utmoſt ſorrow, put himſelf and his whole court into mourning, and ordered prayers to be offered up for the deliverance of the pope. But the artifice was too groſs to impoſe even upon the ignorant and ſuperſtitious multitude. It was remarked, even by the vulgar, that a letter under his own hand, to his generals in Italy, would be more effectual than all his prayers.

It was very different with Francis and Henry: they were extremely concerned for the misfortunes of the pontiff, and determined to carry their arms into Italy. Wolſey himſelf croſſed the ſeas to have an interview with Francis, who met him at Amiens; where it was ſtipulated, that the duke of Orleans ſhould marry the princeſs Mary: and as it was apprehended that Charles would immediately ſummon a general council, both monarchs agreed not to acknowledge it, but to govern the churches in their reſpective dominions by their own authority, during the pope's impriſonment. Soon after, a new treaty was negotiated between the two monarchs; by which Henry renounced his ancient pretenſions to the crown of France; and Charles, in return, bound himſelf and his ſucceſſors to pay annually the ſum of fifty thouſand crowns. Spain was now become the terror of the Engliſh; and the animoſity ſo long entertained againſt the French entirely ſubſided.

Charles, though alarmed at this alliance between France and England, refuſed to ſubmit to the conditions inſiſted upon by the allies. He receded, indeed, from his demand of Burgundy, as the ranſom for the two princes; but inſiſted that Francis ſhould evacuate all his Italian conqueſts before they ſhould recover their liberty. The conditions being rejected, the Engliſh and French heralds, purſuant to their inſtructions, declared war againſt the emperor, and ſet him at defiance. Charles anſwered the Engliſh herald with great moderation; but reproached the Frenchman with his maſter's breach of faith, and anſwered him with inſults. The French monarch retaliated this charge, by giving the emperor the lie; and challenges were formally ſent to each other by theſe great princes. But though they were both undoubtedly brave, no duel took place. The practice of ſingle combat was, however, at this time, very common in Europe, and even countenanced, in ſeveral caſes, by the law. It was ſtill the common method of terminating diſputes between diſcontented warriors; and the challenges which reciprocally paſſed between Charles and Francis, greatly increaſed the evil.

During theſe tranſactions on the continent, the paſſions of Henry produced events as remarkable as any that are found in the hiſtory of any country. His conſort, Catherine of Arragon, who was ſix years older than Henry, had loſt his affections. She was the daughter of Ferdinand and Iſabella, and niece to Charles V. had been married to Henry eighteen years, and brought him three children; one of whom, the princeſs Mary, afterwards queen of England, was ſtill living. The queen could neither be reproached with barrenneſs, with bad conduct, nor even with that peeviſh humour which ſo frequently accompanies female virtue. But all her gentle and amiable accompliſhments could not fix a heart devoted to pleaſure. She had been firſt married to prince Arthur, elder brother to Henry; and upon his death, ſhe was betrothed to him. This marriage had always been conſidered as illegal by moſt of the foreign ſtates; had been ſtrongly oppoſed as ſuch by Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury; and his opinion had been confirmed by the two houſes of Convocation. Theſe authorities ſtrengthened Henry's ſcruples; and it was thought that the pope had no power to diſpenſe with a poſitive law of the Deity. Henry was the more affected, becauſe all his children by Catherine, Mary excepted, had died in their infancy; and the curſe of being childleſs is threatened in the Levitical law againſt the perſon who ſhall eſpouſe his brother's widow. He conſidered himſelf as obnoxious to this malediction; and the more he was inclined to a divorce, he was the more ſollicitous to convince himſelf of the illegitimacy of his marriage. The great progreſs Henry had made in caſuiſtical divinity, enabled him to examine this queſtion thoroughly. The celebrated Thomas Aquinas, whoſe authority was great in the church, and abſolute with Henry, had treated of that very caſe, and expreſsly declared againſt the lawfulneſs of ſuch marriages. "The prohibitions (ſays that famous caſuiſt) contained in Leviticus; and among the reſt, that of marrying a brother's widow, are moral, eternal, and founded on a divine ſanction; and though the pope may diſpenſe with the rules of the church, the laws of God cannot be ſet aſide by any authority leſs than that which enacted them."

This deciſion was ſufficient to convince Henry, that his marriage was unlawful; and an incident that now happened determined him to procure a divorce from Catherine. Anne Boleyn, a young lady celebrated for her beauty and mental accompliſhments, had been lately created maid of honour to the queen, and ſoon acquired an entire aſcendant over the affections of Henry. He endeavoured, by every method, to ſeduce her, but the virtue or ambition of Anne reſiſted all his arts; and the king perceiving that there was no other method of gratifying his paſſion, determined to make her his partner in the throne. But it was no eaſy taſk to repudiate the aunt of Charles V. Many difficulties oppoſed every ſtep of the proceſs.

A. D. 1527. Before any advances could be made, it was neceſſary that the bull of pope Julius ſhould be annulled at Rome; a proceeding which no pontiff would be willing to adopt. Clement, though ſtill a priſoner to Charles, was deſirous of procuring the favour of Henry, who was alone able to aſſiſt him in his diſtreſs: he therefore liſtened to the propoſals of that monarch, and ſeemed willing to annul the bull of his predeceſſor. He granted a commiſſion to Wolſey to examine, as legate, the validity of the marriage, and promiſed to expedite a bull of divorce. But Clement, with all his dexterity and addreſs, wanted intrepidity, firmneſs, and integrity. Charles V. diſcovered his intentions; and threatened, if he favoured the Engliſh monarch, to ſummon a general council, and cauſe him to be depoſed, on account of his being a natural ſon of Julian of Medicis. At the ſame time, he flattered him with the hopes of re-eſtabliſhing his family in the dutchy of Florence, if he complied with his deſires. The offers and threatenings of Charles were too powerful for Clement to withſtand: he granted a new commiſſion, in which cardinal Campeggio was joined with Wolſey, for trying the validity of the king's marriage. But he could not be induced to promiſe, that he would not recall this commiſſion. Campeggio artfully protracted his departure for England; and when he arrived there with a bull in the ſtile requeſted by Henry, he refuſed to communicate it to any perſon except the king and Wolſey. Nor could this bull be executed till the marriage was pronounced illegal; and accordingly the two legates proceeded to examine the validity of the marriage.

A. D. 1529. The king and queen were both cited to appear before this tribunal; and Henry, when called, anſwered readily to his name. But the queen, inſtead of anſwering to her's, roſe from her ſeat, threw herſelf at the feet of her huſband, and addreſſed him in the moſt pathetic terms. She began with obſerving, that ſhe was a ſtranger in his dominions, deſtitute of friends, of counſel, of aſſiſtance; expoſed to all the injuſtice which her enemies were pleaſed to heap upon her. She told him, that her conduct, ever ſince their marriage, had been irreproachable; and proteſted, that he had received her a virgin to his bed. She added, that in eſpouſing him, ſhe had followed the advice of thoſe able princes, Henry VII. and Ferdinand the Catholic. She expreſſed her ſuſpicion of the legates, appealed from them to the pope; and, after making the king a low reverence, ſhe left the court, nor would ſhe ever after appear before the legates. Henry did not attempt to reproach her with any crime: on the contrary, he declared that ſhe had ever been a dutiful and affectionate wife, and that the whole tenor of her behaviour had been conformable to the ſtricteſt rules of probity and honour. But he ſtill inſiſted on the ſcruples with which he had been agitated. He mentioned the conſummation of her marriage with his brother Arthur; declared his doubts of the validity of pope Julius's diſpenſation; and expreſſed his deſire that the court might give judgment according to the rules of equity and religion.

The legates now proceeded in their commiſſion, and firſt examined into the proofs of the conſummation of Arthur's marriage with Catherine. And it muſt be owned by every impartial enquirer, that the fact was eſtabliſhed as far as the nature of the tranſaction would admit of proof. Every perſon now expected that the ſentence of divorce would be ſoon pronounced, but that moment was ſtill at a great diſtance. Campeggio ſpun out the trial, till he received his final inſtructions from Rome; when he burnt the decretal bull, and declared that the cauſe was evoked to Rome. Henry thought himſelf ſure of obtaining his wiſhes, when he was informed of this mortifying tranſaction. He ſuſpected Wolſey of treachery, and from that moment we may juſtly date the fall of that powerful miniſter. Both the emperor and Catherine made the utmoſt efforts to ruin him in the king's opinion: they were at great pains to propagate reports, by means of their agents, wholly calculated to accompliſh his deſtruction. The dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, at the head of a powerful party, exerted all their influence to ſupplant him in the royal favour, and embraced every opportunity of miſrepreſenting his actions. But, perhaps, all their endeavours, added to the envy and malignancy of the world, would not have been ſufficient to have effected his diſgrace, without the powerful aſſiſtance of Anne Boleyn, who had now gained an entire aſcendency over the mind of her royal lover. Aſſiſted by her powerful influence, Wolſey ſunk under the complicated weight.

Every body expected that the diſgrace of the cardinal would have immediately followed the evocation of the cauſe to Rome; but they were deceived. Henry had ſo much command over his paſſion, as not to intimate any diſlike to the proceedings of his miniſter; but Campeggio had no ſooner received his audience of leave, than Henry, in order to divert the chagrin reſulting from his diſappointment, made a progreſs through ſeveral of the counties adjacent to his capital, without taking the cardinal with him. From this neglect Wolſey prognoſticated that his fall was at no great diſtance. He, however, ſtill continued to diſcharge the duties of his office; and obſerving no alteration in the behaviour of the courtiers towards him, he began to flatter himſelf that his diſgrace was not abſolutely determined. But his enemies, with Anne Boleyn at their head, had ſo prepoſſeſſed the king, during his abſence, againſt the miniſter, that on his return to London, the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk, both ſworn enemies to Wolſey, were ſent to demand the great ſeal, which Wolſey thought proper to refuſe, aſſerting, that he held it by patent during his life. The next day they returned with orders under the king's ſignet, and Wolſey immediately delivered the ſeal into their hands. The king immediately gave it to Sir Thomas More, a man of letters, virtue, and integrity. Wolſey was ordered to retire from York palace, which, though it belonged to the archiepiſcopal ſee, was ſeized by Henry, and became afterwards the reſidence of the kings of England, under the title of Whitehall. A cupboard of maſſy gold, a thouſand pieces of holland, which had belonged to him, with all his rich furniture, were converted to the king's uſe. Wolſey himſelf retired to Aſher, a country-ſeat he poſſeſſed on the banks of the Thames, where he diſmiſſed his numerous retinue.

Henry was, however, for ſome time, willing to ſuſpend the blow which overwhelmed his favourite; but his enemies, particularly Anne Boleyn, ſo exaſperated the king againſt him by falſe accuſations, that he gave him up to the proſecution of the parliament. The Houſe of Lords preſented an accuſation againſt the cardinal, conſiſting of forty-four articles; but all of them ſo vague and indeterminate, that the Commons rejected the bill. Thomas Cromwell, formerly one of his domeſtics, defended him in that aſſembly with a force and courage which, inſtead of hurting his fortune, as might have been expected, laid the foundation of that favour which he afterwards enjoyed with the king. True merit ſometimes acquires an aſcendant over vicious minds. But the oppoſition of the Commons was not ſufficient to divert the dreadful ſtorm that threatened to overwhelm this once powerful miniſter. He was condemned, on pretence of his having ſollicited bulls from Rome, though the king had given his conſent to that meaſure; and the cardinal was never able to recover from this diſgrace: he fell a ſacrifice to the envy and malevolence of his enemies. The king, however, would not ſuffer this proſecution to be carried to extremities: he even granted him a pardon for all offences; reſtored him part of his plate and furniture; and continued, from time to time, to intimate, that he ſtill entertained for him his former affections.

Clement, by his duplicity, greatly augmented the prejudices already entertained by the Engliſh againſt the Romiſh church. This was ſufficiently evident by the conduct of the parliament. The utmoſt freedoms were uſed with the characters of the ſacred colleges. Some members of the Houſe of Commons having attacked the impoſitions of the clergy, and the various attempts they had made to uſurp an authority in civil matters, no offence was taken, though their invectives were remarkably ſevere. One of them had even the boldneſs to advance ſuch tenets, that even the deiſts of our times would ſcruple to defend publicly. He ſaid, That as the vaſt variety of theological opinions which had, at different times, prevailed in the world, could not poſſibly be known and examined by individuals, their wiſeſt method was to ſuſpend their judgment with regard to all; and that the only religion obligatory on the human race, was the belief of one Supreme Being, and the practice of virtue. Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, complained, on this occaſion, of the temerity of the Commons; and accuſed them of having formed a deſign, founded on heretical and Lutheran principles, of robbing the church of her patrimony, and overturning the national religion. The duke of Norfolk undertook their defence, but made uſe of terms perhaps ſomewhat indecent. He ſaid, "That the greateſt clerks were not always the wiſeſt men." "Your obſervation may be right," replied Rocheſter, "but I have not known, in my time, any fools that have proved great clerks." This reflection diſpleaſed the Commons, who complained of it to the king, and the biſhop was obliged to put a favourable conſtruction on his words. So greatly was the power of the hierarchy fallen in the opinion of this capricious monarch.

Henry, inſtead of condemning the Commons for their ſevere attacks, was pleaſed to find that the clergy muſt depend ſolely on his power. He had more than once determined to throw off all dependence upon Rome, though, at the ſame time, he trembled at the thoughts of hereſy. He had defended the Catholic Church againſt Luther, and his pride would not ſuffer him to acknowledge that he was now convinced of his error. He had no hopes of ſucceeding in his ſollicitations for a divorce from Rome. The policy of Clement VII. and the intrigues and power of Charles V. had abundantly convinced him, that every attempt of that kind would prove abortive. A treaty had been lately concluded between the emperor and the pope; by which it was ſtipulated, "That the emperor ſhould reſtore to the family of Medicis the dutchy of Florence, on the ſame footing as before the war: that he ſhould cauſe Revenna and Cervia to be delivered to the pope: that he ſhould put him in poſſeſſion of Modena and Reggio: that he ſhould aſſiſt him in making himſelf maſter of Ferrara: that Franciſco Sforza ſhould be reſtored to Milan: that the pope and the emperor ſhould employ their temporal and ſpiritual arms againſt the heretics of Germany: that Alexander de Medicis ſhould eſpouſe Margaret, the emperor's natural daughter: that the pope ſhould grant the emperor a fourth of the eccleſiaſtical revenues in his dominions, in order to enable him to carry on the war againſt the Turks; and that he ſhould abſolve all who had been any way concerned in the taking and ſacking of Rome."

This treaty was ſoon after followed by another, between the emperor and Francis I. on the baſis of that concluded at Madrid. By this treaty the emperor agreed to wave, for the preſent, his claim upon Burgundy. Francis engaged to pay two millions of crowns for the ranſom of his children; to withdraw his troops from Italy; to cede to Charles the government of Flanders and Artois; to reſtore the county of Aſti, with all that he ſtill retained in the kingdom of Naples; to eſpouſe Eleanor, queen-dowager of Portugal, the emperor's ſiſter; and to re-eſtabliſh the heirs of the late duke of Bourbon in all the eſtates of that family, which had been confiſcated.

Theſe treaties reſtored peace to Italy, and Clement no longer depended on Henry's aſſiſtance. It was therefore neceſſary to have recourſe to ſome other expedient, or drop all thoughts of obtaining a divorce from Catherine. Dr. Thomas Cranmer, a fellow of Jeſus College, Cambridge, diſcovered a method which ſeemed to promiſe the removal of every difficulty. He propoſed to conſult all the univerſities of Europe with regard to this controverted point; alledging, that if they agreed to approve the king's marriage with Catherine, his Majeſty's ſcruples muſt ceaſe of courſe: if they condemned it, the pope would find it difficult to reſiſt the opinion of all the learned, when joined with the ſollicitations of ſo great a monarch. Henry was highly delighted with this propoſal, and determined to carry it immediately into execution. He alſo found, upon inquiry, that Cranmer was a perſon of acknowledged piety, learning, and moderation, and therefore determined to have him near his perſon. Accordingly he ſent for him to court, entered into converſation with him, and conceived an high opinion of his parts and underſtanding. In the mean time, he diſpatched his agents to collect the opinions of the univerſities of Europe.

A. D. 1530. It was not long before Henry obtained his deſire. The univerſities of Paris, Orleans, Bourges, Thoulouſe, Angiers, Venice, Ferrara, Padua, Bologna, Oxford and Cambridge, pronounced a deciſion agreeable to his wiſhes. They maintained, "That the marriage of a perſon with his brother's widow was contrary to the divine law; and, conſeſequently, could not be authoriſed by any diſpenſation."

But this deciſion had no effect upon the court of Rome; they ſtill refuſed to liſten to Henry's remonſtrances. A ſpirited letter was therefore written to the pope, ſigned by the principal prelates and nobility of England; in which, after mentioning the many good offices which the king had formerly done for his Holineſs, the judgment of ſo many learned univerſities, and the little regard he had paid to all theſe weighty conſiderations; they plainly told him, "that if he continued to amuſe and deceive the Engliſh monarch in the affair of the divorce, they would renounce their connections with the ſee of Rome, and do themſelves that juſtice which they had ſo long demanded in vain from his Holineſs."

During theſe tranſactions, Wolſey reſided at a country-houſe at Richmond, a ſeat he had received as a preſent from Henry, in return for Hampton-Court. He had been reinſtated in the revenues of his archbiſhopric, and thoſe of the ſee of Wincheſter. He even entertained hopes of again recovering the king's favour. The courtiers were alarmed, and procured an order for him to remove to his archiepiſcopal ſee. He immediately obeyed, and retired to Cawood, in Yorkſhire, where he applied himſelf ſtrictly to execute the duties of his eccleſiaſtical charge. Nor did he labour in vain. The aſſiduity with which he diſcharged his paſtoral duties, his charity to the poor, his hoſpitality, and the obliging reception he gave to all who viſited him in his retreat, ſoon gained him the love and eſteem of all orders of men in the neighbourhood of his reſidence. Wolſey, for the firſt time, now became truly popular. But he was not long ſuffered to enjoy this happineſs unmoleſted. The earl of Northumberland and Sir Peter Walſh were ſent down to arreſt him for high-treaſon, and to conduct him to London. No regard was paid to his eccleſiaſtical character; the privileges of the church were no longer regarded.

Wolſey made no oppoſition to the royal orders; he immediately ſet out for London with ſome degree of chearfulneſs. They were met upon the road by Sir William Kingſton, conſtable of the Tower, at the head of a party of the guards. But the cardinal, partly by the fatigues of his journey, and partly by the great anxiety of his mind, was ſeized with a diſorder, which ſoon turned to a dyſentery; ſo that he reached Leiceſter-abbey with the utmoſt difficulty. He perceived his diſſolution was approaching; and told the abbot and monks, who advanced to receive him with great reſpect, that he was come to lay his bones among them. He was immediately carried to his bed, from which he never more aroſe. The folly of ambitious purſuits, and the vanity of human grandeur, now appeared in their genuine colours; and he ſincerely regretted the time he had ſpent in aſſiduouſly ſtudying the headſtrong paſſions of an ungrateful prince. "Had I" ſaid he, "ſerved my God as diligently as I ſerved my king, he would not have forſaken me in my grey hairs." With theſe reflections Wolſey paid the debt of nature on the twenty-third of November, in the ſixtieth year of his age; and was interred, at his own requeſt, in the chapel of Leiceſter-abbey.

This great miniſter exhibits a ſtriking example of the folly and weakneſs of thoſe who miſtake the paths of ambition for the paths of happineſs. His character has been loaded, perhaps unjuſtly, with the moſt violent reproaches. Great allowances ſhould certainly be made for the obſtinacy and violence of Henry's temper: Wolſey was often obliged to purſue meaſures his better judgment condemned. His ſucceſſors ceſſors could not hold the helm of government with ſo ſteady a hand: they were far more criminal than the cardinal. The ambition he entertained of filling St. Peter's chair proceeded, perhaps, in part at leaſt, from a deſire he entertained of being ſerviceable to his country in that important ſtation. Henry himſelf, when informed of the death of the cardinal, regretted his loſs, and ſpoke of him in the moſt favourable terms: and it ſhould be remembered, that a miniſter who is odious to the nation he governs, cannot be tranſmitted, in very favourable colours, to poſterity.

A. D. 1531. The parliament that met ſoon after the death of Wolſey, made uſe of the ſame act that had deſtroyed the cardinal, to enrich the crown, at the expence of the clergy. The legantine power of Wolſey, though exerciſed with the king's conſent, had been the cauſe of his fall; and the clergy were conſidered as having participated in his guilt, becauſe they had ſubmitted to an authority now declared illegal. The example of Wolſey had ſufficiently convinced the eccleſiaſtics, that it would be in vain to offer any apology for their conduct: they ſubmitted to the king's pleaſure, and were glad to purchaſe a pardon at the expence of one hundred and eighteen thouſand, eight hundred and forty pounds. It was alſo required of them, that they ſhould acknowledge Henry "the protector, and ſupreme head of the church of England." Some of them, indeed, procured a clauſe to be inſerted, which invalidated the whole conceſſion: it ran in theſe terms, "So far as is permitted by the law of Chriſt."

The whole proceedings of Henry ſufficiently ſhewed, that he was determined to humble his clergy. He knew he ſhould be ſupported in all his meaſures by the Commons, who ſhewed a ſtrong deſire to mortify the eccleſiaſtics; nor did he apprehend any oppoſition from the temporal lords. The Proteſtant religion was at this time ſecretly favoured by many perſons in England, where the writings and ſermons of Wickliff and his diſciples had, many years ſince, diſſipated, in part, the miſt of ignorance and ſuperſtition from the minds of the people; who being, at the ſame time, oppreſſed by the pope's uſurpations, and ſcandalized by the lewd and immoral bulls of the late pontiffs who had filled St. Peter's chair, were very deſirous of an opportunity to deliver themſelves from ſuch an intolerable and diſgraceful yoke. But however deſirous the Commons might be of humbling the clergy, they were greatly alarmed at the king's having revived the obſolete ſtatute of proviſors. Moſt of them had, in ſome manner or other, maintained cauſes in the legantine court, and therefore were as liable to the penalties of that ſtatute as the clergy themſelves; and the rigour with which Henry had treated that body, made them apprehenſive for their own ſafety. They therefore preſented a petition to the king, requeſting that they might be included in the pardon preparing to be iſſued for the clergy. Their deſire was granted, and the Commons extolled the clemency of Henry to the ſkies.

A. D. 1532. The parliament proceeded ſtill farther at their next meeting, with regard to the power of the Roman pontiff in England. An act was paſſed againſt levying the annates, or firſt fruits, a tax hitherto paid to the pope for granting bulls to the new prelates. This ſtatute declared, "That the kingdom was impoveriſhed by the great ſums paid to the Roman pontiff: that, ſince the ſecond year of the late reign, above one hundred and ſixty thouſand pounds had been ſent to Rome on account of annates or firſt-fruits, palls and bulls for biſhoprics: that the annates had been originally deſigned as a contribution for ſupporting a war againſt the infidels; but as they were not applied to that purpoſe, it was decreed, that they ſhould not be paid for the future: that no more than five per cent. of the annual revenue ſhould be given for the bulls of biſhoprics: that if the pope ſhould refuſe to grant them upon theſe terms, the biſhop elect ſhould be preſented by the king to the metropolitan of the province, in order to be conſecrated; but ſhould the metropolitan refuſe conſecration, on pretence of wanting palls and bulls, two prelates appointed by the king ſhould perform the ceremony, and the elect ſhould then be conſidered as lawfully conſecrated. The parliament, however, at the ſame time, declared, that the king ſhould be at liberty to annul or confirm this act, within a limited time; and if, in that interval, he ſhould compromiſe his difference with the court of Rome, it ſhould obtain the force of a law; but ſhould the pope, on account of this act, endeavour to diſturb the peace of the kingdom with the ſentences of excommunication and interdict, theſe cenſures ſhould be utterly diſregarded. All eccleſiaſtics were forbid to receive or publiſh ſuch cenſures, and enjoined to celebrate divine ſervice in the ſame manner as if they had never been iſſued." After paſſing this act, they proceeded to examine the oath to the pope, adminiſtered to the biſhops on their inſtallation; and were on the point of aboliſhing it, when the breaking out of the plague at Weſtminſter occaſioned their being prorogued.

It was now ſufficiently evident to the whole nation, that Henry's intention was to marry Anne Boleyn; and either force the pope to agree to his meaſures, or withdraw his obedience from the holy ſee. The chancellor, Sir Thomas More, a man of ſtrict virtue, incapable of making his religion ſubmiſſive to his intereſt, and, at the ſame time, too much a philoſopher to be over ſollicitous to advance his fortune, begged leave to reſign the ſeals, and retired from that elevated ſtation with more joy than an ambitious perſon would have felt in being placed in that exalted ſeat of power. Soon after the reſignation, Warham, archbiſhop of Canterbury, paid the debt of nature; an event which gave Henry no ſmall ſatisfaction, as he flattered himſelf he ſhould now eaſily procure the affair of his divorce to be determined in his own dominions. For though the deceaſed prelate was convinced that Henry's marriage with Catherine was unlawful, yet he was too much devoted to the ſee of Rome to do any act, or exert his own authority in oppoſition to the papal power. The king named for his ſucceſſor Dr. Thomas Cranmer, and he was ſoon after placed in the archiepiſcopal chair.

Henry had exerted all his influence to prevail upon Catherine to withdraw her appeal from Rome; but all his attempts proving abortive, and a treaty of offenſive alliance being concluded with Francis I. he privately married Anne Boleyn on the fourteenth of November. Her father, mother, and brother, together with her uncle the duke of Norfolk, and archbiſhop Cranmer, were preſent at the ceremony.

A. D. 1533. The queen ſoon became pregnant, and Henry publicly owned his marriage. This circumſtance rendered it neceſſary that Catherine's divorce ſhould now be finiſhed; and it was determined in the council, that the archbiſhop ſhould pronounce the ſentence. Accordingly Cranmer repaired to Dunſtable, in the neighbourhood of which the queen reſided, and cited Catherine to appear. As ſhe took not the leaſt notice of the citation, ſhe was declared contumacious, and the primate proceeded to the examination of the cauſe. The evidences of Arthur's conſummation of his marriage were produced; the opinions of the univerſities were read; together with the judgment pronounced two years before by the convocations both of Canterbury and York: and after theſe preparatory ſteps, Cranmer annulled the king's marriage with Catherine, as unlawful. He alſo, by a ſubſequent ſentence, ratified the king's marriage with Anne Boleyn, who was ſoon after publicly crowned with the greateſt pomp and ceremony. On the ſeventh of September, the new queen was ſafely delivered of a daughter, who received the name of Elizabeth, and afterwards ſwayed the ſceptre of England with ſuch honour and applauſe. Henry immediately conferred on her the title of princeſs of Wales, though ſhe was only the preſumptive heir to the crown.

The intelligence of theſe tranſactions no ſooner reached Rome, than the whole conſiſtory was in the moſt violent ferment. The cardinals of the imperial faction urged the pope to launch the dreadful bolt of excommunication againſt the Engliſh monarch; but the pontiff could not be prevailed upon to proceed any farther than to threaten Henry with that ſentence, if he annulled not the criminal acts he had committed within a limited time. The mediation of Francis I. who had entered into a negotiation with Clement for the marriage of his ſecond ſon, the duke of Orleans, with Catherine of Medicis, the pope's niece, ſeemed, however, likely to produce an accommodation. Henry was prevailed upon to ſubmit his cauſe to the holy ſee, provided the cardinals of the imperial party were excluded from the Roman conſiſtory during the trial; and the pope was diſpoſed to gratify his deſire. A day was even appointed for the return of the meſſenger with Henry's definitive anſwer; but the courier who carried the king's acquieſcence in writing, was detained by accident beyond the limited time. In vain did the biſhop of Paris requeſt the pope to wait a few days for the meſſenger: Clement was ſo highly exaſperated, that he would liſten to no remonſtrances. He entered the conſiſtory enflamed with anger; and, with a precipitation fatal to the power of the Roman ſee, pronounced the legitimacy of Henry's marriage with Catherine, and declared him excommunicated if he refuſed to obey the ſentence. Two days after, the meſſenger arrived; but the evil was not to be redreſſed. The obedience of England, one of the richeſt jewels in the papal crown, was loſt by this haſty deciſion. A kingdom the moſt devoted of any in Europe to the apoſtolical ſee, was become its irreconcileable enemy. Two days patience would have prevented this alarming event.

A.D. 1534. The parliament met on the fifteenth of January, and continued to enact laws wholly ſubverſive of the papal authority. They had already proſcribed all appeals to Rome, and all the rights and regulations of the apoſtolic chamber. The people had for ſome years been perſuaded, that a general council was far ſuperior to the Roman pontiff; it was now publicly maintained, that the pope was only a biſhop, and that his power extended no farther than the limits of his own dioceſe. The people, the parliament, and even the clergy, adopted this opinion. The ſtatute of Henry IV. againſt heretics was moderated. By another ſtatute it was declared, that no ſynod or convocation of the clergy ſhould be aſſembled without the king's permiſſion; that his majeſty ſhould nominate ſixteen perſons from the parliament, and as many from the clergy, to examine the canons and conſtitutions of the church, with a power to aboliſh ſuch as were uſeleſs, and confirm thoſe that were neceſſary. The parliament next confirmed the ſtatute againſt annates: it was enacted, "That for the future the pope ſhould have no ſhare in the election or confirmation of biſhops; but that, when a ſee became vacant, the king ſhould ſend to the chapter a congé d'elire, or licence, to elect a new biſhop; and if the election ſhould not be made in twelve days after the date of the licence, the right of chuſing ſhould fall to the king: that the biſhop elect ſhould ſwear fealty to his majeſty: that no perſon ſhould preſume to apply to the biſhop of Rome for bulls, palls, or any other religious purpoſe: that Peter-pence, together with all procurations, delegations, bulls, and diſpenſations, iſſued by the court of Rome, ſhould be entirely aboliſhed: that the archbiſhop of Canterbury ſhould be empowered to grant ſuch diſpenſations as were conſiſtent with the law of God, provided that part of the money thence ariſing ſhould be paid into the king's exchequer: that all religious houſes, whether exempted or non-exempted, ſhould be ſubject to the viſitation of the archbiſhop: that the king's marriage with Catherine ſhould be deemed null and void; and that the ſucceſſion ſhould be ſettled upon the iſſue of his lawful wife Anne, whether male or female." This parliament alſo paſſed an act of attainder againſt Elizabeth Barton, commonly called, "The holy Maid of Kent," and her accomplices, in a treaſonable attempt to raiſe diſturbances in the kingdom.

This woman had been long ſubject to hyſteric fits, during which her body was thrown into unuſual convulſions, and ſhe frequently uttered many ſtrange and incoherent expreſſions; whence the ignorant and credulous multitude were induced to believe that ſhe ſpoke by the inſpiration of heaven. The party who ſtill ſupported the pope's authority, conſidered this perſon as a proper inſtrument to gain proſelytes to their party, and condemn the methods that had been taken to procure the divorce. They, however, waited till the belief of her having an immediate intercourſe with heaven was eſtabliſhed with the people. This being effected, they taught her to declaim againſt the new doctrines, which ſhe called hereſy; againſt innovations in eccleſiaſtical government, and againſt the king's divorce from Catherine. She even at laſt had the boldneſs to aſſert, "that if the king proſecuted his divorce, and married another woman, he ſhould not wear the crown a month longer, but ſhould die the death of a villain." Henry, for ſome time, neglected to take any notice of this woman; he conſidered her pretended prophecies as the effects of a diſtempered brain, and which would be diſregarded as ſoon as they ceaſed to be a novelty. But finding that ſhe was ſupported, not only by the monks, but alſo by the pope's agents in England, he reſolved to proceed againſt her with the utmoſt ſeverity. Both the maid herſelf and her accomplices were accordingly examined in the Star-chamber, where they readily confeſſed all the particulars of their guilt, and ſuffered the puniſhment inflicted by the parliament. The detection of this impoſture tended greatly to injure the credit of the eccleſiaſtics, eſpecially the monks, who now became the objects of Henry's reſentment.

During theſe tranſactions, intelligence of the excommunication fulminated by Clement reached England, and added greatly to the general ferment. The appeal of the king to a general council of the clergy was affixed to all the gates of the churches. The convocation declared, that the biſhop of Rome had no authority in England; and that the power which he and his predeceſſors had hitherto exerciſed there, was nothing more than an uſurpation tolerated by its kings. Thus was the church of England totally ſeparated from the authority of the Roman ſee; and thoſe who pretended that no great kingdom could throw off the ſubjection of the pope without the moſt imminent danger, now ſaw that a ſingle blow was ſufficient to overthrow this venerable Coloſſus.

Soon after the riſing of the parliament, Henry ſent commiſſioners through the whole kingdom, to adminiſter the oath of allegiance and ſucceſſion to all his ſubjects; and Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, refuſing to take it, were committed to the Tower. But though Henry had renounced the pope's authority, he was far from being a friend to the reformers. Their tenets were, however, embraced by great numbers of the Engliſh, and all ranks of men were diſpoſed to favour their attempts to remove many of the ſuperſtitious practices from the public worſhip. The king's book againſt Luther had done him honour with the Catholics; and the anſwer of that reformer, who treated him with a ſovereign contempt, failed not to wound his vanity. He did not, therefore, abandon the tenets of the Roman church, though he denied the authority of the pontiff. His miniſters and courtiers knew not which religion to adopt; they wavered between both, and ſeemed extremely cautious of declaring their real opinions. The duke of Norfolk, and Gardener, biſhop of Wincheſter, who were firmly attached to the ancient religion, though they pretended to acknowledge the king's ſupremacy, uſed every method in their power to exaſperate Henry againſt the reformers. On the other hand, the new queen, with archbiſhop Cranmer, and ſecretary

Cromwell, who were friends to the proteſtants, artfully excited his reſentment againſt the Holy See, while they themſelves profeſſed the eſtabliſhed faith. Thus the profeſſors of both religions were equally obnoxious to perſecution. It was as criminal to acknowledge the pope's ſupremacy as to embrace the tenets of Luther. The prior of the Carthuſian monks, the prior of Hexham, Benaſe, a monk of Sion college, and John Haile, vicar of Iſleworth, together with three monks of the Charterhouſe, were put to death for denying the king's ſupremacy. This ſeverity was a prelude to thoſe ſanguinary ſcenes that diſgrace the cloſe of Henry's reign.

At the ſame time, the reformers felt the weight of Henry's violent hand. The ſpirit of liberty cheriſhed by that whole ſect alarmed the rapacious monarch, and he was determined to employ perſecution and violence againſt them; but he ſhould have remembered, that the zeal of ſectaries is always increaſed by oppoſition. A gentleman of the Temple, and a clergyman, having embraced the doctrines of the Reformation, were ſeized by the government, and put to the torture. Their ſufferings proved too ſtrong for their zeal; they abjured the tenets of Luther, and were ſet at liberty. But feeling afterwards the deepeſt compunctions for their timidity, they boldly preached againſt the ſuperſtitions of the eſtabliſhed religion, and were condemned to the flames. It was expected by their enemies, that they would again recant when brought to the ſtake; but they were miſtaken: they ſuffered with the moſt unſhaken intrepidity; and even in the midſt of their torments, gloried in the tenets they had before inculcated. Another diſciple of the reformers, when ſurrounded with the flames, embraced, with a tranſport of joy, the faggots which were to put a period to his life. It was not, indeed, eaſy to avoid the danger of incurring the king's diſpleaſure; his miſplaced zeal conſidered the moſt innocent actions as heretical. To teach children the Lord's prayer in the vulgar tongue, to read the tranſlation of the New Teſtament, to ſpeak againſt pilgrimages, and to neglect the faſts of the church, were conſidered as highly criminal, and puniſhed with the utmoſt ſeverity. The jealouſy and cruelty of the Spaniſh inquiſition ſeemed to direct the proceedings of the Engliſh government.

Nor were theſe inſtances of his zeal for the tenets of the Romiſh church ſufficient to ſatisfy the Catholics: they conſidered his revolt from the pope to be equally criminal with denying the fundamental doctrines of Chriſtianity. One Peyto, a Franciſcan friar, who preached before him, had the boldneſs to declare, "That many lying prophets had deceived him, but he, as the true Micajah, warned him, that the dogs ſhould lick his blood, as they had done the blood of Ahab." The king, notwithſtanding the violence of his temper, took no notice of this inſult. But the next Sunday, he ordered Dr. Corren to preach in the Royal Chapel; and he juſtified the king's proceedings, and called Peyto a rebel, a ſlanderer, a dog and a traitor. He was interrupted in the midſt of his harangue by another Franciſcan, who told him he was one of the lying prophets, who endeavoured to eſtabliſh the ſucceſſion to the crown by adultery. Henry impoſed ſilence on this petulant churchman, and he was ſummoned before the council. But this did not intimidate the friar: for being told by one of the counſellors, that he ought to be thrown into the Thames, he anſwered, "That the road to heaven was not longer by water than by land."

A. D. 1535. Fiſher, biſhop of Rocheſter, and Sir Thomas More, were ſtill confined in the Tower. They were both men of great parts and learning. Fiſher had, for many years, enjoyed the confidence of Henry, and was a prelate of great virtue and erudition. The pope, who conſidered his ſufferings as the conſequence of his attachment to the holy ſee, ſent him a cardinal's hat during his confinement in the Tower. But this promotion could not exempt him from puniſhment. He was at laſt brought to his trial; and refuſing to take the oath of ſupremacy, was found guilty, and condemned to loſe his life. He received the notice of his execution with great compoſure, and ſubmitted to the fatal blow with calmneſs and intrepidity. Great pains had been uſed to prevail upon Sir Thomas More to take the oath of ſupremacy; but he refuſed every offer, and fell a victim to the ſanguinary malevolence of Henry. When conducted to the ſcaffold, neither the ſerenity of his mind, nor the uſual chearfulneſs of his temper, forſook him. He begged the executioner to ſtay till he had put aſide his beard, "for (added he) it never committed treaſon." The humour, the virtue, and the reſolution of this great man, will be remembered with applauſe, while the malevolence of his enemies will be recollected with deteſtation.

Paul III. who had lately ſucceeded Clement VII. in the papal chair, had flattered himſelf with being able to reconcile Henry to the Roman ſee. He had always favoured Henry's cauſe before his advancement to the papacy, and even gained the friendſhip of that capricious monarch. Senſible of the loſs the apoſtolic ſee muſt ſuſtain by a breach with England, he was very deſirous of putting a friendly period to this alarming diſpute. A negotiation was accordingly opened, and ſeemed to promiſe a favourable iſſue, when the news of Fiſher's execution re-kindled the rage of the ſacred college. A cardinal put to death in defence of the rights of the holy ſee, merited the ſevereſt vengeance, and the pontiff haſtened to fulminate the thunders of the Vatican. Henry was cited to appear at the pope's tribunal, with all his adherents, within ninety days; and in caſe of diſobedience, the king was declared to be excommunicated, and his marriage with Anne Boleyn illegitimate; his ſubjects were freed from all oaths of allegiance; his kingdom was given up to the ambition of the firſt invader; and his leagues with all Catholic princes were diſſolved. Paul, however, thought proper to delay the publication of theſe cenſures till it ſhould appear that an accommodation with England was abſolutely deſperate; and till Charles V. at this time violently preſſed by the Turks and the proteſtant princes of Germany, ſhould be in a condition to execute the violent meaſures of the conſiſtory.

Henry was not in the leaſt intimidated by the threatenings of the pope: the thunder of the Vatican was no longer terrible to the Engliſh. The league of Smalcalde, in which the German reformers aſſumed the name of Proteſtants, had compoſed a formidable barrier to the ambition of Charles V. The kings of France and England made ſome advances to be admitted into this confederacy. They well knew, that a conformity of ſentiments, as well as of political intereſts, was neceſſary for this purpoſe; and the rigid treatment their reformed ſubjects had experienced in both kingdoms, muſt induce the German princes to think they could not rely upon them as ſincere allies. Francis and Henry, therefore, pretended to a conformity of ſentiments with them, and that they were deſirous of eſtabliſhing the Reformation in their dominions. But as the German princes ſuſpected the ſincerity of their declarations, they refuſed to enter into an alliance with them, but upon certain conditions. Thoſe delivered to the Engliſh ambaſſadors were in ſubſtance as follows:

"That Henry ſhould approve and embrace the Augſburg confeſſion of faith, and defend it in a free council with all his power: that he ſhould approve of no place for holding a council without their conſent; that if the pope ſhould call a council by his own authority, Henry ſhould join with them in proteſting againſt it: that he ſhould accept of the title of Protector of the League: that he ſhould never return to the obedience of the pope: that he ſhould not aſſiſt their enemies; and that he ſhould pay one hundred thouſand crowns towards the defence of the league; but if any part of that ſum remained at the concluſion of the war, it ſhould be reſtored." Theſe articles, however diſagreeable, were not rejected by Henry; but it ſoon appeared, that their ſentiments, with regard to religion, were ſo very different, that no alliance could be concluded between them.

A. D. 1536. While the greateſt powers of Europe were thus agitated with religious diſputes, queen Catherine was ſeized with a dangerous diſtemper, which put a period to her life on the ſixth of January, in the fiftieth year of her age. A little before ſhe expired, ſhe wrote a very tender and pathetic letter to the king, whom ſhe ſtiled "her moſt dear lord, king, and huſband." Henry was greatly affected with this laſt proof of Catherine's affection, given at a time when ſhe was tottering on the brink of eternity, and juſt going to appear before the Judge of the whole earth. The queen's behaviour was very different: ſhe openly expreſſed her ſatisfaction at the death of Catherine, and ſeemed to take a pleaſure in communicating it to the public. She little thought that ſhe herſelf would ſoon fall a victim to the unbounded paſſion of her huſband. The remains of the unfortunate Catherine were depoſited in the abbey-church of Peterborough, which Henry afterwards converted into an epiſcopal cathedral.

The great breach between Charles and Henry had been chiefly occaſioned by the exertions of the former to revenge the diſhonour of his aunt. But as that princeſs was now no more, the emperor conſidered himſelf at full liberty to regain, if poſſible, the friendſhip of Henry. He accordingly offered to renew the former amity, on theſe conditions: That he ſhould be reconciled to the court of Rome; that he ſhould aſſiſt him in his war againſt the Turks; and that he ſhould join him againſt Francis I. who was preparing to conquer Milan. But Henry had too often experienced the duplicity of that prince to form an alliance with him, and therefore politely refuſed his advances. He declared, that he ſhould not refuſe the friendſhip of the emperor, provided he would acknowledge, that the former breach between them proceeded entirely from himſelf; that his conduct with regard to the pope had been juſt, was ratified by the parliament, and could not now be revoked; that when peace was firmly eſtabliſhed among the princes of Chriſtendom, he ſhould very readily join in a war againſt the infidels; and that when the former friendſhip between him and the emperor was reſtored, he ſhould not fail to employ his good offices to reconcile him with Francis; or, if theſe proved ineffectual, to aſſiſt the injured party with all his forces. Charles, though defeated with regard to his attempt of forming an alliance with Henry, loſt not ſight of the projects he had formed. He invaded Provence and Picardy, but was repulſed with loſs. He himſelf laid ſiege to Marſeilles, and his generals to Peronne, but neither of them ſucceeded.

Henry now determined to take a ſevere revenge for all the affronts he had received from the monkiſh clergy. That numerous body of men, knowing that their power was ſo cloſely connected with that of the Roman ſee, that they muſt ſtand or fall together, exerted all their influence to depreciate the Reformation, and load Henry with the moſt atrocious crimes. They declaimed, with the utmoſt violence, againſt the followers of Luther; while the religioniſts, in their turn, imputed to the monks thoſe frequent faſts which oppreſſed the induſtrious to enrich the idle; thoſe ſuperſtitious rites of devotion which were often conſidered as more meritorious than a diſcharge of the moral duties; thoſe vain ſubtilties which adulterated theology; and that captious caſuiſtry which tyrannized over the reaſon and conſciences of men. But, perhaps, the revenues of the convents had inſpired him with a deſire of being maſter of their riches. He was, however, fearful of the conſequences that might reſult from this attempt, as religious retreats had ſo long been conſidered as ſacred and inviolable. A council was therefore ſummoned, where the affair was conſidered with the utmoſt attention; and it was reſolved, that a general viſitation ſhould be made of all the monaſteries; that a ſtrict inqueſt ſhould be taken of all their titles and revenues; and that the morals of the religious, and the regulations obſerved in each order, ſhould be cloſely inſpected. Cromwell was created vicar-general, and inquiſitor-general of all the monaſteries, and other privileged places. The viſitation was accordingly performed with the utmoſt rigour; and, if credit may be given to the reports of the viſitors themſelves, they diſcovered ſuch abominations and ſcenes of vice, debauchery, and impoſture, as were not only diſgraceful to religion, but even ſhocking to human nature. The report of the viſitors was publiſhed, in order the more effectually to excite the horror and deteſtation of the people.

Recourſe was now had to the parliament, where an act for the diſſolution of the leſſer monaſteries was paſſed into a law. The preamble to this bill declares, "That ſmall religious houſes, under the number of twelve perſons, had been long and notoriouſly guilty of the moſt abominable vices, and conſumed and waſted the church lands belonging to them: that for above two hundred years, many viſitations for reforming theſe abuſes had been made without ſucceſs, their vicious method of life daily increaſing; ſo that unleſs the ſmall houſes were diſſolved, and the religious diſtributed into the greater monaſteries, no reformation could be expected." It was therefore declared, that all houſes, whoſe revenues did not exceed two hundred pounds a year, ſhould be ſuppreſſed, their revenues converted to better uſes, and the religious compelled to reform themſelves.

This act was no ſooner paſſed, than orders were iſſued, that all nuns and friars under twenty-four years of age ſhould be immediately diſmiſſed and abſolved from their vows; and that all others above that age ſhould have free liberty to leave their houſes and retire wherever they pleaſed. No leſs than three hundred and ſeventy-ſix of theſe leſſer monaſteries were thus diſſolved; and their revenues, which amounted to thirty-two thouſand pounds a year, were given to the king, together with their goods, chattels, and plate, computed at one hundred thouſand pounds. While the parliament was engaged in paſſing an act for ſuppreſſing the leſſer monaſteries, the convocation deliberated upon a propoſition of the utmoſt importance to the reformers. This was a new tranſlation of the Bible. Tindal, ſome years before, had publiſhed a verſion of the ſcriptures; but it being found, upon examination, to be inaccurate and unfaithful, it had been committed publicly to the flames by order of the government. It was therefore now propoſed to publiſh a new tranſlation, which ſhould be free from thoſe objections. This motion was ſtrongly oppoſed by the popiſh party, and as warmly ſupported by the friends of the Reformation, who conſidered it as the only means of diſcovering to the people the many errors and ſuperſtitious abſurdities of the church of Rome. After a long conteſt, the motion was carried, and a new tranſlation of the Scriptures was ordered to be made by perſons eſteemed equal to the undertaking.

But the reforming party now loſt their principal ſupport. Anne Boleyn, who had ſo long continued her aſcendency over the heart of Henry, had now loſt the power of pleaſing. Jane Seymour, one of the maids of honour to the queen, and a lady of ſingular beauty and merit, had inſpired him with a new paſſion, and he was determined to ſacrifice every thing to the gratification of his appetite. Anne was of a lively and gay diſpoſition; and, though ſtrictly virtuous, ſhe was not ſufficiently careful of her behaviour. She had been bred at the court of France, and contracted the eaſy carriage ſo familiar to that ſprightly people. Calumny converted her imprudence into vice; and the Auſtrian party, who had been exaſperated at the divorce of Catherine, improved the report, to render the king ſuſpicious of her virtue. The paſſions of Henry were all in the extremes: he had no ſooner conceived a jealouſy of the queen, than her deſtruction was determined. He cauſed her to be arreſted, and accuſed her of adultery before a committee of the Houſe of Lords, on ſuch ſlight circumſtances, that to mention them is ſufficient to confute them. The counteſs of Rochford, who had married the queen's brother, a woman of the moſt infamous character, accuſed her of carrying on a criminal correſpondence with her own brother, but was not able to bring the leaſt proof of her aſſertion. The parliament, however, always ſubſervient to the monarch's paſſions, paſſed ſentence of death upon the queen, though no evidence was produced againſt her. She proteſted her innocence to the laſt; and ſent the king, as ſhe was going to mount the ſcaffold, a very pathetic letter, which at once indicates the ſerenity of her mind, and that ſhe met death with that decent confidence which always attends a mind conſcious of its own integrity. "You have (ſaid ſhe) been continually raiſing me: from a private gentlewoman, you made me a marchioneſs; from a marchioneſs, a queen; and as you can raiſe me no higher in this world, you are this day ſending me to be a ſaint in heaven." She was beheaded on the nineteenth of May, and buried privately in the Tower.

Thus fell the celebrated Anne Boleyn, who had ſo long reigned ſovereign of Henry's affections. Her unhappy fate was deplored by the people, who conſidered her as the innocent victim of her huſband's inordinate paſſion. If this opinion needed any confirmation, the behaviour of Henry himſelf was ſufficient for that purpoſe. He married the lady Jane Seymour the very next day after her execution, ſo eager was he to ſatisfy his brutal appetite. His obdurate heart was not the leaſt affected by the bloody cataſtrophe of a perſon who had for ſeveral years been the object of his moſt tender affections. Nor was he ſatisfied with this ſanguinary action: he cauſed his marriage with Anne to be declared illegal, under pretence of a pre-contract of marriage with the earl of Northumberland. By this cruel proceſs, Elizabeth, as well as Mary, became illegitimate.

Elizabeth was about three years of age when her mother fell a ſacrifice to Henry's jealouſy. She had been hitherto ſtiled princeſs of Wales, but was now diveſted of that title. The princeſs Mary, whom he had treated with great ſeverity on account of her tender attachment to her mother, and her refuſing to renounce the pope's ſupremacy, was now perſuaded by the Romiſh party to attempt a reconciliation with her father. Accordingly ſhe ſubſcribed to the king's ſupremacy, renounced the authority of the biſhop of Rome, and acknowledged the illegality of her mother's marriage, in order the more effectually to remove the princeſs Elizabeth from the king's preſence and affections. But Henry, though he was reconciled to Mary, continued his affection to Elizabeth: he cauſed her to be educated at court with all the care and tenderneſs of a father.

The late events rendered it neceſſary for the king to call a new parliament; and he ſoon found that the ſame obſequiouſneſs prevailed in this as in the former aſſembly. They confirmed the late queen's divorce, declared the children by the king's two firſt marriages illegitimate; and adjudged the crown, after his deceaſe, to the iſſue of his preſent queen, or any other perſon he might marry after her death. At the ſame time, they gave Henry full power to ſettle the mode of ſuch ſucceſſion, either by will, or letters patent under the great ſeal; and pronounced all thoſe who maintained the validity of his two former marriages guilty of high-treaſon.

The ſuppreſſion of the leſſer monaſteries now occaſioned great diſturbances in different parts of the kingdom; and the pope having repeated the ſentence of excommunication againſt Henry, laid the kingdom under an interdict, and forbid his ſubjects to pay him any obedience. The monks exerted all their influence to perſuade the people, that they were under an indiſpenſable duty of taking up arms againſt a prince who had trampled under foot all their civil and religious liberties. The ignorant multitude eagerly liſtened to theſe inſinuations; they had been always taught to conſider as ſacred what was now devoted to deſtruction. Upwards of twenty thouſand men aſſembled in Lincolnſhire, under the command of Thomas Mackerel, prior of Barlings. This undiſciplined multitude publiſhed their grievances in a petition to the king; complaining of the ſuppreſſion of the monaſteries, the ſubverſion of the ancient religion, the eſtabliſhing new tenets, &c. Henry ſent an anſwer to this petition; and diſpatched the duke of Suffolk, at the head of a ſmall body of troops, to reduce the inſurgents to obedience. But they were in no condition to contend with regular forces; and on being promiſed a pardon, diſperſed of themſelves. Their leader, however, fell into the hands of the royaliſts, and paid his life as a forfeit to his temerity.

This inſurrection was hardly ſuppreſſed, before another was excited in Yorkſhire, which ſeemed to threaten more important conſequences to the government. The rebels were headed by one Aſke, a gentleman of fortune in that county, and well adapted, by his natural talents, to head a popular inſurrection. The inſurgents were joined by a little army of ejected monks, carrying before them a banner, on which a crucifix with five wounds, and a chalice, were painted. They wore the ſame device upon their ſleeves, to animate them in the ſupport of their religion. They ſtiled their march "The Pilgrimage of Grace;" and all who joined them were obliged to take an oath, "That they entered into the Pilgrimage of Grace for the love of God, the preſervation of the king's perſon and iſſue, the purifying the nobility, and expelling all evil counſellors; not for any particular profit of their own, nor to kill any man through envy; but to ſupport the true faith, procure the reſtitution of the church, and ſuppreſs heretics and their opinions." The people were deluded with theſe ſpecious pretences; they flocked to this religious ſtandard; and Aſke ſoon found himſelf at the head of forty thouſand men. Their firſt attempt was againſt the caſtle of Pontefract, which was conſidered as a place of ſtrength, but ſoon ſurrendered to the inſurgents. York and Hull were alſo eaſily reduced; and Aſke obliged all the nobility in the county to join him, except Henry Clifford, earl of Cumberland, who defended Skipton-caſtle againſt all the attempts of the rebels.

The government was greatly diſtreſſed for want of troops; five thouſand men only could be raiſed on this emergency. The duke of Norfolk, however, advanced, at the head of this little army, againſt the rebels; while Henry, in order to amuſe them, publiſhed a proclamation, commanding all the nobility to meet him at Northampton on the ſeventh of November. The royaliſts were encamped at Doncaſter, and the inſurgents advanced into that neighbourhood. The river Till only ſeparated the two armies; and the rebels attempted twice to paſs it, in order to venture a battle, and were twice prevented from executing their purpoſe by violent falls of rain, which rendered the ſtream impaſſable. A ſuperſtitious terror now filled the breaſts of the inſurgents: they were perſuaded that heaven itſelf oppoſed their deſign; and liſtened to the offers of the duke of Norfolk, who promiſed them a pardon. They diſperſed, and returned to their reſpective habitations.

But this peace was but of a ſhort continuance. The prieſts renewed their practices for diſturbing the public peace; and ſoon collected a numerous body of men, who were perſuaded that religion itſelf depended upon their defending the ancient ſuperſtitions of the church. The duke of Norfolk found it neceſſary to continue in the north during the winter; but by putting the martial law into ſtrict execution againſt every one who refuſed to take the oath of ſupremacy, he, inſtead of leſſening, increaſed the diſorders. Two gentlemen, Muſgrave and Treby, putting themſelves at the head of eight thouſand peaſants, made an unſucceſsful attempt on Carliſle, and were afterwards entirely routed by the duke of Norfolk. Muſgrave made his eſcape; but Treby, with about ſeventy of his followers, being taken priſoners, were all hanged on the walls of Carliſle.

A. D. 1537. Exaſperated at theſe frequent diſturbances, Henry ſent for the chiefs of the rebels to court, in order to prevent their engaging in any other inſurrection. Aſke readily obeyed the ſummons, and was received with kindneſs; but the lords Darcy and Huſſey, together with ſeveral other chiefs of the rebels, refuſing to obey the king's mandate, were ſeized, and beheaded on Tower-hill. Theſe executions intimidated Aſke: he retired into the country without a licence from the government, and was ſoon after hanged at York. Fortunately for Henry, the Scottiſh monarch, James V. was in France during theſe diſturbances in the north of England; ſo that the rebels could receive no aſſiſtance from that kingdom.

Henry was now ſo uſed to ſlaughter, by the frequent executions, that he ſeemed to delight in blood. He ordered Thomas Fitzgerald, ſon to the late earl of Kildare, and five of his uncles, who had ſuffered a long confinement in the Tower for an inſurrection in Ireland, to be executed, in order to intimidate the people, who ſeemed ripe for a revolt. But Stephen Fitzgerald, the earl's youngeſt ſon, eſcaped to the continent, and retired to cardinal Pole, who made uſe of him in the deſigns he had formed of recovering England to the obedience of the holy ſee.

While Henry was thus employed in chaſtiſing his rebellious ſubjects, his queen was delivered of a ſon at Hampton-Court, to the inexpreſſible joy of the nation in general, and of Henry in particular. He had now obtained the object of his ardent wiſhes; he was bleſſed with a ſon, the undoubted heir of all his dominions: but his ſatisfaction was greatly leſſened by the death of the queen, which happened ſoon after her delivery. She was the moſt beloved of all his wives, and highly celebrated for her humble deportment, her goodneſs, and her affability. The king was ſo afflicted with his loſs, that he ſecluded himſelf from all company ſeveral days. The young prince was baptized by the name of Edward, and three days after declared prince of Wales, duke of Cornwall, and earl of Cheſter.

A. D. 1538. The birth of a prince tended greatly to confirm Henry's power: he was feared by his ſubjects, and his friendſhip courted by the greateſt princes of Europe. He now conſidered the monks as his greateſt enemies, and determined to render them unable to give him any diſturbance for the future. In order to this, he procured addreſſes from the two univerſities; wherein the pernicious nature of religious houſes, which harboured only a multitude of lazy drones and ſwarms of impoſtors, were fully diſplayed, and the king requeſted to remove ſo great an evil. A viſitation was accordingly appointed, and the viſitors confounded guilt and innocence. Time and the paſſions had indeed introduced many corruptions into the cloiſters; but it is not reaſonable to believe, that the manners of the eccleſiaſtics ſhould be totally depraved. In ſome of the religious houſes, inventions to impoſe on popular credulity were diſcovered; falſe relics were employed, and falſe miracles were performed. Some impoſtures of a more artificial nature were alſo found by the viſitors. At Hales, in Glouceſterſhire, had been ſhewn, for ſeveral ages, the blood of Chriſt, ſaid to have been brought from Jeruſalem; and it is natural to ſuppoſe, that a relic of ſuch importance muſt be held in the higheſt eſtimation. This relic was ſuppoſed to be attended with very important circumſtances: the ſacred blood was not viſible to any perſon in mortal ſin, even when placed before him, till he had performed good works ſufficient for his abſolution. At the diſſolution of the monaſtery, the whole contrivance was diſcovered. Two monks, who were entruſted with the ſecret, had taken the blood of a duck, which they renewed every week. This they put into a phial, one ſide of which was clear and tranſparent, and the other thick and obſcure. Furniſhed with this inſtrument of deception, they uſed it to their own emolument. When any rich pilgrim arrived, they were ſure to ſhew him the dark ſide of the phial, till maſſes and offerings had expiated his crimes; or rather till his money, faith, or patience, were nearly exhauſted; when they turned the bright ſide of the phial, and bleſſed him with the ſight he had ſo long and earneſtly deſired.

At Boxley, in Kent, was a crucifix remarkably famous, held in the higheſt veneration, and diſtinguiſhed by the appellation of the Road of Grace. It had been often ſeen to move, to bend and riſe itſelf, ſhake its head, hands and feet, roll its eyes, and move its lips. This inſtrument of religious deception being brought to London, it was broke in pieces at St. Paul's Croſs, by Hilſey, biſhop of Rocheſter, before a multitude of ſpectators, who, with their own eyes, beheld the ſprings and wheels by which it had been actuated.

It is no wonder that diſcoveries like theſe raiſed a general indignation. The authors of ſuch ſcandalous abuſes were deteſted; the monaſteries were conſidered as infamous; and the crimes of a few were extended to the whole body of the religious. This gave Henry the advantage he deſired; and the monks, convinced that it would be madneſs to make any oppoſition, ſurrendered their monaſteries, and many of them received penſions for their ſubſiſtence. No leſs than ſix hundred and forty-five monaſteries were diſſolved, twenty-eight of which had abbots, who enjoyed ſeats in parliament. Ninety colleges were demoliſhed in the ſeveral counties; two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chauntries and free-chapels; and one hundred and ten hoſpitals. The whole annual revenue of theſe eſtabliſhments amounted to one hundred and ſixty thouſand one hundred pounds; a ſum which did not much exceed the twelfth part of the national income.

Whilſt Henry was thus employed in demoliſhing the baſis of ſuperſtition, it could not be ſuppoſed he would overlook the moſt famous and reſpected of all the inſtruments of popiſh idolatry, the ſhrine of St. Thomas of Canterbury. Becket was indebted, for the honour of being ranked among the ſaints, to the vigorous efforts he had exerted in defence of the authority of the Holy See; and a ſaint of that character muſt be highly obnoxious to Henry, who was determined to aboliſh the power of the Roman pontiff in England. He could not bear the thought, that ſuch a furious and obſtinate rebel to his prince ſhould be held in the higheſt veneration by the people, his tomb frequented by pilgrims, and enriched with ſuperb preſents. It was not uncommon, in theſe times, to carry on proceſſes againſt the dead, and Henry availed himſelf of the practice. The life of Becket underwent a ſtrict examination; his actions were condemned by the generality of the people; and the miracles pretended to be wrought at his tomb were proved to be forgeries. His name was therefore ordered to be eraſed out of the Calendar, the office compoſed for his feſtival expunged from the Breviary, his bones to be burnt, and his aſhes diſperſed by the winds. The rich ſhrine of the ſaint had alſo attracted the rapacity of Henry, who converted the whole to his own uſe. Among the ſpoils was a diamond eſteemed the moſt valuable in Europe. It was a preſent from Lewis VII. of France, who made a pilgrimage to the ſhrine of St. Thomas. This jewel was, by Henry's orders, ſet in a ring, and worn afterwards by that monarch on his thumb. At the ſame time, Henry, in order to reconcile the people to theſe innovations, erected ſix new biſhoprics, gave large donations to his courtiers, and ſettled ſalaries on the abbots and monks. It was alſo pretended, that the crown would never more have occaſion to levy taxes, but would be able, by the acquiſition of the church-lands, to defray all expences of government. The people were, however, ſoon convinced, that thoſe pleaſing promiſes had no foundation, and that all the riches of the nation would not be ſufficient to ſupply the prodigality of their monarch.

Intelligence of theſe proceedings no ſooner reached Rome, than that city was filled with libels and ſatires againſt the perſon and conduct of Henry: he was repreſented as the moſt impious and ſacrilegious tyrant that ever diſgraced the royal title or dignity: he was compared to Belſhazzar, Nero, Domitian, Diocleſian, and particularly to Julian the apoſtate, whom he was ſaid to reſemble in his learning and apoſtacy, though greatly inferior in moral duties. Cardinal Pole's ſtyle was eaſily diſtinguiſhed in theſe invectives, which were ſoon diſperſed over all Europe. Henry, whoſe vanity and ſanguinary diſpoſition daily increaſed, determined to revenge the inſult. The cardinal himſelf was beyond his power; but ſeveral gentlemen of diſtinction, among whom were his two brothers, were arreſted, as his accomplices in a conſpiracy againſt the king's life; and all of them were executed, except Sir Geoffrey Pole, who was pardoned on account of his having diſcovered all he knew of the cardinal's intentions.

The Roman pontiff had hitherto ſuſpended the bull of excommunication formerly paſſed againſt Henry, in hopes of being one day able to accommodate his difference with that monarch; but finding that the late proceedings in England had rendered a reconciliation impoſſible, he publiſhed the bull with great ſolemnity, and endeavoured to excite the neighbouring powers againſt a prince whom he had conſigned to deſtruction. He even offered the Engliſh crown to James of Scotland, provided he was able and willing to wreſt it from Henry's head.

But the prince that had dared to drive the religious from their retreats, and committed to the flames the remains of Becket, was not to be intimidated. He knew that the thunder of the Vatican had loſt its force; and that the cultivation of reaſon had removed a corner of the veil which ignorance and ſuperſtition had formed to conceal the rays of truth from the eyes of mankind. Henry therefore ſet the pope's power at defiance; and exacted a new oath from the clergy, by which they renounced the authority of the Roman pontiff. The new tranſlation of the Bible was alſo now finiſhed, and preſented to the king by Cromwell, who was perſuaded that nothing could ſo effectually eradicate the popiſh ſuperſtition as a free toleration of the ſcriptures in the vulgar tongue. But Henry, who halted half way between the Catholics and the Proteſtants, would not permit an indiſcriminate uſe of the Scriptures; he would only allow a copy of the tranſlation to be depoſited in each pariſh church, where it was ordered to be fixed by a chain; and took care to inform the public by proclamation, "That this indulgence was not the effect of his duty, but of his goodneſs and liberality to them; who therefore ſhould uſe it moderately, for the increaſe of virtue, not of ſtrife: and ordered, that no man ſhould read the Bible aloud, ſo as to diſturb the prieſt while he ſang maſs, nor preſume to expound doubtful paſſages without the advice of the learned." This indulgence was, however, conſidered as a great acquiſition by the friends to the Reformation; eſpecially as they obtained a royal warrant, enjoining the clergy to read the Lord's Prayer, the Creed, and the Ten Commandments, in Engliſh. At the ſame time, they were ordered to recommend good works; and to teach the people, that relics, roſaries, and other ſuperſtitious trifles, were unneceſſary to ſalvation.

A. D. 1539. Notwithſtanding Henry had proceeded with ſuch animoſity againſt the Roman pontiff, he piqued himſelf on his zeal for the Catholic faith: he was even ambitious of defending it by diſputation, as well as by perſecution; and the doctrine of the real preſence, or that of tranſubſtantiation, the moſt incomprehenſible of all the dogmas in the Romiſh religion, was the point he maintained with the greateſt obſtinacy. One Lambert, a ſchoolmaſter of London, had ventured to doubt of the real preſence; and being cited to appear before the biſhops, he appealed to the king. Henry was charmed with having ſo fine an opportunity of diſplaying his theological talents. He thought it no derogation from his dignity to hold a public diſputation with that reformer. Notice was accordingly given that the king intended to enter the liſts againſt Lambert, and the prelates, the nobility, and many gentlemen of diſtinction were aſſembled on this occaſion. The king himſelf appeared in all the enſigns of majeſty ſeated upon his throne: and in the midſt of this ſplendid aſſembly was produced the unhappy Lambert, and required to defend his opinion againſt his royal antagoniſt.

The conference was opened by the biſhop of Chicheſter, who informed the ſchoolmaſter, that the king had taken the preſent opportunity of convincing him of his errors; adding that if he ſtill continued to perſevere in his heretical opinions, he muſt expect the ſevereſt puniſhment. Lambert defended his opinion with great intrepidity: but the king aſſiſted by ten biſhops, who all engaged in the diſpute, if indeed ſo patial a conteſt deſerves the name, effectually confounded the diſputant, after the conference had laſted five hours. But though confounded and reduced to ſilence, he was not convinced: and when the king aſked him whether he would live or die? Lambert replied, that he threw himſelf entirely on his majeſty's clemency. The king replied, that he protected not heretics, and that he muſt either abjure his opinions or periſh. Lambert choſe the latter, and died with the utmoſt intrepidity amidſt the moſt dreadful tortures.

Intoxicated with the praiſes that had been laviſhed upon him during his diſpute with Lambert, Henry exacted with more violence than ever, a ſubmiſſion to his religious ſentiments. To think different from him on theological ſubjects, was equal to committing a capital crime; and he took the advantage of the ſervility of his parliament, to make his own opinion the ſtandard of orthodoxy in England. The chancellor informed the two houſes, that it was his majeſty's deſire to extirpate from his kingdom all diverſity of opinion with regard to religion; and a committee was immediately appointed to draw up a bill for effecting that purpoſe. But it was ſoon found that ſuch a diverſity of ſentiments prevailed among the members of the committee that there was no hopes of their ever making a report. A bill was, therefore, drawn up, either by Henry himſelf, or ſome member of the privy council, and preſented to the houſe, where it was paſſed into a law. It was called "the bill of the Six Articles," or as the proteſtants juſtly termed it, "The Bloody Bill." By this law the preſence in the euchariſt; communion in one kind; the perpetual obligation of vows of chaſtity; the celibacy of eccleſiaſtics; the utility of private maſſes; and the neceſſity of auricular confeſſion, were eſtabliſhed. Whoever denied the real preſence was ſubjected to death by fire; nor was he even admitted to abjure his error. The puniſhment of the other articles was alſo remarkably ſevere; for though abjuration was admitted, the offender was puniſhed by the confiſcation of goods and chattels, and impriſonment. Thoſe who continued obſtinate, on who relapſed, were capitally puniſhed. The clergy, who ventured to marry were alſo ſubject to death; and fines and impriſonment were inflicted on all thoſe who refuſed to confeſs themſelves, or to receive the euchariſt at appointed ſeaſons. It is difficult to conceive the idea of regulations more unjuſt and ſevere. Cranmer alone had the courage to oppoſe this bill; but when it was paſſed into a law, he immediately ſeparated himſelf from his wife, and Henry was ſatisfied with this proof of his ſubmiſſion. Latimer and Shaxton threw up their biſhoprics on account of this act, and were committed to priſon.

Nor were the parliament more tenacious of their civil than their eccleſiaſtical liberties; for by one ſingle act, without ſcruple, and almoſt without deliberation, they totally ſubverted the Engliſh conſtitution. They paſſed a bill, by virtue of which the king's proclamation obtained the ſame force as a ſtatute enacted by the whole legiſlative power.

By another act the king was empowered to nominate any number of biſhops, ſees for biſhops, and cathedral churches, as he thought proper, and to endow them with ſuch poſſeſſions as he might judge convenient. An act was alſo paſſed, by which the parliament inveſted in the crown all the abbey-lands, upon the falſe pretence, that the ſurrenders made by the abbots, priors, and ſuperiors, had been "without conſtraint, of their own accord, and according to the due courſe of common law." Nor did any of the mitred abbots, who ſtill kept their ſeats in the Houſe of Peers, enter any proteſt againſt this ſtatute; though it was ſufficiently known that arts of all kinds had been employed; that every motive, calculated to work upon the frailty of human nature, had been ſet before them; and that it was at laſt with the utmoſt difficulty thoſe dignified eccleſiaſtics agreed to a conceſſion, which moſt of them regarded as deſtructive of their intereſts, as well as ſacrilegious and criminal in itſelf.

The parliament alſo gave another inſtance of their condeſcenſion and meanneſs. They paſſed bills of attainder againſt cardinal Pole, the counteſs of Saliſbury his mother, the marchioneſs of Exeter, Sir Adrian Forteſcue, and Sir Thomas Dingley, without hearing any evidence to convict them of the crimes which were laid to their charge. The two gentlemen were executed, the marchioneſs was pardoned, and the counteſs received a reprieve.

As the libraries of ſeveral abbies were well furniſhed with books, Henry, deſirous of preſerving whatever was valuable in theſe repoſitories, employed the famous antiquary John Leland to collect the moſt uſeful manuſcripts, and other monuments of antiquity. He alſo intended to found a college for the ſtudy of the civil law, the purity of the Latin and French languages, and the knowledge of foreign affairs; to ſerve as a ſeminary for miniſters of ſtate and ambaſſadors. But the king's own prodigality, and the rapacity of his courtiers, rendered this, and ſeveral other ſimilar deſigns, abortive.

The ſlaviſh conceſſions of the parliament had rendered Henry's will the law of the land; and both the Proteſtant and Popiſh parties cultivated his favour with the moſt abject ſubmiſſion. Bonner, lately made biſhop of London, though in ſecret a zealous partizan of the pope's authority, found means, by the moſt profound diſſimulation, to obtain letters patent for enjoying both the ſpiritual and temporal revenues of his ſee during the king's pleaſure: and Gardiner, a bigotted ſon of the Romiſh church, maintained his influence by the moſt extravagant ſubmiſſion. Theſe prelates encouraged the Catholics to be extremely vigilant in informing againſt all who refuſed to ſubſcribe to the ſix articles; and no leſs than five hundred perſons were ſoon thrown into priſon. But though Cromwell and Cranmer had not intereſt enough to prevent the act from paſſing, they were able, for ſome time, to elude its execution: they even remonſtrated againſt the cruelty of puniſhing ſo many delinquents, and obtained permiſſion to ſet them at liberty. Thus the uncertainty of Henry's temper gave each party an opportunity of triumphing in their turn. The law of the ſix articles, which ſeemed intended to extirpate the reformed religion, was ſoon followed by a general permiſſion for every one to have the new tranſlation of the Bible in his family; a conceſſion regarded by the Proteſtants as a deciſive victory over the Catholics.

While the conteſt thus continued in ſuſpence, both parties ſeemed to be perſuaded that the final deciſion would, in a great meaſure, depend upon the choice of a future queen, the king having given ſeveral intimations of his intention to enter into a new marriage. He firſt caſt his eyes on a daughter of the duke of Guiſe, but was informed that this princeſs was already betrothed to the king of Scotland. Cromwell therefore propoſed Anne of Cleves, youngeſt ſiſter to the dutcheſs of Saxony. A flattering picture of that princeſs, drawn by the hand of Hans Holbein, determined Henry to apply to her father; and the marriage was ſoon after concluded, notwithſtanding the negotiation was oppoſed by the elector of Saxony, and the princeſs was ſent over to England. The marriage of Henry with this princeſs would, in all probability, have fruſtrated all the attempts of Gardiner and his party, had ſhe anſwered the great character given by her friends of her beauty and accompliſhments. But when Henry, who was impatient for a ſight of his conſort, ſaw her privately at Rocheſter, he was ſo diſappointed, that he ſwore, "ſhe was a great Flanders mare;" and declared, he could never bear her any affection. His averſion was increaſed, when he found ſhe could ſpeak only German, a language he did not underſtand; and that the charms of her converſation were not likely to compenſate for the homelineſs of her perſon. He would even have broken off the match abruptly, had not his affairs required the friendſhip of the German princes. A good underſtanding had, for ſome time, prevailed between the emperor and the king of France; and even ſuch marks of union appeared, as occaſioned great jealouſy in the court of England. Henry therefore determined to complete his marriage; and told Cromwell, that ſince matters had gone ſo far, he muſt put his neck into the yoke.

A. D. 1540. The marriage was accordingly performed on the ſixth of January; and Cromwell, who knew how greatly his own intereſt was concerned in this affair, was very anxious to learn from the king, next morning after the marriage, whether he now liked his ſpouſe any better. The king anſwered, that he hated her more than ever; that her perſon was more loathſome on a near approach; and that he was determined never to meddle with her. He, however, continued to behave very kindly to the princeſs; nor gave any intimation of the diſguſt he had conceived againſt Cromwell for the ſhare he had taken in this tranſaction.

The parliament meeting on the twelfth of April, Cromwell opened the ſeſſion with a ſpeech; in which he informed both houſes, that the king, in order to terminate all diſputes about religion, had appointed commiſſioners to examine the conteſted articles, that a ſtandard of faith might be eſtabliſhed on the ſolid baſis of the ſacred Scriptures; and that after the truth ſhould be thus made known to his people, he was reſolved to puniſh, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all thoſe who ſhould preſume to prefer their own opinion to the eſtabliſhed articles of belief. Cromwell's ſpeech was received with the higheſt applauſe; and the peers, in order to flatter the king in the perſon of his miniſter, declared, that he was worthy, by his deſerts, to be vicar-general of the univerſe. At the ſame time, the miniſter ſeemed to be in the higheſt favour with his maſter, who created him earl of Eſſex, and inſtalled him a knight of the garter.

The only religious order that now remained in England, was that of the Knights of St. John of Jeruſalem, or of the Knights of Malta. The valour this order had exerted againſt the infidels, acquired them the favour of the people, and they reſolutely refuſed to yield up their revenues to the king. Henry, determined not to ſuffer any ſociety to exiſt in England that profeſſed obedience to the pope, had recourſe to the parliament for the diſſolution of this order. But their revenues, though very large, were far from ſatisfying the rapacity of Henry; they were ſoon ſquandered away, and the king was obliged to have recourſe to his parliament for a ſupply. He had always found that aſſembly very laviſh of their liberties and the blood of their fellow-ſubjects, but very frugal of their money; and accordingly they ſtrongly oppoſed the demand of this tyrannical monarch; nor was it without the utmoſt difficulty that he obtained the grant.

The king's marriage with Anne of Cleves, which had been principally effected by Cromwell, greatly leſſened the power of that miniſter: Henry was ſecretly diſguſted, and the favours he had lately conferred upon him were deceitful. The duke of Norfolk and Gardiner obſerved this prognoſtic of the miniſter's fall, and determined to improve it. They well knew, that he was hated by the nobility, becauſe they ſaw themſelves eclipſed at court by a perſon of mean extraction; that he was odious to the catholics, becauſe they regarded him as a ſworn enemy to the church of Rome; and that he was ſuſpected by the proteſtants of having betrayed their intereſt through timidity. They did not, however, think it prudent to attack him abruptly, but to have recourſe to ſtratagem. They introduced Catherine Howard, a beautiful young lady, and neice to the duke of Norfolk, at court. The king was highly pleaſed with Catherine; and Gardiner, at once the pander and the prieſt, made frequent entertainments at his own houſe for the royal lover and his miſtreſs. The ſtratagem ſucceeded; Henry was ſo pleaſed with his miſtreſs, that he offered to make her his partner in the throne.

In conſequence of this new connection, the duke of Norfolk and Gardiner acquired the higheſt credit in the cabinet, and made uſe of the vileſt inſinuations to ruin the miniſter. They repreſented to Henry, that the nation in general was diſſatisfied with his adminiſtration, and perſuaded that Cromwell had abuſed his majeſty's confidence. They added, that as theſe complaints and murmurings chiefly regarded religion, it would be prudent to ſatisfy the people by examining his conduct ſtrictly, and even, if neceſſary, to ſacrifice the vicar-general, in order to procure the tranquillity of the kingdom. Henry, who was exaſperated againſt Cromwell, readily liſtened to theſe inſinuations, and it was determined that the miniſter ſhould fall a victim to the reſentment of the public. He was accordingly arreſted at the council-board, and immediately committed to the Tower. Cromwell now experienced the common fate of degraded miniſters, that of being forſaken by all his friends: Cranmer alone endeavoured to ſupport him. The more the parliament had flattered him in his proſperity, the more they inſulted him in his diſgrace. They accuſed him of hereſy and treaſon, and condemned him to death without examination, and without evidence. In vain he implored the clemency of the king in a letter written in the moſt affecting ſtrain, and containing the moſt earneſt ſupplications. Henry was deaf to the ſoft whiſpers of humanity; his brutal heart was a ſtranger to mercy. The miniſter was executed without delay; and all his ſervices diſregarded or forgotten. Cromwell was a man of induſtry and ability, and worthy of a better maſter, and a better fate. Though raiſed from a plebeian origin, he behaved with no inſolence to his inferiors; nor forgot in his proſperity to return the obligations he had received during his low condition: no perſon had cauſe to complain of his ingratitude.

Henry had now the pleaſure of perceiving that the obſtacles which had hitherto prevented his divorce, were removed: the two powerful monarchs Charles V. and Francis I. were no longer friends. Charles having occaſion to viſit Flanders to ſuppreſs an inſurrection, had begged permiſſion of Francis to paſs through his dominions. The requeſt was very readily granted; he was received by Francis with unſuſpicious courteſy, and even intruſted with the ſecrets of his allies. Charles was no ſooner out of reach of danger, than he profited by this indiſcretion; he expoſed Francis to the reſentment of the king of England; and though by acting ſo treacherous a part, he proved himſelf unworthy of all confidence, he found means to procure the friendſhip of a prince, who knew no other rule of conduct than his paſſions and his caprice.

It was now determined by Henry to procure a divorce from Anne of Cleves; and found no difficulty in obtaining a deciſion from the convocation in his favour. It was ſaid that there had been a pre-contract between the queen and the marquis of Lorraine; that the king had not "inwardly" given his conſent, and that he had never conſummated his marriage. Theſe objections were certainly very frivolous; but as the queen made no oppoſition, they were thought ſufficient, ſentence was pronounced for a diſſolution of the marriage, and the deciſion of the clergy was ratified by the parliament. The queen expreſſed no diſſatiſfaction. She was ſatiſfied on being informed, that the king, would, by letters patent, declare her his adopted ſiſter, and give her precedence before all the ladies of England, except his own wife and daughters; that an eſtate of three thouſand pounds a year ſhould be allotted for her maintenance; and that ſhe might either live in England, or return to her own country. She choſe the former, and was even prevailed upon to write a letter to her brother, the duke of Cleves, informing him, that ſhe had been treated in the moſt tender and generous manner by the king, though ſhe could not have him for her huſband; and conjuring him not to break the harmony that ſubſiſted between the two courts, on account of any thing that had happened to her in England. Thus was the marriage with Anne of Cleves diſſolved on the moſt frivolous pretences that ever were urged before any court of juſtice.

This obſtacle being removed, Catherine Howard was declared queen of England, after having been for ſome time privately married to Henry. But this marriage had no effect on the conduct of Henry; cruelty ſeemed to have taken poſſeſſion of his ſoul. Papiſts and reformers were equally the objects of his infernal paſſion; they both ſuffered for the tenets of their religion. The former denied the king's ſupremacy, and the latter the real preſence in the ſacrament; both were contrary to the religious eſtabliſhment of Henry, and therefore both equally obnoxious to puniſhment. Dr. Barnes, Thomas Gerard, a reforming miniſter, and William Jerome, vicar of Stepney, were condemned to the ſtake for hereſy; but they did not ſuffer alone, three bigotted catholics ſhared the ſame fate, and periſhed in the ſame flames, for denying the king's ſupremacy. Barnes diſcuſſed theological queſtions even at the ſtake; and as the debate between him and the ſheriff turned upon the invocation of ſaints, he ſaid, that he doubted whether the ſaints could pray for us; but if they could he hoped, in half an hour, to be praying for the ſheriff and all the ſpectators. This promiſcuous puniſhment of proteſtants and catholics gave occaſion to a foreigner, then in England, to ſay, That it was of no conſequence whether they were for or againſt the pope, ſince both loſt their lives for their opinions.

But it could not be expected that ſuch deſpotic cruelty could be executed without exciting the hatred of the people; they conceived an abhorrence for the authors of ſuch deteſtable proceedings, and ſome alarming ſymptoms of an inſurrection appeared in ſeveral parts of the kingdom. The king's ſuſpicion fell upon cardinal Pole; and this was to him a ſufficient reaſon for putting the counteſs of Saliſbury, the mother of that prelate, to death. She was the laſt of the Plantagenet race, and venerable both for her age and her virtues. She was led to the place of execution; but even in thoſe diſtreſſful circumſtances ſhe did not loſe her courage. She refuſed to ſubmit to a ſentence pronounced without a trial; and, running about the ſcaffold, ſhe told the executioner, that if he would have her head, he muſt win it in the beſt manner he could. Nor was it till after he had aimed many blows at her neck, that he at laſt gave her the fatal ſtroke.

The frequent inſurrections of popiſh faction in the northern counties had ſo often alarmed Henry, that he now determined to viſit thoſe parts in perſon, in order, if poſſible, to terminate theſe diſorders, by puniſhing, with the utmoſt ſeverity, all who had dared to diſturb the tranquillity of the kingdom. The inhabitants were no ſtrangers to his cruel diſpoſition, and therefore wiſely determined to deprecate his vengeance, by offering him a conſiderable ſum of money. Henry accepted of the commutation, and deſiſted from carrying his inhuman deſigns into execution. Before he left London, he had diſpatched Sir Ralph Sadler into Scotland, to propoſe an interview with James V. and the Scottiſh monarch had agreed to meet him at York, in order to concert meaſures for preſerving the peace of both kingdoms.

Scotland had, for ſome time, felt the zeal and fury of ſectaries, as well as England: the torch of civil diſcord flamed both in the northern and ſouthern parts of the Britiſh iſles. Patrick Hamilton, a young man of a noble family, deſtined for the church, having, about the year 1527, been ſent abroad for his education, imbibed the opinions of the reformers; and, on his return to Scotland, diſſembled not his religious ſentiments. A Dominican, who had inſinuated himſelf into his friendſhip, perfidiouſly accuſed him before the archbiſhop of St. Andrews. He was tried, condemned to be burnt for his errors, and ſuffered with all the reſolution of an hero. At the ſtake he cited his accuſer to the tribunal of Jeſus Chriſt; and the Dominican, either aſtoniſhed at his conſtancy, or overcome with remorſe, ſoon after loſt his ſenſes, and expired. The death of Hamilton, who was now conſidered both as a prophet and a martyr, brought over a great number of proſelytes to the Reformation. Among others, was friar Foreſt, who became a zealous preacher, and profeſſed an extreme attachment to the holy ſcriptures; which, in thoſe times, was conſidered as a ſure characteriſtic of hereſy. Foreſt was therefore ſoon after brought to his trial, and condemned to the flames. While the prieſts were deliberating on the moſt proper place for his execution, one of their hearers adviſed them to burn him in ſome cellar; "for (ſaid he) the ſmoke of Mr. Patrick Hamilton affected all thoſe on whom it blew."

Such was the ſtate of religious diſputes in Scotland when James received the invitation from Henry to meet him at York. The nobility perſuaded him to accept the offer; hoping, that if an union was formed between the two princes, they ſhould be able to enrich themſelves with the ſpoils of the church. The clergy were alarmed; they dreaded the conſequences of ſuch an interview; and determined, if poſſible, to prevent it. They repreſented the danger of making any innovations in the eſtabliſhed religion; the pernicious conſequences of aggrandizing the nobility, already too powerful; the hazard of putting himſelf in the hands of the Engliſh; and the dreadful ſituation of his country, ſhould he, by purſuing ſuch impolitic meaſures, loſe the friendſhip of France. At the ſame time, they offered him a preſent gratuity of fifty thouſand pounds Scots, and promiſed that the church ſhould be always ready to contribute liberally to the neceſſities of the ſtate. Theſe repreſentations, aſſiſted by the influence of the queen, induced James to change his reſolution. He delayed his journey for ſome days, and then ſent excuſes to Henry, who waited for him at York. The Engliſh monarch was not of a temper to bear tamely this affront: he vowed the moſt ſevere revenge; but an event, which happened ſoon after his departure, rendered it neceſſary for him to return to his capital, and defer, for a ſeaſon, his revenge againſt the king of Scotland.

While Henry continued at York, one Laſcelles informed the archbiſhop of Canterbury, that the queen, in the former part of her life, had been little better than a common ſtrumpet. He offered to confirm his information by the evidence of his ſiſter, who had lived as a ſervant in the old dutcheſs of Norfolk's houſe, where the queen had been educated, and where ſhe had carried on a criminal intrigue with Derham and Mannock, two menial ſervants. Struck with this intelligence, which it was dangerous either to conceal or diſcover, Cranmer communicated it to the chancellor and the earl of Hertford, and requeſted their advice with regard to the moſt prudent method of proceeding in ſo delicate an affair. They knew that Henry, though extremely ſcrupulous in every particular that regarded his honour, was captivated by the youth, beauty, and agreeable diſpoſition of Catherine. He had even put up a prayer in his chapel, returning thanks to heaven for the felicity he enjoyed in the conjugal ſtate; and had deſired the biſhop of Lincoln to compoſe a form of thankſgiving for that purpoſe. But notwithſtanding theſe demonſtrations of the king's eſteem for Catherine, it was reſolved that the matter ſhould not be buried in ſilence, and that the primate himſelf was the moſt proper perſon to diſcloſe it to his Majeſty. Cranmer, unwilling to ſpeak upon ſo delicate a ſubject, wrote a narrative of the whole proceeding, and ſent it by a ſpecial meſſenger to the king. It is impoſſible to expreſs the ſurprize and confuſion of Henry when he received the archbiſhop's relation of the queen's infamous conduct; but, at the ſame time, he was ſo fully convinced of his conſort's fidelity, that he at firſt gave no credit to the information, and declared that he looked upon the whole as a malicious forgery; but as he could not reſt till he knew the certainty of the matter, he ordered it to be inquired into with ſuch precautions as might preſerve the queen from any ſcandal, ſhould ſhe be found innocent. It was therefore reſolved, that the lord privy-ſeal ſhould examine Laſcelles. This he accordingly did, and found him ſteady in his information. The ſiſter of Laſcelles was next examined, and ſhe confirmed the teſtimony of her brother by undeniable evidence. It was now thought neceſſary to arreſt Derham and Mannock, which was eaſily done, as they had not the leaſt ſuſpicion of their danger. They both confeſſed repeated acts of impurity with the queen before her marriage; and it was alſo proved, that ſhe had ſince entertained one Culpepper a whole night in her chamber.

When Henry received the report of theſe examinations, his grief and diſtraction deprived him of ſpeech; he vented his diſtreſs in a torrent of tears. He appointed the primate, the chancellor, the duke of Norfolk, the earl of Suffolk, and the biſhop of Wincheſter, to interrogate the queen on this ſubject. She at firſt denied the charge; but finding her illicit amours were fully diſcovered, ſhe confeſſed the whole to the archbiſhop, who wrote the narrative from her mouth, and ſhe ſigned it with her own hand. Henry was now convinced of the infidelity of his queen, and determined to take a ſevere revenge on her, and all her accomplices.

A. D. 1542. A parliament, the uſual inſtrument of Henry's tyranny, was immediately ſummoned; and the queen's confeſſion being laid before them, they preſented an addreſs to his majeſty, in which, after entreating him not to be concerned at this untoward misfortune, to which all men are ſubject, they deſired leave to frame a bill of attainder againſt the queen and her accomplices. They received a gracious anſwer; and proceeded immediately to attaint of high-treaſon the queen, and the counteſs of Rochford, who had conducted her ſecret amours; and in this act both Derham and Culpepper were included. They alſo paſſed a bill of attainder for miſpriſion of treaſon againſt the old dutcheſs of Norfolk, Catherine's grandmother, lord William Howard and his lady, the counteſs of Bridgewater, and nine other perſons; becauſe they were acquainted with the queen's illicit amours, and did not make the neceſſary diſcovery before her marriage. Under this tyrannical government the ties of natural affection became crimes; and it was expected that relations ſhould expoſe the ſecret failings of each other. Nor were the parliament aſhamed to aſſiſt the fury and madneſs of the king. They paſſed an act, whereby it was declared, that any perſon who knew, or vehemently ſuſpected any guilt in the queen, and did not, within twenty days, reveal it to the king or council, ſhould be guilty of treaſon; and that if the king married any woman who had been incontinent, taking her for a true maid, ſhe ſhould be guilty of treaſon, unleſs ſhe previouſly revealed her guilt to him. The people made themſelves extremely merry with this extravagant clauſe. It was pleaſantly remarked, that the king muſt, for the future, look out for a widow, as no reputed maid would ever venture to incur the penalty of the ſtatute.

Theſe acts being paſſed, the queen and lady Rochford were beheaded, the twelfth of February, upon Tower-hill. The queen confeſſed her miſconduct in the former part of her life; but endeavoured to perſuade the world, that ſhe had never tranſgreſſed the rules of virtue ſince her marriage with the king. Lady Rochford found very little pity from the ſpectators: her execution was conſidered as a judgment from heaven for her having been the principal cauſe of the death of Anne Boleyn, and that of her own huſband; and this notorious inſtance of her profligate life tended greatly to clear their characters in the opinion of the world. With regard to the dutcheſs dowager of Norfolk, and the other perſons attainted of miſpriſion of treaſon, Henry himſelf ſeems to have been ſenſible of the cruelty of their ſentence, for he ſoon after granted them a pardon.

Theſe domeſtic diſtreſſes would have diverted from theological diſputes the mind of any prince leſs jealous than Henry of extending his opinions. He had ſome time ſince nominated commiſſioners for aſcertaining the proper articles of belief, in order to eſtabliſh an uniformity of ſentiments in matters of faith and religion; and the parliament paſſed a law, by which they ratified all the tenets which ought to be acknowledged; and in which they declared they had no other rule, either in religious or temporal concerns, than the will of their maſter. The produce of the labours of theſe commiſſioners, or rather the caprices of Henry, was a ſmall work, intituled, "The Inſtitutions of a Chriſtian Man." This book was received by the convocation, and voted to be the infallible ſtandard of orthodoxy, though it conſiſted partly of Catholic, and partly of Proteſtant doctrines. But Henry was not long pleaſed with his own production. He publiſhed another work, intituled, "The Erudition of a Chriſtian Man;" and this, though it differed conſiderably from the former, was eſtabliſhed as the genuine Creed of the profeſſors of Chriſtianity. It was neceſſary for the people to change their opinions as often as their ſovereign. He now retracted the permiſſion he had ſo lately given his ſubjects in general to read the Scriptures, reſtraining that conceſſion to gentlemen only; and even theſe were allowed to read in ſuch a manner, "That it be done quietly, and with good order." He alſo made alterations in the miſſal; ordained that the name of the pope ſhould be erazed or blotted out of every book where it was mentioned; and by endeavouring to ſet bounds to the ſpirit of diſputation, he increaſed the ardour of zeal, and irritated the taſte for innovation. But amidſt all the ridiculous creeds which he impoſed upon his ſubjects, he was always attentive to inculcate a paſſive obedience to his power, and held both the clergy and people in the moſt ſlaviſh ſubjection.

Henry was now determined to revenge the affront he had received from the Scottiſh monarch. He publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he reproached James with the breach of his promiſe, with having afforded an aſylum to ſeveral Engliſh rebels, and with retaining ſome territories which belonged to England. He alſo revived the old claim of the dependence of the crown of Scotland, and ſummoned James to do homage for his kingdom. The Scottiſh monarch made no anſwer to this declaration; but employed his whole attention to raiſe an army, in order to diſappoint the ambitious deſigns of Henry. His reſentment was greatly increaſed by the French ambaſſador, who had brought with him conſiderable ſupplies of men and money, and was extremely laviſh of the promiſes he made, in the name of his maſter, of effectual aſſiſtance and ſupport.

The command of the Engliſh army was given to the duke of Norfolk, who rendezvouſed his forces at Newcaſtle. The earl of Southampton was appointed to command the van; but he died at Newcaſtle, univerſally regretted for his abilities as a ſtateſman, and his approved courage and prudence as a general. On the twentieth of October, the Engliſh army entered Scotland, and were met by a herald from James, who expoſtulated with the duke of Norfolk on the injuſtice of invading the kingdom before any declaration of war had been publiſhed. But his remonſtrances were in vain: the Engliſh general ravaged all the country bordering on the Tweed, and retired to Berwick on account of the ſeverity of the weather. The earl of Huntley had indeed been ſent by James, at the head of ten thouſand men; but his forces were ſo far inferior to the Engliſh, that he was obliged to act wholly on the defenſive.

This invaſion did not, however, terrify the Scottiſh monarch: he levied an army of fifteen thouſand men; and being joined by the earl of Huntley with a train of artillery, he determined to invade England on the weſtern ſide of the Solway Firth. James repaired thither in perſon; but as ſoon as every thing was ready for croſſing into England, he left the army under the command of his favourite, Oliver Sinclair, who was hated by the Scottiſh nobility. The conſequences of ſo imprudent an action were ſoon apparent. The officers choſe to ſacrifice their king, their country, and their own honour, rather than ſerve under a perſon they deteſted. Accordingly, when Sinclair read his commiſſion at the head of the army, the nobility retired from their poſts; and the ſoldiers following their example, threw down their arms, ſo that the uproar and confuſion became general thro' the whole army. A body of five hundred Engliſh forces, under the command of Sir Thomas Wharton, who hovered round the Scottiſh camp to obſerve the motions of the enemy, perceiving the diſorder that prevailed among their ranks, attacked them with ſo much fury, that they ſought their ſafety in a precipitate flight. The earls of Caſſils and Glencairn, the lords Maxwell, Fleming, Somerville, and Gray, the general Sinclair, with about two hundred gentlemen, and eight hundred common ſoldiers, were taken priſoners, and all their artillery and baggage fell into the hands of the Engliſh.

This action, or rather rout, happened at Solway Moſs, in the neighbourhood of Carliſle. James was then at Caerlaveroc, where he received the alarming intelligence of the defeat and diſſipation of his army by an handful of Engliſh forces. He could not ſupport the diſgrace: his rage and regret ſo affected his ſpirits, that he repaired immediately to his bed, and ſoon after expired, in the flower of his age. Before his death, news arrived that his queen was ſafely delivered; on which he aſked, with ſome emotion, whether ſhe had brought him a ſon or a daughter? Being told the latter, he turned about in his bed, and exclaimed, "How many miſeries await this poor kingdom! Henry will be maſter of it, either by arms or by marriage."

The death of James, and the birth of a daughter, heireſs of a kingdom whoſe friendſhip was of ſo much importance to England, gave a new turn to the deliberations in the Engliſh council. It was now determined not to drive the Scots to deſpair, by taking the utmoſt advantage of the late victory: on the contrary, a ſcheme was formed for uniting the two kingdoms by a marriage between Edward prince of Wales and the young queen of Scotland. The Scottiſh priſoners were accordingly interrogated on this ſubject; and as they were well diſpoſed to encourage the contrivance, they were all ſet at liberty, on condition of their promiſing to return to London, if the project ſhould become abortive.

A. D. 1543. The Engliſh parliament meeting on the twenty-ſecond of January, were ſo well pleaſed with the ſucceſs of Henry's arms againſt the Scots, that they granted him a conſiderable ſubſidy. They afterwards paſſed an act for permitting the nobility, gentry, and merchants, to have Engliſh bibles, and other religious books mentioned in the ſtatute, in their houſes, for the inſtruction of their families. This act, which was procured by the influence of Cranmer, contained a clauſe, which mitigated the puniſhment of thoſe who ſhould be found guilty of hereſy; but the king was empowered either to repeal or ſuſpend the force of the act whenever he found it expedient.

The Scottiſh priſoners, on their return, found their country involved in confuſion. James Hamilton, earl of Arran, was, after the infant princeſs, the next heir to the crown. He was a nobleman of a weak capacity, of a peaceable diſpoſition, and a friend to the Reformation; but not at all adapted to hold the helm of government in theſe tempeſtuous times. The friends of the reformed religion, who were now pretty numerous in Scotland, exhorted him, however, to claim the regency, by virtue of his proximity of blood. Arran liſtened to their importunities, and reſolved to demand it at the meeting of the next parliament. He was powerfully oppoſed by the popiſh faction, at the head of whom was Cardinal Beaton, archbiſhop of St. Andrews, and primate of Scotland; a prieſt of unpopular manners, a zealous Roman Catholic, and of a perſecuting ſpirit. He publiſhed the will of the late monarch ſoon after his death, by which that prince had left the government to him, in conjunction with the earls of Argyle, Huntley, and Murray. By virtue of this inſtrument, which is ſaid to have been forged by that ambitious churchman, he took poſſeſſion of the government; and having joined his intereſt with that of the queen-dowager, ſiſter to the duke of Guiſe, he obtained the conſent of the convention of the ſtates, and excluded the pretenſions of the earl of Arran.

He did not, however, long enjoy the power he had uſurped. The return of the Scottiſh priſoners enabled Arran to make the moſt powerful oppoſition to the cardinal's adminiſtration; and the nation being exaſperated at his forgery, the majority of the parliament declared in favour of Arran, and the cardinal was committed to priſon. A negotiation was immediately opened with Sir Ralph Sadler, the Engliſh ambaſſador; and a treaty of marriage was concluded; by which it was ſtipulated, that the queen ſhould remain in Scotland till ſhe was ten years of age; that ſhe ſhould then be ſent to England, in order to be educated; that ſix Scotch noblemen ſhould be ſent as hoſtages to Henry; and that Scotland: notwithſtanding its union with England, ſhould ſtill preſerve its laws and privileges. But Beaton, having found means to eſcape from priſon, excited the eccleſiaſtics againſt this treaty, and awakened the natural antipathy of the Scots againſt the Engliſh. The popiſh party were indefatigable in perſuading the people, that an union with England muſt be productive of their own ſlavery. Their endeavours had the deſired effect; the Engliſh ambaſſador was inſulted by the populace, and the regent had no longer any power to protect him. Perſuaded that theſe violent proceedings muſt occaſion a rupture between the two kingdoms, Sadler ſummoned the priſoners to return to England, purſuant to their engagements; but all of them refuſed to obey, except Gilbert Kennedy, earl of Caſſils, who preferred his honour to his liberty. Henry was ſo pleaſed with this noble behaviour, that he received him with great marks of eſteem, loaded him with preſents, and gave him his liberty without ranſom. Beaton was not at all diſpleaſed at this refuſal of the priſoners, though it reflected diſgrace upon their country. He well knew that they muſt now depend wholly on the government for ſupport, and oppoſe the Engliſh with all their power. A war was now expected between the two kingdoms, and Francis engaged to ſupport the intereſt of Scotland.

But however deſirous the French monarch might be of aſſiſting his Scottiſh allies, the war he was already engaged in with the emperor rendered it very difficult to ſend forces ſufficient to ſupport them againſt the power of the Engliſh monarch. Matthew Steuart, earl of Lenox, was then at the French court; and Francis being informed that he was engaged in an ancient and hereditary enmity with the family of Hamilton, by whom his father had been murdered, propoſed that he ſhould viſit his native country, and join in ſupporting the cardinal and the queen-mother; promiſing, that a ſupply of money, and, if neceſſary, even military ſuccours, ſhould be ſent after him. He was alſo flattered with the hopes of eſpouſing the queen-dowager; and in caſe of the death of Mary, the infant princeſs, of aſcending the Scottiſh throne in preference of the earl of Arran, whoſe legitimacy was liable to ſome objections. Tempted by theſe alluring proſpects, Lenox returned to Scotland, and, on his arrival, exerted all his intereſt for breaking off the marriage treaty. He aſſembled a conſiderable number of forces, in order to wreſt the young queen from the hands of the regent; who being unable or unwilling to contend with his enemies, agreed to an accommodation. This important point being gained, the queen and the cardinal, who had now no farther occaſion for the aſſiſtance of Lenox, deſired Francis to recall him: but the earl, informed of their deſign, withdrew to his caſtle at Dumbarton, and the following year threw himſelf into the arms of the Engliſh.

Henry, exaſperated at the behaviour of Francis, determined to join the emperor againſt him. He had, indeed, ſome grounds for complaint againſt that monarch, beſides his behaviour with regard to Scotland. He ſaid, that Francis had engaged to ſeparate himſelf entirely from the ſee of Rome, and had not performed his promiſe; and that he had refuſed to pay the ſums which were due to him. Theſe reaſons were ſufficient for Henry to abandon the alliance of Francis, and to conclude with the emperor an offenſive and defenſive league againſt France. A meſſage was now ſent to the French king, requiring him to renounce his alliance with the Turks, and to make reparation for the damage the infidels had done in Chriſtendom. Francis refuſed the haughty demand, and a declaration of war was the immediate conſequence. Charles V. affected to conſider Francis as guilty of the greateſt crime, by having formed a league with the ſultan Solyman; though he ſhould have remembered, that his own ambitious projects had obliged him to court the friendſhip of the Turks.

An event happened about this time, which gave the Proteſtants ſome hopes of enjoying their religion unmoleſted. The king, on the twelfth of February, married Catherine Parr, widow to Neville, lord Latimer; a woman of great virtue and prudence, and well affected to the reformed religion. By this marriage Henry fulfilled the prophecy uttered in jeſt, that he would be obliged to eſpouſe a widow. But this event did not put an end to the perſecutions carried on againſt the reformers. A few days after the king's marriage, Anthony Perſonne, a prieſt; Robert Teſtwood, a ſinging-man; and Henry Fulmer, a taylor; were, at the inſtigation of Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, burnt at Windſor, for reading the writings of the reformed. At the ſame time, the biſhop's own ſecretary was executed, for denying the king's ſupremacy.

The league formed between Charles and Henry threatened Francis with the loſs of his kingdom. The French monarch, therefore, took the field early, and was ſucceſsful. The duke of Cleves, an ally of Francis, opened the campaign with a victory over the Imperial forces; and Francis made himſelf maſter of the whole dutchy of Luxembourg, and afterwards of Landrecy. But Charles had no ſooner aſſembled his army in the Low Countries, than he took almoſt every caſtle in the dutchy of Cleves, and reduced the duke to ſubmit to very rigorous terms. He was ſoon after joined by ſix thouſand Engliſh, under the command of Sir John Wallop, and immediately inveſted the town of Landrecy. Francis, however, found means to throw ſuccours into the place; and the ſeaſon being far advanced, Charles was obliged to raiſe the ſiege: he, however, made himſelf ſome amends, by taking the city of Cambray.

A. D. 1544. The winter ſeaſon having put a period to military operations, Henry convoked a parliament, where the princeſſes Mary and Elizabeth were reſtored to their right of ſucceſſion. But, what is very ſingular, Henry would not ſuffer the parliament to reverſe the ſtatute which declared them illegitimate. At the ſame time, he prevailed upon both houſes to inveſt him with a power of ſtill excluding them, whenever he might think proper. Two very ſingular acts were alſo paſſed this ſeſſion, and both, in the higheſt degree, diſhonourable. The firſt gave a full remiſſion to the king of the ſeveral debts he had lately incurred by a general loan exacted from his ſubjects; and even ordained, that thoſe of them who had already received payment, either in whole or in part, ſhould refund the ſums they had received to the exchequer. The other eſtabliſhed a new oath for the ſecurity of his eccleſiaſtical inſtitutions, and it was enacted, that all thoſe who had taken the former oaths to that purpoſe, ſhould be ſuppoſed to have taken the new one; an abſurdity which has, perhaps, no equal in parliamentary proceedings. Henry was, however, afraid of the uſual œconomy of the parliament, and would not expoſe himſelf to the mortification of a refuſal. But as his uſual prodigality had drained his treaſury, and as he was unable, without money, to proſecute his wars againſt France and Scotland, he exacted new loans from his ſubjects, levied a benevolence, and employed every expedient which the prerogative at that time allowed him.

As ſoon as the ſeaſon would permit, Henry ſent a fleet and army to invade Scotland. The fleet amounted to near two hundred ſail, and had on board a body of ten thouſand men. Dudley, lord Liſle, commanded the navy, and the earl of Hertford the land forces. The troops were landed in the neighbourhood of Leith; and, after defeating a ſmall body that oppoſed their landing, they took that town, and thence advanced to Edinburgh, the gates of which were ſoon forced; and the city, after being pillaged by the ſoldiers, was ſet on fire. The regent and the cardinal being in no condition to oppoſe ſo great a force, retired to Stirling. No oppoſition being made to the Engliſh, they continued their ravages, burnt Haddington and Dunbar, and retired into England, having loſt only forty men in the whole expedition. This incurſion has been cenſured as ill-concerted: for it is ſaid, if Henry intended to ſollicit an alliance, he behaved with too much violence; and if he meant to make a conqueſt, he neglected to improve his ſucceſs. It may, however, be obſerved, that having, in conjunction with the emperor, formed the project of an invaſion of France, he was ſollicitous of employing his whole force on the continent.

The plan formed by theſe two powerful princes, was to invade France at the head of an army of above one hundred thouſand men; and it was agreed to march directly to Paris, without entering upon any ſiege, and thence proceed to the entire conqueſt of the kingdom. Had this plan been executed, France would, in all probability, have been ruined; for Francis could not oppoſe to theſe formidable preparations above forty thouſand men. But fortunately for the French monarch, the emperor, at the head of an army of ſixty thouſand men, had taken the field before Henry landed at Calais; and not to loſe time while he was waiting for his confederate, Charles ſat down before Luxembourg, and ſoon made himſelf maſter of the place. He thence proceeded to Cammercy on the Meuſe, which ſoon ſurrendered. Ligny met with the ſame fate; but St. Dezier on the Marne, which he next beſieged, made a brave reſiſtance, under the command of Sancerre, the governor.

While the emperor was employed in reducing theſe places, Henry landed at Calais at the head of thirty thouſand men, accompanied by the dukes of Norfolk and Suffolk; the earls of Arundel, Oxford, and Surry; the lords St. John, Ferrers of Chartley, Montjoy, and Grey of Wilton; Sir Anthony Brown, Sir Francis Bryan, and a great number of the moſt opulent perſons in the kingdom. Soon after his arrival, he was joined by the count de Buren, admiral of Flanders, with ten thouſand infantry and four thouſand horſe. Henry finding the emperor employed in taking places, imitated his example, and inveſted Montreuil and Boulogne. Theſe ſieges neceſſarily produced delays; and Charles finding the ſeaſon conſiderably advanced, and that the ſcheme for ſubduing France was likely to prove abortive, concluded a ſeparate peace with Francis. In conſequence of this treaty, the count de Buren withdrew his forces from the Engliſh army, and Henry was obliged to raiſe the ſiege of Montreuil. He had, indeed, taken Boulogne; but this acquiſition was of little conſequence, when compared with the immenſe expence of his military preparations.

A. D. 1545. Francis, determined, if poſſible, to diſtreſs Henry, employed the whole winter in fitting out a fleet to invade the coaſts of England. They ſailed early in the month of July; and on the eighteenth, advanced towards the Engliſh fleet, then riding at St. Helens. Here a cannonade began, which laſted ſeveral hours, but with very little effect, the art of gunnery being then in its infancy, and the guns and tackle very ill adapted to the intended purpoſe. Finding their attempt to deſtroy the Engliſh ſhips abortive, they landed on the Iſle of Wight, where they committed the moſt dreadful ravages, till the militia of the country advanced againſt them, and drove them to their ſhips.

Henry now found it impoſſible to ſupport this expenſive war without having recourſe to his parliament, who granted him a ſmall ſubſidy. The clergy were more liberal; and it is remarkable, that during the eſtabliſhment of the Catholic religion, greater ſums were always contributed by the church than the laity. Hence the emperor, when he was informed of the ſuppreſſion of the Engliſh monaſteries, and of Henry's profuſe donations of their revenues among his courtiers, is reported to have ſaid, "That he had killed the hen which brought him the golden eggs." But though the parliament were ſo remarkably tenacious of their own money, they were amazingly profuſe with regard to the ſubſtance of others. They now beſtowed upon Henry all the revenues of the univerſities, chapels, and hoſpitals; a liberality that regarded the property which ought, perhaps, in juſtice, to have been the laſt to have been diſpoſed of. The king, however, took care to inform the univerſities, that he meant not to encroach upon their endowments. Some idea may be formed of the proſtitution of this parliament by one of their ſtatutes, in which they acknowledge, that the king had been always, by the word of God, ſupreme head of the church of England: that the biſhops, and other eccleſiaſtics, had no manner of juriſdiction, but by his royal mandate; and that he alone was inveſted with full authority to correct all manner of hereſies, errors, vices, and ſins. The king made a long and elaborate ſpeech to this parliament, in which he complained of the diſſentions that prevailed among his ſubjects with regard to religion. He told them, "That the ſeveral pulpits were become a kind of batteries againſt each other; where one preacher called another heretic and anabaptiſt, which was retaliated by the opprobrious terms of papiſt and hypocrite: that he had permitted his people the uſe of the ſcriptures, not in order to furniſh them with matter for diſpute and railing, but that he might enable them to reform their conſciences, and inſtruct their children and families: that he was grieved to the heart to find how that precious jewel was proſtituted, by being introduced into the converſation of every alehouſe and tavern, and employed as a pretence for decrying the ſpiritual and legal paſtors: and that he was ſorry to obſerve, that the word of God, while it was the object of ſo much anxious ſpeculation, had very little influence on their practice; and that though an imaginary knowledge ſo greatly abounded, charity was daily going to decay." Theſe obſervations were certainly juſt; but the example of the king, who encouraged ſpeculation and diſpute, was ill adapted to promote that charity and peaceable ſubmiſſion to the eſtabliſhed opinion he ſo ſtrongly recommended.

A. D. 1546. The ſubſidies voted by parliament enabled Henry to make new preparations for carrying the war into France; but an accident happened at the opening of the campaign, which gave very little hopes of ſucceſs to the Engliſh. The earl of Surry, who commanded the Engliſh forces in Boulogne, attempted to intercept a convoy of proviſions going to the fort of Outre Eau, which the French had built at the mouth of the port; but was obliged to return with ſome loſs, without effecting his purpoſe. This was followed by a more conſiderable defeat. The earl, not the leaſt intimidated by his late unſucceſsful attempt, attacked the Marſhal de Biez, who was conducting a much larger convoy. But Fortune again declared for the French: the Engliſh general was routed, with the loſs of about eight hundred men killed on the ſpot, and one hundred and twenty taken priſoners, among whom was Sir Edward Poynings.

Theſe misfortunes induced Henry, whoſe animoſity againſt Francis was neither violent nor perſonal, to think of liſtening to the terms which had been offered for a peace. He had ſufficiently gratified his capricious humour by the ſhort war he had carried on againſt his former ally; and having reaſon to apprehend, from his great increaſe in corpulency, and viſible decay of ſtrength, that his end was approaching, he was deſirous of finiſhing a quarrel which might prove dangerous to the kingdom during the minority of his ſon. Francis was ſtill more deſirous of a peace, and it was concluded on the following conditions:

"That the king of France ſhould pay regularly the penſion ſettled by former treaties.

"That Francis ſhould pay in eight years the ſum of two millions of golden crowns, in conſideration of the penſion, and the expence Henry had been at in reducing Boulogne."

"That the king of England ſhould keep poſſeſſion of Boulogne, together with its territories, till the whole debt was diſcharged.

"That when all the ſums ſhould be paid to Henry, Boulogne ſhould be reſtored to France, in the ſame condition as when taken by the Engliſh."

The emperor was included in this peace: and with regard to Scotland, Henry agreed, that it ſhould enjoy the ſame benefit, provided the Scots gave him no cauſe to make war upon them. Thus Henry terminated a war which had coſt him above one million three hundred and forty-three thouſand pounds ſterling; and all he acquired in return, was only a bad ſecurity for a debt which did not amount to one-third of the value. All Henry's expeditions were nearly of the ſame kind.

But neither experience nor reflection could cure Henry of the madneſs of introducing new ſyſtems of faith, and endeavouring to eſtabliſh an uniformity of opinion among all ranks of people. He had hitherto ſtrictly ordered divine ſervice to be performed in no other language than the Latin; but he now permitted the Litany to be celebrated in the vulgar tongue; and added to it one petition, "to be delivered from the tyranny of the biſhop of Rome, and from all his deteſtable enormities." Cranmer endeavoured to make ſtill farther innovations; and had probably ſucceeded, had not Gardiner, who was then at the court of the emperor, as ambaſſador from Henry, wrote to the king, informing him, that if he continued to carry his oppoſition againſt the Catholic religion any farther, the emperor would break off all commerce with him. About the ſame time, Cranmer loſt a ſincere, and one of his moſt powerful friends, Charles Brandon, duke of Suffolk, brother-in-law to the king. That nobleman was well affected to the Reformation, took every opportunity to ſupport its profeſſors, and had always maintained a cordial and ſteady friendſhip with the king. Henry was ſitting in council when he was informed of Suffolk's death, and dropped a tear to his memory; declaring at the ſame time, that during his whole life, he had never made any attempt to injure an adverſary, nor ever whiſpered a word to the diſadvantage of any perſon. Deprived of this ſincere and generous friend, Cranmer himſelf was expoſed to the cabals of the courtiers. His enemies, under the maſk of a zeal for orthodoxy, repreſented the primate as an encourager of hereſy. Henry ſaw their malice, and reproved them in the ſevereſt terms. He told them, that he was well acquainted with Cranmer's merit, as well as with their envy and malevolence. Adding, that he was determined to cruſh all their cabals; and ſince gentle methods were in vain, to teach them, by the ſevereſt diſcipline, a more dutiful concurrence in promoting his ſervice.

But though the primate himſelf was beyond the reach of his enemies, the ſpirit of perſecution was far from having ſubſided: the good and the virtuous ſtill felt the fiery hand of a bigotted zeal. Anne Aſcue, a young woman of great merit, who had entered into a ſtrict connection with the queen, was accuſed of having denied the real preſence in the ſacrament. Bonner drew from her a recantation; but ſhe qualified it in ſuch a manner as did not ſatisfy that furious prelate. She was therefore thrown into priſon; and her courage being rather rouſed than depreſſed by this ſeverity, ſhe wrote to the king, declaring, that with regard to the myſtery of the euchariſt, ſhe believed as much as Chriſt had revealed of it, and as much as the Catholic church required; but as ſhe preſumed to queſtion the king's explanation of this tenet, this declaration was conſidered as an inſult. The chancellor Wriotheſley, a perſon intoxicated with religious zeal, was ſent to examine her with regard to her patrons at court, and the great ladies with whom ſhe had been intimate. But this ſcheme proved abortive: ſhe refuſed to diſcover any of her friends: and though ſhe was put to the torture in the moſt cruel manner, ſhe ſtill continued reſolute in preſerving an inviolable ſecrecy. She was immediately carried to the place of execution, and burnt alive, without having ſhewn the leaſt inclination to retract. Three other perſons ſuffered with her, and imitated her courage and conſtancy. All the arguments uſed by the biſhop of Saliſbury to prevail upon them to recant their errors, were urged in vain. They maintained their tenets in the midſt of the flames, and ſeemed to glory in their ſufferings.

The fidelity and ſecrecy of Anne Aſcue preſerved the queen, who had been her principal confidant; but ſhe ſoon after found herſelf in the utmoſt danger of falling a victim to the dogmatical zeal of her huſband. Henry, who was now very corpulent, and of a bad habit of body, was afflicted with an ulcer in his leg, which threatened his life, and at the ſame time greatly increaſed that peeviſh and paſſionate temper to which he was always ſubject. The tenderneſs of Catherine was remarkable on this occaſion; ſhe attended him with the utmoſt aſſiduity, and uſed every method in her power to ſoothe his pains, and prevent thoſe dreadful guſts of humour ſo frequent and fatal in their conſequences. The king's favourite topic was theology, and Catherine was frequently obliged to diſcuſs the more abſtruſe tenets of religion with him. Whether her arguments were too ſtrong for the king to anſwer, or whether ſhe inadvertently dropt ſome expreſſions that ſhewed ſhe was attached to the Lutheran principles, is not abſolutely known; but the king was highly provoked at her preſuming to differ from him in any theological ſpeculation. He even complained to Gardiner of the queen's obſtinacy; and that furious prelate, pleaſed at having an opportunity of cruſhing the very head of the proteſtant party, perſuaded the king to order articles of impeachment to be drawn up againſt his conſort. The chancellor ſeconded the arguments of Gardiner, and ſoon after brought the articles to be ſigned. Fortunately for Catherine, the chancellor dropped the fatal paper, which was found by one of the queen's party, and immediately put into her hands. Senſible of the danger to which ſhe was expoſed, ſhe determined, if poſſible, to avert the ſtorm by prudence and diſcretion. She accordingly paid her uſual viſit to the king, whom ſhe found in a more ſerene diſpoſition than uſual. The converſation failed not to turn upon the ſubject of theology; and Henry challenged her to maintain her uſual arguments in divinity. Catherine told the king that ſuch profound ſpeculations were above her comprehenſion, and, in her opinion, very ill ſuited to the natural imbecillity of her ſex. She added, that though ſhe had often engaged in theſe ſpeculations, it was only to divert his pains, and profit by his inſtructions; that his elucidations had withdrawn the veil of obſcurity which ſhe had ſo long wiſhed to be removed, and to effect which ſhe had made uſe of arguments, though ſhe knew when ſhe urged them they were not concluſive. "And is it ſo ſweet-heart, replied Henry, then, by St. Mary, we are perfect friends again." At the ſame time he embraced her with great tenderneſs, and ſent her away with aſſurances of his kindneſs and protection.

The next day, while Henry and Catherine were walking in the palace garden, the biſhop of Wincheſter, who knew nothing of this reconciliation, appeared with forty of the purſuivants, to ſeize the queen, and commit her to the Tower. The king no ſooner ſaw the prelate approach, than he took him aſide, and was obſerved to ſpeak to him in a very angry tone of voice. The queen was greatly alarmed, eſpecially on overhearing the terms knave, fool, and beaſt frequently repeated. The prelate retired in great confuſion, and the queen generouſly interpoſed to mitigate the paſſion of the king, who replied, "Poor ſoul! you know not how little that man is intitled to your favour." The queen was very careful for the future not to offend the petulant humour of her huſband; and Gardiner was never able to recover the good opinion of the monarch.

A. D. 1547. This attempt of Gardiner and Wriotheſley exaſperated the king and the catholic party, and the duke of Norfolk and his ſon, the earl of Surry, ſoon felt the weight of his reſentment. The duke of Norfolk was, by his birth, allied to the throne; and had diſtinguiſhed himſelf by a long ſeries of ſervices to the ſtate. He was uncle to two of Henry's queens, and always conſidered as the greateſt ſubject in the kingdom. He was an implacable enemy to the reformation, and had taken every opportunity to enforce the laws againſt them. The earl of Surry, ſon to the duke of Norfolk, was a young nobleman of great merit, but of very little diſcretion. Hurried away by his ambition, and exaſperated by ſome affronts he had lately received, he very imprudently irritated the peeviſh humour of Henry by ſome menacing expreſſions; and the king, perſuaded that he entertained views of marrying the princeſs Mary, determined to prevent the great power of his family from becoming formidable to the government during his ſon's minority. Both Norfolk and Surry were accordingly arreſted, and ſent to the Tower. Surry was accuſed of entertaining in his family ſome Italians, who were ſuſpected to be ſpies ſent by his holineſs; and of carrying on a correſpondence with cardinal Pole, becauſe one of his domeſtics had paid a viſit to that prelate in Italy: and becauſe the earl quartered the arms of Edward the Confeſſor upon his eſcutcheon, he was ſuſpected of aſpiring to the crown; though it was well known that both himſelf and his anceſtors had openly, during many years, and even by the approbation of the heralds, maintained that practice. But however frivolous theſe accuſations may now appear, they were then thought ſufficient to find him guilty. He was condemned by the lord chancellor, who preſided at his trial, and beheaded upon Tower-hill on the nineteenth of January.

The innocence of the duke of Norfolk was ſtill more apparent, though his dutcheſs, and Elizabeth Holland his miſtreſs, gave information of all they knew againſt him. The greateſt crime of which he was accuſed was that of having ſaid, that the king was ſickly, and could not hold out a long time, and that the kingdom would fall into diſorders on account of the diverſity of religious opinions. Henry well knew, that all the accuſations he could alledge againſt him would not be ſufficient to find him guilty in a trial before his peers, and had therefore recourſe to the uſual inſtrument of his tyranny. He ordered a bill of attainder to be preferred againſt him, and he was declared guilty of high-treaſon, without being heard in his own defence. Cranmer, though a friend to the Reformation, and well knew, that Norfolk was a ſworn enemy to all innovations in religion, refuſed to have any ſhare in a tranſaction that muſt reflect diſgrace on all that were concerned in it. He was therefore no ſooner informed that the commons had paſſed the bill, than he retired to his ſeat at Croydon, and appeared no more at court, till he was ſent for to aſſiſt the king in his laſt moments.

Though the attendants of Henry had for ſome time perceived that the hour of his diſſolution was at hand, no perſon had the courage to inform him of his dangerous ſituation. An act had been paſſed in his reign, which rendered it capital for any perſon to foretel the king's death, leſt, in the violence of his paſſion, he ſhould cauſe the law, in all its rigour, to be executed on the author of ſuch friendly intelligence; eſpecially as his late treatment of the Howard family had demonſtrated his cruelty did not ſubſide as the ſprings of life decayed. At length Sir Anthony Lenny ventured to diſcloſe the fatal ſecret, and exhorted the king to prepare for that awful change which was ſo near at hand, as his legs were already mortified. Henry, contrary to all expectation, thanked him for the information, and deſired that Cranmer might be ſent for; but before the archbiſhop arrived, the king was ſpeechleſs. The prelate beſeeching the king to give him ſome ſign of his truſting in God, through the merits of our Redeemer, he ſqueezed his hand with great fervency, and immediately after expired, on the twenty-eighth of January, in the fifty-ſixth year of his age, and the thirty-eighth of his reign.

A few days before his death Henry had iſſued his royal mandate for the execution of the duke of Norfolk; but expired the night before the day appointed for that purpoſe; and it was thought improper to ſtain with blood the commencement of the new reign, eſpecially as the ſentence was conſidered as unjuſt and tyrannical.

The king, about a month before his death, had made his will, in which, purſuant to the power given him by the parliament, he had ſettled the ſucceſſion to the crown of England in the following manner: Firſt, upon the prince of Wales and his poſterity. Secondly, upon the children of his preſent queen, or thoſe of any future marriage he might contract. Thirdly, upon the princeſs Mary and her iſſue, but with this expreſs condition, that ſhe ſhould marry with the conſent of the executors of his will. Fourthly on the princeſs Elizabeth, with the ſame proviſo. Fifthly, upon the lady Frances Brandon, daughter to his ſiſter, the queen of France, by the duke of Suffolk. Sixthly, on the lady Eleanor Brandon, younger ſiſter to Frances. Laſtly, in failure of all theſe, upon the next lawful heir. By another clauſe in his will he named the following ſixteen executors: The archbiſhop of Canterbury; the lord chancellor; the earl of Hertford, uncle to young Edward; the lord St. John; the lord Ruſſel; the lord viſcount Liſle; Cuthbert Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham; Sir Anthony Brown; Sir Edward Montague; the chief-juſtice Bromley; Sir William Paget; Sir Anthony

Denny; Sir William Herbert; Sir Edward Watton; and his brother Dr. Watton. To the lords who were his executors, he left five hundred marks, and to the commoners three hundred, and ordered his executors to pay all his debts. He made the prince of Wales heir to all his moveables, but ſtrictly charged him to be ſubject to the advice of his council till he was eighteen years of age. He left three thouſand pounds a year to each of his daughters, with ten thouſand pounds addition, as their whole fortune, if his executors thought proper. To the queen he left three thouſand pounds in plate and jewels, and a thouſand pounds in money. Another clauſe in his will ſufficiently ſuggeſted, that he was far from being ſettled with regard to his notions in religion: he left money for maſſes to be ſaid for delivering his ſoul from purgatory; and though he had deſtroyed all thoſe inſtitutions, eſtabliſhed by his anceſtors and others, for the benefit of their ſouls, and had even left the doctrine of purgatory doubtful in all the articles of faith he publiſhed during the latter years of his reign, yet he was determined to take care of the future repoſe of his own ſoul, by adhering to the ſafer ſide of the queſtion.

Perhaps a more difficult taſk cannot be impoſed upon an hiſtorian, than that of giving a ſummary of Henry's qualities. Lord Herbert very juſtly remarked, That his hiſtory is his beſt character and deſcription. He was abſolutely different and inconſiſtent with himſelf, in different periods of his life. While the natural modeſty of youth reſtrained the violence of his turbulent paſſions, his government was the admiration of foreigners; and he was almoſt adored by his people; but in his more advanced age, his conduct was entirely changed. He became rapacious, arbitrary, froward, fretful, and ſo cruel, that he ſeemed to delight in ſhedding the blood of his ſubjects. The grand object of all his purſuits was the gratification of his own brutal appetites: to this he ſacrificed every obligation of juſtice, every dictate of conſcience, every feeling of humanity: the cruel fate of the unfortunate Anne Boleyn will fix an eternal mark of infamy on his character. At the ſame time it muſt be acknowledged, that with all his vices, follies, and imperfections, Henry poſſeſſed many great and agreeable qualities. He was not only liberal and indulgent to his court and family, but alſo to ſtrangers. He was at once a lover and encourager of the arts and ſciences, and his court was fuller of learned men than many of the univerſities; he made them his companions as well as his counſellors, and advanced them to the higheſt dignities both of church and ſtate. He was particularly careful of the education of his own children, and his authority induced the nobility to follow his example. The treatment he met with from the court of Rome, provoked him to violence; the danger of a revolt from his ſuperſtitious ſubjects, ſeemed to require the moſt extreme violence. He laid the foundation of Engliſh liberty by delivering the Engliſh church from her ſlaviſh and diſgraceful ſubjection to the ſee of Rome; though he was perhaps actuated more by his unruly paſſions, than by the motives of conſcience and religion. Foreign nations reſpected his power, his own ſubjects forgot his vices, and it is hiſtory only that regards him as a monſter.

Henry had the following iſſue. By his firſt wife, Catherine of Spain, he had two ſons and one daughter, viz.

Henry, born Jan. 1, 1511, and died on the twenty-ſeventh of February following.

Another ſon, who died ſoon after his birth, which happened the latter end of the year 1514.

Mary, born February the elventh, 1516, and who aſcended the throne on the death of her brother Edward.

By his ſecond wife, Anne Boleyn, he had the famous queen Elizabeth, and a male child ſtill-born.

By his third wife, Jane Seymour, he had a ſon named Edward, who ſucceeded him immediately in the throne.

He had no iſſue by his three laſt wives, Anne of Cleves, Catherine Howard, and Catherine Parr.

By Elizabeth, widow of Sir Gilbert Taillebois, he had a natural ſon named Henry Fitz-Roy, created duke of Richmond and Somerſet, and afterwards made lord-lieutenant of Ireland. The beauty of his perſon, the quickneſs of his parts, his expertneſs in all kinds of military exerciſes, his excellent diſpoſition, and the uncommon endowments of his mind, gained him the character of the fineſt youth of the age, and raiſed the expectations of the people very high in his favour. Theſe accompliſhments, the honours he had received, and the extraordinary fondneſs which Henry always expreſſed for him, occaſioned an opinion, that, in defect of legitimate male iſſue, the king would have found a way to raiſe this natural child to the throne. But whatever deſigns he had formed in his favour, they proved abortive by the death of this youth, which happened in the eighteenth year of his age.

Henry VIII. ſummoned ten parliaments, and twenty ſeſſions were held, though the whole time which they ſat during this long reign, did not exceed three years and a half. The abſolute will of the king being the law of parliament, and the members being deſirous of returning as ſoon as poſſible to their country ſeats, buſineſs was ſoon diſpatched; a motion was made and generally carried without the leaſt oppoſition. Hence thes many abſurd and tyrannical laws, which multiplied crimes and puniſhments during the reign of Henry VIII. Had theſe, indeed, been ſtrictly executed, every man without exception muſt have been obnoxious to the penalty of high-treaſon. For example, it was treaſonable for any perſon to aſſert the validity of Henry's marriage either with Catherine of Arragon, or Anne Boleyn; and it was equally criminal to ſay any thing to the diſparagement of the princeſs Mary and Elizabeth, the deſcendants of thoſe marriages. Even a profound ſilence upon theſe topics might be dangerous; for when the marriages were declared illegitimate by ſtatute, it was alſo enacted, that whoever refuſed to anſwer upon oath to any point contained in that act, was ſubject to the pains of death. In order, therefore, to find a perſon a traitor, it was only neceſſary to interrogate him concerning the legality of either of the king's former marriages. If he was ſilent, he was a traitor; and if he anſwered either in the negative or affirmitive, he was equally guilty. Thus the ſubjects were oppreſſed under the authority of laws, which ought to have been the guardians of their happineſs and ſecurity.

A. D. 1547. THE late king was perſuaded that he had fixed the government, during the minority of his ſon, on ſo firm a baſis, that it could not be ſhaken. But he ſhould have remembered, that his power would ceaſe with his exiſtence; and that the commands of the moſt abſolute monarchs are diſregarded, when, by their deaths, they have ceaſed to inſpire terror. Accordingly, the regents had no ſooner ſettled the form of government agreeable to Henry's will, than a change was propoſed. It was obſerved, that it would be very troubleſome for the people, and particularly for foreign miniſters, to be obliged to apply to fourteen perſons of equal authority; and, to remove this difficulty, it was moved, that one ſhould be choſen as their preſident, with the title of protector of the king's realm, and governor of his perſon: but though he ſhould enjoy all the exterior ſymbols of the royal dignity, he ſhould yet be bound, in the exerciſe of power, to follow the opinion of the executors.

This change, however reaſonable, and even neceſſary, it might appear to the majority, was ſtrongly oppoſed by Wriotheſley the chancellor, a perſon at once very ambitious and very active. He had no ſuperior in the council, except the primate; and Cranmer having little inclination to mix in public affairs, he flattered himſelf that the chief direction of the buſineſs of the kingdom would fall into his hands. He ſtrenuouſly aſſerted, that they had no power to depart from the tenor of the late king's will, authoriſed by an act of parliament. His remonſtrances, however, had no effect on the council; they determined to chuſe a protector, in order the more effectually to provide for the public tranquillity. No difficulty occurred with regard to the perſon proper for this exalted ſtation. Edward Seymour, earl of Hertford, maternal uncle to the king, and the more intereſted in his preſervation, as he had himſelf no pretenſions to the crown, was appointed to fill this dignified ſtation, and immediately created duke of Somerſet. At the ſame time, the chancellor was created earl of Southampton. But this mark of favour was far from ſatisfying the ambition of that turbulent miniſter; he determined to oppoſe all the meaſures of the protector, and render him uneaſy in his high ſtation.

In order to this, he reſolved to devote his whole time to the affairs of the cabinet; and as his office of chancellor neceſſarily engroſſed a conſiderable part of his attention, he ventured, without any warrant from the king, protector, or regency, or any other authority than his own, to put the great ſeal in commiſſion; and appointed four lawyers to execute, in his abſence, the office of lord high chancellor of England. A meaſure ſo replete with arrogance and preſumption could not fail of giving umbrage to the government; and it was determined to ſuppreſs the haughty ſpirit of the ambitious chancellor. The judges being conſulted on this occaſion, declared, that the commiſſion he had granted was contrary to the laws of England; and that the earl of Southampton, for taking ſuch an unconſtitutional ſtep, had not only forfeited his high office, but alſo rendered himſelf obnoxious to the ſevereſt puniſhment. A council was now ſummoned, and the chancellor ordered to attend. But he was ſo far from making any ſubmiſſion, that he defended his own power in the moſt haughty manner, and with very indecent language. He called the authority of the council and protector in queſtion, and told them he would not ſubmit to any ſentence they might pronounce againſt him. He was therefore deprived of the ſeals, and committed a priſoner to his own houſe, where he continued till the twenty-ninth of June, when he entered into a recognizance of four thouſand pounds to pay whatever fine they ſhould think proper to impoſe upon him. The Catholic party loſt a powerful friend by his removal; he was at once an able advocate, and a zealous defender of the Romiſh religion.

The fall of Southampton increaſed the ambition of the protector: he now thought himſelf at full liberty to engroſs the ſole management of the affairs of government. He accordingly procured a patent from the young king, by which he was enabled to overthrow all the appointments of Henry. It inveſted him, under the title of protector, with the whole regal authority. He appointed a council, conſiſting of all the former members, except Southampton; but he enjoyed the power of chuſing other counſellors, and to conſult with ſuch only as he thought proper. With this council he was enabled to execute any meaſure that might be thought ſerviceable to the government, without incurring any penalty or forfeiture, inflicted by any law, ſtatute, or ordinance, whatſoever. No reſiſtance was made to this uſurpation of power, though it was ſufficiently evident that the protector was, in effect, abſolute maſter of the kingdom. Perhaps the people, habituated by cuſtom to the tyrannical government of Henry, might prefer a ſingle perſon to a council of regency, and think the public tranquillity would be much better ſecured by the excluſion of parties from the government.

While the Engliſh were thus employed in ſettling the government, Francis I. king of France, paid the debt of nature, and was ſucceeded by Henry II. a prince of vigour and ability, but leſs ready in his reſolutions than his predeceſſor, and leſs enflamed with animoſity againſt the emperor Charles V. He was, in a great meaſure, governed by the duke of Guiſe and the cardinal of Lorraine, brothers to the queen-dowager of Scotland; and being zealous champions for the papal authority, and the Roman Catholic religion, they determined to prevent the intended marriage between Edward and the young queen of Scotland. Accordingly they perſuaded Henry to attempt the recovery of Boulogne, and to reject the late treaties which had been concluded with Henry by Francis I. This perfidious behaviour did not, however, intimidate the protector: he determined, if poſſible, to execute the dying injunctions of his late maſter, relative to the marriage between thoſe infant ſovereigns, and by that means unite the two kingdoms. But before he proceeded to carry this deſign into execution, he thought it neceſſary to provide for the tranquillity of the public, and place the Reformation on ſo firm a baſis, that it might be able to baffle all the attempts of its open and concealed enemies.

The attachment of Somerſet to the reformed religion was open and declared. Young Edward had imbibed the ſame principles. Many of the counſellors having profited by the deſtruction of the monaſteries, were now diſpoſed to plunder the ſecular clergy; and others were animated againſt them by the prejudices of opinion, rather than the proſpect of intereſt. Cranmer, who was a Proteſtant as well as the protector, being conſulted on the ſubject of advancing the reformation, recommended moderate meaſures. He obſerved, that it would be very dangerous to introduce a change of religion by violence and perſecution; that reaſon rather than force was the proper inſtrument for convincing mankind of their errors; and that the people ſhould be conducted to a change in religion by gradual and inſenſible innovations. He was alſo deſirous of letting the enthuſiaſm of the reformers grow weaker by time; becauſe the fervors of a new ſect always lead to ſuperſtition, and to a devotion too pure and ſpiritual to be adopted. The primate had already procured ſeveral of the beſt books written by the German divines againſt popery, to be tranſlated and publiſhed in England. The queen dowager, Catherine Parr, not only aſſiſted in publiſhing, but tranſlated great part of the paraphraſe of Eraſmus on the New Teſtament.

Cranmer's plan was readily adopted; and the protector, by virtue of a proclamation, to which the parliament had given the force of a law, ſuſpended, for a time, the exerciſe of the epiſcopal power, and appointed a general viſitation to be made of all the dioceſes in England. But thoſe who were charged with this duty were enjoined to proceed with the greateſt caution and prudence. The viſitors conſiſted of a mixture of clergy and laity, and had ſix circuits aſſigned them. They were enjoined to correct immoralities and irregularities in the clergy, wherever they were found; to aboliſh the ancient ſuperſtitions, and to bring the diſcipline and worſhip ſomewhat nearer the practice of the reformed churches. At the ſame time they were enjoined to retain, for the preſent, all images which had not been abuſed to idolatry; and to inſtruct the people not to deſpiſe ſuch ceremonies as were not yet abrogated; ſome particular ſuperſtitions only were to be retrenched, ſuch as the ſprinkling their beds with holy water, the ringing of bells, or uſing of bleſſed candles, in order to drive away the devil. By purſuing ſuch gentle methods the reformation proceeded without tumult or confuſion; the people were convinced of their errors without being ſeized with the ſpirit of enthuſiaſm; and parted gradually with their ancient ſuperſtitious practices, without throwing the government into convulſions. This viſitation was the firſt attempt to execute the deſign already formed for completing the reformation, which was only begun in the preceding reign.

The greateſt difficulty experienced by the viſitors, conſiſted in correcting the zeal of the catholic preachers, among whom were ſeveral old monks, who inveighed with all the force of bigotted and diſappointed zeal againſt the reformation. Orders were therefore iſſued to reſtrain them in the topics of their ſermons: twelve homilies were publiſhed, which they were enjoined to read to the people; and they were prohibited from preaching any where but in their own pariſh churches. In the mean time the proteſtant divines enjoyed an unbounded liberty by virtue of ſpecial licences, which were eaſily obtained. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, ſtrongly oppoſed theſe innovations, and particularly the homilies, which he repreſented as very improper, becauſe the delicate and myſterious points of juſtification and grace, were defined with the moſt metaphyſical preciſion. The knowledge of theſe tenets he aſſerted to be far above the comprehenſion of the vulgar, and therefore ſuperfluous to the generality of Chriſtians. One of the Calviniſtical writers is very angry with Gardiner for this oppoſition; he calls him "an inſenſible aſs, and one that had no feeling of God's ſpirit in the work of juſtification." It was a general opinion at this time, among the proteſtants, that they could penetrate into the depths of theſe profound myſteries; and therefore entertained a ſovereign contempt for all who confeſſed their ignorance of them. But though Gardiner oppoſed the homilies in particular, his objections were not ſolely confined to them: he remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt the great imprudence of making perpetual innovations, and on the neceſſity of adhering to ſome ſyſtem. "'Tis a dangerous thing, ſaid he, to uſe too much freedom, in reſearches of this kind. If you cut the old canal, the water is apt to flow farther than you intended. If you indulge the humour of novelty, you cannot put a ſtop to the people's demands, nor govern their indiſcretions at pleaſure." His remonſtrances had, however, no effect, the viſitors proceeded with great prudence in demoliſhing the ancient ſuperſtitions.

The whole attention of the protector was now turned towards proſecuting the war with Scotland. He aſſembled an army of eighteen thouſand men, and equipped a fleet of ſixty ſail, one half of which were ſhips of war, and the other loaded with ammunition and proviſions. The command of the fleet was given to lord Clinton; while he himſelf, aſſiſted by the earl of Warwick, lead the land forces. Alarmed at this powerful armament, the French ambaſſador applied, by orders from his court, to the regency, deſiring that a negotiation might be opened, in order, if poſſible, to reſtore peace between the two kingdoms, without the effuſion of human blood. The requeſt was complied with, and Tunſtal, biſhop of Durham, and Sir Thomas Rowe, were appointed to meet the Scottiſh commiſſaries at Newcaſtle, where the conferences were opened on the fourth of Auguſt. But the Engliſh plenipotentiaries refuſing to proceed in the negotiation, unleſs the marriage between the two ſovereigns was previouſly ſettled, and the Scottiſh commiſſioners declaring they had no power to conſent to the marriage, the negotiations became abortive, and the protector entered Scotland on the ſecond of September.

But before he commenced hoſtilities he publiſhed a manifeſto, in which he recapitulated the reaſons that induced the Engliſh to have recourſe to arms, and urged, by a variety of arguments, the expediency and even neceſſity of the marriage of the young queen of Scots and Edward being immediately concluded. Theſe arguments were drawn from the ſituation of the two kingdoms, which nature, by ſurrounding them by the ocean, ſeemed to have deſigned for one empire; from the ſimiliarity of the inhabitants in their laws, language, cuſtoms, and manners, whereby they were naturally adapted to be united, and to become one people; from the equality of the young king and queen, with regard to age and fortune; from the imminent danger to which Scotland was perpetually expoſed from the hoſtile attempts of a richer and moſt powerful neighbour; and from the many advantages that muſt reſult to the inhabitants of both kingdoms from living in a ſtate of peace and ſecurity. The protector added, that excluſive of theſe conſiderations, poſitive engagements had been made for concluding this alliance; and that the Scots were bound in honour to perform, what their intereſt and ſafety ſo ſtrongly demanded.

This manifeſto, however, produced not the intended effect: all the protector's remonſtrances were rendered abortive, by the arts and intrigues of the queen dowager of Scotland, who was warmly attached to the intereſt of France, and the Roman catholic religion. Somerſet therefore found himſelf obliged to have recourſe to arms, in order to compel the Scots to adopt a meaſure which no motives of policy or prudence could induce them to embrace. He accordingly continued his march towards Edinburgh without meeting with any oppoſition, except from a few caſtles, which were eaſily reduced.

The Scottiſh government had not, however, been idle; the earl of Arran had collected the whole force of the kingdom, and his army, which was double to that of the Engliſh in numbers, had taken poſt at Muſſelburgh, on a very advantageous ſpot of ground, ſecured by the banks of the river Eſke, about ſix miles from Edinburgh; while the Engliſh lay encamped at Preſton-Pans. In this ſituation ſeveral ſkirmiſhes paſſed between the light troops of each army, but without any thing deciſive; and Somerſet, finding it impoſſible to draw the Scots to an engagement ment, and fearing he ſhould ſoon be diſtreſſed for want of proviſions, ſent an herald to Arran, offering to abandon his enterprize, and to pay all the damages the Scots had ſuffered from his troops, provided he would give his promiſe, that the young queen ſhould not be given in marriage to any foreign prince, till ſhe reached the age of chuſing a huſband for herſelf. Theſe moderate terms induced the Scots to imagine that the Engliſh were intimidated, and that, if the enemy was attacked, the victory would be certain. The prieſts and monks, who had come to the camp in great numbers, laboured aſſiduouſly to propagate this opinion; adding, that they had now an opportunity of inflicting vengeance on their heretical enemy. A movement made by the Engliſh towards their ſhips, confirmed them in this opinion; and that the protector was going to embark his forces. Elated with this idea, and determined to cut off his retreat, they quitted their camp, croſſed the river Eſke, and advanced, with great precipitation, into the plain, where the Scottiſh regent drew up his army in three diviſions: the firſt, which conſiſted of the beſt troops, was commanded by the earl of Angus; the ſecond by the regent himſelf; and the third by the earl of Huntley. The earl of Argyle headed a body of Highland archers, who formed a guard to the artillery.

The protector was greatly pleaſed when he ſaw the Scots leave their advantageous camp; as he ſhould now have an opportunity of bringing on a deciſive action. He drew up his troops in two lines; the earl of Warwick commanded the firſt, and the protector himſelf the ſecond. The lord Grey of Wilton lead a reſerved body of cavalry, and had orders to fall upon the flank of the van of the Scottiſh army, as ſoon as they were engaged in cloſe fight with the firſt line of the Engliſh.

Such was the diſpoſition of both armies, when the Scots advanced to the charge; but a dreadful fire from the cannon of the ſhips threw the Highland archers into great confuſion, and even the whole van began to ſtagger. Lord Grey perceived the ſituation of the enemy, and could not reſiſt the opportunity of attacking them before they recovered from their ſurprize. But he ſoon perceived he had acted with too much precipitation. The ſpot occupied by the enemy was fallow land, broken ridges, and ſeparated from him by a ſlough and a ditch. Theſe impediments rendered the ſhock of his body of horſe feeble and irregular; and the Scottiſh infantry ſtanding firm, he was repulſed with conſiderable loſs; he himſelf was dangerouſly wounded; lord Edward Seymour, ſon to the protector, was unhorſed; and the Engliſh ſtandard in danger of being taken. But the earl of Warwick and the duke of Somerſet advanced with ſo much celerity to ſupport the Engliſh horſe, that they ſoon formed behind the infantry, and the battle now became general. The Engliſh artillery, planted on a neighbouring eminence, played full on one of their flanks, while the cannon of the ſhips galled them on the other; and the lord Grey, eager to repair his error, charged them in front with ſo much fury, that their firſt line gave way, and an orderly retreat was begun: but the Highland archers betaking themſelves to flight, ſpread a panic through the whole army; the retreat was changed into a precipitate flight, and the whole became one general ſcene of confuſion, terror, and conſternation. The braveſt of the Scots were put to the ſword, and the route and ſlaughter became ſo general, that from the field of battle to Edinburgh, the whole ground was covered with the dying and the dead. The prieſts and monks received no quarter, for having engaged in an enterprize ſo foreign to their profeſſion. Few victories have been more deciſive or more complete. Above ten thouſand periſhed in the engagement and purſuit, and about fifteen hundred ſurrendered themſelves priſoners. The Engliſh loſt not more than two hundred men. This action: which is known in hiſtory by the name of the Battle of Pinkey; from a nobleman's ſeat of that name in the neighbourhood, ſeemed to have put a period to oppoſition, and deſtroyed for ever the French intereſt in Scotland.

The regent fled with the queen dowager to Sterling-caſtle, and the Scottiſh army was ſo entirely diſſipated, that Arran found the utmoſt difficulty of checking the incurſions of ſmall parties of the Engliſh. The protector marched directly to Leith, which made no oppoſition; but he failed in his attempt againſt Edinburgh caſtle. He, however, plundered the town; while the fleet under lord Clinton, burnt all the places on the ſea coaſts, and took all the ſhipping in the frith of Forth. Had the duke purſued all the advantages of his late victory, he might have given law to the conquered. But a cabal having been raiſed againſt him at London, he haſtened his return, leaving Warwick with full powers to negociate a treaty with Arran, who had deſired leave to ſend commiſſioners for that purpoſe. The latter, however, meant only to gain time till ſuccours could arrive from France; and accordingly no Scottiſh commiſſioners appeared at the place appointed for the conferences.

When the protector arrived at London, he found that his brother Thomas, who had married Catherine Parr, the queen dowager, and had lately been created lord high-admiral of England, was become his greateſt oppoſer. He had not only joined in the cabals of his enemies, but alſo made ſeveral vigorous efforts to ſupplant him in the high poſt he enjoyed. He had already gained ſuch an aſcendancy over Edward, that he had perſuaded the king to write a letter with his own hand to the houſe of commons, recommending him to their choice as governor of the king's perſon. Though this attempt ſtruck at the foundation of the protector's greatneſs, he ſtill endeavoured to reclaim his brother by gentle and munificent methods; but finding he was ſtill determined to purſue his ſcheme, Somerſet found it neceſſary to ſummon a parliament, as the only authority that could ſupport him againſt the machinations of his brother.

But before the ſeſſion was opened he informed the council of the letter his brother had obtained from the young king, and which he propoſed to lay before the houſe at the meeting of the parliament. The council were alarmed at this circumſtance, and ſeveral lords were deputed to diſſuade the admiral from purſuing a ſcheme which might involve the government in diſtreſs, and ultimately terminate in his own deſtruction. But he continued firm to his purpoſe, till the council threatened to deprive him of all his poſts, commit him to the Tower, and indict him upon the ſtatute which made it death for any perſon to diſturb the eſtabliſhed government. Theſe menaces awakened his attention; he ſaw the conſequences that might reſult from his diſobeying the council, and thought proper to abandon his enterprize; but he was never thoroughly reconciled to his brother.

The late victory over the Scots had greatly raiſed the reputation of the protector, who now obtained a patent, appointing him to ſit on the throne, upon a ſtool or bench, on the right hand of the king, and to enjoy the ſame honours and privileges which had uſually been poſſeſſed by any princes of the blood, or uncles of the kings of England. Theſe honours were invidious to the old nobility, and created the duke many powerful enemies. But if the protector diſcovered his vanity and weakneſs in aſſuming ſo much ſtate and grandeur, he merited the higheſt applauſe on account of the laws, enacted through his influence in this ſeſſion of parliament; for by theſe the rigour of former ſtatutes was greatly mitigated, and ſome ſteps taken for ſecuring the liberties of the people. All laws were repealed which extended the crime of treaſon beyond the limits aſſigned it by the ſtatute of the twenty-fifth of Edward the third; together with all laws enacted during the late reign, for extending the crime of felony; all the former laws againſt the Lollards or heretics; and the bloody ſtatute of the ſix articles: no perſon was to be accuſed of words but within a month after they were ſpoken. That ſtatute which gave the force of laws to the king's proclamations, was alſo repealed. Thus were ſome of the moſt ſevere laws ever enacted in England totally abrogated, and the people began to flatter themſelves with the hopes of enjoying ſome ſhare of religious and civil liberty. Hereſy, however, ſtill continued to be a capital crime, and puniſhable by fire. But as there now remained no preciſe ſtandard by which that crime could be aſcertained, it entirely depended upon the rigour or lenity of the judges.

Several laws were enacted, which greatly contributed to promote the Reformation. The cup was reſtored to the laity; private maſſes were aboliſhed; the king was inveſted with the power of creating biſhops, without any election of the chapter; and all proceſſes in the biſhops courts, thoſe of Canterbury excepted, were to be carried on in the king's name, and ſealed by his ſeal, as in the courts of common law. But the moſt remarkable bill paſſed by this parliament, was that which gave the revenues of chauntries and colleges to the crown. The preamble to this ſtatute premiſes, that theſe funds ſhould be employed to good and godly uſes, in erecting grammar ſchools, in farther augmenting the revenues of the univerſities, and in making better proviſion for the poor and needy. But the rapacious courtiers had already, in their imaginations, devoured the prey; and it was not long before it was ſhared out among them. Cranmer, and ſeveral other prelates, were of opinion, that the revenues of the church, by the impropriation of tythes, and other methods of alienation, were already too much reduced. The primate, therefore, ſtrenuouſly oppoſed the bill, and was joined by the biſhops of London, Durham, Ely, Norwich, Hereford, Wincheſter, and Chicheſter: but notwithſtanding this oppoſition, it was paſſed into a law. By this act no fewer than two thouſand three hundred and ſeventy-four chauntries, colleges, and other religious foundations, fell to the crown.

A. D. 1548. Several alterations were now made in the ceremonies of the church. which increaſed the diſcontents of the Catholics. Orders were iſſued that candles ſhould not be carried about upon Candlemas-day, nor aſhes on Aſh-Wedneſday, nor palms on Palm-Sunday; that no images ſhould be ſuffered to remain in the churches; that auricular confeſſion ſhould be left free, and conſidered as indifferent. Theſe particulars ſtruck at the root of the Catholic religion; but ſtill the progreſs of the Reformation was greatly obſtructed among the people, by the ſermons delivered by the clergy of oppoſite ſentiments. Several attempts were made to remove this inconvenience; but theſe proving ineffectual, a total ſilence was impoſed upon all preachers in general, which put an end to all the polemics of the pulpit. But this reſtraint, from the very nature of things, could only be temporal. The protector reflected not, that in proportion as the ceremonies of public worſhip were retrenched, the people became the more deſirous of ſermons, which alone could ſupply the place of ſenſible objects. The Proteſtants in particular, who were fond of being addreſſed from the pulpit, remonſtrated ſtrongly againſt this injunction; and it was thought expedient to eſtabliſh a practice, which ſeems eſſentially connected with the very ſpirit of Chriſtianity.

Several of the Catholic party oppoſed theſe alterations in religion with all their power. Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, was at the head of this oppoſition, and defended his opinions with great boldneſs before the council. He laid before them the reaſons on which his oppoſition was founded with all the force of eloquence; and concluded his ſpeech in the following manner: "For my part, my ſole concern is to manage the third and laſt act of my life with decency, and to make a handſome exit off the ſtage. Provided this point is ſecured, I am not ſollicitous about the reſt. I am already, by nature, condemned to death: no man can give me a pardon from this ſentence, nor ſo much as procure me a reprieve. To ſpeak my mind freely, and to act as my conſcience directs me, are two branches of liberty I can never part with. Sincerity in ſpeech and integrity in action are entertaining qualities; they will ſtick by a man when every thing elſe takes its leave, and I muſt not reſign them upon any conſideration. The beſt of it is, if I do not throw them away myſelf, no man can force them from me; but if I give them up, then am I ruined by myſelf, and deſerve to loſe all my preferments." This oppoſition of Gardiner drew on him the indignation of the council, and he was committed to the Tower; an act of ſeverity which intimidated the Popiſh party, and no farther oppoſition was made to the new ordinances.

The Scots having ſent no commiſſioners to the conferences for a peace, the war was renewed, but without force or vigour. Talbot, earl of Shrewſbury, was ſent into Scotland, to command the Engliſh forces, in the character of lieutenant-general. In the mean time, the lord Grey of Wilton took and fortified Haddington, which made him maſter of the moſt fruitful part of Scotland, and whence he made excurſions to the very gates of Edinburgh. The Scots were in no condition to oppoſe the Engliſh, till the ſuccours from France landed at Leith about the beginning of June.

Theſe troops, which conſiſted of ſix thouſand men, under the command of Deſſé, revived the courage of the Scots, and the ſiege of Haddington was immediately undertaken. The Scots, who were only formidable in a deſultory war, were very unfit for this undertaking: even with the aſſiſtance of the French, they deſpaired of taking the place by aſſault, and depended entirely for ſucceſs upon the hopes of ſtarving the garriſon. They, however, repulſed ſeveral ſallies made by the beſieged, and ſhut them up cloſely within their fortifications.

While the army was employed in the ſiege of Haddington, the parliament were deliberating on the moſt proper method of preventing their young queen from falling into the hands of the Engliſh, as her marriage with Edward muſt be productive of an union between the two kingdoms. The earl of Huntley, who at firſt was diſpoſed to favour the propoſal of Somerſet, but had changed his opinion by the late violent meaſures purſued by the Engliſh, ſaid pleaſantly, "That he was not averſe to the match, but that he diſliked the manner in which the princeſs was courted." Several weighty reaſons were, however, urged, both for and againſt the marriage; but at laſt it was determined to ſend their young queen to France; and, what was underſtood to be the neceſſary conſequence, to marry her to the dauphin. She was accordingly embarked on board the French gallies, and after a tempeſtuous paſſage, arrived ſafely at Breſt; whence ſhe was conducted to Paris, and ſoon after betrothed to the dauphin. This event was a fatal blow to the projects of the protector, who now ſaw, that the marriage he was ſo deſirous of completing was now impoſſible.

The ſiege of Haddington was ſtill continued; and the Scots had the good fortune to ſurpriſe and cut off a party ſent to its relief, under the command of Sir Robert Bowes and Sir Thomas Palmer. But on the approach of the earl of Shrewſbury, at the head of twenty-two thouſand men, they raiſed the ſiege, and retired with great precipitation. Shrewſbury, however, made no attempt to diſtreſs the enemy; he contented himſelf with reinforcing the garriſon, and leaving a large ſupply of proviſions and ammunition in the place. This was effected without the leaſt oppoſition, and the earl immediately returned to England.

While the war was thus carrying on in Scotland, the protector was indefatigable in completing the Reformation. The public offices of the church were reviewed, a new catechiſm was publiſhed by Cranmer, and a new liturgy was received by the convocation, though not without a long and ſtrenuous debate. The parliament met on the twenty-fourth of November, and confirmed all the orders of council iſſued for the reformation of religion. Prieſts were permitted to marry, though the preamble to the act paſſed for that purpoſe expreſsly declared, that it were better for the prieſts and miniſters of the church to live chaſte, and without marriage; and it were much to be wiſhed they would of themſelves abſtain. The new liturgy, drawn up by a ſelect committee of biſhops and divines, was confirmed, and ordered to be uſed in all churches and chapels in the kingdom. This liturgy was nearly the ſame with that at preſent uſed in the Church of England.

But the attention of the protector was now diverted from promoting the progreſs of the Reformation. His brother had renewed his former practices, and carried them to a much greater length. The queen-dowager, his wife, had ſome time ſince died in child-bed; and he flattered himſelf with the hopes of eſpouſing the princeſs Elizabeth, who was then in her ſixteenth year, and ſeems to have liſtened to the inſinuations of a man poſſeſſed of every talent proper to captivate the affections of the fair. But as Henry VIII. had excluded his daughters from the ſucceſſion, if they married without the conſent of his executors, which Seymour could never hope to obtain; it was concluded, that he propoſed to effect his purpoſe by expedients ſtill more raſh and more criminal. He endeavoured to ſeduce the young king and the courtiers into his intereſt; he inveighed openly againſt his brother's adminiſtration; and he drew to him a great number of partizans from all the claſſes of the people. He could depend upon the attachment of ten thouſand of his ſervants and retainers, and had provided arms for their uſe.

A. D. 1549. The protector, informed of theſe particulars, attempted to bring him back to his duty and allegiance by gentle methods; but his attempts were in vain; he rejected every offer, and ſet his brother at defiance. Somerſet now laid the whole affair before the council; and a charge, conſiſting of thirty-three articles, was drawn up againſt him, and he was committed to the Tower. Dudley, earl of Warwick, ſon to the obnoxious miniſter of Henry VIII. was a perſon of great talents, which qualified him to ſhine both in the cabinet and the field. But all his virtues were obſcured by ſtill greater vices; an exorbitant ambition, an inſatiable avarice, a neglect of decency, a contempt of juſtice. Warwick happening to riſe to eminence on the ruin of the two brothers, determined to widen the breach between them; and engaged Somerſet to proceed with the utmoſt violence againſt his brother, lord Seymour. Commiſſioners were now ſent to interrogate him in priſon; but he refuſed to anſwer the captious queſtions that were put to him; deſired that his trial might proceed in the legal method; that the witneſſes might be confronted with him, and that the heads of his accuſation ſhould be laid before him. Theſe demands, however reaſonable in themſelves, were denied; the laws had long ſince yielded to force, and it was in vain to expect that the method of proceeding would now be altered. A bill of attainder was preferred againſt him, and paſſed without any material oppoſition in the Houſe of Lords. The Commons were more ſcrupulous: ſome of the members objected againſt the whole method of proceeding by bills of attainder paſſed in the abſence of the accuſed; and required that a formal trial ſhould be given to every man before his condemnation. This oppoſition alarmed the miniſtry. A meſſage was ſent from the king, requiring them to proceed; and offering, that the ſame narratives which had ſatisfied the lords ſhould be laid before them. This conceſſion produced the deſired effect; the bill paſſed in a very full houſe: near four hundred voted for it, and not above nine or ten againſt it. The royal aſſent was ſoon after given to the bill, and the admiral was beheaded. His behaviour on the ſcaffold was very undaunted; and he perſiſted, with his laſt breath, in declaring, that he had never committed, or intended to commit, any act of treaſon againſt the government. The protector was greatly blamed for proceeding in this manner againſt his brother, and denying to grant him a fair and impartial trial. But arbitrary judgments were become ſo common, that it is ſomething ſingular that the leaſt ſhadow of evidence ſhould be ſought for to juſtify the condemnation of thoſe who oppoſed either the court or the miniſter.

The new liturgy, though received and approved of by all that wiſhed well to the Reformation, yet met with very great oppoſition from the Catholic party. They were unwilling to abandon the tenets of their ancient religion, and exerted their whole intereſt to raiſe diſturbances in the nation. A great variety of opinions prevailed, and all attempts to reduce them to an uniformity were frivolous and vain. The government appointed commiſſioners to enquire after and examine the enemies to the new ritual; and if theſe were obſtinate, and refuſed to be converted, they were ordered to be delivered over to the ſecular arm, and puniſhed for their opinions. Several were proſecuted for their hereſy, but the greater part of them recanted, and were pardoned. A woman, named Joan Bocher, or Joan of Kent, who denied the incarnation of Chriſt, perſevered in her error, and was condemned to the flames. Cranmer, though of a mild diſpoſition, thought it neceſſary to puniſh her; and having engaged Edward to ſign her ſentence, the young monarch told him, with tears in his eyes, that if any wrong was done, the guilt ſhould be entirely on his head. Cranmer uſed every argument to reform the woman; but finding all his attempts abortive, he ſuffered the ſentence to be executed, and ſhe periſhed in the flames. Soon after, one Van Paris, a Dutchman, was condemned for having embraced the hereſy of Arius, and ſuffered with ſo much reſolution and fanatical zeal, that he embraced with tranſport the faggots which conſumed him. But theſe ſeverities were ill calculated for removing the evil; they tended rather to increaſe than exterminate hereſy. They produced, however, a temporary effect; a conformity to the new liturgy was eſtabliſhed, and the murmurs againſt the late innovations ſeemed to be lulled aſleep on the couch of forgetfulneſs. The princeſs Mary alone continued to adhere to the maſs, and abſolutely refuſed to admit the reformed modes of worſhip.

During the laſt ſeſſion of parliament, an act had paſſed the Houſe of Lords, for giving licence to every perſon to incloſe his own grounds, but had been thrown out by the Commons. Irritated at this oppoſition, the nobility determined to carry the project into execution, notwithſtanding their bill had proved abortive in parliament. This occaſioned an univerſal diſcontent among the lower claſs of people, who were perſuaded that a ſcheme was now formed for reducing them to an abſolute ſtate of ſlavery. Extreme indigence, to which they had been reduced by various cauſes, contributed to ſpread the flame of civil commotion into divers parts of the kingdom. The ſuppreſſion of the abbies and monaſteries, though doubtleſs of the utmoſt advantage to the nation in general, tended greatly to promote the oppreſſion of the poor and indigent. It not only deprived the idle of a reſource, but the peaſant and the farmer loſt a ſure market for the fruits of their labour. Beſides, the nobility, who were now become the owners of the church-lands, not only raiſed the rents of the farms, but alſo diſtreſſed the tenants by every method that avarice could invent. The woollen manufacture was carried to a great height in the Netherlands; and the large quantity of bullion imported from America, enabled the grandees of Spain to purchaſe the fineſt pieces of their cloth at very high prices. Hence the Engliſh wool found a ſure and advantageous market among the Flemings. The natural conſequence of this was, that the nobility turned their farms into paſture lands, and agriculture, which required the labours, and therefore afforded ſubſiſtence, to the huſbandmen, was neglected. Hence the tenants and labourers were conſidered as a burden; and a multitude of people were reduced to beggary. The poorer claſſes of men could neither maintain their cattle nor themſelves. What contributed ſtill farther to oppreſs them, was the adulteration of the coin, begun in the reign of Henry VIII. and continued by Somerſet to anſwer the neceſſities of the ſtate. In conſequence of this impolitic meaſure, the good coin was either hoarded up or exported; baſe metal only circulated, and the poor became unable to provide bread for their families. An alarming ſtagnation of commerce took place, and the loudeſt complaints reſounded from every part of England.

The protector, dreading the conſequences of this univerſal diſcontent, exerted himſelf to quiet the minds of the people. He publiſhed a pardon, even after the inſurgents had committed overt-acts of rebellion, and appointed commiſſioners to enquire into and redreſs their grievances. In conſequence of this, many of the incloſures were thrown down, and the nobility were exaſperated againſt the protector, while the people received very little mitigation of their ſufferings. The evil was of too complicated a nature to be eaſily redreſſed. The inhabitants of almoſt every county of England gave indications of their being ready to take up arms, and procure by open violence the neceſſaries of life, which they could not obtain by their labour. In Devonſhire and Norfolk, the ſpirit of rebellion threatened the moſt fatal conſequences.

A prieſt of Stamford-Courtney, had the addreſs to give the diſturbances in the weſt of England, a religious turn, and fed the flame of diſcontent by every artifice which a miſguided zeal could inſpire. This artful change of the ſubject from temporal to religious objects, increaſed the number of the inſurgents, and many of the gentry, particularly Humphrey Arundel, governor of St. Michael's Mount, joined the populace. They were now formed into a kind of regular army, amounting to near ten thouſand men. Lord Ruſſel, who commanded a ſmall body of forces in Devonſhire, being unable to meet the rebels in the field, had recourſe to negotiation. But they inſiſted on the moſt extravagant articles, declaring that they would never lay down their arms till they were granted. They demanded, that all the general councils and ancient canons of the church ſhould be obſerved: that the law of the ſix articles ſhould be executed: that the maſs ſhould be ſaid in latin, and the prieſt alone receive the euchariſt: that the hoſt ſhould be elevated and worſhipped, and that thoſe who refuſed to perform that adoration ſhould ſuffer as heretics: that the ſacrament ſhould be only adminiſtered to the people at Eaſter, in one kind: that baptiſm ſhould be adminiſtered at all times, and at any ſeaſons: that holy bread, holy water, and palms, ſhould again be uſed, and all the images reſtored, together with all the ancient ceremonies: that the new liturgy ſhould be laid aſide, and both the old offices and the proceſſions, be reſtored: that all preachers before their ſermons, and prieſts in their celebrating maſs, ſhould pray for the ſouls in purgatory: that the people ſhould be forbid to read the bible: that every gentleman ſhould be reſtrained from having more than one ſervant for every hundred marks of yearly income: and that half the abbey-lands ſhould be taken from the preſent poſſeſſors, and adjudged to two of the chief abbeys in each county.

Theſe demands were received by the regency with that contempt they deſerved; and as ſoon as the rebels found they were rejected, they determined to have recourſe to arms in order to force a compliance from the government. Accordingly they marched directly to Exeter, carrying before them croſſes, banners, holy water, candleſticks, and other implements of the ancient ſuperſtition; together with the hoſt, placed on a canopy. The ſiege of the city was formed on the ſecond of July; but as the rebels were wholly deſtitute of cannon, they were repulſed in every attempt to take the place by ſtorm. The citizens were, however, ſoon reduced to extremity; but they held out till they were relieved. The lord Grey having joined the lord Ruſſel with a conſiderable body of forces, they advanced againſt the rebels, who were totally routed. Many of the inſurgents were executed by martial law. Arundel, and the other leaders were ſent to London, where they ſuffered for their crimes. The prieſt of Stamford-Courtney was hanged on the top of his own tower, dreſſed in the popiſh robes of his order, and a chaplet of beads ſuſpended at his girdle.

But this defeat did not in the leaſt intimidate the rebels in Norfolk. They were headed by one Ket, a tanner, who exerciſed his authority with the utmoſt inſolence and outrage. They were more numerous than the weſtern rebels, their number being at leaſt twenty thouſand. Intoxicated with power, Ket made the moſt exhorbitant pretenſions. He demanded that the gentry ſhould be ſuppreſſed; that new counſellors ſhould be placed about the king; and that the ancient rites of religion ſhould be re-eſtabliſhed. Theſe demands being rejected, the inſurgents marched to Norwich, and took poſt at Mouſhold-hill, which overlooks the city. Here Ket, who affected great auſterity, and regularity of conduct, erected his tribunal under an old oak, thence called the oak of reformation. Here he iſſued his ordinances, and committed a thouſand enormities, under pretence of redreſſing ſome abuſes.

Somerſet endeavoured to heal theſe diſorders by lenient methods; but the rebels having refuſed, with the moſt provoking inſolence, a pardon which was offered them, it was determined to reduce them by force. The marquis of Northampton was accordingly ſent againſt them, with about a thouſand Engliſh infantry, and a body of Italian horſe. But the marquis advancing to Norwich, contrary to his orders, his forces were routed with the loſs of about an hundred men, among whom was John lord Sheffield. This defeat alarmed the government, and the king propoſed to ſend Somerſet at the head of a powerful army, in order to cruſh the rebels before their numbers increaſed to a more formidable number. But the protector, who affected popularity, choſe not to appear in perſon againſt the rebels; but diſpatched the earl of Warwick, at the head of ſix thouſand men levied for carrying on the war againſt Scotland. Warwick marched with the utmoſt expedition, and came up with the inſurgents at Duſſingale. A bloody engagement enſued, in which the rebels were totally defeated, and above two thouſand of them ſlain on the ſpot. Ket was hanged on the walls of Norwich caſtle, his brother on the top of Windham ſteeple, and nine of his principal followers on the boughs of the oak of reformation. This defeat intimidated the rebels of Yorkſhire, where a conſiderable party were already in arms. The ſucceſs of Ket had animated them to purſue the ſame meaſures for obtaining redreſs of their grievances; and his defeat ſtruck them with deſpair: they threw down their arms and obtained a pardon.

But though the royal authority acquired ſtrength by the ſuppreſſion of theſe rebellions, they proved very detrimental to the king's affairs in foreign countries. The forces deſtined for Scotland were detained in England; and M. de Thermes landing there with freſh ſuccours from France, he had leiſure to reduce the diſtracted ſtate of that unhappy country to ſome order. He took the caſtle of Boughtry, and put the whole garriſon to the ſword. Haddington, however, held out againſt all his efforts, and it was determined to reduce the place by famine. But this was not eaſily effected, ſupplies were continually thrown into the place during the ſummer, ſo that all his efforts proved abortive. At laſt winter effected what his whole power could not perform. The inclemency of the weather was an obſtacle not to be ſurmounted by the Engliſh. The earl of Rutland, warden of the Eaſt Marches, received orders to diſmantle the place. He accordingly marched thither at the head of a ſtrong body of forces, demoliſhed the fortifications, and brought off the garriſon. Nothing was now left to the Engliſh of all their conqueſts in Scotland, except the caſtles of Lauder, Douglas, Eymouth, and Roxburgh.

Nor were theſe all the ill conſequences that reſulted from the late commotions. Henry II. of France, encouraged by the inteſtine troubles of England, made an effort to execute his favourite ſcheme of recovering Boulogne. The court had for ſome time been apprehenſive that he had formed that deſign, and ſent over ſecretary Paget to the court of Charles V. in order to conclude an alliance with that powerful monarch. But Charles having formed a deſign of extending his dominions by acting the part of a champion for the catholic religion, liſtened not to the advances made by the court of England for entering into a ſtrict confederacy. In the mean time Henry II. entered the territory of Boulogne at the head of a numerous army, took ſeveral caſtles, equipped a powerful fleet, and attempted a deſcent on the iſlands of Guernſey and Jerſey; but a ſquadron of the Engliſh ſhips being immediately fitted out, fell upon the enemy, and drove them from the iſlands with the loſs of above a thouſand men.

Diſappointed in receiving the expected aſſiſtance from the emperor, Somerſet was deſirous of concluding a peace with France and Scotland; eſpecially as he was in no condition to ſupport the neceſſary expences, and had experienced the difficulties and dangers that attended miniſters in demanding and raiſing new ſubſidies: at the ſame time, he was determined to complete the great work of the Reformation ſo ſucceſsfully begun. He therefore determined to ſacrifice Boulogne, in order to gain the friendſhip and aſſiſtance of Henry. But when he propoſed the reſtitution of that place in the council, he met with the ſtrongeſt oppoſition from his enemies; who knowing he was in no condition to carry on the war, were determined, for that very reaſon, to oppoſe every meaſure that had any tendency to procure a pacification, and to embrace the firſt opportunity that offered for depriving him of his dignity.

The unbounded authority enjoyed by Somerſet expoſed him to danger. The haughtineſs of his carriage, his ambition, the contempt he expreſſed for all thoſe who refuſed to be directed by his ſentiments, joined to the conſideration of his limited and inferior capacity, irritated daily the diſcontented. Warwick, the moſt powerful, and therefore the moſt dangerous of his enemies. formed a very formidable party againſt him. He had provoked the nobility and gentry by the preference he had ſhewn the people with regard to the incloſures, and the commotions that followed: they even dreaded a renewal of the ſame diſorders from his preſent affectation of popularity. He had created a court of requeſts in his own houſe for the benefit of the poorer claſs of people, and readily embraced every meaſure calculated to promote their intereſt and ſafety. But tho' Somerſet courted the affections of the people, his power among them was not conſiderable: the popiſh party, which ſtill formed a principal part of the illiterate commonalty, were his inveterate enemies, and readily embraced every opportunity to condemn his conduct. All his actions were miſrepreſented; he was reproached with the execution of his own brother; a crime ſo unnatural in the eyes of mankind in general, that he was repreſented as a monſter rather than a human being. Add to this the great parade he made of his wealth in erecting that magnificent palace in the Strand, which ſtill bears his name; the pariſh church of St. Mary, and three biſhops houſes, having been pulled down, to furniſh ground and materials for that ſtructure. Theſe imprudent and impolitic actions had given Somerſet's enemies too many advantages over him; they magnified all his imprudences into crimes.

After ſeveral complaints, diſputes, and fruitleſs treaties for an accommodation, the lord St. John, preſident of the council, the earls of Warwick, Southampton, and Arundel, with five other counſellors, met, on Sunday the ſixth of October, at Ely-Houſe, where the earl of Warwick reſided; and aſſuming to themſelves the whole power of the council, ſent for the lord mayor and aldermen of London; and after arraigning the protector's conduct, and charging him with the moſt enormous crimes, commanded them to obey no orders but ſuch as were iſſued by themſelves. Informed of this ſeparate meeting, the king ſent ſecretary Petre to know the reaſon for ſo uncommon a proceeding. He was very readily admitted, but not ſuffered to depart till they had deliberated on the ſtate of the nation.

Somerſet, on being informed of this defection of the counſellors, removed the king from Hampton-Court to Windſor-Caſtle; and arming his friends and ſervants, ſeemed determined to defend himſelf againſt his enemies. But finding that Cranmer and Paget were the only perſons of rank that adhered to him, that he was abandoned by his partizans, and that the people did not ſeem to intereſt themſelves in his favour, he loſt all hopes of ſucceſs, and offered to ſubmit to the deciſions of the council, provided they would promiſe to treat him with candour. This was promiſed him. He was, however, ſent to the Tower, with ſome of his friends and adherents; among whom was Cecil, afterwards ſo famous in the reign of queen Elizabeth. On the fourteenth of October, he was brought before the council, and articles of accuſation exhibited againſt him, of which the following were the chief: That he had not obſerved the conditions on which he had been made protector: that he had treated with ambaſſadors, without notifying it to the council; and had, by his own authority, diſpoſed of governments and biſhoprics: that he had held a court of requeſts in his own houſe: that he had debaſed the coin: that he had iſſued proclamations in the affair of incloſures, contrary to the opinion of the whole council: that he had not taken care to ſuppreſs the late inſurrections; but had, on the contrary, ſupported and encouraged them: that he had occaſioned the loſs of the forts in the territory of Boulogne, by neglecting to furniſh them with proviſions and ammunition: that he had endeavoured to inſtil into the king a bad opinion of his counſellors, by perſuading him they intended to deſtroy him: that he had cauſed the lords of the council to be proclaimed traitors: that he had maliciouſly, not only put the king in great fear, by carrying him ſo ſuddenly to Windſor, but thrown him into a dangerous diſeaſe: that he had armed himſelf and his ſervants; and that he intended to fly to Guernſey or Jerſey.

As the duke had received no previous notice of theſe articles, he was not prepared to give his anſwer, and was therefore remanded back to the Tower. The marquis of Northampton, the earls of Warwick and Southampton, the lords St. John, Ruſſel, and Wentworth, were appointed governors of the king's perſon; and the principal adminiſtration of the government entruſted with the earl of Warwick, but without any title that might give him the leaſt authority over the other counſellors. A revocation of the protector's power was alſo publiſhed under the great ſeal. But all the arts of Warwick could not perſuade the well-meaning part of the council to believe the duke guilty of any thing intentionally bad, either againſt the king or the conſtitution of his country: they indeed thought him too obnoxious to the landed intereſt of England, to continue longer at the head of affairs; and therefore willingly engaged in meaſures for removing him from the ſeat of power, as well as for excluding him from ever regaining it for the future.

The Catholic party greatly exulted at the fall of the protector. They flattered themſelves that Warwick, who was always conſidered as a friend to the Romiſh religion, would reſtore the ancient faith and mode of worſhip; but they were miſtaken. Warwick always made religion ſubſervient to his intereſt; and knowing that the king had imbibed a ſtrong attachment to the Proteſtant doctrines, he was reſolved not to oppoſe his inclinations, nor forfeit his own power by purſuing any violent meaſures. He accordingly declared his intention to promote the Reformation; and ſo ſtrongly oppoſed the meaſures of Southampton, who was conſidered as the head of the Catholics, that he retired from court in diſguſt, and ſoon after died of vexation. Several other changes were alſo made in the council; but they all tended to convince the Romaniſts, that they had nothing to expect for their having been inſtrumental in the fall of the duke of Somerſet. The earl of Warwick was made lord-high-admiral of England; the lord St. John was created earl of Wiltſhire, and made treaſurer, in the room of the duke of Somerſet; Wootton, ſecretary of ſtate, in the room of Smith; Ruſſel was created earl of Bedford; the marquis of Northampton obtained the office of great chamberlain; and lord Wentworth, beſides the office of chamberlain of the houſhold, obtained the two large manors of Stepney and Hackney, which had been torn from the ſee of London.

Somerſet wanted ſpirit to ſupport his diſgrace with dignity; and he was prevailed upon to confeſs, on his knees, before the council, all the articles of the charge exhibited againſt him; a ſubmiſſion that diſgraced him in the eyes of the nation. The parliament deprived him of all his offices, and condemned him in a large fine. But Warwick thinking he had now ſufficiently humbled the haughty Somerſet, and that his abject behaviour had effectually deſtroyed the ſmall remains of his authority, he readmitted him into the council; and even agreed to an alliance between their families, by the marriage of his ſon, lord Dudley, with the lady Jane Seymour, daughter to Somerſet.

A. D. 1550. But though Warwick and his aſſociates had ſo ſtrenuouſly oppoſed a peace with France when propoſed by Somerſet, they changed their opinion when they had no longer the ſame motives for their oppoſition: they were now convinced that a peace was abſolutely neceſſary, and a negotiation was accordingly entered into with Henry's miniſters. But the French king, even at the opening of the conferences, declared, that he would not pay the penſions ſtipulated by his predeceſſor, being determined not to be tributary to any monarch upon earth. He, however, offered to pay a ſum of money for the immediate reſtitution of Boulogne; and it was accordingly agreed to ſurrender the place for four hundred thouſand crowns; one half to be paid immediately, and the other at the end of ſix months. Scotland was included in this treaty; and it was ſtipulated, that the Engliſh ſhould reſtore Lauder and Douglas, and demoliſh the fortreſſes of Roxburgh and Eymouth.

This peace was celebrated with great rejoicings, though it was very far from being agreeable to the people. The reſtitution of Boulogne, which had been conſidered as ſo great a crime even to have propoſed it, in the duke of Somerſet, opened the eyes of the people: they were now convinced, that the ambition of the courtiers, not any regard for the glory of the king and the welfare of the nation, had raiſed the ſtorm that had ſwept Somerſet from the ſeat of power. The murmurs became general, and ſoon reached the ears of the aſpiring Warwick, who, to divert the public attention, and prevent their reſentment from proving fatal to the adminiſtration, undertook the popular office of enquiring into certain miſdemeanors of thoſe who had been intruſted with the management of the public money, ſome of whom were ſeverely puniſhed.

Warwick had already declared his deſign to complete the Reformation, and he now began to carry his promiſe into execution. Several biſhops, though they had extended their complaiſance very far with regard to the meaſures of the court, were ſtill friends to the tenets of the Roman church, and it was now determined to ſeize their revenues. The proſecution was begun with the famous Gardiner, biſhop of Wincheſter, who, in ſeveral inſtances, had rendered himſelf obnoxious to the adminiſtration. He was required to acknowledge his former miſbehaviour, and confeſs the juſtice of his confinement; to own that the king was ſupreme head of the church; that the power of making and diſpenſing with holidays was part of the prerogative; that the common-prayer-book was a godly and commendable form; that the king was a complete ſovereign in his minority; that the ſtatute of the ſix articles was juſtly repealed; and that the king had full authority to correct and reform what was amiſs in eccleſiaſtical diſcipline. The biſhop made no difficulty of ſigning all theſe articles, except the firſt. He maintained, that his conduct had always been inoffenſive; and declared, that he would never own himſelf guilty of faults he had not committed. But the council, who never intended to accept of any acknowledgment, multiplied articles in proportion to his ſubmiſſion. At laſt, the prelate, from a dread of totally diſhonouring his former conduct by mean compliances, determined to act with vigour. He refuſed to ſubſcribe any articles they might preſent to him, and was depoſed from his ſee by a commiſſion appointed for that purpoſe. Several other biſhops, much leſs ſuſpected and obnoxious than Gardiner, underwent the ſame fate; as Day, biſhop of Chicheſter; Heathe, of Worceſter; and Vaiſy, of Exeter.

Nor were theſe plunderers of the church contented with the revenues of the prieſthood; they extended their rapacity to objects of much ſmaller importance. The council iſſued an order for purging the libraries of all ſuperſtitious books, and all that were plated with gold and ſilver were condemned for their ornaments. If they were books of literature, they were deſtroyed, as uſeleſs; if of mathematics, geometry, or aſtronomy, they were ſuppoſed to be infected with magic. The libraries of Oxford ſuffered the utmoſt outrage; nor had the univerſity power to oppoſe theſe barbarous violences; they even feared that their revenues would attract the rapacity of the earl of Warwick. The princeſs Mary herſelf was expoſed to the utmoſt danger: ſhe was required to change her religion, or at leaſt to read St. Auguſtin and the ancient fathers, who would convince her of the errors of popery. But Mary was inſenſible to all theſe remonſtrances. She was, however, alarmed for her own ſafety, and formed a plan for making her eſcape to the court of Charles V. but her deſign was diſcovered, and prevented. The emperor, however, made ſtrong repreſentations in her behalf: he even threatened to commence hoſtilities, if liberty of conſcience was refuſed her. His remonſtrances had the deſired effect: it was not thought adviſeable to plunge the nation into a war on ſo ſlight an occaſion; and Edward, who had imbibed the utmoſt deteſtation for the idolatrous worſhip of the Catholics, lamented with tears the obſtinacy of his ſiſter, and his own misfortune in being obliged to tolerate her errors.

A. D. 1551. The ſweating ſickneſs, which now raged in England, ſwept away great numbers of the inhabitants. Several of the nobility alſo felt the dreadful effects of this alarming contagion; among whom were the duke of Suffolk and his brother. By the death of theſe two noblemen, the title of duke of Suffolk became extinct in the family of Brandon, which was next in ſucceſſion to the crown after the two daughters of Henry VIII. The earl of Warwick, who ſeems already to have formed the deſign of placing his own family on the throne, immediately procured Henry Grey, marquis of Dorſet, to be created duke of Suffolk. The laſt earl of Northumberland died without iſſue; and Sir Thomas Piercy, his brother, having been attainted on account of the ſhare he had in the Yorkſhire inſurrection, during the late reign, the title was extinct, and the eſtate was veſted in the crown. Warwick, therefore, procured for himſelf thoſe ample poſſeſſions which lay in the north, the moſt warlike part of the kingdom; and was dignified with the title of duke of Northumberland. Lord St. John, the treaſurer, was created marquis of Wincheſter, and Sir William Herbert, earl of Pembroke; William Cecil was knighted, and made ſecretary of ſtate, and Sir Robert Dudley, one of Northumberland's ſon, was ſworn one of the ſix ordinary gentlemen of the king's bedchamber.

Several excellent regulations were now made for the benefit of commerce, and reſtoring the coin of the kingdom to its proper ſtandard. Almoſt the whole commerce of the realm had hitherto been carried on by ſtrangers. Henry the third had created into a corporation, and inveſted with particular privileges, all the merchants of the Hanſe towns; and the council, ſenſible of the prejudices done by this means to the national induſtry, ſuppreſſed the grant; and all foreigners whatever, from this period, being obliged to pay the ſame duties, the Engliſh turned their attention to commerce, and a ſpirit of induſtry began to appear in the kingdom. But all theſe pleaſing attempts were in danger of being rendered abortive by the civil commotions, excited by the unbounded ambition of the duke of Northumberland, who conſidered all increaſe of titles or poſſeſſions, either to himſelf or his adherents, only as ſteps to farther acquiſitions; and perceiving the duke of Somerſet, though deprived of his dignity, and even greatly leſſened in the public eſteem by his late puſillanimous conduct, ſtill preſerved a conſiderable degree of popularity, he reſolved to ruin a man, whom he conſidered as the chief obſtacle to his ambitious projects.

The alliance ſo lately concluded between their families had been productive of no cordial union; it only afforded Northumberland an opportunity of effecting, with more eaſe and certainty, the deſtruction of his rival. He began his infamous deſign by alienating the affections of the young king from his uncle, whom he repreſented as a very dangerous ſubject: he ſpread a report, that Somerſet had cauſed himſelf to be proclaimed king in ſeveral counties, and that he was preparing an armed force to make himſelf maſter of his majeſty's perſon. At the ſame time he continually offered him freſh inſults, in order to provoke him to commit imprudent actions; and had gained over many of the friends and ſervants of that unfortunate nobleman to his intereſt. Thus provoked, the unguarded Somerſet let fall ſome menacing expreſſions againſt Northumberland, and his treacherous confidents carried to his enemy every paſſionate word that dropped from him; they even revealed the ſchemes which they themſelves ſuggeſted. The king was informed of theſe pretended diſcoveries, and by too readily believing the ſlanderous tales, he abandoned his uncle, and conſented to his being put under arreſt.

The treacherous and hypocritical Northumberland having thus obtained his majeſty's permiſſion, the duke of Somerſet, the lord Grey, David and John Seymour, Hammond and Newdigate, two of the duke's ſervants, Sir Ralph Vane, and Sir Thomas Palmer, were all apprehended the ſame night, and committed to priſon. The next day the dutcheſs of Somerſet, with her two favourites, Crane and his wife, Sir Miles Patridge, Sir Michael Stanhope, Baniſter, and others, were taken into cuſtody. Sir Thomas Palmer, who had acted as a ſpy upon the duke's actions, charged him with having formed a deſign "to excite a rebellion in the north; to attack the horſe-guards on a muſter-day; to take poſſeſſion of the Tower; and to raiſe an inſurrection in London." But the only accuſation that ſeemed to have ſome truth for its foundation was, that he had formed a deſign to murder the duke of Northumberland, the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Pembroke, at an entertainment that was to be made for them at lord Paget's. Crane and his wife corroborated Palmer's evidence with regard to the laſt ſcheme; and it appears that ſome raſh deſign of that nature had been propoſed, though no regular plot had ever been formed, nor any meaſures taken for its execution.

The duke's trial came on before his peers at Weſtminſter-hall, on the firſt of December, the marquis of Wincheſter preſiding as high-ſteward. He denied the charge, and demanded to be confronted with his accuſers; but this requeſt, however equitable, was denied, and the court proceeded to the trial. The depoſitions of the witneſſes as given before the privy-council, were delivered in to the jury, but they were neither produced in court, nor confronted with the priſoner. The duke's defence was, however, ſo ſatiſfactory with regard to the treaſonable part of the charge, that the peers gave a verdict in his favour; but they found him guilty of the other part of the charge, and he was condemned to ſuffer as a felon, purſuant to a ſtatute paſſed in the reign of Henry VII. declaring it felony for any perſon to form a deſign of killing a privy-counſellor.

A. D. 1552. The behaviour of Somerſet, from the time he received his ſentence, was calm, reſigned, and unaffected; he employed his time in reading and compoſing exerciſes of devotion. He made decent application to the king in favour of his wife and family, and on the twenty-ſecond of January he was carried to the ſcaffold on Tower-hill, where he was to ſuffer. He was attended on this melancholy occaſion by Dr. Cox; and after performing ſome devotions, he addreſſed himſelf in a ſpeech to the people, in which he declared his innocence with regard to the king, and his fidelity to his country: he ſubmitted to his ſentence, becauſe awarded by the law: he profeſſed his zeal and affection for the proteſtant religion, and a ſincere ſatiſfaction in what he had done to promote it. He expreſſed the higheſt regard for the perſon of the king; he exhorted the people to pay both him and the council the moſt implicit obedience: declared he died in peace with all mankind; aſked pardon of all whom he had offended; and requeſted the prayers of all preſent. On finiſhing his ſpeech, he adjuſted himſelf with the utmoſt calmneſs on the block, where he received the blow which put a period to his life.

A dreadful groan ran through the whole audience when the fatal ſtroke was given. Many ruſhed in and dipped their handkerchiefs in his blood, which they preſerved as a precious relic; and ſeveral of them, when Northumberland, ſome time after, met a ſimilar fate, upbraided him with this cruelty, and diſplayed before his eyes theſe ſymbols of his crime. Somerſet certainly deſerved a better fate. He was a perſon of great virtues, eminent for his piety; courteous and affable, ſincere and candid in all his tranſactions, a patron of the poor and oppreſſed; but a much better general than a counſellor. The faults he committed were owing to weakneſs, not to any bad intention. He was never accuſed of perſonal vices, nor guilty of falſhood, of perverting juſtice, of cruelty, or of oppreſſion.

Sir Ralph Vane, a brave old ſoldier, and Sir Miles Patridge were hanged; and Sir Michael Stanhope, with Sir Thomas Arundel, beheaded, as the duke's confederates; but ſtrenuouſly denied, in their laſt moments, the crime for which they ſuffered. Lord Paget, chancellor of the dutchy of Somerſet, was deprived of his office, and condemned to pay a fine of ſix thouſand pounds; and lord Rich, lord high chancellor, was alſo deprived of the ſeals, for having ſent a letter to Somerſet, informing him of the deſigns of the council.

The parliament, which met on the twenty-third of January, paſſed ſeveral bills both of a civil and religious nature; but the moſt remarkable was that which regarded the crime of treaſon; to which the commons annexed a clauſe of infinitely more conſequence than the bill itſelf. It was declared, "That none ſhould be attainted of treaſon on this act, unleſs two witneſſes ſhould come, and to their face aver the fact for which they were to be tried, except ſuch as ſhould make a voluntary confeſſion; and that none ſhould be queſtioned for any thing ſaid or written againſt the king or government, but within three months after it was done." This equitable and conſtitutional clauſe was ſtrongly oppoſed by all Northumberland's faction, as it totally condemned their late proceedings in the caſe of the unfortunate duke of Somerſet; but notwithſtanding all their arts, it paſſed both houſes, and has ever ſince remained one of the chief bulwarks of Engliſh liberty.

Tonſtal, biſhop of Durham, was one of the moſt eminent prelates of that age, both on account of his learning and abilities, and the unblemiſhed integrity of his life. He had always oppoſed by his vote and influence, all the late innovations in religion; but they were no ſooner eſtabliſhed, than he had readily ſubmitted, and conformed himſelf to every ſyſtem of doctrine which was eſtabliſhed by authority. He juſtly concluded, that all private opinions ought to be ſacrificed to the great concerns of public peace and tranquillity. But neither his obedient and tractable conduct, nor the unimpeached rectitude of his life and morals, could ſecure him againſt the rapacious deſigns of Northumberland, who had formed a deſign of appropriating to himſelf the ample revenues of the ſee of Durham, and of acquiring a principality in the northern counties. But before this deſign could be executed, it was neceſſary to deprive Tonſtal of his biſhopric. A bill of attainder was therefore brought into the houſe of lords, where it paſſed with only two diſſenting voices, Cranmer and lord Stourton. But when the bill was ſent down to the commons, they inſiſted that witneſſes ſhould be examined, in order to prove the charge againſt him; that the biſhop ſhould be confronted with his accuſers and be permitted to ſpeak in his own defence. Theſe equitable demands were refuſed, and the commons nobly exerted the power with which they were intruſted, and threw out the bill. This oppoſition of the commons, ſo unuſual in that age, convinced Northumberland that he had nothing to hope for from their condeſcenſion, and every thing to fear from their oppoſition. It was therefore reſolved to diſſolve the parliament, which had ſubſiſted from the beginning of the preſent reign.

A. D. 1553. The utmoſt pains were taken to procure a parliament more ſubſervient to the adminiſtration than the laſt. Accordingly the king wrote circular letters to all his ſheriffs, requiring them to return ſuch members as would ſerve the court; an example of the moſt fatal tendency, as the freedom of elections was a very eſſential part of the national liberty. The labours of the court were not in vain; the parliament anſwered all the expectations that were formed of it; no oppoſition was made to the meaſures of the adminiſtration. Tonſtal had, during the receſs of parliament, been depoſed by lay commiſſioners, and the ſentence was now confirmed by the parliament, who divided the ſee of Durham into two biſhoprics; but the dignity of an earl palatine was veſted in the king, who gave it to Northnmberland. They alſo gave the miniſtry another mark of their attachment; they granted the king two ſubſidies and two fifteenths. Edward himſelf was a great œconomiſt; but the rapacity of his courtiers was ſo inſatiable, that notwithſtanding the plunder of the churches, colleges, and hoſpitals, the fall of the many manors that belonged to them, and the four hundred thouſand crowns received from France, for the reſtitution of Boulogne, the debt of the crown amounted to three hundred thouſand pounds ſterling.

During the ſpring of the preceding year Edward had been ſeized with the meaſles, and afterwards with the ſmall-pox, but paſſed through both without any dangerous ſymptoms, and his health had ſome time been fully re-eſtabliſhed, when he was ſeized with a cough, which ended in a conſumption. It was, however, hoped that the king's youth, the approach of ſpring, and the medicines adminiſtered by his phyſicians, would by degrees get the better of his diſorder; but it proved of too malignant a nature, and increaſed ſo faſt, that when the parliament met in the beginning of March, both houſes were obliged to attend him at Whitehall, to hear the reaſons for their being called together.

Northumberland perceived that it was now neceſſary to complete the deſign he had formed for placing his own family on the throne of England. He therefore ſuffered none but his own creatures to approach the royal perſon. At the ſame time he affected the moſt anxious concern for the young monarch's health and recovery. By theſe hypocritical expreſſions of duty, he ſoon gained the firſt place in the affections and confidence of young Edward. This point being gained, the next was to prevail upon the king to alter the ſucceſſion. Edward, who was ſincerely attached to the proteſtant religion, had often expreſſed his dread of the fatal conſequences that would inevitably attend its profeſſors, if ſo bigotted a catholic as his ſiſter Mary ſhould ever aſcend the throne. Northumberland improved theſe melancholy reflections, and artfully inſinuated, that the only method of averting thoſe dreadful misfortunes from the profeſſors of the new religion, conſiſted in changing the ſucceſſion. He added that the king poſſeſſed the ſame power with his father, and might therefore transfer the crown from the princeſs Mary to the lady Jane Grey, eldeſt daughter to Frances Brandon, now dutcheſs of Suffolk. Obſerving, at the ſame time, that the princeſs Elizabeth muſt inevitably ſhare the fate of her ſiſter; becauſe the only pretence they could uſe againſt Mary was her illegitimacy, which equally affected Elizabeth, the marriages both of Catherine and Anne having been declared unlawful by the legiſlature.

Edward, whoſe prevailing paſſion was the intereſt of the reformed religion, was pleaſed with this expedient. He knew the lady Jane to be a perſon equally diſtinguiſhed for the accompliſhments of her mind and perſon: ſtrongly attached to the reformed religion, a friend to virtue, and a lover of her country. He therefore determined to leave the crown to that accompliſhed princeſs; eſpecially as her mother had been expreſsly mentioned in the will of Henry VIII. as heir to the throne after his own children.

It was now neceſſary for Northumberland to finiſh the other part of his political fabric, in order to ſettle the crown on his own family. This was effected by perſuading the duke of Suffolk to give his daughter the lady Jane Gray, in marriage to his fourth ſon, the lord Guildford Dudley. Suffolk, who owed all his preferments to Northumberland, heſitated not to form the offered alliance. This being effected, Northumberland determined to ſtrengthen his intereſt by other marriages, and accordingly brought about a match between the lady Catherine Gray, ſecond daughter to the duke of Suffolk, and the lord Herbert, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Pembroke; and beſtowed his only daughter Catherine, upon lord Haſtings, eldeſt ſon to the earl of Huntingdon. Theſe marriages were celebrated with ſuch remarkable pomp and feſtivity, that the people, who hated Northumberland, could not forbear expreſſing their indignation in the warmeſt terms, at ſeeing ſuch public demonſtrations of joy, while their beloved monarch was languiſhing on the bed of ſickneſs.

Nothing now remained to complete the deſign of Northumberland, but the execution of the change which Edward had determined to make in the ſucceſſion. On the eleventh of June, Sir Edward Montague, chief juſtice of the Common-pleas, Sir John Baker and Sir Thomas Bromley, two of the judges, the attorney and ſollicitor-general, attended the council, in obedience to a ſummons they had received for that purpoſe, and Edward gave them the minutes of an intended deed for altering the ſucceſſion, with orders to draw them up in the form of a patent. They were aſtoniſhed, and deſired leave to conſult together on a ſubject of ſo much importance to the kingdom in general, and themſelves in particular. After ſome time, they returned, and declared, that they could not obey the king's orders. They juſtly obſerved, that the ſettlement of the crown by Henry VIII. was made purſuant to an act of parliament; whereas this not only wanted that authority, but, by an act paſſed in the beginning of the preſent reign, it was declared to be treaſon in any of the heirs, their aiders and abettors, to attempt to change the order of ſucceſſion. The duke of Northumberland was ſo incenſed at their refuſal, that he behaved in the moſt indecent manner; it was even feared he would proceed to violence againſt their perſons. The king declared, he intended to ſummon a parliament, in order to obtain their ratification of the deed; but in the mean time, commanded them, on their allegiance, to draw the letters patent in the legal form. At the ſame time, the judges were informed by the council, that their refuſal would ſubject them to the pains of high-treaſon. At laſt it was determined that a ſpecial commiſſion ſhould be paſſed by the king and council, commanding the judges to draw a patent for the new ſettlement of the crown; and that a pardon ſhould be granted them for any offence they might commit in executing the commands they had received. The patent was accordingly drawn, and ſigned by all the judges, except Sir James Hales, who, though a ſincere friend to the Reformation, obſtinately refuſed to put his name to the inſtrument. Cranmer alone, of all the officers of ſtate, oppoſed this ſcheme, and laboured aſſiduouſly to perſuade Edward not to alter the ſucceſſion. He alledged, that he could not, without perjury, ſign the patent, as he had already ſworn to the obſervation of Henry's will; but, at Edward's earneſt intreaty, and Northumberland's authoritative inſtances, he ſigned the inſtrument.

The health of Edward now declined viſibly every day, and all hopes of his recovery vaniſhed. The people had not ſcrupled, for ſome time, to impute the diſorder of Edward to the practices of Northumberland; and an incident which now happened tended to confirm them in their opinion. His phyſicians were all diſcharged by an order of council procured by Northumberland, and the king committed to the care of an ignorant old woman, who engaged, by the help of her noſtrums, to reſtore him, in a ſhort time, to his former health and vigour. But unfortunately for the peace of England, her promiſes were never performed. The ſymptoms were every day aggravated; his cough increaſed, his legs ſwelled, his colour became pale and livid, and he reſigned his breath at Greenwich on the ſixth of July, in the ſixteenth year of his age, and the ſeventh of his reign.

Edward was almoſt idolized by his ſubjects. He was of a mild and ſweet diſpoſition, and ſcrupulouſly attached to the principles of equity and juſtice. His learning was far ſuperior to his years. He loved the liberal arts before he knew them. Had he been indulged with a longer life, there is all the reaſon in the world to ſuppoſe he would have made his people happy by a wiſe and equitable adminiſtration.

MARY.

A.D. 1553. A Civil war is the general conſequence of a breach in the order of ſucceſſion. England had now been involved in that dreadful calamity, had not the duke of Northumberland, the ſole author of this ambitious attempt, been hated by the people. Mary was known to be a bigotted Catholic; but her title to the crown, after the death of her brother, admitted of no diſpute; for the objections ſtated by the friends of lady Jane were new, and unknown to the nation. Mary was conſidered by the people in general as the legal ſucceſſor of Edward. But the ambition of Northumberland was not to be reſtrained; he determined to ſupport the title of lady Jane, tho' he could not be ignorant that he was acting contrary to the opinion of the people. He knew the oppoſition would be powerful, and therefore determined to act with caution. He concealed the king's death for ſome days; and prevailed upon the council to requeſt the attendance of the two princeſſes, Mary and Elizabeth, under pretence of the bad ſtate of health of their brother, who deſired the aſſiſtance of their counſel, and the conſolation of their company.

Ignorant of the treacherous deſign, Mary readily obeyed the ſummons, and was arrived within half a day's journey of the capital, when ſhe diſcovered the ſnare that was laid for her deſtruction. She received a letter from the earl of Arundel, informing her of the death of the king, of the ſettlement of the crown upon lady Jane, and of the deſign of Northumberland to ſeize her perſon. She was now convinced of the neceſſity of immediately providing for her own ſafety. The ſudden death of one of her ſervants, who was ſuppoſed to have died of the plague, furniſhed her with an excuſe for a precipitate return. Nor did ſhe think herſelf ſafe till ſhe reached Framlingham, in Suffolk; whence ſhe wrote, in character of queen, to the council and nobility, demanding to be acknowledged and proclaimed.

Northumberland finding it in vain to diſſemble any longer, threw off the maſk, and reſolved to act in a more open manner. He engaged the council to depute him, and the earl of Suffolk, to Sion-houſe, a ſeat on the banks of the Thames, where the lady Jane then reſided, to inform her that ſhe had been appointed by the deceaſed king to ſucceed him in the throne. Jane, who was nearly of the ſame age with Edward, had received her education with him; and could perſonal merit have entitled her to the crown, ſhe had enjoyed it without oppoſition. She was a lady of the moſt amiable perſon, the moſt engaging diſpoſition, the moſt accompliſhed parts. The ſtudy of the learned languages was at once her employment and her delight; and ſhe preferred the leſſons of Plato to the amuſements of the court. She was a ſtranger to ambition; ſhe deſired not to diſturb the tranquillity of her country. She had hitherto been unacquainted with the ſecret diſpoſitions of Edward in her favour; ſhe never imagined ſhe was deſtined to the throne. Struck with ſurprize and conſternation at the meſſage, ſhe refuſed the offer; alledging the preferable right of the two princeſſes; and warning them of the fatal conſequences that would, in all probability, attend ſo dangerous, and, in her opinion, ſo criminal an enterprize; begging they would let her continue in the private ſtation ſhe had hitherto enjoyed. She wiſhed to refuſe a ſceptre to which ſhe had no right, and which ſhe conſidered as a burden.

Every argument was uſed by her father-in-law, her father, and her huſband, whom ſhe tenderly loved, to combat this reſolution; and ſhe at laſt yielded to their importunities, but with ſo much reluctance, that her conſent was rather extorted than given. She was immediately conducted to the Tower, where it was then cuſtomary for the new monarchs to reſide ſome days before their coronation. The council, who found themſelves, in effect, Northumberland's priſoners, were obliged to attend. They iſſued orders for proclaiming the lady Jane; but ſo thoroughly were the ambitious ſchemes of Northumberland deteſted, that they were obſerved only in the capital: the injuſtice of that nobleman had effectually effaced the merits of the lovely victim of her family's ambition. The news of this revolution was received with ſilent ſurprize by the people; nor were any of thoſe acclamations heard, which are uſual on ſuch occaſions: even the heralds ſeemed to perform their office with regret.

During theſe tranſactions, Mary exerted all her intereſt to oppoſe the deſigns of Northumberland, and to aſſert her own title to the crown. She was attended by great numbers of the neighbouring inhabitants; and, by poſitively promiſing to leave religion in the ſame ſtate ſhe found it, reſerving nothing more than a liberty to profeſs her own, ſhe fixed the people in her intereſt; and though ſtrongly attached to the Reformation, they promiſed to ſupport her with their lives and fortunes. She was now joined by numbers of the nobility and gentry; particularly by the earls of Bath and Suſſex, Sir Thomas Mordaunt, Sir John Wharton, Sir William Drury, Sir Henry Bedingfield, and Sir Henry Jernegar, who all repaired to her ſtandard, and brought her a ſtrong reinforcement. Sir Edward Haſtings, brother to the earl of Huntingdon, having been ordered by the government to levy troops for the ſervice of lady Jane, deſerted to Mary, at the head of four thouſand men. Even the fleet which had been ſent by Northumberland to cruiſe on the coaſt of Suffolk, in order to prevent either the eſcape of Mary, or the landing of foreign forces to her aſſiſtance, ſubmitted to that princeſs.

Theſe unexpected events alarmed Northumberland, who ordered the army in the neighbourhood of London to march immediately towards Newmarket, under the command of the duke of Suffolk. But the counſellors perſuaded Northumberland to head the army in perſon; obſerving, that his known valour, his ſuperior military acquiſitions, and the dread of his name, already terrible in Norfolk by his victory in the late reign, would ſtrike the inſurgents with fear. He followed their advice, and joined the army, which amounted to ſix thouſand foot and two thouſand horſe.

The approach of Northumberland alarmed ſeveral of Mary's friends, and they adviſed the princeſs to retire to the continent. Had the duke advanced with that expedition which the cauſe he had undertaken to ſupport demanded, the advice had, probably, been followed; but he marched in ſo ſlow and deliberate a manner, that Mary's friends had time to recover from their fears, and to join her ſtandard with all their forces. When Northumberland reached Bury, he found that great numbers of his men had deſerted, and he was obliged to wait for reinforcements from London before he could advance againſt Mary's army.

The departure of Northumberland gave the counſellors an opportunity of leaving the Tower, where they had been in ſome meaſure confined by that ambitious nobleman, under pretence of attending upon the perſon of lady Jane till her coronation. They aſſembled at Baynard's Caſtle, a houſe belonging to the earl of Pembroke, and invited thither all the noblemen whom they conceived to be well affected to Mary. A conſiderable number attended; and the conference was opened by the earl of Arundel, who inveighed, in the ſtrongeſt terms, againſt "the cruelty and injuſtice of Northumberland, his inſatiable avarice and unbounded ambition, the criminal deſign he had formed for altering the ſucceſſion, and the wickedneſs in which he had involved the whole council: and concluded with moving, that they might return immediately to their duty and allegiance, which they owed their lawful ſovereign, by proclaiming Mary queen, as the only method they could now take to preſerve the tranquillity of the ſtate, and recover their own honours."

Pembroke ſeconded the motion; and laying his hand upon his ſword, ſwore he was ready to fight any man who ſhould preſume to oppoſe ſo ſalutary a meaſure. But there was no occaſion for employing force: the majority expreſſed their approbation of the propoſal: the lord-mayor and aldermen were ordered to attend immediately; and Mary was proclaimed on the nineteenth of July, in the ſtreets of London and Weſtminſter. Te Deum was ſung in the cathedral of St. Paul's, and the event celebrated with great rejoicings by the populace. Even the duke of Suffolk himſelf, who commanded in the Tower, finding all reſiſtance would be in vain, ordered the gates to be thrown open, and declared for queen Mary. Lady Jane again deſcended to a private ſtation; which ſhe would never have left, had not the ambition of her relations forced her to graſp a ſceptre which belonged to another.

Orders were now diſpatched to the duke of Northumberland to diſband his army; but before they reached his hands, he had been deſerted by his troops, and endeavoured to gain the favour of the queen by an early ſubmiſſion: he proclaimed her queen with all the external marks of joy and ſatisfaction. But Mary was not to be deceived by the hypocritical behaviour of Northumberland; ſhe knew him to be an inveterate enemy to her whole family, and that his expreſſions of loyalty and zeal for her ſervice were wholly extorted by fear. She therefore immediately ſent the earl of Arundel to arreſt that ambitious nobleman, his ſons and accomplices. The haughty Northumberland loſt at once both his hopes and his courage. Arundel no ſooner informed him of the purport of his viſit, than he fell at his feet, and, in the moſt ſubmiſſive manner, begged his favour. This abject behaviour, ſo peculiar to fallen inſolence, excited the contempt, rather than the pity of Arundel. He told the duke the queen's orders muſt be obeyed; and Northumberland, together with two of his ſons, and his principal accomplices, were ſent to London, and committed to the Tower. The duke of Suffolk, lady Jane, and lord Guilford Dudley, were alſo taken into cuſtody.

All oppoſition being thus deſtroyed, Mary, attended by vaſt numbers of people, and a long train of courtiers, ſet out from Framlingham for London, where ſhe was met by the princeſs Elizabeth, with a body of two thouſand men. She had raiſed thoſe forces as a defence for her own perſon during the troubles which ſeemed to threaten the kingdom with all the horrors of a civil war; but on being informed of her ſiſter's ſucceſs, and the entire ſubmiſſion of Northumberland's party, ſhe proceeded, at the head of her little army, to join her ſiſter; and had the addreſs to gain her confidence, by aſſuring her that theſe men were raiſed for her ſervice.

Mary made a very pompous entry into London; and proceeding immediately to the Tower, where the duke of Norfolk, who had been detained priſoner ever ſince the death of her father; Courtney, ſon to the marquis of Exeter, who, without being charged with any crime, had been ſubject to the ſame puniſhment ever ſince his father's attainder; the three prelates, Gardiner, Tonſtal, and Bonner, who had been confined for their adherence to the Catholic religion, appeared before her, and implored her clemency and protection. She embraced them all in the moſt affectionate manner, ſaying to the conſtable of the Tower, "Theſe are my priſoners;" ordered them inſtantly to be ſet at liberty, and admitted them to her confidence and favour. The prelates were reſtored to their ſees; Courtney was created earl of Devonſhire, and Gardiner made lord high chancellor of England.

Notwithſtanding the promiſe Mary had made to continue the religion eſtabliſhed by Edward, ſhe was determined to make promiſes, oaths, juſtice, and even intereſt itſelf, give way to her favourite project of reſtoring the religion of the church of Rome. She granted, indeed, a kind of general amneſty, and remitted the ſubſidy voted to the late king. But theſe were vain and fallacious appearances; they were ſoon followed by all the rigours of tyranny. The queen, naturally ſolemn, melancholy, and opinionated, was ſo much the more ſuſceptible of the impreſſions of falſe zeal, as ſhe had been brought up in the moſt profound ignorance; and while her head was diſturbed about her religion, her heart was the more ſeverely ſet againſt the Proteſtants. From theſe ſources her whole reign became a ſcene of miſery, and the kingdom was deluged with the blood of its inhabitants.

Her firſt care, after ſecuring the perſons of thoſe from whom ſhe expected the greateſt oppoſition, was to conſult with her friends the beſt method of extirpating the reformed religion. She was ſo determined to keep no meaſures with the Proteſtants, and force the kingdom to join immediately in what ſhe called the Union of the Catholic Church, that had it not been for the more artful counſels of Charles V. and biſhop Gardiner, ſhe had ſent directly for cardinal Pole, as legate, to reconcile England to the biſhop of Rome. But they both diſapproving of a ſtep of ſuch dangerous tendency, the queen was, with great reluctance, prevailed upon to ſuſpend her reſolution for the preſent, and to content herſelf with publiſhing a liberty of conſcience in affairs of religion.

This declaration, which was made by the queen in council on the twelfth of Auguſt, was rendered as public as poſſible, and the partizans of Mary magnified it as a noble inſtance of the queen's generoſity. The Proteſtants, however, conſidered it in a very different light: they were alarmed for their religion; and their fears were ſoon confirmed by the confidence of the Catholics, who made no ſcruple of inveighing, in the moſt bitter terms, againſt the tenets of the Proteſtants. Bourne, one of the chaplains of biſhop Bonner, in a ſermon preached before that prelate in the cathedral of St. Paul's, uſed the moſt indecent invectives againſt Edward's adminiſtration, particularly with regard to the Reformation. But he ſhould have remembered, that the memory of Edward was ſtill dear to the people who were alarmed for their religion, and it could not be ſuppoſed they would part with it eaſily. Accordingly a furious tumult was excited: ſome of the audience reproached him in the harſheſt terms; others pelted him with ſtones; and one of them threw a dagger with ſuch dexterity at the preacher, that it narrowly miſſed his face, and ſtuck faſt in the wood of the pulpit behind him. At laſt the people grew ſo furious, that Bourne would probably have been torn in pieces, had not Bradford and Rogers, two eminent Proteſtant miniſters, interpoſed, and conveyed him, by a private door, out of the church, to a neighbouring houſe.

So glaring a proof of the people's diſlike to popery ſhould have been a caution to the adminiſtration not to proceed too zealouſly in favour of ſuperſtition: but it produced the contrary effect; they determined to have recourſe to more violent meaſures. The Proteſtants were filled with terror: they plainly perceived that religion and the laws of their country would ſoon ſuffer a violent change, and that thoſe who refuſed to adhere to the new ſtatutes would be conſidered as rebels. The city of London ſhewed, on this occaſion, ſome dawnings of the ſpirit of liberty; they made no enquiries into the tumult excited againſt Bourne in the cathedral. The government ſuſpecting the magiſtrates were not ſufficiently aſſiduous in the cauſe of ſuperſtition, inſiſted on their declaring whether they were able, by their own authority, to prevent all public tumults; and if they thought themſelves incapable of effecting ſo neceſſary a deſign, the lord mayor was ordered to ſurrender the ſword of juſtice into the queen's hand, that ſhe might herſelf uſe it for the good of her people.

Mary's reign had not yet been ſtained with any ſanguinary act; but it was now thought neceſſary to open the ſluices of ſeverity, which ſoon deluged the land with blood. On the eighteenth of Auguſt, the duke of Northumberland was brought to his trial in Weſtminſter-hall, and arraigned for high-treaſon. After the indictment was read, the duke deſired permiſſion to propoſe two queſtions to the peers who were appointed to decide his fate: firſt, Whether any perſon could be guilty of treaſon for having obeyed orders given him by the council, under the great ſeal? Secondly, Whether thoſe who were equally guilty with himſelf could ſit as his judges? The high-ſteward anſwered, That the great-ſeal of an uſurper had no authority; and that thoſe peers who had neither been impeached nor convicted, were innocent in the eye of the law, and therefore might be admitted on any jury. Theſe anſwers, though far from being uncontrovertible, ſufficiently convinced the duke, that it would be abſolutely uſeleſs to make any objections: he therefore pleaded guilty to the indictment. His example was followed by the marquis of Northampton, and the earl of Warwick, who were tried at the ſame tribunal, and were all condemned to ſuffer as traitors. Sir John and Sir Henry Gates, Sir Andrew Dudley, and Sir Thomas Palmer, who had been ſo inſtrumental in bringing the duke of Somerſet to the block during the late reign, pleaded guilty, and received the ſame ſentence.

The character of the queen, and the preſent ſituation of affairs, left Northumberland no hopes of favour. He was, indeed, deteſted by all parties, and his death was conſidered as a neceſſary act of juſtice. On the ſcaffold, he profeſſed himſelf a member of the Catholic religion; and lamented his having plundered the effects of the church, eſpecially as it was not now in his power to make reſtitution. But whether theſe were his real ſentiments, or whether he hoped, by this declaration, to render the queen more favourable to his family, cannot now be known. However that be, the people who had ſincerely lamented the duke of Somerſet, beheld with joy the puniſhment of his oppreſſor. Sir Thomas Palmer, and Sir John Gates, ſuffered with him. The reſt were thought proper objects of the royal clemency, as they pleaded conſtraint as an excuſe for their treaſon. Suffolk himſelf was pardoned, and recovered his liberty; an indulgence which he owed, in a great meaſure, to the contempt entertained of his capacity. Sentence had been pronounced againſt the lady Jane, and her huſband the lord Guilford Dudley, but without any deſign of carrying it at preſent into execution.
